James Gilchrist was executed at Glasgow, in pursuance of his sentence, on Thursday last; the crime of which he was found guilty, was the murder of his wife. A few minutes before the unfortunate man was launched into eternity, he requested the attention of all present, and, in a clear and audible voice, called the Lord Provost, and the Clergyman who directed his devotions, "to witness at the tribunal of God, that he was innocent of the crime for which he was about to suffer;" and his last words to the Provost were, "My Lord you are parting with an innocent man!"

SUNDAY, JULY 31, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Every intelligence, received during the course of the week from the Continent, so far from repressing the sanguine expectations we entertain relative to the success of the Spaniards and Portuguese, tends to corroborate them. It may be objected, that our tone was too peremptory; that our certainty of success was too unconditional; but, in taking a retrospect of the past for the last three years, that is the whole of the Austrian and Prussian war, our Readers will not fail to notice the important circumstance, that in a shorter space of time than the Spanish insurrection has already lasted, the Austrian and Prussian armies had been annihilated, and the two monarchies lay prostrate at the feet of the conqueror. It is unnecessary to advert to the vast accession of strength which every day, every week, every month, brings to a popular insurrection. It is like a heap of snow loosened from the summit of a mountain, in proportion as it descends, its bulk increases, till it becomes so irresistible by its weight and its size, that every object which stands is dragged after it, and serves to augment its terrific and devastating effects. If the Gallic Monster had not been able to stifle the young Hercules in his cradle, shall we entertain any apprehension that he will be able to do it when the hero arrives at maturity. All the philosophic glare of our age, all the affected eccentricity of our modern writers, are not persuasive enough to make us renounce early religious impressions, and to doubt of retributive justice. There must be a term to villainy—the cause of justice, though exposed to trials and difficulties for a time, must be finally triumphant. Religion—experience, traditionary and historical, confirm this opinion.

But it is perfectly unnecessary we should have recourse to declamation to aid the opinion we entertained of Spanish affairs. There are facts, strong irresistible facts, in support of it. Every mail from the Continent brings them—Every foreign newspaper contains them; even the sophistry and artifices of the common enemy cannot disguise them. They are like the sun, which a transient cloud may obscure, but which bursts through the thin vapour with brighter splendour. But where are these facts? They are to be seen in the very Bulletins of the French army, in the official and semi-official papers of the Tyrant. On witnessing the rhodomantades, and contradictions of Sir John Falstaff, have we any doubt that the blustering bully is a most shameless egregious liar. Is it necessary to have been before acquainted with the circumstance of Harry taking away from him his ill-acquired booty, to be convinced that the Knight is telling a most flagrant untruth. His very tone, his manner, convey conviction. Read the diary of Madrid—read the letter from the Elbe—and read all their other diaries and letters, and remark their contradictions and blusterings, and every man of common experience and judgment will pronounce BONAPARTE as notorious and infamous a liar. Oh! what pleasure must it afford to every man of integrity and feeling, whether Briton, Spaniard, or German, to see that insolent, imperious upstart reduced to that last state of degradation and infamy, to lose his prey, and afterwards to heap one falsehood upon another, in order to cover his ignominy. "What trick, what device, what starting hole "canst thou now find out, to hide thee from this open and "apparent shame?" Such is then the issue of all his crimes and atrocities. With the superior abilities he possessed, with the influence he could easily have acquired over the public opinion of Europe, he might have done more good to mankind than any man we have ever read of in history. But now the career is closed; and though he may at the extremity of it, shed torrents of blood, and inundate Spain with slaughter and devastation, he is however reduced to the diabolical predicament, that the gate of reformation and mercy is shut to him for ever. The army he can employ against Spain, as we have repeatedly observed, is entirely incompetent for that purpose. We have also observed, that he would be compelled to divide his army for want of provisions: these divisions will not receive a moment's respite from the Patriotic Generals. His foraging parties will be harrassed by the armed peasants. If he draws supplies from France, he must have armies to protect them; or they fall into the hands of the Patriots. This scarcity of provisions will compel him to divide his army into still smaller divisions, and it will crumble to pieces without even the honour of a general engagement. He may raise the conscripts of the years 1809 and 1810, they will never be able to supply the loss of his veteran army, and they are inferior, even in point of discipline, to the Spanish Patriots. If he has not been able as yet even to resist successfully the isolated efforts of the Spaniards, what means will he be able to oppose to the Spanish insurrection, when it is better organized, and aided by our numerous expeditions. On account of our superiority at sea, and the good wishes of the natives, we shall not meet with the same difficulty of subsisting our army. This will enable them to act occasionally in a body, when their number, bravery, and discipline, will overwhelm any corps the French will be able to oppose to them. However the highest policy would suggest the expediency of compelling him to employ a considerable part of his army and recruits along the French coasts: we should have, as was already observed in this Paper, flying squadrons from Calais to Bayonne, with about ten thousand of our best soldiers on board, and make partial descents on every part of the French coast: these squadrons may unite or act separately, as the service may require. It is said that Lord Nelson highly approved of this mode of annoying the French. We know it from experience, that the French, during the Prussian and Austrian war, did not retain a single soldier in France, except such as were necessary for drilling the conscripts, and for defending Brest and Boulogne; and even a part of this service was confided to the new raised national guards. He cannot rely even on this resource at present. There were never twenty thousand organized at any period. The French papers, it is true, asserted the contrary; but that was an absolute ruse de guerre. He is too much afraid of entrusting arms to the people at the present crisis, when their detestation and the ruinous war he carries on in Spain, may induce the inhabitants to turn these arms against himself. The commanders of our squadrons should also receive orders to circulate all along the coast from the Elbe to Trieste, papers in in the French, German, Italian, and Dutch languages, containing the Spanish Proclamations, and a faithful narrative of the events in that peninsula. This could be very easily effected; and did they produce no other effect than to keep alive his jealousy and apprehension, as he knows, and as every tyrant believes, that the people have a right to abhor him, he will be compelled to keep a considerable force in the interior and along the coast. No means of annoyance should be neglected: one blow should succeed another. The present crisis is decisive of his fate and that of Europe. This favourable moment may never more return; and if we neglect, we deserve to lose the advantages it offers. Every means of attack we can employ against him are lawful. He is a bandit, an outlaw, who has trampled on laws, institutions, and customs. The war is between him and civilized society; and it would be inhumanity towards the millions who inhabit Europe, to recommend that our attack against that lawless villain should be conducted on the principles of the laws of nations. In particular, we should turn our attention to Brabant and Holland. We have traversed the two countries in every direction, in the beginning of the Austrian and Prussian wars; and their abhorrence of BONAPARTE at that time was so great, that had the late or preceding Ministry effected a landing of thirty thousand men, they would have been joined by the greater part of the male population of the two countries. We recur again to the necessity of suggesting, as we did in our last number, the expediency of collecting our whole disposeable force remaining in Great Britain, opposite the coast of Flanders. Austria is at the same time on the alert. We received subsequent information to the letter we exclusively communicated on Sunday last, from our correspondent in Hamburgh, which puts it beyond every doubt, that if Austria has not already declared war against France, a war is unavoidable. It is true our subsequent information shews that our correspondent was premature in his account of the departure of ANDREOSSY, but it confirms the other circumstances mentioned in that letter. We have also received, through the same channel, the positive account, that the troops stationed in Gallicia and Hungary were to form two camps, one near Schoenbrun, and the other at Egra, to which the regiments in Bohemia were likewise to be joined. The last French accounts set the authenticity of this information beyond a doubt. Their forming a camp near Berlin, and collecting so large a force in Silesia, prove it irrefragably. That our Government has foreseen this event, may be concluded from the commission of Mr. ADAIR, who, we entertain no doubt, goes to Vienna, and not to Constantinople, as is generally stated. The accounts from the North of Germany confirm this opinion, as it was confidently reported there, that he had already arrived at Trieste.

Denmark begins at last to feel the disastrous effects of her alliance with the common tyrant. The marks of her sovereignty have been torn down in every part of Holstein, and those of her perfidious ally substituted in their place. We congratulate the Danes on account of this signal perfidy. If the flagrant experience of the past could not instruct them, it is to be supposed that this insult will rouse them to a sense of their danger. Very little entreaty, very little diplomatic skill will be now necessary to make them recoil with horror from the gulph in which they were going to plunge; and we expect that our Ministers will neglect nothing in order to save that deluded government and people. No important news have been received from Sweden in the course of the week, which render it more than probable that Finland will soon cease to be the theatre of the horrors of war between that country and Russia; we therefore sincerely hope that the journey of the gallant Gustavus will contribute to this much wished for event.

In opposition to the public opinion, it is now positively said, that the DUKE of YORK will command the Grand Expedition. The nomination of Sir HARRY BURRARD was only a temporary expedient, preparatory to his Royal Highness taking upon himself the command. We have good authority for stating this; and we sincerely regret that no disinterested friends of his Royal Highness had been consulted by him, before he had resolved on this step. They would have told him that his nomination will be displeasing to the people at large; and whatever opinion we may entertain of his experience, personal bravery, and tactical knowledge, we are convinced that it will be equally displeasing to the people he is going to assist. He is known on the continent only as an unsuccessful officer; and when we reflect what a pernicious influence this circumstance may have on the success of the most important Expedition that ever left this country, we cannot remain silent: however, we will confine, for the present, our strictures to these few remarks, as we still wish, if not hope, that his Royal Highness may be prevailed on to change his resolution.

The Eurydice frigate has arrived at Plymouth, and has brought with her a Spanish schooner, which was cut out of St. Sebastian, by the boats of his Majesty's ship Unicorn. St. Sebastian is a sea-port in Biscay, and a very small distance from Bayonne, the residence of Bonaparte. The Spanish schooner had on board 2000 stand of arms, and dispatches from King Joseph to Buenos Ayres, and the Spanish Colonies in South America. This is the second Dispatch-vessel, sent by Bonaparte or his agents, to the Spanish Colonies, which has been intercepted by our cruizers. The Eurydice was only three days on her passage. From the intelligence which had reached St. Andero before she sailed, it appears that the French had suffered much more severely than the Patriots, in the battle that took place near Valladolid.

We suppose we shall be informed of the result of Sir Arthur Wellesley's Expedition about the begginning of next month; he sailed on the 12th, and would reach the Tagus probably about the 22d; his force is equal to that under Junot, of whom we hope he has by this time given a good account. Sir Charles Cotton will give as good an account, we trust, of the Russian squadron.

Private letters from Holland to the 22d instant, state, that the troops were marching out of that country in all directions, and the inhabitants were called upon to do duty in their place. At the date of the latest accounts from Holland, an embargo was expected to take place in the Dutch ports.

GENERAL JUNOT.—This officer was originally a private in the ranks, and owes his present elevation to a very singular circumstance. During a battle on the Continent, Bonaparte had occasion to send a dispatch to one of his Generals, and having rode up to the company in which Junot served, he asked if any man among them could write: Junot instantly replied in the affirmative. He was accordingly called out of the ranks to a drum head, and Bonaparte dictated his dispatch. While Junot was writing, a cannon ball struck the ground near him, and covered him with dust.—"That will do," said the soldier, "for I wanted some sand for my letter."—"You are a brave fellow," observed Napoleon, "what is there I can do for you?"—"Have," said Junot, "these worsted epaulets taken off my shoulders, and replace them with silver." It was accordingly done; the soldier was promoted, was made Governor afterwards of Paris, and elevated to his present rank. Junot is a brave and excellent General, but must be of a captious disposition, as he has fought not less than fifteen duels.

SAILING MATCH.—Five boats started at six o'clock on Friday evening from Blackfriars-bridge to Putney, for the Cup and Cover annually given by the Proprietors of Vauxhall. Mr. Astley's boat, the Mercury, was the winner.

To-morrow being the first of August, according to annual custom, conformable to the will of Mr. Dogget, Comedian, who was a great amateur of aquatic pleasure, six young men lately out of their apprenticeships will start from the Old Swan, London Bridge, in six wherries, and row against tide, to the Swan at Chelsea; the first that arrives there will be entitled to a Coat and Silver Badge; the second to 5*l.*; and the third to 3*l.* which they will receive at Watermens'-hall.

ANOTHER CRIM. CON. CASE.—Tuesday a labouring man having found his wife in an illicit amour, the husband, without waiting the tedious process of the Courts of Law, thought fit to bring his action on the spot, and so completely covered him with mud, by rolling him in the kennels of Drury-lane, that it was impossible to discover a feature in his face; the Defendant, however, took to his heels, and thus released himself from so dirty an affair.

FROM THE SPANISH PATRIOTS.

Dispatches have been received from Sir T. Dyer, dated Benevento, July 16. They contain an account of a battle between the French and Spanish armies, commanded by General Lassoles and Cuesta, on the 14th, at Rio Seco, near Valladolid, which lasted from half-past eight till half-past twelve. The French force consisted of 10,000 infantry, 2000 cavalry and artillery, and a large proportion of cannon, that of the Patriots amounted to 14,000 infantry, with only 800 cavalry, 26 pieces of cannon, and a body of peasantry. The ardour and impetuosity of the new levies in the Patriot Army were not to be restrained, and consequently they fell in upon the French, and, in the first onset, drove the enemy back, capturing four pieces of cannon, which they spiked. The country, however, being open, and the French being greatly superior in cavalry and artillery, the brave Patriots were unable to maintain the advantage they had gained. They however retreated in good order to Benevento, under cover of the Spanish regiment of Carabineers, leaving behind them 13 pieces of cannon; but the French had suffered so desperately in the action, that they were not in a condition to enter Rico Seco till four hours after the battle, and they made no attempt to pursue the Patriots to Benevento, where General Cuesta continued at the date of Sir T. Dyer's letter, receiving reinforcements, which would speedily enable him to court another meeting with his adversary, and with every prospect of a different result. It must, however, be admitted, that in the plains of Leon and Castile, the enemy, whilst they maintain a superiority in cavalry and horse artillery, fight with great advantage against raw troops, inadequately equipped. The loss, in killed and wounded, is not mentioned. It was reported that the French General Lassoles was killed, and his horse was said to have been found without a rider.

A Gentleman arrived in town on Friday from Bilboa, which he left on the 15th inst. According to his information there had been two engagements in the neighbourhood of Saragossa.—The first, which we have already published, under the name of Palafox, is conceived to be an exaggeration, although the result is understood to have been decisively against the French.—The second engagement, which took place upon the 1st and 2d of July, was fought with uncommon fury, particularly on the part of the Spanish Patriots. On the 1st, the Patriots fought with muskets, against batteries erected by the French, for it seems that the Spaniards were the assailants. But upon the 2d, musketry being found comparatively unavailing, the Patriots threw down their muskets, placed their jackets on their arms, and with their bayonets alone rushed upon the most formidable batteries of the French, whom they dislodged by a most gallant effort. In these attacks the Patriots are said to have been uniformly followed by the women, who, actuated, by patriotic ardour, and fearless of danger, carried wines, and every species of refreshment, for the Patriots. Such, indeed, was the ardour of these women, that they followed the body of valiant men who made the attack we have mentioned upon the French battery, and a number of them were the victims.

Extract from the Porto Journal, "The Loyal Portuguese."—Porto, the 13th July 1808;

Expectata dies aderat.....

"MADRID, JUNE 22.—Within these few days 60 carts laden with wounded Frenchmen, arrived in the city, in consequence of the insurrection in Andalusia. Castanos has 25,000 regular Spanish troops, and 6000 English. From Gibraltar every assistance has been afforded—all the Proclamations have been circulated in Spanish and French. The Marquis of Casaveres, who commanded the cavalry under Echevarria, has been sentenced to be shot, for disobedience of orders. The retreat of Moncey's army, has been completely cut off—General Lefebvre's army, composed of 11,000 men, was completely routed by Palafox; some corps of Catalans arrived in time to distinguish themselves. Murat is fortifying himself in the Prado; every thing announces his attempt to retreat. The brave Brigadier-Gen. D. Joaquim Blake, has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-General. The mournful silence of Bayonne announces the difficult situation of the Great Emperor."

From the mail which left Portsmouth on Friday night, we hear that the whole of the fine army collected there remained at St. Helen's. It has received an accession of some recruits and troops from Ireland, particularly the 2d battalions of the 36th and 45th, which will make it amount to nearly 15,000 men. The first rendezvous is to be off the Tagus.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday His Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor. At two o'clock His Majesty held a private Levee; after which, Major-General Sherbrook was presented to His Majesty, on his return from, and command in Sicily, and on his being appointed Colonel of the Sicilian Regiment.

The Archbishop of Dublin took leave of His Majesty previous to his departure for Dublin

The Recorder made his Report before His Majesty of the convicts capitally convicted at the last Sessions in the Old Bailey, when His Majesty was pleased to respite them all during his Royal pleasure.

FASHIONS FOR AUGUST,

Extracted from the Twenty-fifth Number of LE BEAU MONDE, OR, LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE.

LADIES' DRESSES.

EVENING DRESS.—Gown of plain white sarsnet, made in a chemise form, comes high round the neck; is tied behind with a bunch of white ribband, and the back is full, and trimmed with handsome point lace. The bottom of the dress has a most superb stamped border, with two rows of laced footing, let in the middle of the border; long full sleeves, trimmed round the hand with a lace footing, to correspond with the bottom. A girdle or cordon of St. Jago, the patron Spanish Saint, of silver-cord and tassels, confines the dress round the waist. The Biscayan hat is composed of white satin and silver net, silver tassels, and a wreath of silver stars round the front, which rises flat from the forehead, and gives a pleasing expression to the fair wearer's countenance. Shoes are of white satin, with a silver plaited edging round the foot, and gloves white kid.

MORNING WALKING DRESS.—A plain Indian muslin dress, made walking length, with short Spanish sleeves and back, and front made to cross straît over the bosom, with a blue sarsnet scarf, trimmed with broad French lace, to hang careless over the shoulders, one end of the scarf is rounded off, and the other has three black silk tassels hanging negligently from it. The bonnet is of straw, formed in open lozenges and lined with blue sarsnet, to correspond with the scarf; the trimming is of the same, with a bunch of wild flowers in front.

OBSERVATIONS ON LADIES' DRESSES.

The votaries of fashion are so scattered over the face of the land, and we may say of the sea also, that to dilate on the various whimsicalities of tonish pursuits would require a volume; in that leisure, however, which a summer gives, and which the cessation of winter amusements would soon render irksome, some of our fairest and most fashionable have discovered that employment is the best antidote against tedium and ennui. In consequence, modelling is now become a pursuit in the highest circles; first, among others, her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, under the instruction of Turnerelli, has made considerable progress in the art, and has finished some exquisite busts of the late lamented Duke of Brunswick, and of herself, with which she has honoured some of her particular friends.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES, AND FASHIONABLE OBSERVATIONS.

EVENING DRESS.—The blue coat still maintains a considerable preference; the gilt basket buttons are still much in vogue, and from the marked and general approbation they have received in the higher circles, will no doubt continue some time in use; indeed the sanction of Blood Royal can at all times stamp a celebrity on any article, and from that source does the modern use of the basket buttons spring. Black velvet collars are also sometimes worn on the blue coat, but they are by no means general. White waistcoats are still the complete standard of fashion, and though they have been so long in vogue, it is not likely that any gaudy colours will be adopted in opposition to their elegant simplicity. Very light drabs, or stone-coloured kerseymere breeches, with silk strings, are the most prevalent wear, and many gentlemen, to preserve uniformity, have introduced a silk stocking of the same colour, instead of a white one; the extreme and appropriate neatness of this dress needs no comment.

FOR MORNING WEAR.—The light mixture or light drab colour, or partridge mixed coats, are much worn by the standards of fashion, and these altogether single brensted, and with plated basket buttons. Striped waistcoats, with India nankeen or striped trowsers and gaiters. From the extreme heat of the weather, few have been seen in riding breeches and boots, but we have observed many in stocking pantaloons, made of the finest stocking web, which from their flexibility and lightness are certainly well adapted for summer wear.

THE THEATRE.

HAY-MARKET.

On Friday evening a new Play, in three acts, called The Africans; or, Love, War, and Duty, from the pen of Mr. Colman was represented at this theatre.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Farulho (the Priest).....Mr. Thompson.
Torribal.....Mr. Farley.
Madiboo.....Mr. Fawcett.
Selico.....Mr. Young.
Demba Sego Jallu (King of Kasson)..Mr. Palmer, jun.
Dancori.....Mr. Carles.
Henry Augustus Mug.....Mr. Liston.
Fetterwell.....Mr. Grove.
Marrowbone.....Mr. Menage.
Berissa.....Mrs. Gibbs.
Darina.....Mrs. St. Leger.
Sutta.....Mrs. Liston.

This play is so exactly taken from a French Tale, written by Florian, and entitled Selico, that the English author cannot bring originality of plot among its pretensions to fame. It is an imitation as servile, but at the same time as elegant as the Æneid; yet as the original was neither the Iliad nor the Odissey, the beauties which it contains, do not shine with superior lustre. The following is a correct outline of the fable:

Torribal, Madiboo, and Selico are three brothers, who by their labours support their mother Darina, an aged widow. The youngest, Selico, is about to be married to Berissa, the Mahotan priest Farulho's daughter. The wedding day is arrived, and preparations are made for the festival, when Madiboo informs his brother Torribal that whilst hunting he has perceived a party of Mandingoes lying in ambush near the town, but prevails upon him not to rouse the warriors till the marriage rites are over. On Selico's departure for the mosque with Madiboo, his mother gives him a mantle, which she has woven, as a present for the priest, and Torribal is left to guard and defend her. The scene changes to Farulho's house, and we are introduced to Mr. Henry Augustus Mug, ivory-turner, at No. 25, Snow-hill, London, but now one of Farulho's slaves, whose amour with Sutta, a little black musical companion in captivity, gives birth to several comic songs that greatly enliven the play. The marriage ceremony is on the point of being celebrated; the benevolent priest has, at the request of his daughter, liberated all his slaves; the bridegroom, the bride, and all their friends are assembled, when loud shrieks announce the approach of the Mandingoes. Distracted between duty and love, Selico yields at last to the representations of his brother, and leaves his mistress to hasten to the assistance of his mother. The Mandingoes arrive and set fire to the town, the conflagration of which, with the shouts of the triumphant savages, forms a scene wildly grand, that closes the first act. Five days are supposed to have elapsed before the second rising of the curtain. Torribal, Madiboo, Selico, and their mother have escaped, but as the camp of their foes stands at a short distance from their retreat, they are unable to procure food, and are famished for want. Selico leaves his mother and brothers, to seek among the dead for the corpse of Berissa and her father, and finding two headless bodies, one of which still bears the mantle he had given to the priest, he supposes that both have been murdered. Then after wandering five days without taking any nourishment, he is met by Madiboo, who directs him to his mother, and very opportunely falls in with Henry Augustus Mug, who has become the conquering monarch's Secretary at War, and now roves around the burnt town with a basket of provisions. Madiboo obtains it easily, and carries present comfort to his family. The three brothers soon perceive that famine must ultimately destroy their mother as the rainy season approaches, and the enemy's camp remains fixed in their neighbourhood, in order to sell the slaves they have made to English merchants. Selico proposes that his brothers should sell him, and with the gold support his mother. They both refuse, but he insists, and is led by Madiboo to the camp, where Fetterwell, and other Europeans are bargaining for slaves. On account of his colour, which, they say, does not announce durable strength, the merchants offer such a low price for him that it is not accepted. At this moment, a proclamation is issued, promising a reward of four hundred ounces of gold, to whosoever should bring before the king, the man, who during the night had been seen coming from the tent of his Majesty's favourite female slave, that he may be punished with torture and death. Selico instantly requests his brother to denounce him as the culprit, threatens in case he should refuse, to deliver himself into the hands of the executioner, and forces him to comply with his wishes. The promised reward is given to Madiboo, and stakes are prepared for Selico and the female offender. Meanwhile, Torribal has informed his mother of the cause of Selico's departure, and his intention of selling his freedom. She hurries from her retreat, and whilst on the way to the camp, meets Madiboo loaded with gold, who vainly attempts to prevent her from proceeding, and at last follows her with his brother. The stakes and piles are ready, the King ascends his throne, Selico is chained, the female slave appears covered with a veil, which is snatched from her at the moment she is going to be led to the stake, and Selico perceives Berissa! alive, but on the point of dying in agony, and what to him is no less painful, accused of having received a man in her tent. She knows him, and declares that he is not the offender, but will not betray the name of her nightly visitor. They are both chained, and torches are brought to set fire to the pile, when Farulho bursts through the crowd of guards and spectators, and proclaims himself guilty of having endeavoured at night to free his daughter. The King then interrogates Selico, and learns the whole of his story; at that moment Darina, Torribal and Madiboo arrive, and fall at the monarch's feet. He calls for an English merchant, and bids him say how much he now thinks a slave like Selico is worth. "On account of his virtue, a thousand pieces of gold would not be too high a price," is the answer. "Well, exclaims the King; I give the thousand pieces of gold, not to buy, but to marry him with Berissa." Rejoicings ensue, and the play closes.

Mr. Colman has acquired so much popularity and deserved fame in comedy, that we are astonished his genius would descend to the lower sphere of the melodrama. For though it bear the pompous title of a play, this piece is only a melodrama, not indeed like those senseless compositions, filled with escapes and affected wit, with which the boards of the winter theatres were crowded; but as it should be, teeming with interest, with chaste and elegant language, sometimes beautiful imagery, sentiments that spring from and speak to the heart, and adorned, not overloaded with limited pomp and magnificence. The characters of the three brothers are happily delineated; although they do not possess new features. Torribal is blunt, rough, and sincere; Madiboo, lively, but full of sensibility; and Selico, like most heroes of a play, tender, sentimental, courageous and resigned. The greatest novelty (and novelty it may be called,) at least by the Sovereigns of Africa, China, the Deys, &c. who till then had been accustomed to be visited by wandering Irishmen or plodding Scotchmen alone) is the introduction of a London cockney, drawn with Mr. Coleman's usual felicity, and admirably performed by Liston. The King of Kasson was evidently meant to represent the Emperor of France; but we are at a loss to conceive why, after all the just abuse that has been lavished upon him during the course of the play, his character was displayed at the close in so brilliant a light. There are a few inconsistencies which it is our duty to point out. At first it cannot be supposed that any man in his senses would prefer the celebration of a brother's nuptials, to the security and the very existence of all his countrymen; and yet Madiboo, though conscious of the approach of the foes, and apprized a second time of their arrival by Augustus Mug, instead of calling the warrior to arms, conceals the information he has received, and thus causes the destruction, murder, and captivity, of the inhabitants of a whole town. It seems strange, also, that since Mug describes the Mandingoes as having already entered the town, no one but he should have known their arrival. Secondly, though Torribal, is the most manly, both in age, manners, form, and language, of the three brothers; and describes himself as a lion, in these words—

"We were two lions;
"But I, the bravest—"

In imitation of Cæsar's speech in Shakespeare,

"We were two lions, litter'd in one day,
"But I, the eldest and more terrible."

Yet he remains constantly at his mother's elbow, without encountering any of the dangers with which he is best calculated to contend. These inconsistencies were added by Mr. Coleman, in order to improve on the French tale, which is not totally free from them. Many others might be pointed out, but space will not allow us to do it. The dances are too frequent, and badly executed. The music is old and one of Mr. Kelly's best selections, and what won our approbation, it was openly acknowledged as such. The scenery is beautiful and appropriate; and, with a few curtailments, this piece will deserve the reception which it met with. Mr. Fawcett's acting was excellent, the character seems to have been drawn to suit his powers. Mr. Young was very great in Selico, and now and then reminded us of Mr. Kemble. Mr.

Farley, Mrs. Gibbs, and Mrs. Liston, were very successful in their several parts, Mr. Thompson seemed to have at last mastered his countenance; Mr. Liston to wish that no other candidate for theatrical fame should ever excel him in his character, and Mrs. St. Leger to exert herself, just enough to avoid being hissed, but not to deserve praise. It is the misfortune of this lady, that the most pathetic scenes seem to produce on her a ludicrous impression. Like King Midas, whose touch converted every thing into gold, she converts every circumstance, however afflicting—every speech, however moving, into a subject for laughter. Her manners were not those of an African mother, and her shape far from that of a famished woman.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

SIR,—The Eccentric Divine, mentioned in your last but two, No. 28, must be a very learned man, and must have studied very much, or he never would have been able to prove that the Letters composing the name of Napolen Budnaparte, and the numbers represented by those Letters, before the introduction of figures, amounted to the exact number 666, as is mentioned in the 13th Chapter of the Revelations to be the number of the Beast (Buonaparte).

Now, Sir, I am not so learned a man as the Eccentric Divine, having had little more than a parish education, but wishing for improvement (as no doubt many of your readers do the same) I should esteem it a favour, if he will inform me where he learned that the numbers for which the Letters in the Beast's name should amount to the number 666.

I never understood that Saint John wrote in any other language than Hebrew and Greek.

If, therefore, the Letters are in Greek, the numbers would be 184, if, in Hebrew, 1092, as may be very easily proved by Lamy's Introduction, page 311.

I perceive the method the Eccentric Divine has used to find his numbers is as follows, viz.—The first ten Letters he calls one, two, three, &c. and the residue of the Letters are called 20, 30, 40, &c. adding 10 to every Letter, by which means the number 666 will be found.

But I doubt whether when St. John wrote his Revelation he calculated in that way, therefore I apprehend it is of more modern invention.

However, upon the whole, your readers from what I have wrote, may easily make a table and satisfy their own curiosity, in case the Eccentric Divine will not favour me with a better solution. I am yours, &c.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, WEDNESDAY, JULY 27.

CRIM. CON.

GREGSON v. M'TEGGART.

The Plaintiff in this case was an Attorney, the same who lately recovered in an action against his Coachman, for criminal conversation with his wife; this was a second action against the Defendant, who was a Broker in the City, for criminal conversation before the coachman.

The Attorney General stated all the circumstances of the case as they appeared in evidence, and observed, that although they could give no direct proof of the fact, yet he contended, from the facts which he should lay before the Jury in evidence, that they would be justified in concluding that an adulterous intercourse had taken place. He then adverted to what he admitted, proved a singular feature in the present case, namely, that this was a second action to recover damages for the seduction of the same woman. The reason of this was, that at the time the action against the Coachman was prosecuted, the Plaintiff was not in possession of sufficient evidence against the Defendant to warrant his laying his case before a Jury with any fair prospect of success; but he had since became acquainted with facts which at that time he was wholly ignorant of, and it became him now to bring the Defendant to public justice, because it would appear that he was the first seducer of the unfortunate woman, and consequently was the cause of that miserable state of degradation into which she afterwards fell, by prostituting herself in the basest manner with her menial servant. After many other observations upon the nature and tendency of this injury, the Attorney General proceeded to detail the case in evidence.

Mr. Cooke, the Barrister, the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Mr. Leese, a Surgeon, Mr. Dixon, the Plaintiff's partner in trade, and a Mr. Clementson, all spoke to the good conduct and affection of Mr. Gregson, and the apparent harmony with which he and his wife lived together.

Naomie Smart said she went to live in the family of Mr. Gregson after the death of his former partner, Mr. Smart, which happened in the year 1802. She went with the family to Layton, when Mr. G. took a house there. Mr. M'Teggart was a neighbour; he at first visited the house in a public and open manner, but afterwards he visited in a more private manner, and when Mr. Gregson was absent. Mr. Gregson usually went to town about eight in the morning, and returned about nine or ten at night. Mr. M'Teggart used to come to the house about six or seven, and when he was there the blinds in the dining-room were pulled down: the blinds were usually pulled down in the former part of the day, but they were suffered to remain down after Mr. M'Teggart came there. On those days when he came, Mrs. G. always put on clean linen, and dressed rather gayer than usual. She then spoke particularly to two visits, on one of which, about the end of 1803, Mrs. Close, Mrs. Gregson's mother, was on a visit at the house. Mr. M'Teggart came one evening as usual; and being told Mrs. Gregson was down the garden, he went after her. She saw them together, and they went into a shrubbery near the green-house, where they remained for sometime. When Mrs. Gregson returned to the parlour she heard high words between her and her mother, and Mrs. Gregson burst into tears. On another occasion the witness went into the parlour to carry some coals. Her mistress appeared much confused, and asked her why she came without being rung for. Mr. M'T. was standing in the room, Mrs. Gregson's dress appeared much discomposed, and she appeared very much flurried.

Elizabeth Graves said she lived last with Mr. Gregson at the house at Layton; she said Mr. M'Teggart frequently visited at the house when Mr. Gregson was out. While Mrs. Close was on a visit at the house, her mistress and the Defendant often walked together in the garden. One day as she was coming from the kitchen garden, she saw them walking near the green-house, they appeared in earnest conversation, and at length Mr. M'T. took her by the hand, and they walked away behind the green-house which led to a lumber room; she went in doors and mentioned to the other servants what she had seen. Once as she was in the kitchen, she saw across the hall into the drawing-room, Mr. M'Teggart had just come in; he went up to Mrs. Gregson, took her by the hand, and kissed her, which she willingly accepted.

William Goodburne spoke to the visits of Mr. M'T. in town. He had seen Mr. M'T. take hold of her hand and kiss her at meeting, at a time he supposes they were not aware they were seen by any one. Once he went into the room where they were together. He found them sitting on the sofa, and one arm of Mr. M'T. was resting on the sofa behind Mrs. Gregson's back.

Matilda Phipps, a young lady who was on a visit at Mr. Gregson's on the 11th of March, 1804, stated that at that time she was only ten years old. Mrs. Gregson told her and her sister to go play in the garden, when Mr. M'T. came; she accordingly went out, and passing the window, saw Mr. M'T. kiss Mrs. Gregson.

Elizabeth Downes said she went to live with Mr. Gregson at his new house in town, on the 1st of January, 1807. Soon afterwards Mr. M'Teggart came to the house; she opened the door; he asked, is Mrs. Gregson at home? the witness shewed him up stairs to the room where Mrs. G. usually sat. Mrs. G. was above, and when she came down, as soon as he entered the room, she drew down the blind of one of the windows. She desired the witness to bring some coals, which she did, and saw them sitting close by each other near the fire, the elbows of their chairs touching. The room in which they sat was separated from the kitchen only by a thin wainscot, and her mistress, instead of ringing, usually knocked against the wainscot when she wanted the witness. She heard a noise which at first she thought was a knocking against the wainscot, but after listening she thought it was the rocking of a chair; it continued about ten minutes, and then it ceased; shortly afterwards Mr. M'Teggart came into the kitchen, and talked to her for a minute or two about the smallness of the kitchen. Mrs. Gregson also came into the kitchen, and the witness intended to have remarked her dress, but they both looked at her so intently that she was not able to make any observation on her mistress. As soon as the Defendant was gone, Mrs. Gregson went into her bed room and dressed herself. When she went into the room she found the chairs displaced, and Mr. M'Teggart in the dark corner, where the blind was down. There was a sofa in the room, but as it had a loose case it would have betrayed if any one had been upon it. Her opinion was, that at that time Defendant and her mistress had had criminal intercourse. Two other servants spoke to the frequent visits of the Defendant.

Mr. Dallas, for the Defendant, made a most animated and elegant speech, in which he vindicated his innocence. He commented on the singularity of the present action, which could be for no other purpose but the design of getting money from the pocket of the Defendant, as for all the purposes of a divorce, the former action was sufficient. He observed, that in most questions of this kind two considerations occurred, the fact of the adultery, and the quantum of damages. Upon the latter he should not have a word to say. The woman had, with a most base and crapulent appetite, debased herself to prostitution with her own coachman. For losing such a wife who could demand damages? But he stood there to assert what the Defendant had before asserted, that he was not guilty of the fact imputed to him, and of this he hoped to convince the Jury. The learned Counsel then went into a minute examination of the evidence, and contended it did not bring home the guilt charged upon the Defendant.

Lord Ellenborough having summed up, the Jury withdrew, and after a deliberation of two hours, found a verdict for the Plaintiff—Damages One Shilling.

MONDAY, JULY 25.

SIR JOHN CARR v. HOOD AND SHARPE.

This was an action brought by the Plaintiff, to recover from the Defendants, booksellers in the Poultry, a specific damage for an injury he had sustained, in consequence of a book published by them, entitled "Hints for a rights merrie and conceitede Tour, in quarto, to be called The Stranger in Ireland, which, it was alledged, was written with a view to ridicule the Plaintiff's work, called A Stranger in Ireland, and generally to depreciate his reputation as an author, and hold him up to public derision and contempt; the consequence was, that the Plaintiff had lost the sale of a manuscript work, entitled A Tour through Scotland, and had been otherwise damnified and injured.—The Defendants admitted themselves to be the publishers of the Hints in question, and that it was written for the purpose of ridiculing The Stranger in Ireland, but contended that they had done it in the fair exercise of free discussion, and their just right of fair and honest criticism.

Mr. Garrow addressed the Jury, commenting on the nature of the book in question, which he contended was not legitimate and fair criticism, and for the motives with which it was written, he bade the Jury look to the frontispiece, which he said was grossly personal and scurrilous. In that Sir John Carr was represented as the Stranger in Ireland, and the description to the plate makes him exclaim—"a blazing comet shakes its fiery tail over my head, and marshals me the way.—Now behold a cloud before this erratic stranger—'tis Shakespeare's, and very like a whale. The moon, my favourite star, smiles benignly upon my labours, and three wild Irish are for this night only seen flying in compliment to me."—The Learned Counsel quoted other offensive parts, to shew a tendency to ridicule the Plaintiff, and called upon the Jury for ample damages.

Sir Richard Phillips was called to prove that he had refused to purchase the Plaintiff's Tour through Scotland, from the prejudice he supposed the book published by the Defendants had raised against the productions and writings of the Plaintiff. But for that publication, he should have given him the same sum he had received for his Stranger in Ireland, his Tour through Holland, A Northern Summer, &c. namely, 400*l.* Sir Richard said that he had not read My Pocket-Book, and he was not in the habit of reading publications of scurrility, and anonymous libels. He admitted that his name was to The Oxford Review; and he had done so, that there might be one honest review.

Lord Mountsorris said, he had read Sir John Carr's Stranger in Ireland, from having previously heard that he had spoken handsomely of Ireland. He had also read the criticism upon it, and he had been deterred from purchasing Sir John's book in consequence.

Sir Vicary Gibbs addressed the Jury. The Defendants, he said, had done nothing more than they were justified in doing, exercised just right of fair criticism, and the result of that criticism was, that Lord Mountsorris, who had compared the Plaintiff's works and the critique together, had made up his mind not to purchase it, thereby proving the truth and propriety of the remarks upon it. The Learned Counsel said, it was the lot of authors to have their works criticised, ancient as well as modern. The philosophy of Socrates was exposed by Aristophanes, Descartes was refuted by Sir Isaac Newton, and Locke overturned the doctrines of Sir Robert Filmer. In short, the Defendants had done nothing more than perform their duty to the Public as critics, and the Plaintiff had no right of action.

Lord Ellenborough said, that every man who wrote committed himself to the judgment of the Public, and every one might comment upon his work. If the commentator did not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation, he exercised only a fair legitimate right. In the present case, the Plaintiff had embodied himself in his work; the principal part of his tour was concerning himself, and therefore placing him in Dublin, and the long coach waiting for him, was not irrelevant to the subject. Had the party writing the criticism followed the Plaintiff out of his book into domestic life for the purpose of slander, that would have been libellous, but not otherwise. To repress just criticism, would be extremely injurious to society. If a work was sent into the world that was likely to disseminate a bad taste, or was destructive of public morals, it was of the first importance to correct and expose it. Society in that case was indebted to the critic. His Lordship then alluded to the advancement of philosophy and science, by the opposition one great man had offered to another, and repeated the observations of the Attorney General on that subject. If an individual, he said, presented the public with an outline sketch of himself, that the public had a right to finish the picture; and if the criticism was a fair one, the author must take the consequences of it. His Lordship added, that he did not know of any more threatening to the Liberty of the Press, than the species of action before the Court; and he would again repeat, that if the publication complained of was a fair criticism, and the author had not travelled out of the work he criticised for the purpose of slander, the action would not lie; but if the Jury could see any thing personally slanderous against the Plaintiff, unconnected with the work he had given to the Public, in that case the Plaintiff had his right to action, and they would find accordingly.

The Jury consulted together a few minutes, and found for the Defendants.

WINCHESTER ASSIZES, JULY 28, 1808.

BEFORE MR. BARON GRAHAM AND A SPECIAL JURY.

CRIM. CON.

COLONEL T. R, POWLETT v. LORD SACKVILLE.

This was an action to recover damages for criminal conversation with the plaintiff's wife—the damages were laid at 5000*l.*

Mr. Serjeant Lens, proceeded to state, that Lord Sackville had introduced himself to Mrs. Powlett as the friend of her husband, and that he had, on several occasions, taken advantage of the absence of Colonel Powlett from his town house in Baker-street, North, and also his country residence at Southampton, to debauch the wife of his friend. It would appear in evidence, that on the 10th of June, in the last year, the Defendant effected his criminal purpose at an Inn, at Winchester, while Colonel Powlett was gone on a water party. The facts were too glaring to admit of a doubt. The Defendant's rank aggravated the offence, and the Jury were bound to visit his conduct with the utmost severity.

Mrs. Bell lived at the White Hart, Winchester, two years and a half; remembered that on Friday the 10th of June, Mrs. P. came to the house, witness knew Lady P. very well. In about a quarter of an hour a chaise came with a gentleman. She did not know who he was; but since knew it was Lord S. Shortly after he arrived, saw Mrs. P. walking across the hall, on the ground floor. Mrs. P. looked at witness as she passed; to the best of witness's belief they did not notice each other as they passed, when Lord S. was standing at the door. Witness knew Mrs. P. went up stairs, and saw Lord S. walk several times across the hall. Witness was desired, by her husband, to go up stairs. Witness went to the attic story first, and returned to the door on 2d floor, (No. 4, bed-room). Witness knocked gently with her knuckles. The Lady answered witness could not go in. On this witness went to No. 3, the adjoining bedroom, and found it locked; both chambers communicated by inner doors; one of the windows looked against a wall, and not the High-street. Witness then retired to No. 2, on same floor.——Witness left the door of No. 2, open, and she could have seen any person pass to and fro: remained half an hour before any thing occurred.—Witness then went down, and sent the chambermaid Charlotte.—After the servant came up, witness waited half an hour. Her attention was then attracted by the door opening, and the Lady came out—Mrs. P. asked the chambermaid for a towel from No. 4 door—Witness continued in No. 2; Mrs. P. stood at the door, and went in; afterwards came out of No. 3 door, and went down stairs—Witness attempted to go into No. 4 door, found it locked; she then went into No. 3, and from thence to No. 4; the inner door was open, and she saw the shutters closed and one curtain drawn—Witness saw a Gentleman in the room, who proved to be Lord Sackville, stooping down on the other side of the bed, Mrs. Powlett was close to Witness at this time: the bed was between witness and the Gentlemen—Lord Sackville asked what was the matter?—Witness said nothing—It was the same Gentleman who came in the chaise—Witness was asked by Lady Powlett whether she would explain herself? Said she could not—Witness asked Mrs. Powlett if there was a Gentleman in the room?—Mrs. Powlett said, if witness said nothing about it, nobody would know it—Witness said, the servants would know it, and she could not keep it secret. Lord S. said, "Could nothing be done to recompence them?" Witness made no answer; they both requested after this, that witness would not mention it. Lord S. then went down stairs. Before he went down, Mrs. P. was crying, and witness said, she would not injure her for the world, if she did not injure herself.

Several other witnesses were examined. Their evidence tended in a more or less degree to confirm the adultery; and after a reply from Mr. Garrow, the Learned Judge summed up, and the Jury found a verdict, 3,000*l.* damages.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

PLYMOUTH, JULY 29.—By the Martial gun-brig from off Corrunna is learnt, that General Sir A. Wellesley with his army had been off that port; but finding the Spanish Patriots so strong and in such high spirits, he proceeded to the southward, supposed to Lisbon. Came in the Arrow armed schooner from a cruize: she sails to-morrow with dispatches for the coast of Spain and Portugal. Came in the Calypso and another Jamaicaman; they left the rest of the convoy off the Dedman yesterday steering up Channel, under convoy of the Sparrow, 18. Six of the convoy parted company in a gale of wind soon after they sailed.

The following Letter was received on Friday at Lloyd's:—

"His Majesty's Gun-vessel, Martial, Plymouth, 25th July, 1808.

"GENTLEMEN.—I beg leave to inform you of the capture of the Ships Ross, Captain Brown, and Atlantic, Craig, from Jamaica for London, the former on the 14th, and the latter on the 15th, by a Spanish Schooner Privateer of 14 guns, on her passage from La Guira for Spain. I fell in with the two Ships and Schooner on the 19th ult. off Cape Villona. The Ross got into Camiranos, the Atlantic and Schooner into Laxa, where I followed, took possession of the Atlantic, and took her into Corunna, where the Senior Naval Officer on that station now is, and where she now lies for decision; but I fear she will be given up to the Privateer. The Masters and Crews of both Vessels are all well, and are waiting the event.

"To the Underwriters at Lloyd's."

BREAD.—No Court of Aldermen being held on Tuesday, the Lord Mayor, after inspecting the returns, ordered it to remain at its present price.

POLICE.

PUBLIC OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

DUELLING.—In consequence of a dispute between an Attorney's Clerk, of the name of M'Creery and a countryman of his, of the name of Mackintosh, a journeyman tailor, at a public-house, the latter sent the following challenge:

Mr. Mac Creery You are to come to cholk farm to-morrowe morning at halfe past six o'clock, and you are to harm yourself with what ever you please acept sword.

103. Warder Strette, Wm. Mucintosh.

On the evening after the challenge was sent, the landlord of Macintosh, who is a tailor, applied to Lavender, the Officer, to attend at Chalk Farm; the Officer, after hearing all the circumstances, thought them too contemptible to attend to, but the landlord was so much alarmed for his friend, that he agreed to reward him liberally if he would attend. Lavender called upon Macintosh, to know the cause of his courage failing, when his defence was, that there was a mistake in the time, and that he had been to Chalk Farm an hour before the time he had appointed in his note.

The account given by Mr. M'Creery for his non-attendance was, that his wife had not given him the challenge till after the time had expired, when he applied at the Office for a warrant against the tailor. A difficulty arose, in consequence of his not being able to swear to the hand-writing of Macintosh, and on enquiry it turned out that he could not write, and a boy, the son of his landlord, between nine and ten years of age, had written the challenge, by the dictation of Macintosh. The parties have since been brought together and reconciled.

On Monday, information was received at the office, that two Gentlemen were going to fight a duel at Chalk Farm, in consequence of which, Rivett and Adkins were dispatched to take them into custody. The Officers could not meet them in the course of the evening, and went to Chalk Farm in the morning, but no mighty combatants appeared. Upon inquiry, it was discovered that they were two foreigners, Sandoz, a journeyman jeweller, who lodges in Princes-street, Soho, and Dubois, a journeyman watchcase-maker, who lodges in Bateman's buildings. It is supposed that their friends learnt that the Officers were in pursuit of them, on Monday evening, got them together, and made them shake hands.—The Officers, however, apprehended Sandoz, on Thursday evening, and took him before Mr. Read, who made him give bail to keep the peace, himself in 100*l.* and two sureties of 50*l.* each.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

At one o'clock on Friday morning, as the watchman was going his rounds, he discovered a fire in the office of Mr. Cox, copper-plate printer, of Bream's buildings, Chancery-lane.—The office was situated in a narrow place called Bowl and Pin-alley; at the rear of the buildings, and there is not a single fire-plug in either of those places, or several other little courts and alleys that surround it. A small engine from Lincoln's-inn, reached the scene of alarm and terror shortly after the accident was discovered; and the neighbours kindly and hummely furnished it with water from the little reservoirs which they had for domestic use. Before three o'clock some of the engines belonging to the regular Fire Offices arrived. Mr. Cox's office, however, and the workshop of Mr. Lumley, a carpenter adjoining, were entirely consumed; the Old Swan, Bream's-buildings, and several smaller houses received partial injury.

SUICIDE.—A young female, who had deviated from the path of rectitude, and had for some months lived by frequenting the places of public amusement in the metropolis, put a period to her existence on Friday evening, in the New-Road; Mary-le-bone. She severed her wind-pipe with a sharp penknife; and it was supposed that distress of mind led her to her rash end.

ALARMING ACCIDENT.—On Friday evening, about seven o'clock, as the Earl of Paulet and his son, the Hon. Captain Paulet, were taking a ride in his Lordship's phaeton in Hyde-park, the horses took fright and ran away with the vehicle. Captain P. in endeavouring to check the impetuosity of their career, broke the reins. The horses, when they arrived near the new bridge, ran against the wooden railing which separates Rotten-row from the foot path, which they carried away completely. By the concussion Lord Paulet and his son were thrown out of the carriage with a considerable degree of velocity. The fiery animals then dashed along until they came to the Serpentine River, into which they would have undoubtedly plunged head-long, had it not been for the presence of mind and spirited conduct of Mr. Dodding, of Henrietta-street, who was in his barouche with his Lady. Mr. D. on perceiving the direction which the horses were taking, drove his carriage so as to bring his cattle in contact with those of Lord Paulet's; and at the moment when their destruction appeared inevitable, they were preserved. The horses were then secured by the bye-standers. Lord Paulet, being much bruised by the fall, was conveyed to his house in Stratford-place, in Mr. Dudding's carriage. Capt. Paulet, we are happy to add, was not hurt; his preservation was the more miraculous, as he fell upon his head.

BIRTH.

Last week, the Lady of Thomas Harris, Esq. of a daughter, at Goddington, near Oppington, Kent.

DIED.

Petersburgh, May 14, at the tender age of 18 months, her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Elizabeth Alexandrowna.

Lately at Durham, General Montgomery Agnew, Governor of Carlisle, aged 78.

Lately, in the Isle of Man, aged 63, Vicar-General Christian, one of the Ecclesiastical Judges of that Island and Diocese.

Saturday se'nnight Mr. Barthelemon.—He had been upwards of half a century in this country. He was an excellent musician, and was once considered as a first-rate performer on the violin, but the style has changed since he was in vogue, though to the last he was much admired for his taste and skill in playing the works of Corelli, and some of the old masters. He was a very amiable man in private life.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-TWO.

ARE THE FORMER DISASTERS OF AUSTRIA TO BE ATTRIBUTED TO THE INCOMPETENCY OF HER GENERALS?

As a war between Austria and France appears to be unavoidable, it would not be uninteresting to turn back to the last and preceding campaigns, and attempt to discover the cause of the unvarying ill success of the former—a State always remarkable for military enterprize and experience. We are particularly interested in this examination. During nineteen eventful years, Austria, though uniformly unfortunate, has been uniformly respectable; and whilst we turn with disgust from a retrospective view of the conduct of Russia, Prussia, and the other States of the Continent, her fidelity to her engagements, her efforts in the common cause, her dignity in misfortune, her invariable attachment to this country, must render her an object of our peculiar esteem and interest.

The first disasters of Austria, and of the allies in general, should be attributed to a false appreciation of the French Revolution. She had the misfortune to recollect, that insurrections, apparently alike, both in Holland and Brabant, had been easily suppressed, and therefore concluded that the French would not oppose greater resistance. This supposition, though false, was by no means injudicious. Who could have possibly imagined at that time, that such discordant parts, as composed the French Revolution, could be brought by any political process to unite. She therefore thought it a favourable opportunity to weaken that dangerous power, which, for two centuries, had been the principal object of her jealousy and alarm. But let us pass over that time, and hasten to subsequent events as more relative to the object of our disquisition.

History teaches us when the same moral causes operate on men, that the choice of a commander has a decided influence on the issue of a campaign. We have seen this observation verified by the two last wars between Austria and France. The moral advantages were equally great on both sides; because the French had lost every trace of the enthusiasm, which made them do such wonders in the beginning of their Revolution, and they were obliged to rely solely on the physical resources of the State, and the superior skill of their Generals. What was the consequence? As long as Suwarrow was opposed to them, they were always beat; and they lost in a very few months the fruits of all their former exertions and victories in Italy. The fatal spirit of division, which afterwards manifested itself in the camp of the allies, the recal of Suwarrow, and the return of Bonaparte from Egypt, gave them back, however, in a still shorter time than they were losing them, all their former conquests. The same cause produced the same events in the last war. Mack, recommended by intrigue, and supported by the personal friendship of the Emperor, commanded at Ulm; and, in less than three weeks, the finest army in Europe was destroyed, and the capital opened its gates to the enemy. But the Austrians seem at last to be instructed by dearly-bought experience. They now must be convinced that the discipline of their army, that every advantage they may derive from moral causes in this extraordinary crisis of their affairs, that the military spirit of the nobility, and the experience of so many years are all unavailing without a General, who is recommended by his services, and not by birth or patronage. Happily for the Austrian Cabinet and people, they seem to be aware of this important truth; and they confidently look forward to a man, who, though a prince, deserves this mark of national confidence. The Arch-Duke Charles had constantly to labour against Court intrigue, petticoat influence, the rapacity of that swarm of plunderers who fatten on the army and the public. He had nothing to recommend him but his services, his patriotism, and his integrity. No man had greater obstacles to encounter, or was exposed to more disgusts. Though the most distinguished officer, an honest man, and patriotic citizen—though he possessed the highest confidence of the army, he was never entrusted with the principal command, till the empire was brought to the verge of destruction, by the imbecility and cowardice of men, who were thrust into command by Court intrigue or favour. But what was the consequence? As soon as the chief command devolved on him; as soon as the disasters of the State gave him full liberty to act, Bonaparte, who knew to appreciate his talents, always hastened to conclude a peace. We acknowledge we have been induced to choose this subject as the object of our disquisition, in order to counteract the fatal effects which may result to this country from a similar cause. An unexpected event has changed the face of Europe. We have had no direct influence on this change.—It is the effect of one of those extraordinary circumstances which sometimes happen, but cannot be exactly foreseen.

If we would render ourselves worthy this unexpected good fortune, we must make a proper use of it. There has been a mistaken notion entertained almost universally, or, at least published universally, that we are assisting only the Spaniards, that all these vast armaments are made exclusively for their advantage. This is very fine sentiment; and we sincerely esteem the good nature of those persons, though we do not admire their penetration or judgment, who think in this manner. However it is necessary to dissipate this generous delusion; we are not assisting the Spaniards exclusively; we are assisting ourselves, and more efficaciously than the most ardent well-wisher of his country would have dared expect, about three months ago. Nothing is more dangerous to a people than prejudices supported by generous principles; they are always attended with disadvantages, and the sooner they are dissipated the better. We owe this candid declaration likewise to the brave and generous people, who have espoused the honourable cause we are engaged in ourselves. If there ever existed a people who deserved to be treated with candour, and the most distinguished marks of esteem, the Spaniards have the most undoubted claims to this distinction. Their present unparalleled exertions contribute is much to our security and well-being as to their own; and this candid avowal of reciprocal services and advantages is worthy of two nations who prefer liberty to every other consideration. We have every thing to gain from their success—permanent security; a vast preponderance in the interests of Europe; and an immense extension of our commercial relations, are only a part of the advantages.

But let us prove to the Spaniards, to the present generation, and to posterity, that we are not unworthy of this accidental revolution in our affairs; and if we cannot pretend to the merit of having prepared it, let us at least lay claim to the inferior degree of worth, that we know how to turn it to common advantage. The present Ministers, we feel no reluctance in declaring it, on the contrary, we are animated with the most heartfelt satisfaction in doing them justice—have acted, since they received the first communication of this happy event, as honest men, as patriots, and as consummate Statesmen. Let them but continue in the same distinguished manner, and as long as a single record of the present time shall subsist, their names will rank high among the worthiest and most enlightened Statesmen of every age and every country.—Their reputation is strongly established; their claims to the gratitude and confidence of their country and of Europe unquestionable. Is it to be supposed then that men, with such advantages before them, with such a vast fund of honour and fame at their disposal, will sacrifice them all from the paltry consideration of not wishing to offend an individual, let his rank and influence be ever so extensive? What is this in competition with the permanent advantages of their country, with the freedom of Spain and Portugal, the independence of Europe, the securing of those blessings to our children, and the liberty and prosperity of mankind? They know it, and they will feel grateful to us for animadverting on a choice they have a reluctance in making; they know that our immense military preparations are of no use, unless the operations of this gallant army are directed by a distinguished commander. Instead of effecting their great object; instead of returning to their relatives, to their grateful country crowned with victory, followed by the benedictions of the people they went to assist, and animated with the consciousness of having supported the reputation of British bravery, they will be slaughtered on the plains of Spain, because our soldiers cannot fly, and we will have to lament the loss of an army of fifty thousand men, who will be sacrificed without their country possessing even the consolation that they effected the purpose they were sent out for.

When these considerations are weighed, the country, the army loudly declare their opinion, that this is too important an object to be endangered from any consideration for an individual. Whatever his merit, his zeal, probity, or rank may be, unless he be the most distinguished among the distinguished, the destinies of Europe, the fortunes of England, and the fate of a gallant army, cannot be confided to him. The more we reflect upon the importance of the object, the less we can conceive how it is possible, that a man of Mr. Canning's distingnished abilities and rectitude, would ever consent that the nomination of an incompetent person should even be proposed in the cabinet. We call on him here publicly and particularly, because we have the highest veneration for his character and talents, to employ the influence which his merit and eloquence give him, to have a General chosen, to whose suggestions the allies will listen with deference; who possesses the confidence of our own soldiers; and for whom the enemy will entertain some apprehension. Are there any of our princes who possess these qualities, we call upon him to propose them? If they have not that reputation among foreigners, if they cannot pretend to the confidence of the army by former success, if they cannot inspire respect and awe to the Generals of the enemy, they should not have the command. The question is not, what the real merit of the person may be; but if that merit be established in the opinion of others; for this is not a time for experiment; a single defeat may frustrate all our sanguine expectations. Was there ever a braver army than that commanded by Whitelocke, and through the incompetency of the General, it was beat and taken prisoners by a few thousands of half-armed South American ragamuffins. We hope there is no man in this country so void of every particle of natural feeling, as to risk the possibility of having the infamous affair of Buenos Ayres, and of the Helder, acted over again! Away with the disgraceful idea! There are generals in this country, who are every way competent for this distinguished command, and whose former success, will be a security of their future victories. We could mention one man, if we dared give our opinion on so important a subject: a man who possesses equally the confidence of the soldier and the citizen, who has honourably distinguished himself in the cabinet, the senate, and the field, who unites the accomplished manners of the gentleman, the frankness of the soldier, the abilities of the scholar, the virtues of the patriot, with the generosity and good nature of the best man in private life; who possesses so much of that spirit of chivalry, which will endear him to the Spaniards, who knows and speaks their language; who enjoys the esteem and gratitude of foreigners, on account of his distinguished generosity towards the unfortunate refugees that fled from French persecution—It is, in a word, the Earl of Moira.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH AND SWEDISH PAPERS.

JOURNAL OF THE OPERATIONS AT SARAGOSSA.

JUNE 26.—After the attack of the 23d, in which the French suffered a heavy loss, Gen. Lefebvre retreated, with 3,000 men, towards Epila; but the Marquis de Lazan, Palafox's brother, attacked him on the march with a numerous body of Arragonese, who most gallantly combated the enemy; and the latter would have most certainly been totally routed and destroyed, had not two divisions of the peasantry given way. The enemy, however, lost about 1,000 men.

JUNE 27.—Gen. Verdier joined the enemy with about 2,400 men, cavalry and infantry, and some Portuguese. They attacked Saragossa and Monte Torrero. They were repulsed with the loss of 800 men killed, a great number wounded, six pieces of artillery, five cars of ammunition, drums, musical instruments, &c. which were carried into Saragossa. The loss on our side was much less. An express arrived with intelligence of the approach of 7,000 Valencians, with 26 pieces of cannon. These troops were ordered to remain in concealment for the present, to fall in on the enemy the next day when engaged.

JUNE 28.—The enemy renewed the attack in the morning, on Torrero and the city, but were bravely repulsed, losing nearly the whole of their cavalry, and much of their infantry. At Torrero the action proved unfortunate, owing to the treachery of the Commandant of the artillery, who made his men retreat, and abandon two batteries at the most critical moment. The Valencians arrived, though rather late, but they could not dislodge the enemy from Torrero, whence they showered down shells and grenades upon the city; and in the night time, by an act of infamous treachery the powder-magazine in the place, appropriated to bull-fights, was blo[illegible], by which explosion fourteen houses were destroyed, and [illegible] two hundred persons killed. At this moment the enemy presented themselves in three places, hoping to be able to enter; but they were repulsed, and the column which attempted the entrance of Overtamaqueda in front of the temporary powder-magazine was totally destroyed. Orders were instantly issued for the arrest of all the French resident at Saragossa, with their families, and other suspected persons.

JUNE 29.—The Artillery Officer, who sold the batteries of Torrero, ran the gauntlet six times, the soldiers beating him with their ramrods; he was then shot. A fellow was hanged who was detected in going out of the city with dispatches for Murat, from which it appeared, that the three gates attacked the preceding night had been sold. This morning at day-break, the arrests ordered yesterday were carried into execution. Both armies continued warmly engaged.

JUNE 30.—The firing was kept up in the same manner as the day before, and a number of the French were killed.

JULY 1.—The firing continued without interruption till ten this morning, having lasted incessantly for thirty-six hours. A number of the enemy were killed, and their wounded were carried off in a numerous assemblage of waggons to Borja, Tudela, Tafalla, Mallen, and Alagon.

JULY 2.—The attack continued. The bombardment was kept up. Three shells fell on the church of the Pillar; but neither these, nor some others which fell in the city, did much damage. The Monks, with the Nuns, and other ladies, continued busy in making cartridges.

JULY 3.—From morning till night the fire did not cease. Our troops shewed great ardour.

JULY 4.—Yesterday Torrero was reconquered. The French there lost all their officers. Their cavalry were reduced to 13 horses, and the infantry were almost totally destroyed.

JULY 5.—We learn, that the convents and public edifices at Tudela, are inadequate to the reception of the wounded, and that the enemy are conveying them in waggons to Pampeluna. Of two captains of artillery who were wounded, one is dead.—A dead body, inclosed in a coffin, was carried through that city, under an escort, on the way to Bayonne. It was most probably that of Verdier, but of this we are not certain. We are assured, that on the 3d instant the Navarese, in the vicinity of Balteira, put to death a Spanish interpreter, who accompanied the French army. He had dispatches for Napoleon, and a considerable quantity of gold, which was concealed in a mattress. The same day, the people of Tauste, though destitute of fire-arms, made prisoners thirty Cuirassiers, who were scouring the country for provisions, and carried them into Saragossa with their hands tied behind them, though some Chasseurs made an effort to rescue them.

SARAGOSSA GAZETTE, EXTRAORDINARY, JUNE 20.

On the 17th, a Spanish soldier came in, who related that he had been made prisoner by the French. He had a packet directed to the Administrators of Saragossa, which purported that it was put into his hands by the French General Lefebvre, in order to be laid before the Most Excellent Captain-General of this kingdom. The same soldier who brought the packet brought with him many seditious proclamations printed in Bayonne, in the Castilian tongue, which were entrusted him by the French General. It was resolved by the Viceroy of this city, and by the Royal Counsellors and Assistants assembled, that the note should be sent back unopened. The following reply was the consequence, which, with the Manifesto of Bellay, and the proclamation published yesterday, were this day sent to the enemy's camp by the hands of Lieutenant-Colonel Don Manuel de Ena. The following is a literal copy:—

"MOST EXCELLENT SEIGNOR—If his Majesty the Emperor ordered you to re-establish the tranquillity which this country has lost, it is to little purpose that you take this trouble. It is my duty to answer to the confidence which the brave people of Aragon has placed in me, drawing me from the retreat in which I wanted to place the guardianship in my hands. It is at least clear, that I ought not to be led astray by a Spaniard hitherto so delusive. My sword guards the gates of the capital, and my honour answers for its security. It was unnecessary then to give too much importance to this private affair. The troops which suffered on the 15th and 16th should not again be brought into trouble. Let thine be at proper hours quiet in their beds, and I will be at my own hazard. Rest soon being appeased, the indignation of the Spaniards at the excesses of the French is every day increasing. It is known that the spies you paid are unfaithful. A great part of Catalonia has placed itself under my command, with no less a portion of Castile. The Captains-General of Catalonia and Valentia are united with me. Galicia, Estramadura, Asturias, and the four kingdoms of Andalusia, are also resolved to avenge their oppressions. The French troops commit atrocities unworthy of men; they plunder, insult, and kill with impunity, the honest inhabitants who have done them no evil; they have outraged religion, and mutilated the sacred images in a manner unheard of. Neither this conduct, nor the tone which you hold since the days of the 15th or 16th, is proper to satisfy a valiant people. You will do what you can; I will do what I ought to do.

"The General of the troops of Aragon.

"JOSEF DE PALAFOX Y MELGI."

In consequence of the excesses committed by the French troops, it is ordered that, with the exception of their arms and horses, the property taken on them shall be prize.

FROM THE DIARIO DE LA CORUNA.

MURCIA, JULY 2.—There is in the press a second supplement to the Diario of this day, containing an account of the engagement at Valencia, which terminated yesterday at noon, and in which the French, to the number of 19 or 20,000 men, were completely routed. Only 1,200 of them escaped, whom Generals Llamas and Cerbellon are gone in pursuit of; and 1,500 have been marched prisoners into the Galley Arsenal at Carthagena. Moncey was wounded, and is a prisoner at Valencia. This city is now tranquil, being released from the danger of being attacked by the 7,000 French troops, which had already reached the environs of Albacetlas when Llamas and Cerbellon were pursuing, with more than 30,000 men, the rear guard of Moncey's army. These 7,000 were the last reinforcement sent to this General, and they found their graves at Valencia.

BENEVENTE, JULY 22.—Marshal Bessieres, who entered this place with from 10 to 12,000 men, subsequent to the retreat of our army, marched out again in the evening of the 20th.—The country is entirely laid waste, for the enemy cut down all the plantations, and fed their horses with the corn. Seignor Cuesta has retreated with the cavalry, and has left the infantry at their own disposal. It is said that he has gone to join Palafox.

VALDEVIEGAS, JULY 22.—Seignor Cuesta has suddenly evacuated Benevente, and marched for Leon. In consequence of dispatches taken by a serjeant of the regiment of Saragossa, from a French Aid-de-Camp, whom he apprehended in the disguise of a Spanish postillion, and which dispatches were transmitted to Seignor Cuesta, who received them at ten o'clock at night; he dismissed the peasantry belonging to his army, ordered the cavalry to mount, and with them and the flying artillery, he marched off suddenly at twelve o'clock, saying, "Let those who are able and willing follow me." This precipitate departure has given rise to various speculations. There are some, who from the intelligence received yesterday, predict some heroic achievement as the issue of the plan which he had so suddenly adopted.

FROM THE OVIEDO GAZETTE.

SEVILLE, JULY 6.—On the 26th day of June, Seignor Caro attacked Moncey between Quarte and Mislata, villages a small distance from Valencia, and obliged him to retreat. The Spanish arms were crowned with a similar success on the 27th, in which the Valencians sustained a considerable loss, but caused a much greater one to the enemy. Our General had learned, that the enemy meditated an attack upon the town that night, and to cover it, moved under the walls. In fact, the French army began its attack at one o'clock in the afternoon, the 28th, with a brisk fire of artillery and musquetry, directed against different points of the town, principally aiming at the destruction of the gate of Quarte. He, however, was received with such vigour and steadiness, by the batteries placed in the town, partly on the walls, and partly on the tops of houses, that on the approach of night, he retreated in complete disorder to his general quarters, situated between the two villages above said, and defended by a battery advantageously disposed. Under such circumstances, Messrs. Cervellon, Llamas, and Caro, desirous to dislodge him from such a strong position, determined that the Valencian, Murcians, and those troops that garrisoned the town, led on by their respective Commanders, should assault the trenches from all parts, which they did on the 29th. The combat was as obstinate and bloody as may be expected between two armies, the one superiatively disciplined, commanded by one of the greatest Generals France boasts of, placed in the necessity of conquering, or dying, animated by a succession of 16 years victory, and farther protected by his situation; and the other stimulated by the quickest sentiments of Religion, Patriotism, and the love of Liberty. The good cause triumphed at last, and the enemy so completely routed, that from an army of 18,000 men, only 1000 made their escape.

At the departure of the post they were fluctuating in uncertain movements, such as doubt, terror, and despair, may inspire, though at last they took the road of La Mancha. The measures that were taken to break down the bridges over which they were to pass, and, moreover, 100,000 peasants in arms, from the neighbouring districts of Valencia, who are in pursuit of them, all render it almost impracticable for them to make a safe retreat. If all the people of this great nation were penetrated with similar sentiments, and they manifested the same constancy in danger, and obedience to their Chiefs, as these invincible Valencians, we should evince to the whole universe, that there is no occasion for resorting to history to convince ourselves, that great virtues, directed by prudence, operate prodigies against numerous armies, though supported by discipline, and by talents in the Chiefs.

BADAJOZ, JULY 16.—A stratagem contrived by Dupont, and contrary to the law of nations, has preserved his troops from a complete route. General Castanos was preparing to attack him with numerous forces, but discovering in the vanguard of the enemy a multitude of children, women, secular and regular clergymen, drawn from Cordova, he found himself obliged to desist from immolating so many innocent victims.

MADRID, JULY 20.—By letters received from La Mancha, through the last Courier, we learn, that the division of Wesel has been completely routed; he was going with the intention of assisting Dupont, who is in the most critical situation, surrounded in the vicinity of Andujar by forty thousand Andalusians. General Frere, destined for the same enterprize, apprehending a similar fate, did not venture to proceed beyond St. Clemente; there he was joined by nine hundred men, the only remnant of the beautiful army with which Moncey expected to subjugate Valencia. These fugitives are indebted for their existence to a traitor, who has pointed out the way to them for effecting their escape.

We learn from Levida, that the Catalonians have rendered themselves masters, by storm, of Fort Monjuy, with the loss of from 6 to 7,000 men; but they put to the sword the whole of the garrison, in conformity to the laws of war in similar cases.

The present Government takes the severest measures to prevent the dissemination of the news of the disasters experienced by the French arms, in different Provinces of the Kingdom. They have, therefore, prohibited with all rigour, all Diaries, Gazettes, Proclamations, and whatever printed papers are calculated to excite patriotism, or any indignation against the family of Bonaparte; so much so, that those who print, copy, read, or listen to any similar papers, are declared and punished as guilty of high treason.

The arrival of several Patriots in this city, with the consolatory intelligence of the measures taken by the provinces for redeeming Spain, has given rise to a proclamation of the 1st of July, wherein it is commanded that every house-keeper who lets lodgings, shall put up a billet in the front of his house, with the word, "Posada," (lodging-house.) That all strangers arriving in the town, shall, within twenty-four hours, send into the customary register, their names and qualities, with the places they come from, and their motives for visiting Madrid. That no person shall be admitted into any house under pretext of charity, without the above precautions being attended to; and heavy penalties are threatened upon those who contravene them.

CORUNNA, JULY 13.—The Government has issued a public notification, that, among other generous propositions, England has made an offer to guarantee the repayment of whatever sums of money shall be advanced by the wealthy and loyal subjects of Ferdinand VII. for the support of his just cause, and that of the valiant armies who are defending it.

The following are the preliminary articles of a new and perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, between the two nations of Spain and Portugal, concluded on the one hand by the Government of Gallicia, in the name of our August Sovereign Don Ferdinand VII. and on the other by the Supreme Junta of Government established at Oporto, in the name of the Prince Regent of Portugal.

"ART. I. There shall be peace, friendship, and good understanding between the two powers, and they shall mutually aid each other in expelling from every part of their territories in the Peninsula, the tyranny of France (beginning with Portugal), with a view to the preservation of the perfect independence of the two nations, respectively, and to the re-establishment of the sovereignty of their lawful Monarchs.

"II. That the kingdom of Gallicia shall, in the first instance, furnish all the aid in its power to reinforce the army of Portugal; and that it shall further be bound, as far as it shall be able, to induce the other provinces of Spain, bordering on Portugal, to assemble such a force as may be necessary to accomplish the destruction of the common enemy; and that in like manner Portugal, over and above the aid which it will have to give Spain, as soon as it shall have secured its own freedom, engages, as far as possible, to contribute to the re-establishment of the freedom of the other provinces of the said kingdom of Portugal.

"III. The Britis[illegible] most faithful ally of Portugal, having [illegible] present treaty, a copy thereof shall be [illegible] Majesty the King of Great Britain, in [illegible] ance of its stipulations.

"In testimony whereof, we affix our signatures to the present convention.

JULY 23.—On the 19th inst. arrived at the port of Vivero, in an English frigate, Don Joachim Freyre, a Lieutenant of the Navy, one of the deputies who were sent to his Britannic Majesty. He set off immediately for this town, and arrived here on the morning of the 20th.

At the same time an English frigate and sloop of war entered this harbour; they saluted the forts, which returned the honour with 21 guns. They had on board a Deputation from Great Britain to the Government of Gallicia, consisting of General Sir Arthur Wellesley and four Colonels. At one o'clock the General and Colonels arrived at the Mole, amidst an immense concourse of people, who incessantly shouted, "Long live the King of Great Britain." At four o'clock in the afternoon, by order of the Government, a Deputation, consisting of the Governor of this garrison, Don Miguel Blanes, Auditor, &c. Marquis de St. Miguel, and Senor de la Pencia, went on board the frigate in which the Envoy from his Britannic Majesty arrived. Having exchanged the most sincere protestations of the strict union and alliance now existing between the two nations, the whole of them landed amidst repeated discharges of artillery. The party then proceeded to the Palace, where the Members of the Government had assembled, and the Envoy from his Britannic Majesty was received in great state. On the same evening the following note was addressed to the Clergy of the different parishes:—

"This City, in order to manifest its generous gratitude to the English nation, grants permission for a general illumination, to commence at nine o'clock this evening, and communicates the necessary information to your Reverence, in order that you may contribute, on your part, to so honourable a festival, by giving orders that all the bells be rung and for a longer time than is usual in such cases."

During the illumination and ringing of the bells, the Members of the Government and the British Envoy paraded the streets, attended by a vast concourse, accompanied by a band of music, and escorted by a body of troops. He afterwards went on board his ship. He landed again on the following morning, amidst repeated discharges of artillery, and on entering the house appropriated to his residence, a company of the Royal Corps of Artillery, with their colours, was stationed to keep guard before it.

JULY 30.—Marshal Bessieres having written to his Excellency Don Joaquin Blake, in the usual style of Bonaparte's Generals, with the view of bringing about the destruction of this country, and the annihilation of its inhabitants, the General has in reply addressed to him the following letter:—

SENOR GENERAL, July 24.

I return thanks to your Excellency for the humane treatment which you assure me has been given to the Spanish prisoners, and on my part I assure you, that the French do not mistake Spanish generosity. It belongs to your Excellency and to me, to banish from our armies that ferocity which does not belong to the truly brave. Good soldiers fight with spirit, and esteem these enemies in proportion to the firm resistance they experience from them. From your Excellency's well-known character, such are, I believe, the principles by which your conduct is guided.

I am also convinced, that your Excellency will know how to appreciate my frank and decided declaration, which is, that I acknowledge no Sovereign except Fernando de Bourbon, or his legitimate heirs. But if it happen, that this unfortunate family should be completely extinguished, I should then only acknowledge for my Sovereign the People of Spain, lawfully represented in General Cortes. This manner of thinking is not confined to me alone; I express to you the sentiments of all the army, and of the whole nation, with the exception of a small number of men, who are governed by the most interested self interest. Be persuaded, that I inform you of the real state of things.—Do not mistake the forced submission of some towns occupied by French troops, for a real change of opinion in the inhabitants. Undeceive, therefore, your Emperor, and if it be true that he possesses a philanthrophic mind, he will renounce the project of subduing Spain. Whatever partial successes he may obtain, it is evident that his brother never can reign in this country, unless he reign over a desert, covered with the blood of Spaniards, and of the troops employed on this unjust enterprize. Notwithstanding the aversion with which I view the cause you support, I assure your Excellency that I entertain for you that high consideration which is due to your eminent personal qualities.

JOAQUIM BLAKE,
General in Chief of the Army of Gallicia.

To his Excellency Marshal Bessieres.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE "DIARIO DE LA CORUNNA," OF THE 29TH JULY.

On the 27th inst. the following resolution was communicated to the General in Chief of the Army, D. Joaquin Blake:—

"The Council of Government taking into consideration the distinguished merit and services of your Excellency, and in just remuneration of the heroism with which your Excellency has shed additional lustre upon them, by your answer to the letter addressed to you from the French General Bessieres, wherein you treated his offer with contempt, and declared yourself the firm and constant defender of your country, and the rights of our lawful Sovereign Don Ferdinand VII.; have appointed your Excellency Governor and Captain-General of the kingdom of Gallicia, and President of the Royal Audience. Your nomination in regular forms will be transmitted to you in course, it being resolved that your Excellency shall continue in the command of the army now confided to your care, until the conclusion of the war; and the promises are communicated to you for your satisfaction.

"July 28, 1808."

BENEVENTE, JULY 15.—This morning our brave warriors entered this place covered with glory. It is at present impossible to give a detailed and circumstantial account of all that took place in the obstinate and sanguinary battle of yesterday, but in the mean time we can assure the public, that the enemy received a severe chastisement, and that our army acquired eternal renown. What was not performed by the Prince's grenadiers and the volunteers of Navarre, Toledo, and Baibastro! What spirit, valour, and presence of mind did they not display! They set the grape shot at defiance, and rushed with pleasure into the midst of the greatest dangers. The first corps carried, at the point of the bayonet, a battery of four pieces of artillery; 1000 of the French fell by the hands of the second and third; and the last, pushing into the midst of the cavalry, spared neither them nor their riders. Upwards of 1500 of the enemy were the victims of their valour.

The column of the provincials of Gallicia, immoveable as a rock, struck terror and dismay into the hostile army, and in a short time had no enemies to combat. Would that it had directed itself in another point! What did it not do? what did it leave to be done?

The van-guard under the command of Count de Mezeda, consisting of 3000 grenadiers and light troops, with their worthy Commander in Chief, did every thing that could be wished.

Each and every of the corps demonstrated that the kingdom has not in vain reposed confidence in them. By ten o'clock in the morning the victory seemed to be ours, and the total destruction of the enemy's army as certain. They were fully aware of their danger, and appeared to have exhausted all their resources. They made, as a last effort, a tremendous discharge of grape shot (of grenades according to others) upon the left wing, and at the same time attacked it with their numerous and well-appointed cavalry. Had the new levies kept their line, imitated the good example of their leaders, and been obedient to orders, the enemy would have found its ruin in the movement to which he owed his safety. But having for a moment been dismayed, the enemy had an opportunity of, in some measure, recovering themselves, and might perhaps have destroyed our army, had not the wise and magnanimous Blake, with our flying artillery, under the command of Captain Don Antonio Paredis, stopped their progress. At the conclusion of the action, our army retreated in the best order, to refresh the troops, with the intention of afterwards returning to the field of battle.

PORTUGAL.

FROM THE OLEAL PORTUGUEZ.

OPORTO, JULY 20.—On the 12th instant sixty-four French soldiers arrived here, made prisoners by the valiant Students of Coimbra, many having been killed and wounded. They took one pair of colours from them, which they dragged about tied to a horse's tail, in demonstration of the utter contempt entertained by them for the rallying signal of a nation, the most perverse that ever disgraced Europe. An immense multitude followed these wretches, gloriously huzzaing our Prince, and uttering imprecations against his persecutors and ours; they nevertheless found, in the humanity of the nation, and in the observance of the injunctions of our august Sovereign, a mildness to which they were not entitled, in sight of the horrors, cruelties, and devastations by them committed in the open and unarmed parts of the country, in which the honour of this self-styled great nation is as much despised as the military discipline of which they so much boast. But let the insolent remember, that vengeance has also its rights, and that their ferocity will be retaliated upon them by exemplary justice.

The regiment of Valença arrived in this city on the 9th and 10th. It is composed of excellent Officers and brave Soldiers. The military exercises and all the other dispositions of the army are rapidly accelerating.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, JULY 21.—His Royal Majesty has received the following Reports from Field Marshall Count Klingspor, dated Head-quarters, near Carleby, the 30th of June, 1st and 4th of July:—

"My last Report, whereby I respectfully acquainted your Majesty with the re-capture of New Carleby, was of the 26th of June, and was dispatched from Jacobstadt by Baron Otter, who has probably already delivered to your Majesty.

"Since that time a Russian army, composed of their best troops, advanced against Sawolax, in Jevoir's Suonejacki, from whence your Majesty's troops were compelled by the enemy's vast superiority in number to retreat to Henrigsnes and Kuopio, when, from the nature of the ground, they hoped they should be able to check the further progress of the enemy; but the latter having begun to turn the position of the Henrigsnes, your Majesty's troops commanded by Colonel Sandels were obliged to make a further retrograde movement to Torwola, where, I hope, he will be able to maintain himself, having formed a junction with the corps commanded by Col. Fahlandes, who arrived from Kiwisalmi, where he was posted to cover the right flank of the brigade.

"I received this moment from Major Ulfhjelm, a report of the unsuccessful expedition from Wasa, under the orders of Adjutant-General Baron Bergenstrale. The amount of our loss cannot as yet be ascertained, but it is not inconsiderable.

"The present position of your Majesty's army is as follows:—The first brigade occupies the environs of New Carleby, one battalion being posted in Ornawais, which, with two gun-boats, form the advanced post of the army; the second brigade is in Upper Jeppo, with two battalions in Upper Harma, on the road to Lappoder, where the enemy's main force is assembled, estimated at 6,000: the fourth brigade is in Carleby; the first is on its march to this place, and the fifth in Torwola, near Kuopio. The troops arrived from Wasa, under the orders of Major Ulthjelmorrupy, occupy the environs of that place. At Perho is a detachment of 650 men, with two three pounders, under the command of Major Ficandt.

REPORT.

"Colonel Sandels has reported to me, under date of the 27th of June, that having received intelligence that a numerous convoy of upwards of 200 new waggons, with provisions, 500 horses, and a considerable military chest, was on its way to Lappeneatue and Kuopio, he ordered it to be attacked; in consequence whereof nearly all the provisions were either taken or destroyed, a loss which will be the more severely felt by the enemy, they being in the utmost want, and which cannot fail to prevent them for a considerable time from attempting any operation of magnitude against your Majesty's Finnish army, which still remains in the same situation which I respectfully described in my Report of the 30th June, with the sole alteration that the brigade has advanced to Lanes Harma, in order to relieve the third brigade, which has hitherto supplied troops for the chain of advanced posts, and that a detachment under the orders of Major Baron Otter, protected by the gun-boats, which are now ready, has pushed forward to Little Veyro and Wasa.

IRELAND.

An elderly Gentleman, on his way from Dublin to Athlone, in an open carriage, on Tuesday last about one o'clock, shortly after he passed the Cappa Hill turnpike, was stopped by a highwayman well mounted, who, drawing a pistol from his bosom, and menacing the postillion with instant destruction, should he presume to interfere or give any alarm, demanded the Gentleman's money. Some proffered silver he rejected, insisting on a pocket-book which he said he knew was about the Gentleman's person; and on the immediate delivery of which his life depended. Having made this avowal, the ruffian gripped the Gentleman by the shoulder, and was in the act of forcing from side-pocket the depository of notes sought for, when the latter, perceiving the awkward situation of the villain while leaning over the vehicle; suddenly slipped from the leading horse, seized his arm, and, by a gallant, a vigorous, and successful effort, seized the pistol from him. Deprived of his weapon, the highwayman found it expedient to make a precipitate retreat, and setting spurs to his horse, though several persons were in sight, effected his escape towards Dublin.

Tuesday se'nnight the repairs of the steeple of St, Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, were finished, on which occasion a grand entertainment was given on a platform which turntowited the ball of the spire! In this tremendous situation, about a dozen persons sat comfortably down to dinner, without any other protection from the extremity of this aerial platform than a rope rove through a perpendicular at each angle. It was sickening to the view. Upon the centre of the table an English ensign was displayed, and the aspiring group kept it up until nearly dark; some had the prudence to descend at an early hour, while the spirited few who remained amused themselves with catches on their descent, which they effected in perfect safety.

PROVINCIALS.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT,

The grain crops of all sorts continue to have in general a promising appearance, especially in the midland and northern districts of the Island, where much more rain has fallen than in those of the south during the present month; and the fine showers within these few days must have tended to fill the ears well. The Barleys are every where apparently very full crops; the Wheats in some cases rather thin and short in the ear; and the Oats likewise occasionally short in the straw, with a deficient ear. In the more southern parts of the kingdom, these crops, and especially the Wheats, are more forward than in the above, where they have in common scarcely yet begun to turn. The Bean and Pea crops are not by any means so promising, the former being in many situations short and not well podded, and the latter greatly injured by the excessive heat of the season. The Potatoe crops have also undergone much injury by the long continued heat and dryness of the season, and consequently the deficiency of hoeing and casting up. It is to be feared that they will prove a deficient crop, at least upon most of the drier sorts of soil. The lands which were sown with turnips last month, where rain has fallen, have the crops now pushing into broad leaf; but in other cases, they have either been destroyed or are still to put in; much land being indeed yet to be sown with that crop. The fruit orchards have suffered greatly, in several districts, from the violence of the winds, and the late hail storms. The Hops continue in some measure promising, but would be greatly improved by rain. The fallows of the Wheat crops have undergone an excellent preparation, and will no doubt be in a fine state at sowing time. Though the Hay harvest is mostly over in the south, there is still much grass to cut in the northern districts. The deficiency of Grass, from the unusual heat and dryness of the season, has had the tendency of keeping up the prices of fat stock; while the same causes have had the effect of preventing a rise in the prices of that in the lean kind.

BRIGHTON, AUG. 5.—This place is full of gaiety. There is an incredible concourse of fashionables daily on the race ground. The Prince of Wales rides to the Hill on horseback, and returns to the Pavillion in his barouche, drawn by his elegant set of bright bays. The Prince is in general habited as Colonel of the 10th Light Dragoons, with a star at his breast, is accompanied by Colonel Leigh, and attended by one groom only. A select party dines with the Prince after the Races. His Royal Highness's Band plays several pieces of music on the Lawn, in front of the Banqueting-room. A Concert within doors succeeds. At Donnidson's and Pollard's Libraries, the crowds are immense, and unceasing are the promenaders on the Steyne. The uncommon brilliancy of the lights in the Banqueting-room of the Pavillion, extends their influence over a considerable part of the Northern extremity of the walk, &c.

For the Petworth Stakes, Trim was the favourite at starting, though Trim, in a two-mile heat, was beat easily by Sasenagh yesterday. The latter, however, being in heats of four miles, the superior strength of Trim gained him the victory. The four horses went off well together, and a sheet would have covered the whole of them, at the turn at the end of the two first miles. Ambrosio and Delville, their riders finding there was no chance of success, however, were pulled in at the distance-post, the grand push being only made by Trim and Sasenagh. The latter was beaten as easily nearly as he had beat the former in the two-mile heat of yesterday.

For the Somerset Stakes, Canopus was the favourite. But the Knowlings were so severely disappointed in their reliance on the favourite yesterday, that, to use a turf phrase, they fought shy to-day. Several, however, did adventure large sums, taking Canopus against the field, and which horse, unfortunately for them, was the last in. Lord Egremont's b. f. merely galloped over the course for the Hippocampus Stakes; and as the 50*l.* or Town Plate, could not be run for by less than three horses, and for which there were only two entered, it was, of necessity, put off to another day.

EDINBURGH, JULY 28.—On Tuesday that fine wooded bank immediately opposite to Springfield paper-mill slipped, with a dreadful crash, into the river Esk, which runs at the bottom, and which is so completely choaked up, that not a drop of water passed for several hours. The bank, which is about 200 feet in height, had discovered symptoms of agitation on the preceding day; and, for about an hour before it gave way, the agitation was extremely violent, and the trees were seen falling in all directions; but when it began to move in a body, it was awfully grand and terrific, and the noise was equal to the loudest thunder. The slip is supposed to have been occasioned by water lodged in the bank, which had loosened it from its bed.

A singular shooting match took place on Saturday se'nnight, at Little Chart, near Canterbury, between Mr. Davis, of Pluckley, and Mr. Hatch, of Westwell, for five guineas, to shoot at 25 potatoes thrown up in the air, which were all hit by the sportsmen, and the wager consequently not decided.

On Saturday se'nnight, Mr. J. Hodgman, of Folkstone, was committed to Westgate gaol by the Mayor of Canterbury, on suspicion of forgery. On his being charged with the offence, he attempted to put an end to his existence at the Union Bank in that city, by shooting himself with a pistol, which, however, he did not accomplish, as the ball, after passing through his clothes, and inflicting a wound against one of his ribs, fell upon the floor. It is conjectured that part of the charge of powder had shaken out of the pistol by carrying it in his pocket, which prevented the fatal effects he meditated.

CANINE AFFECTION.—On Wednesday se'nnight a gentleman's groom went to Windsor from Stoke Green, on horseback, accompanied by three dogs, two pointers, and a terrier; on his return, within about half a mile of home, the horse on which he rode took fright, threw him, and ran home, attended by two of the dogs, the terrier and one pointer. The appearance of the horse at home without the man naturally excited in the hearts of the other servants an apprehension that some accident had befallen him, and two of them, a man and a woman, went in quest of him. After searching in vain about two hours in the lane which is in the direct road to Windsor, they were induced to look into the cross road, whither they went through a field; whilst in the field, the man called the groom's name aloud, which was answered by the barking of a dog. The woman observing, that she thought it the voice of the dog which had not come home, they directed their course to the spot whence the voice proceeded. As soon as they had got into the lane, they descried a dog at a distance making towards them, which proved to be the very dog. Upon coming up to them, he discovered alternate symptoms of joy and uneasiness, and ran before them, as if desirous of shewing them the cause. They followed, when low! he conducted them to the spot where lay the man in a ditch by the road side, apparently lifeless. They carried him home, and laid him on a bed, the dog staying with him the whole time, and by a whining noise discovering his anxiety. The persons who were in the room made several attempts to turn the dog out, but without success; they were at length so won upon by the creature's manners, that they allowed him to remain, when he at length placed himself on the man's bed, and watched him with the most painful anxiety, and as he groaned, so did the dog mourn, proportioning the height and duration of his voice to that of the man; nor did he quit the bed until twelve o'clock of the following day, when the man seemed restored to his senses. What is more remarkable is, that from the time he was laid upon the bed, the man was alternately affected with a stupor or total insensibility, and a most ungovernable frenzy; and in the latter state directed his violence to the poor animal, beating him most unmercifully, but the dog would not leave him.

On Saturday, July 22, between one and two o'clock, a mill in Ditton, belonging to J. Watkins, Esq. was struck by lightning, which carried away one of the sails and the back, nearly blew off the roof on both sides, burst the two iron hoops with the wind shaft, injured the wind wheel, and split the wind shaft from the neck nearly to the tail and gudgeon, and set the roof on fire in two places; then descending, it tore up the trap-doors and three boards adjoining, without doing any further injury to the miller's father, who was sitting about 18 inches from the trap doors at the time, than scorching his hands; his watch was also stopped. Another man was coming down the ladder from the upper room at the time, who did not receive any injury. It blew both the doors of the round-house open, and took a large piece from the bottom of the shaft.

As fevers may be expected to be very prevalent during the present hot weather, it may not be unserviceable to remind our Readers, that yeast, taken frequently in small quantities has hitherto been found an excellent remedy.

A labouring woman, at Isleworth, laid her child in the grass, to sleep, while she pursued her work; on her return she found that during her absence a snake had attacked and killed her infant.

ASTONISHING PRODUCE.—A part of Tweedmouth common, containing about twenty-three acres, the property of James Forster, Esq. Postmaster of Berwick, was bought a few years ago for 400*l.* four acres of which have this season produced the amazing quantity of 1500 stones of hay. It stood so thick in the field, that the mowers would not cut it down at the ordinary prices.

HOW TO MAKE PAPER FIRE PROOF.—Immerse any kind of paper in a strong solution of alum water, then thoroughly dry it, immerse, and dry it again; and neither fire nor candle will burn it.

HERTFORD ASSIZES, TUESDAY, AUG. 2.

George and Thomas Shepherd and William Freeman, were indicted for stealing on the 12th of July, three silver tea-spoons, a silver punch ladle, a glass pepper castor, and a wine glass, from the Pedlar's Arms Public-house, on Hertford Common.

Mr. Curwood, as Counsel for the prosecution, called for the serious attention of the Jury, inasmuch as this case was attended with singular circumstances, and it would be a question of the intention of the prisoners, for of the fact of their taking the articles alleged, there could be no doubt. Of the three prisoners at the bar, Freeman was the son of a most respectable tradesman; the two others were brothers, the eldest of whom was not more than 18, and the other 16 years of age; they were the sons of a gentleman of great respectability and of large fortune, and were nearly allied to persons who had held a most exalted rank in the country. In pity to the agonized feelings of their relatives, he could not be expected to state more explicitly their connections; they were, under their father's will, though neither of them was the eldest son, to inherit a fortune of 20,000*l.* each on coming of age. The facts of the case were very short. On the 20th of July the three prisoners left London as early as five o'clock in the morning, on horseback, and took the road to Hertford. They called at several public-houses, and drank at each. The whole of their conduct, in hard riding and drinking, was not that of persons decorously pursuing their pleasures in a manner befitting their stations in life, but rather that of persons giving way to the unrestrained pursuit of their irregular caprices. They arrived at the house of the prosecutor some time in the forenoon, where they had some ale and bread and cheese, and soon after departed. Immediately after they were gone, the landlady missed the articles stated in the indictment: she gave the alarm to her husband, who pursued them, and they were apprehended in Waltham Abbey Marshes. They were searched, and the articles found upon them. With respect, therefore, to the fact, there could be no doubt; but the question would be, with what intention they took the articles. The Learned Counsel said it was not every taking against the will of the owner which was a felony, but it must be done with a felonious intention—with an intention of secretly taking from the owner with a view to convert it to the use of the taker, with no design of ever accounting with the owner. If the Jury believed they acted with that intention they must find them guilty. But if, fortunately for the prisoners, it should be thought that they did it as a mad frolic, in the wildness of momentary whim, with an intention of returning the articles, it would be no felony.

The landlord of the Pedlar's Arms proved the fact as stated. When he pursued the prisoners, in company with a constable, they were found in Waltham Abbey Marshes. They were there walking their horses backward and forward. He addressed them, and said they were the persons who had taken his spoons. They replied, he did not know they had them. He said, he would be certain, for he would search them. They did search them when they got to Waltham, and he found his three spoons, a glass pepper-box, a wine glass, and a punch-ladle, all of which was his property. He told them at first that he did not believe them to be thieves, but if they would give up his goods, he would take no further notice of them. They said they had often heard of persons who had made such promises, but who were the more severe afterwards. After the articles were found upon them, they were carried before a Magistrate, and committed for trial.

The prisoners being called upon for their defence, Freeman put in a written paper, in which he stated, that he had no intention of committing any illegal act; that on the morning of the 20th of July, the other two prisoners came to his lodgings and knocked him up, telling him they had hired a horse for him, and he must go and ride with them. They accordingly all set off together. They breakfasted at Kingsland, and afterwards drank at several public-houses, until they came to the prosecutor's at Hertford Heath; that when they were there, they saw the articles in the cupboard, and they proposed to take them away to frighten the landlady, and to send them back by the stage the next day, with a note to her, to beware of strangers in future. He concluded, by solemnly denying any design of stealing the articles.

Several witnesses were called, who gave the prisoners an excellent character for honesty.

Mr. Alexander, a Solicitor in London, stated, that he was the Trustee for the two young men indicted by the name of Shepherd, and that their fortune, on coming of age, would be at least 20,000*l.* each. He further added, that their father was recently dead, and since his death, being left without proper controul, they had behaved with great irregularity, and committed many wild excesses.

Another Gentleman, their father's late agent, stated, that their father, during his life-time, allowed them 40*s.* a week for pocket-money, and he continued the same allowance, until the Lord Chancellor should make an order what was the proper stipend to be paid them during their minority.

The Lord Chief Baron, in summing up, said, that their rank and fortune ought not, and would not, with the Jury, place them in a better situation than the poorest culprit they had tried.—On the contrary, if the Jury thought they had an intention of stealing the articles they had taken, it was an aggravation of their case that they were not tempted by want, which frequently impelled those of the lower orders to guilt. It was a singular case, and therefore they would attend minutely to the evidence. His Lordship here summed it up, and observed, that many parts of it were very hard against them. He chiefly commented on their conduct when they were apprehended, which he thought marked rather guilt than a youthful frolic; but it was for the Jury to decide with what intention they took the goods. If at the moment of taking, they intended to convert them to their own use, they were guilty of felony; and any after intention of restoring could not wipe away the original offence.

The Jury deliberated a considerable time, and then found a verdict of Not Guilty.

London,
SUNDAY, AUGUST 7, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Our intelligence from Spain of this week is marked with a partial defeat of the Patriots at Rio Seco. This circumstance, however, far from lessening the opinion we entertain of their ultimate success, tends to impress a more favourable idea of their bravery, and, what is perhaps of greater importance, of the abilities of their leaders. BESSIERES, who commanded the French on this occasion, is one of the most distinguished and confidential Generals of BONAPARTE; we may justly conclude, therefore, that his being unable to harrass either General CUESTA or BLAKE in their retreat, is a strong presumption that his army must have suffered most severely in the action. It has been a general principle adopted by the French, not to allow their enemy the slightest respite in case of a defeat, we are therefore happy in being able to advert to the very important circumstance, that the French General, though educated in the school of the Corsican, had been able to draw no other advantage from an engagement, which cost him almost a third of his army, than that of maintaining the field of battle. Another proof of the justice of these observations, and of the masterly retreat of that division of the Patriots, under the command of our gallant countryman General BLAKE, is the infamous attempt made by BESSIERES to corrupt the fidelity of that brave officer.—This truly national trait of the Frenchman will be a satisfactory key to explain a number of occurrences in the Prussian and Austrian war, which at the time excited the surprise and indignation of Europe. The French and their detestable Chief, notwithstanding their vaunted invincibility, were, we have every right to think, as much indebted to the powerful diversion of their golden Allies, as to the discipline or pretended superiority of their armies. What an insight does this give us of the immorality of that Government and its agents. What proof does it afford of the danger and absurdity of expecting from monsters acting on such principles, an observance of treaties or engagements! Whilst we abominate the conduct of the one, we find in the probity and characteristic honour of the Spanish Nation, a well-founded assurance, that the vile horde which is at present polluting their provinces, will soon expiate with their blood the atrocities they are committing. Encouraged by this prospect of retributive justice and success, we look forward with confidence and exultation to the final result. Every day encreases the resources, the numbers, and discipline of the Patriots; and every day has a contrary effect on their brutal oppressors. The natural consequence of the war the Patriots are waging, is to create in every department, particularly in the military, a number of extraordinary men, who might have languished in obscurity, were it not for this impulse. Even in this they have a vast advantage over their enemies. Their armies are now filled up with reluctant, trembling conscripts, torn from their homes to support the projects of a tyrant they detest; such miserable wretches are incapable of producing soldiers and generals, to make up for the loss of officers and veterans they will suffer in Spain. It is not the loss of the Finances, Armies, and Navy of Spain, that the detestable tyrant will have to regret, he will have to lament the total destruction of an army of veteran soldiers, and generals remarkable for their audacity, length of service, and great knowledge of war. The present degraded state of the public mind in France, extinction of national spirit, and the paralytic influence of despotism, preclude every possibility of replacing them. The magic effects of the Revolution are over. There are now no Marseillois Hymns—no fascinating sounds of liberty, equality, and republic, to raise them to heroic enthusiasm; but in their place a torpid indifference has succeeded. This is the greatest, though least adverted to, advantage of the Spanish insurrection—the new French levies may be lashed into the mechanical duties of soldiers; but to suppose that they will be animated with that lively sense of honour and contempt of danger, which are the moral attributes of men of that profession, would prove a total ignorace of history and of the human heart. It may be objected that despotic governments frequently possessed disciplined armies and distinguished generals; but these were only temporary apparitions, and disappeared with the extrordinary occurrences which created them. It has also been frequently repeated, and with as little judgment, that France is a Military State. It is governed, it is true, on military principles, but we can pledge ourselves to our Readers, from personal observations during a long sojourn in that country, that no people existing have greater antipathy to the military profession, than the present rising generation of Frenchmen. This fact will be incontrovertibly proved by the unexampled sum offered for substitutes, as 2000 French crowns are frequently given for that purpose. It is astonishing also, notwithstanding the great military establishment, how very few volunteer for that service. The influence of patronage is as extensive and fatal there as in any other country; and more pernicious, if possible, as it is money alone which can secure the protection of the rapacious minions of BONAPARTE and his favourites. The ancient familiarity also between the Soldiers and Generals is entirely extinguished; and the latter display as much brutality, hauteur, and reserve, towards their men and inferior officers, as they experience themselves from their Master. With such discouragement, will any man be extravagant enough to imagine that the future soldiers of France, for the miserable pittance of twopence halfpenny a day, and which they even seldom receive, will display the same energy and courage, which characterised the armies formed in the course of the Revolution. They have not even a specious cause to fight for. They are not enlivened by the well wishes and congratulations of their countrymen, but are accustomed to receive on their departure, a last farewell from their disconsolate parents and relations, as if they were going to be led to execution. This reluctance, on the part of the Conscripts, will be seen in a letter we received at a late hour last night, from the Continent, and which we possess exclusively. This letter, which our Readers will see in another part of the Paper, contains likewise the most important intelligence relative to the military preparations of Austria, and gives the most satisfactory evidence of the energy, prudence, and resources of the Government of that country. It confirms, in like manner, our former account of the discontent and alarm manifested by BONAPARTE, in consequence of these preparations. Our Readers will likewise see that the Austrian army is far more numerous and better organized than at any former period of the revolutionary war; and the organization of the Militia is completed. Another circumstance, to which our Correspondent, however, does not refer, is the coronation of the EMPRESS at Presburg, as QUEEN of HUNGARY. This ceremony is of little importance in itself, but it gives the Austrian Government a specious pretext for assembling the Hungarian Magnates, without the alarming formality of calling, in so delicate a juncture, an extraordinary diet; and of proposing to them such measures as the present crisis may suggest. The Hungarians are, perhaps, the bravest and most warlike nation on earth; and if they can, during the festivity of this ceremony, be prevailed on to enter into the views of the Austrian Court, and to co-operate heart and hand, we have then no doubt, but that Austria will engage in the common cause. This great activity on the part of that Government affords us the pleasing conviction of the undiminished influence of the ARCHDUKE CHARLES. The marriage of the EMPEROR seems to have encreased it; and he has no more the obstacles or affronts to encounter, to which the personal enmity of the late EMPRESS subjected him to. Its beneficial effects will be felt in case of a new war, and Austria will have no cause to blush for the infamous surrender of a gallant army, in consequence of the cowardice or ignorance of such a General as MACK.

According to the last accounts from Sweden, a part of the army of the gallant GUSTAVUS has suffered a considerable loss in Finland, and was obliged to retreat in consequence of the great superiority of numbers on the part of the Russians. This account is taken from an official report to his Swedish Majesty by Field Marshal Count KLINGSPOR, and in regreting this check to the arms of our magnanimous ally, we cannot but admire the candour with which it is communicated. We hope, however, sincerely do we wish, that this disastrous war will soon cease, and that the Emperor of RUSSIA, instead of employing the resources of his vast empire, in order to overwhelm his august brother-in-law, and late ally, that he will use them in a manner more suitable to his dignity, and the great expectations that were once entertained of him. It is even said he has made overtures of a peaceable nature to GUSTAVUS, but that his Swedish Majesty declined entering into any negociation, without the concurrence of England. This account coincides perfectly with the opinion we ought to entertain of that high spirited Monarch; and as long as the Councils of this country are actuated by the same principles, which so honourably distinguish them at present, they will never forget the great engagements this country owes to this magnanimous Sovereign. We seize with pleasure this opportunity of recalling to the attention of our cotemporaries the unequal struggle he is engaged in; and it would be something worse than levity, it would be ingratitude of the most shameful kind, if we could forget for a moment, that his present difficulties originate in his attachment to this country, and his honourable adherence to his engagements. Unfortunately our time cannot vaunt many such examples; and shall we turn away with indifference from the only Sovereign and Nation on the Continent, who generously spurned the slightest concession to the common tyrant.

We think our brother journalists have been too severe in their animadversions on the unfortunate toast of Sir FRANCIS BARING. They all seem to insinuate that the worthy Baronet, though not in a state of beastly drunkenness, was so overpowered by the number of toasts he had previously given, that some allowance must be made for the patriotism of the chairman, who had no objection to get drunk for the honour of his country. This reminds us of a celebrated letter of MADAME DE MAINTENON, containing instructions to a French ambassador to the Swiss Cantons, in the reign of Lewis the XIVth. She expresses on that occasion, a desire that he will have no objection to get occasionally drunk for the service of His MAJESTY. She surmised that this would ingratiate him more with the celebrated topers of that country, who were proverbially so at that time than all the arts of diplomacy. As we have obtained the honour at present of being considered the first in that respect, there is every reason to imagine that Sir FRANCIS was willing to support this reputation. This is at least the most satisfactory, and most charitable explanation of the mistake he committed.

We know at the same time, that the generous grape produces different effects on different persons. In some it expands the heart, and opens it to every honourable feeling—it makes others reserved, selfish, and artful. If it should happen to have the latter effect on the worthy Chairman, it would be as uncharitable to blame him for this Constitutional failing, as it would be for his falling asleep, after copiously enjoying all the luxuries of a turtle dinner. The veritas in vino only proves, that he is more an American than an Englishman, and taking this circumstance into consideration, we see no reason for surprise, that he should neglect the prudence he would not lose sight of in a more sober moment, and toast the President of a country of which he is in his heart, and from interest, a citizen. However, the English feelings of the rest of the company soon effaced this trifling interruption to the hilarity of the Meeting. The feast was every way worthy of the guests and of the Merchants of London; and we have the satisfaction to observe, that on every occasion where the interests and dignity of the country, or the honour of the Metropolis, are in question, they act in a manner worthy of the first Merchants and first City in the Universe.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE,

RECEIVED LATE LAST NIGHT.

We have the greatest satisfaction in being able to communicate to our readers a letter from the Lower Rhine, which has been transmitted us by our Correspondent in Hamburgh. It is of a very recent date, and throws a great deal of light over the present state of the Continent. We wish the writer had been, on some subjects, more explicit; but he appears to have been writing to a person, to whom some prior events were known, with which we are not satisfactorily acquainted. However as it is, it is unquestionably the most important account, which we have received for several months from that part of the Continent.

"The most contradictory reports have been in circulation for the last two weeks, and alternately believed and rejected. However this quick succession of rumours must convince the most indifferent, that very extraordinary occurrences are looked to, as well in France as in the neighbouring States. Every private account from Paris, Holland or the South of France, tends to confirm this opinion. The expectations of the people here are already extravagant. Were you willing to give credit to these, the French will be expelled, before the beginning of winter, from every part of Germany, pursued across the Rhine, and, as may be expected, driven like a flock of sheep out of the former Ecclesiastical States. Such are the speculations of our Cologne politicians. It is true they are not much biassed in favour of the French, and though bitterly disappointed, during the course of fifteen years, in their hopes of being relieved from their troublesome guests, or, more properly speaking, masters, they are still as sanguine and indefatigable in their wishes, as if they had never been frustrated. In this confused mass of rumours and conjectures, to discover the real state of affairs is not easy. The restraints the Newspapers lie under, in which every article is revised by an Agent of the Police before it is printed, tend to increase the difficulty. However as this is universally known, their silence with regard to Spanish and Austrian affairs is considered as a convincing proof of the desperate state of French influence in these two countries. No account, tending to invalidate the resistance of the Spaniards to the nomination of Joseph Bonaparte receives any credit; and those, which speak of French success and triumphs are laughed at, and uniformly rejected. They have fine times here at present, as the greater part of the Gens d'Armes and Douaniers have been called away; and as their destination and the object of so unparalleled an order cannot be discovered or accounted for, it has been sometimes asserted that the French were all cut to pieces in Spain, that the English had landed with 40,000 men at the Helder, and that the Archduke Charles had entered Bavaria at the head of 180,000 men, whilst the Archduke John was penetrating through Franconia with an army of an 100,000. Whilst these reports were credited, it was a real jubilee here in Cologne, and among our neighbours in the Duchy of Berg, and one of my friends, who had been up the Rhine as far as Mayence, and had afterwards gone to Aix la Chapelle, Treves and Liege, has told me, that the same extravagant joy reigned, and the same hopes were entertained in all those towns. You may conclude, that when such sentiments are manifested here, how animated the feelings of the Brabanters and Dutch must be on the occasion. I have been positively informed that his Dutch Majesty has been so extremely alarmed by some symptoms on the part of his loving subjects, that he sent Courier after Courier to his August Brother, to remonstrate with him relative to his leaving Holland in so defenceless a state, and that he has threatened to quit the country, and leave crown and all behind him, if a sufficient number of troops were not provided for the security of the country, and to restrain the indiscreet wishes of the Mynheers.

"It is unnecessary to inform you that the several accounts, published officially and unofficially relative to Spain, are entirely devoid of truth. It is now universally known that the inhabitants of that country are in a state of general insurrection, and that several engagements have been fought to the disadvantage of the French. I have seen several Proclamations published by the Juntas of the several Provinces, which contain the strongest and most eloquent animadversions on the perfidy and usurpation of Bonaparte. Notwithstanding every precaution which has been taken by the Police, I have been positively told that copies of them are circulated all over France and Germany. Those I have seen have been sent to Mr. Von der L—, from Amsterdam. The French, who are here, give out, it is said, that they were fabricated by the English, and circulated by their agents, in order to create disturbances. However, if they are not a fabrication, and I see no reason for considering them as such, as they contain the strongest marks of authenticity, the domination of the Bonapartes is at an end! Every one here, in Westphalia, in Holland, on the left side of the Rhine as far as the ancient frontiers of France, and up as far as Switzerland, and, in fact, on the right side throughout the several States, which form the Rhenish Confederation, is animated with a degree of detestation against the French, their Chief and his august Family, which is as unbounded as it is just. I was a few weeks ago, at Elberfeld, the Gemarck, and several other towns in the Duchy of Berg, a short time after the disturbances about the Conscripts had subsided, and the principal manufacturers told me, that had they not employed the greatest degree of prudence, the greater part of their workmen, to the number of about 40,000, had supported the Conscripts. You know what the inhabitants of Elberfeld are, and that at the first signal disaster which occurs to the French Armies, they will sacrifice, without remorse, all the French and their adherents who fall into their hands.

"I begin to perceive that the French employés display the greatest uneasiness and even despondency in consequence of these occurrences. I dine every day in company with several of them; and as they do me the honour to suppose me one of their humble admirers, they are not restrained by my presence. They already tremble for the considerable property which some of those fellows have purchased along the Rhine, with the money they had extorted from the wretched peasantry. As they consider the late atrocious conduct of Bonaparte towards the Spaniards as the cause of their well-grounded fears, they are not very circumspect in their animadversions on that subject. This is in perfect unison with the character and principles of Frenchmen. Every action is appreciated by them, not according to its moral or immoral tendency, but the advantage or disadvantage it may cause them individually. Even every notion of national benefit is indifferent to them, only as it coincides with their private interest. You know these gentlemen, and it is therefore needless to inform you, that the moment the views of their Emperor are in opposition to their invidual welfare, they will abandon him with as much sang froid, and probably with greater, than they did their other favourites for the last nineteen years.

"Another serious affray took place last Monday, at Bonn, between a numerous body of Conscripts, and a detachment of Chasseurs which was to escort them. They are the Conscripts of the department of Mont Tonerre, and had lain for three or four months at Juliers. They were marched, a few days before this disturbance took place, from that fortress to Bonn, where it was said they were to remain. However, the third day after their arrival, when about 200 Chasseurs arrived from Coblence, they received orders to pass the Rhine on their way to Fulda. They immediately refused to obey; and when the chef d'Escadron told them that he would order his chasseurs to cut them to pieces, if they continued refractory some of them seized his horse by the bridle, pulled him to the ground, and he was stabbed by one of the Conscripts with a knife. He was with the greatest difficulty rescued by his men, who charged the mutineers in full gallop. The latter made so desperate a resistance, that the chasseurs were at last compelled to fly, and several of them have been most dangerously wounded. The Chef d'Escadron has since died of the wound and contusions he received. Several of the Chasseurs and Conscripts have been since arrested, as the former are accused of having shewn too much lenity. Certain it is that their exertions went not much further than to save their officer from the hands of the enraged recruits. Several of the inhabitants have also been taken up; and two persons, one a countryman from the environs of Bonn, and the other a shoemaker residing there, have been condemned by a Court-martial to be shot, for having thrown stones at the cavalry.'

"These marks of disobedience, manifested so frequently for the last two months by the Conscripts on both sides of the Rhine, and the lukewarmness of the military on those occasions, must convince the French Government of the impracticability of collecting a sufficiently numerous army to oppose to the Spaniards, to the English who are reported to be making vast armaments, and to the Austrians at the same time. The latter have assembled suddenly an army of more than 80,000 men between Lentz and Vienna. Orders have likewise been given that all the Bohemian and Galician regiments should form a camp at Egra, and the Hungarian regiments are to be collected in and about Presburg. The most extraordinary circumstance is that the Austrian Government, notwithstanding the remonstrances and menaces of Andreossy, is said to have declined every explanation relative to these unexpected movements. The militia is completely organised, and instead of 59,000, as stated in the Imperial Rescript, already amounts to more than 90,000. The vast preparations, the extraordinary diligence in collecting the whole Austrian Army in so short a space of time, and the activity displayed by the Commissaries in organising the new levies, together with the conciliating measures adopted towards Bavaria, prove that the Austrian Cabinet is directed by other Councils, than it had been three years ago.

"However the French seem to be aware of the danger which menaces them. All the soldiers stationed in Westphalia, in Holland and Brabant, notwithstanding the disaffection of the inhabitants, are marching towards Wurtzburgh and Baden.—Their entire army in Germany, exclusive of their auxiliaries, is said to amount to between 70 and 80,000 men, and if we estimate their auxiliaries at about 90,000, which I am confident is estimating them too high, the whole force at the disposal of Bonaparte in that country, may be rated at 180,000. With these he will be obliged to oppose the whole Austrian force; keep all the population of Northern Germany, from the Rhine to the Vistula, in awe; resist every attack which may be made by Sweden on Pomerania, in case of a peace with Russia, and protect Holland and Hanover against the English. Nevertheless the insolence of Bonaparte is said to increase in proportion to the difficulties of his situation. Instead of manifesting any fear, he is said to demand from Austria a renunciation of her part of Poland, and from the unfortunate King of Prussia the cession of all her Provinces on this side of the Oder. If the character of this man were not sufficiently known, these pretensions at the present juncture would make me tremble for the consequences of a new Continental War. But he has deceived Europe too long and too grossly; and there is not a single man of penetration in Austria, who is not convinced that this air of assurance is assumed in order to conceal his weakness and fear. However, after all the experience I have been able to acquire for these twelve years on the Continent, and after the repeated miscarriage of every preceeding war between Austria and France, I have not a doubt on my mind at present, but that a new war will overturn the vast colossus of Bonaparte's power."

Advices have been received from Admial Lord Collingwood, dated the 17th of July, which we have the heartfelt satisfaction to announce, fully confirm the accounts of the successes obtained by the Patriots in Catalonia, Arragon, and Valencia. It was calculated, that the French had already lost near 40,000 men.

Sir Thomas Dyer, the bearer of the above grateful intelligence was himself present at the battle of Valladolid, the result of which was so variously represented: he is understood to speak with the utmost admiration of the fearless intrepidity with which the Spaniards attacked the French army. Their undisciplined and irregular valour was dreadful. He saw four regiments actually cut to pieces by them. The rapidity too, with which the French moved and fired was most formidable.

The Plover sloop of war has arrived at Plymouth with dispathes from Sir Arthur Wellesley, which were received by Government on Monday last. Several British ships of war were lying at anchor below the Bar, one of which, the Narcissus frigate, was to take charge of the convoy, appointed to sail on the 28th. Colonel Browne, after having a conference with Sir C. Cotton, off the Tagus, returned to Oporto on the 21st. Provisions were abundant and cheap there whilst at Lisbon, according to report, hardly any meat was to be had.

On the 12th of July, 250 marines were landed from the Alfred at Figueras, the place where it is supposed Sir Arthur Wellesley's expedition will disembark. Figueras is about 30 leagues from Lisbon, and within a few miles from Coimbra, where the principal force of the Portuguese was collected. The whole of the Patriotic force North of the Tagus amounted, we understand, to 7,000 regular infantry, 50,000 militia, between 15,000 and 16,000 armed peasants and 1,500 cavalry, of whom, however, only about 500 were mounted.

It was understood at Oporto, that General Junot had detached 6000 men against the patriotic army, and that they had proceeded several leagues on their way. We much doubt, however, whether Junot had dispatched so considerable a force, and to such a distance. It is supposed he had not more than 15,000 men with him.

THE BRITISH ARMY IN SPAIN.—The reports respecting the Ministerial arrangements for the command of our forces in Spain, are various. The following is said to be a correct list of appointments, which we insert, but without pledging ourselves for its accuracy.

The Duke of York will command an army of 70,000 men in Spain.

Lord Hutchinson is to accompany his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief to Spain, in a confidential situation.

Sir Samuel Auchmuty goes as Military Secretary to his Royal Highness.

Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon retains his situation, and is to remain at home to transact the public business during the Duke's absence.

Sir Wm. Meadows is to act as Commander in Chief at home.

A "General Field Staff" is to be appointed from Officers of distinguished talents and notorious public merit.

The General Staff of the Army is to remain as at present.

Sir A. Wellesley is named as the Field Adjutant-General on the junction of the British forces in Spain.

The Duke of Cambridge and Lord Moira will both be employed with the Duke of York.

Lord Proby is appointed Assistant Adjutant-General to the Forces.

Sir D. Baird is at Cork, to embark in command of seven regiments, now embarking at the Cove.

Sir Robert Wilson has obtained leave to raise a Portuguese Legion of 5000 men.

The Guards have received orders to embark at Deal.

The following General Order has been issued by order of the Duke of York:

"Horse Guards, July 20, 1808.

"The Commander in Chief directs it to be notified, that in consequence of the state of preparation for immediate service in which the whole army is at this present moment held, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to dispense with the use of the Queues, until further orders.

"His Royal Highness desires the Commanding Officers of the Regiments will take care that the men's hair is cut close to their necks, in the neatest and most uniform manner, and that their heads are kept perfectly clean, by combing, brushing, and frequently washing them; for the latter essential purpose, it is his Majesty's pleasure that a small sponge shall hereafter be added to each man's regimental necessaries.

"By order of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief,

"HARRY CALVERT, Adjutant General."

It is stated, in advices from Lisbon, that the situation of the inhabitants is dreadful beyond description. The discovery of any communication with the Patriots, among whom are included all who reside beyond the range of the posts of JUNOT'S army, is sufficient to bring upon the parties concerned in it the punishment of death. Such a few days ago, was the fate of M. Da Horta Machada, a man of the most respectable character, who formerly was Minister from the Portuguese Government to the Court of St. Petersburgh. He was shot in the great square, by order of Junot, for having in his possession a letter from Oporto, detailing the proceedings which took place in that city, on the 18th of June, and the subsequent days.

The Persian Ambassador, who is arrived in Paris, is a man of elegant and courteous manners, and of great learning. His suite, at his departure, consisted of 500 persons; but owing to the difficulties of the journey, he resolved to leave a great number of them behind. He maintains, in his haram in Persia, no less than eighty wives: his method of management is already the subject of inquiry among several English husbands, who find enough to do in the management of one.

A NEW-INVENTED FIELD-PIECE.—A field-piece of very curious construction has been made at Woolwich, for the use of the Spanish Patriots. It is a long three-pounder, mounted on a light carriage, and fixed to a sort of saddle by which it may be fastened to a mule's back, and worked with all possible celerity. Sixty of these have already been shipped for the Spanish Provinces, and their utility will be incalculable in defending the country against the approaches of a foreign enemy. By the assistance of mules, who are not only sure-footed, but calculated for a mountainous country, they may be conveyed into positions and situations commanding the passes, and may be made the means of considerable annoyance to troops on their march. The mules too will be left to the direction of muleteers, or guides, well acquainted with the country; so that they can be removed from place to place without the fear of falling into the hands of the enemy. They are also calculated to be used as flying artillery, and for all the purposes of annoying troops on their march. The foundery at Woolwich is almost exclusively engaged in manufacturing these pieces, and the greatest alacrity is used in multiplying their numbers.

CRIM CON. ADVENTURE.—A few evenings since, a genteel dressed woman introduced herself to a box occupied by three gentlemen at Vauxhall. She very politely apologised for the liberty she had taken, observing that she had the misfortune to be low-spirited, and she thought the best way to divert her melancholy was to mix with agreeable and cheerful company. After partaking of burnt wine and Arrack punch, the lady very familiarly invited one of her companions to her lodgings in Piccadilly. At an early hour in the morning the gentleman found himself alarmed by the appearance of the lady's husband with a pistol, threatening to dispatch him. The gallant begged for a few moments, to acquaint the husband with his last night's adventure, and he related all that had happened. After hearing the circumstances of his disgrace, Benedict was [illegible] softened, and he promised the supplicant life, on condition that he should divulge the truth at Doctors' Commons, assuring him that he had long suspected Madam of these tricks in his absence, and that he would obtain a divorce; after which, any gentleman was welcome to his wife's affection.

CHECKS ON BANKERS.—The Stamp Act, which commenced its operation on the 2d instant, requires that every check drawn on Bankers or others shall specify the place from whence it is drawn, and if such place be more [illegible] miles distant from the residence of the Banker, [illegible] be stamped as a Bill of Exchange although payable to bearer on demand. The penalties on the drawer, payee and acceptor of any check drawn contrary to this Act, will effectually prevent the payment of any such drafts in future.

The price of Bread was ordered to remain the same as last week: the Quartern Loaf of Wheaten 12¼*d.* and Household 10½*d.*

Mrs. Billington is gone, for the remainder of the season, to Sussex.

The Duke of Q———, has been nearly drowned in his lacteal bath. His Grace imagines that the shortest road to Heaven is by the milky way.

The sages of Doctors Commons are extremely jealous of certain fashionable staymakers, who have of late dealt very largely in divorces; not indeed to part man and wife, but to separate bosom friends.

In the former part of the sixteenth century, bear-baiting was a favourite diversion, and exhibited as a suitable amusement for a princess, and at a later period it maintained a place among the recreations of woman of rank.—Among the spectacles displayed for the diversion of Queen Elizabeth, when she was entertained at Kenelworth Castle, by the Earl of Leicester, bear-beatings. and boxing-matches, are enumerated by the historian of the festivity.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived in town from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace by the Duke of York. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—Capt. Selby, R. N. on his return from the capture of Mari-Galante, and Deseada, in the West Indies—Colonel Sir Thomas Dyer, who brought the important dispatches on Tuesday.

His Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers, and left town for Windsor at six o'clock.

His Majesty appeared chearful and in remarkable good health.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the undermentioned Commanders took leave previous to departing for their respective destinations, viz.

For Madras and Bengal.—Capt. H. P. Tremenheere, of the Asia; Capt. Thomas Jones, of the Walthamstow; Capt. Henry Hughes, of the Tottenham; Capt. James Jameson, of the General Stuart; and Capt. George Simpson, of the Union.

For Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.—Capt. T. M'Taggart, of the Ocean; and Capt. James Hay, of the Sir S. Lushington.

For Bombay.—Capt. James Normand, of the Devaynes.

The Court adjourned, at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

DINNER AT THE CITY OF LONDON TAVERN.

Thursday, the illustrious Personages who have visited this country on the most important mission in the history of modern diplomacy, were entertained at this Tavern. At about half-past six the Noble Foreigners arrived, and, accompanied by the British Ministers, entered the room, where they were received by nearly 300 of the principal Merchants, Bankers, and Traders of the City of London, and by most of the Heads of the Incorporated Companies. About 100 more persons dined in an adjacent apartment, and joined their friends when the cloth was removed, and sufficient accommodation could be afforded.

The tables in the principal rooms were seven; one at the top, and six others at right angles with it. At the former the guests were disposed in the following order: Sir Francis Baring in the Chair; on his right in rotation, Admiral Apadoca, Lord Melgrave, his Excellency the Portuguese Ambassador, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ferrao, Don Rafael de Lupo, Lord Bathurst, Right Hon. Charles Long, Don Josef Lopez Martinez, and the Swedish Ambassador: to the left of the Chair in succession, General Jacome, Right Hon. George Canning, Viscount Materosa, Lord Hawkesbury, Viscount Baumman, Viscount Sidmouth, Don F. de Sangre, Don F. de la Vega, Don Joseph de Noyona; at the same table on the opposite side, were Lords Camden and Erskine, Messrs. Windham, Sheridan, Maitland, Beeston Long, Wellesley, Hammond, &c.

At the other six tables the Members for London and Middlesex presided.

The dinner and desert consisted of every luxury and delicacy of the season, which were provided in great abundance. The wines were Champaigne, Hock, Claret, Madeira, &c.

The following were the toasts first given, some of which were introduced by short observations from the Chair, complimentary to the illustrious persons named in them;—

"The King."—"The Queen."—"The Prince of Wales and Royal Family."—"Ferdinand the VIIth, King of Spain."
"The Prince Regent of Portugal, and the House of Braganza."
"The King of Sweden."—"The King of the Two Sicilies."
"The President of the United States of America."

The only interruption to the general harmony of the meeting occurred when this last toast was announced; and the marks of disapprobation continued until a new subject drew the attention of the company.

An excellent band was provided in the new orchestra, which struck up when the Noble Personages entered, and continued playing martial and patriotic pieces, from the best Masters, during the whole dinner time. Afterwards they were assisted by Messrs. Dignum, Gibbons, and other vocal performers, who commenced with the favourite Anthem of "Non nobis Domine." In the course of the evening, several new songs were given, composed for the occasion, and "Rule Britannia" had some additional verses subjoined, adapted to the liberal purpose of the Meeting.

The conviviality of the meeting having proceeded thus far, the Chairman rose and said, that he had to propose a very few sentiments to the Gentlemen present, which he was confident would meet with their cordial assent and approbation. Sir Francis then proposed—

1. "Success to the Patriots of Spain, our brave associates in liberty and arms."

2. "The health of our illustrious visitors, and may their courage and loyalty, be crowned with success: and when they return to their country, may they be rewarded by its affection and gratitude."

Mr. Canning said, that he rose in the name of these noble guests to express their thanks for the flattering reception given them on this occasion. They desired him to acquaint this respectable company, that without any hope of exterior aid, their countrymen would have endeavoured to rescue themselves from the tyranny by which they were threatened, and they trust they should have succeeded. Now having witnessed not only the promises, but the performances of the British nation to support their cause, they can entertain no reasonable doubt of a favourable issue. The honourable reward they propose is a permanent alliance and friendship with this country, by which the security and happiness of Spain and Britain will be essentially promoted. As an indication of the high respect they bore to this meeting, they desired that the health of his Majesty should be again given.

This toast was then succeeded by the following;—

"May the united efforts of Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal, rescue the Continent from degradation and tyranny."

"That the Spanish, Portuguese, British, and Swedish Powers ever unite for the support of Religion, Liberty, Loyalty, and Law.

Lord Camden then proposed the health of the Chairman with three times three, which produced an appropriate speech from the worthy Baronet, and the return of the same compliment to the Company.

The Noble Visitors were now about to withdraw, when a pause was occasioned by Mr. Canning's health being given; on which the Right Hon. Secretary said, that he had before addressed the Gentlemen present merely in the character of an interpreter; he now had the honour of speaking to them in his own person, and he had the satisfaction in that character to return them his most grateful acknowledgements.

At half-past ten, the upper table was cleared, and we believe the whole of the company soon afterwards withdrew.

DRAMATIC DETECTOR.

No. VII.

PRESENT STATE OF THE FRENCH DRAMA.

What are our sensations, when in the midst of our modern beauties, arrayed in all the easy elegance of natural fashions, we behold a stiff antiquated dame, whose eyes now dwell with complacency on the enormous swelling of her hoop, now glance contemptuously at the light airy vestments of our belles? Her ridiculous appearance awakens a smile, and her haughty scorn of our taste calls for pity at her blindness. We then think that all those who tread the fields of society ought to conform themselves to the uses established there, nor display the stubbornness of private opinion, in direct opposition to the sense of the community. If we pry with the glass of observation into the regions of modern literature, we shall be struck with a contrast equally conspicuous, the result of self-conceit heightened by national vanity. Whilst nature now and then reveals herself naked to our view on the British Stage, and obedient to the talisman which she entrusted to her favourite bard, always attends at the representation of his dramas, we perceive at a distance the French tragic Muse, wrapped in her mimic majesty, stalking disdainful of all the native graces of simplicity, stiff with affectation, and mistaking the language of art for the expression of real passion. The genius of Imitation has kindled his torch in vain, to guide our neighbours through the difficulties of dramatic composition. His light has proved an ignis fatuus that led them into error. They fancied that the Greek poets had exhausted passion and sentiment; in their works alone, therefore, they looked for models and subjects, and not in the unbounded extent of mental and material creation. The unity of time, place, and action, which certainly never found in nature, they determined strictly to observe; in order, they tell us, to inflict no wound on probability. This reasoning would hold good, and Aristotle's rules would deserve compliance, were the means proposed adequate to the end he had in view. But who would attempt to cure insanity with remedies capable of shaking the stoutest foundations of human intellect, and producing that dreadful disorder of the soul? Who, therefore, can reasonably expect to increase the probability of a fact, by an actual violation of probability itself, in the manner of relating or representing it? Yet the French are so bigotted in their Dramatic creed, if such an expression may be used, that any author, who in a tragedy would remove the scene of action from the vestibule to the interior of a palace, a mighty distance! would meet with instant condemnation. In serious comedy they are equally strict; but in melo-dramas and Vaudevilles they allow themselves more latitude, and suffer the scene to be altered at the beginning of every act. Deprived of all the brilliancy of changing scenery, the play must rest for success on its own merit and the exertions of the actors, and from this very necessity for eminence of talent in the authors and actors, springs their inferiority to ours. The former study not nature, the language of which is irregular and unlaboured as its thoughts, but a faultless correctness of diction, cold when it should be simple, and bombastic when it should be warm. Unable to display a great and powerful variety of sentiments and passions, which alone could subdue the soul, since the organs through which it commonly receives its perceptions, are little affected by theatrical pomp, they crowd their performances with heroes, kings, queens, and warriors, and sedulously avoid whatever savours of common life, fully persuaded that the mind accustomed to the ordinary incidents of life requires higher and more important events to captivate closely her attention and awaken strong sensations of pleasure, pity or terror. The actors, equally unassisted by the magical deceptions of the stage, find themselves compelled, by the multiplicity of their gestures, and the loudness of their tones, to give life to the cold and deficient passages with which their parts abound, and in order that the difference of situations and passions may be perceived, to vociferate with increased vehemence and more extravagant gesticulations those, that merely require animation It is not astonishing therefore, that to every Englishman who has lately witnessed the chaste, judicious, and energetic performance of a Kemble and a Siddons, the actors most highly approved on the French stage, should seem to overstep the modesty of nature, or rather to express love, revenge and ambition, as ours would madness. A proof that they are indebted to their authors for the inferiority of their merits (when compared with those of our performers, for candour obliges us to allow that some of them possess eminent talents which they degrade by sacrificing to the bad taste of the public), is that in the lower theatres, such as Louvois, now Theatre de l'Imperatrice, the Theatre de l'Opera Comique, and l'Ambigu Comique, where plays are performed, in which the three unities are not so strictly observed, we meet with actors greatly superior to the former in the easy delineation of nature, though perhaps endowed with a genius of a humbler cast. Louvois is mostly supplied with pieces by one of the best comedians in France, M. Picard, who like his great predecessor Moliere, and our English translator Mr. C. Kemble, always acts in the dramas which he has composed. His productions display a cultivated, elegant and judicious mind, wit chaste and refined, a considerable share of inventive ingenuity in the contrivance of his plots, and adept skill in painting characters. His Mediocre et Rampant rushing him in the estimation of his countrymen; his Voyageurs has, we believe, appeared on the English stage under a different name, and his Filles à Marier, one of his latest compositions, an entertainment in three acts, is full of simplicity and unaffected wit. He is the author of several other pieces too numerous to be mentioned here. It was at this theatre that about six years ago, the farce of Plot and Counterplot made its appearance under the title of Le Portrait de Michel Cervantes. The writer of this article was present at the first representation of this amusing afterpiece, which though severely censured by the French Newspaper Critics of the time, on account of the intricacy of its plot, met with a very favourable reception. The translation given by Mr. C. Kemble is faithful, but the scene between the two supposed dead bodies, being a little altered, did not strike us with the same effect as the original.

L'Opera Comique presents a still livelier scene. There, they now and then indulge in what the French call, des changemens à vue, or changes of scenery executed without lowering the curtain. For in all the Parisian theatres, the Great Opera, or Academie Imperiale de Musique, and the Opera Comique excepted, the curtain always falls when any change of scenery is about to take place. This must be understood to apply only to those theatres in which such a gross violation of the rules of Aristotle is tolerated. The singers in this house are, in general, good, though certainly very deficient in taste and execution, if we put them in comparison with our Braham and Billington.

L'Ambigu Comique is the fertile ground from whence our modern authors plucked all the melodramatic plants which have of late flourished on our London stages. Here we meet with the originals of Tekeli, The Wife with Two Husbands, The Fortress, The Young Hussar, and many others, the names of which have escaped our memory. It is here a Hook found invention and harmless wit, which he improved into indecent double entendres. It is whilst reading the productions of the numberless bards, who write for this theatre, that his partiality for escapes first unfolded itself; and as we have no doubt of his being desirous, perhaps, through the force of habit, to imitate his heroes, and also effect his escape from the lash of deserved criticism, we will indulge him this time, and defer the continuation of our remarks on the French and English stage till a future opportunity.

LUDICROUS STORY OF MR. C——KE.

One evening in Manchester, we were in a public bar amidst a promiscuous company, where C—ke was, as usual the life of the party. Mirth and good humour prevailed till about ten o'clock, when I perceived something lurking in his eye, which foretold a storm. Anxious to get him home before it burst forth, I pressed our departure, under the plea of another engagement; but, instead of having the desired effect, it precipitated what I had foreseen. With a haughty supercilious look, he said—

"I see what you are about, you hypocritical scoundrel! You canting methodical thief! am I, C—ke, to be controuled by such a would-be puritan as you? I'll teach you to dictate to a tragedian." Then pulling off his coat, and holding his fist in a menacing attitude—"Come out," continued he, "thou prince of deceivers; though thou hast faith to remove mountains, thou shalt not remove me.—Come out, I say." With much difficulty he was pacified, and resumed his coat —There was a large fire in the bar, before which stood, with his coat skirts under each arm, a pitiful buck, very deficient in cleanliness and costume. His face was grimy, and his neckcloth of the same tinct, which nevertheless, was folded in various folds about his throat; his hair was matted, and turned up, under a round greasy hat, with narrow brims, conceitedly placed on one side the head, which noddled under it, like a shaking mandarin. Thus equipped, the filthy fop straddled before the fire, which he completely monopolized. At length he caught the eye of our tragedian, who, in silent amazement for the space of half a minute, examined him from top to toe; then turning to me, he burst forth is a horse-laugh, and roared out, "beau nasty, by ——." Perhaps intimidated by C—ke's former blustering, this insensible puppy took little notice: but I knew he would not stop here, and indeed I thought the stranger fair game: now rose from his seat, and taking up the skirts of his coat, in imitation of the other, turning his back to the fire,—"Warm work, sir, in the back settlements, sir," said he, then approaching still nearer, as if he had some secret to communicate, whispered, though loud enough for every one to hear—"Pray, Sir, how is soap?"

"Soap?"

"Yes, Sir, soap; I understand it is coming down."

"I am glad of it, Sir."

"Indeed, Sir, you have cause, if one may judge from your appearance."

There was a general laugh, which the stranger seemed not to regard, but noddling his head, and hitting his boots with a little rattan, rang the bell, with an air of importance, and enquired "if he could have a veal-kitlet or a mutton chip?"

"What do you think," said C—ke, "of a roasted puppy? because," taking up the poker, "I'll spit you, and roast you in a minute."

This had a visible effect on the dirty beau—he retreated towards the door.

C—ke following—"Avaunt, and quit my sight, thy face is dirty, and thy hands unwashed; avaunt, avaunt! I say."—Then replacing the poker, and returning to his seat, he continued—"Being gone, I am a man again."

It happened that Perrins, the noted pugilist, made one of the company this evening; he was a remarkably strong man, and possessed of great modesty, and good nature. The last scene took such effect on his imagination, that he laughed immoderately. C—ke's attention was attracted, and turning towards him with his most bitter look—"Why, you great lubber-headed thief, Johnson would have beat two of you! laugh at me! at C—ke! come out, you scoundrel!"

The coat was again pulled off, and putting himself in an attitude, "this is the arm that shall sacrifice you." Perrins was of a mild disposition, and knowing C—ke's character, made every allowance, and answered him only by a smile, till, aggravated by language, and action the most gross, he very calmly took him in his arms, as though he had been a child, set him down in the street, and bolted the door. The evening was wet, and our hero, without coat or hat, unprepared to cope with it; but entreaty for admission was vain, and his application at the window unattended to. At length growing desperate, he broke several panes, and inserting his head through the fracture, bore down all opposition by the following witticism:—"Gentlemen, I have taken some pains to gain admission; pray let me in, for I see through my error." The door was opened, dry clothes procured, and about nine o'clock in the morning we sent him home in a coach.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Sir,—I should suppose a much more plausible definition of the beast's name mentioned in the 13th chapter of the Revelation, to be that of the Pope than of Buonaparte; the former being a more simple calculation, and upon which it appears to me that there will be no occasion for the "Eccentric Divine," and your last Correspondent to disagree. A SUBSCRIBER.

The Pope's title being "Vicarius Filii Dei."

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

ISLANDS OF SCILLY, AUG. 1.—On the 30th ult. came passenger in the Weekly Packet, established from Penzance to these Islands, Benjamin Tucker, Esq. Surveyor-General to the Prince of Wales.

It is said that Government has it in contemplation to make the harbour at these Islands commodious and safe for the reception of ten sail of the line besides frigates; it being, from its westerly direction, peculiarly advantageous to the getting out to sea with any wind, and for intercepting any of the enemy's fleets that might chance to get out of their ports.

It is also said to be the intention of Government to permit salt to be imported for the use of these Islands, duty free, and the which will be a great acquisition to the poor inhabitants, who are now greatly distressed from the scarcity of that article in curing ling fish, and other fish in general.

FALMOUTH, AUGUST 3.—Sailed this day, his Majesty's ship Pomone, of 44 guns, with about 60 sail, under convoy for Gibraltar, Malta, and Sicily; Thompeuse, and Little Belt, with about 10 sail for Africa; Growler, with eight sail of victuallers for the fleet off L'Orient; L'Aimable, with eleven transports, having on board the 20th Regiment of Foot, and the Queen's, bound, it is supposed, for the Tagus; Ann tender for Bristol; Portuguese schooner Angelica, with a Portuguese Messenger for Oporto; and Patriot, for Corunna and Gibraltar. His Majesty's ship Thais, with about 30 sail from Portsmouth for the Brazils, put in here yesterday, and remain with the Steady gun-brig. Arrived this day his Majesty's ship Bonne Citoyenne, from off Brest. The Princess Amelia, with mails for Corunna, sailed this day. The Portuguese brig Mevo del Mundo, for the Brazils, is on shore, with six feet water in her hold; will be obliged to reland.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Friday last as Mr. Byne, of Stepney, was angling for fish, in Bow Creek, below Blackwall, standing near the brink, he was taken in a fit, fell into the stream, and sank; fortunately for him, some watermen being near at hand, he was soon picked up, and used every means in their power to recover him of his fit, and also to discharge the water he had imbibed: in two hours time he was enabled to walk about. He handsomely rewarded his deliverers for their humane attention.

Wednesday morning a Gentleman of the name of Stuart, residing in Brompton Crescent, Chelsea, walked to Brompton-row, and called for a coach from the stand. The coachman refused to take him, when he immediately returned home, and soon after shot himself with a pistol, and instantly expired.

At Union Hall, on Friday, a genteel young woman, named Dogarty, made her appearance to answer to a summons preferred against her by the Rev. J. Niven, by whose statement it appeared that the defendant, on Sunday last, during his performing divine service at Vauxhall Chapel, attempted to interrupt him. The above charge having been clearly proved by the evidence of many respectable witnesses, the prisoner was held to bail, in conjunction with two sureties of 50*l.* each, at the next General Sessions, which are to be held at Horsemonger Lane.

FOR THE RESTORATION OF SIGHT.—Among all the evils attendant upon humanity none are more to be lamented than those that deprive us of the free exercise of our outward faculties, and particularly that of sight. A remedy for the removal of that defect in sight, ought to obtain the Patronage of the British Public, that it may be freely used among the lower classes who are unable to purchase so inestimable a blessing as that of the removal of defects in the sight. Mr. and Mrs. Williams, No. 99, Hatton Garden, have the pleasure of informing the Public, that they have in their possession an unparalleled remedy for all disorders attendant upon the deficiency in loss of sight. They have testimonials sufficient in their possession to place its efficacy and value beyond doubt. Mr. and Mrs. Williams attend at No. 99, Hatton Garden, from ten to twelve, and from two till five, every day: and upon notice, attend Ladies and Gentlemen at their own houses.—They always apply the remedy in person.—N. B. Mr. and Mrs. Williams have gratuitously distributed their Medicine for the last four years; and have now been advised to form a General Dispensary, to be supported by Subscription, that all Classes may have the opportunity of recovering their perfect sight. To this humane institution Mr. and Mrs. W. beg to direct the attention of the Public.

DIED.

At Hull, on the 9th ult. Widow Pinder. By her register, it appears, that she was born at Louth, Lincolnshire, the 7th of July, 1704; so that she had attained the age of 104 years.

On Wednesday night, the 27th ult. in Dublin, the Right Hon. John Thomas Earl of Clanricarde, General in the Army, Colonel of the 66th regiment, Governor of Hull, and Custos Rotulorum, in the county of Galway. The first Marquis of Clanricarde, in the reigns of Charles I. and II. was, perhaps, as able and distinguished a loyalist and patriot as that æra so celebrated for great men produced.

On Monday se'nnight, at the Trinity House, at Hull, aged 76, Mrs. Gunhouse, widow of the late Capt. Rd. Gunhouse, of Liverpool. Her death was occasioned by a piece of the shell of a crab-fish running into her thumb, which caused a mortification.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-THREE.

SOME OBSERVATIONS RELATIVE TO THE CONDUCT OUR ARMY OUGHT TO OBSERVE IN SPAIN.

To want of harmony and co-operation on the part of the Allies, all the disasters, which Europe has suffered during the course of the revolutionary war, have been generally attributed. These complaints have not been confined to this or that particular country; they have been repeated throughout the Continent. There is not a state, which formed part of the coalitions against France, that does not accuse the other members of the Confederacy of lukewarmness and even treachery. To whatever cause this disunion is to be attributed, that it did exist is generally allowed. A sense of danger had united Austria and Prussia, Spain and Great Britain in the same cause. This union was thought too unnatural to last: the parts which composed it were too heterogeneous to resist rooted prejudices and national jealousy. This opinion was soon verified: the Austrians and Prussians before the end of the first campaign, so far from rendering each other assistance, manifested the most indecent joy when either suffered a defeat. On perusing the history of that time, we know not what we should most admire, the bravery and patience of the soldiers, or the folly of the several governments and the misconduct of the Generals. After the capture of Valenciennes, both Austrians and English neglected every measure which could render co-operation useful and success certain. Defeat, flight, and the loss of the Netherlands were the consequence. The same disasters attended the operations of our army and that of the Russians in Holland, and proceeded from the same cause. The Austrians and Russians experienced similar misfortunes in Italy and Switzerland, through the disunion of the Commanders.

The cause of these disasters was so notorious, that every expectation of success from coalitions was considered chimerical; and this method of resisting the French was thought so insufficient, that the Allies, as well as the enemy, laughed at the idea of expecting from it any ultimate advantage. History was referred to on the occasion; and it contained so many proofs of the prevailing sentiment, that coalition and defeat became synonimous. The failure of the formidable league of Cambray, the inefficacy of the united efforts of Charles the Fifth, and our Henry the Eighth, to make any decisive impression on France; the success of Frederick against the greater part of Europe, were triumphantly mentioned as unanswerable arguments against the utility of coalitions.

This opinion is so very specious, that it would be worth while to investigate, why an union of many against one, in contests between nations, is seldom productive of any considerable result. This miscarriage cannot be imputed to national prejudices exclusively; because if jealousy [illegible] national emulation has as great an influence on the [illegible] time. It cannot, therefore, with any appearance of truth, be attributed to the influence which national animosity may have on the armies. It originates solely in the pride, self-love, and incompetency of the Generals. To them, and to them alone, is the blame to be imputed; for almost every confederacy has been successful in the beginning. Venice was brought to the very verge of destruction by the league; nothing but the dissentions and jealousy of the members could have saved the Republic from ruin. Prussia was reduced to a similar state, notwithstanding the genius of her Monarch, and owed her safety to a similar cause. France was likewise unsuccessful in the commencement, and was preserved from destruction by a difference of views and interests on the part of her enemies. When she was in the zenith of her glory, under the greatest of her Kings, a confederacy, directed by our great Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, was invariably successful against her. These two great men, during a war which lasted eleven years, were never known to disagree; and this harmony of opinion and coincidence of views threatened to overturn a power, which, for near half a century, was the terror of Europe. It cannot also be denied that the miserable passions and ignorance of the Generals, together with the selfishness of the different Cabinets, have contributed most to render France so formidable as she is at present. A new Confederacy is forming against her, better organized, it is to be hoped, than the preceding. However, the only way to produce a different result, is by chusing other men and means. The experience of former times will teach us more prudence and circumspection. It must be considered at the same time, that this is the last effort Europe, according to all probability, will be able to make; and if she succumb, she is lost without a prospect of being able to retreive her affairs. A few observations on the conduct fit to be observed in this critical juncture, will not be impertinent. They will be important, if they have no other merit than that of engaging some other writer to treat the subject.

Some years ago the reputation of our army had sunk very low in the opinion of the Continent. But this prejudice did not last long. Our splendid success in Egypt and the battle of Maida, effaced the stigma our arms had suffered before Dunkirk and at the Helder. Another opinion, more injurious and equally unfounded, likewise prevailed, that our soldiers were guilty of the greatest excesses, and our officers of intoxication. This unjust prejudice against the latter, probably gave occasion to an infamous report, which was in general circulation abroad, that our army was never attacked by the enemy towards the end of the campaign of 1793, till about six or seven in the evening, when too free an indulgence in the pleasures of the table was said to have incapacitated our Generals from commanding with that steadiness and coolness which can alone insure victory. No man in this country will give credit to so dishonourable an aspersion, but, as it has been industriously and universally circulated, the more cautious we ought to be, that we give no future pretext for so base a calumny. However, the Officers, who served in Flanders, are most interested in this report. Though our army is as free as any in Europe from a vice so fatal to subordination, yet precautions should be taken that our soldiers never fall into it. They are now going to a country where spirituous liquors are incomparably cheaper than at home. A most excellent regulation was introduced in the Expedition commanded by Lord Cathcart, which was sent to co-operate with the Russians and Swedes during the last Austrian war. Our Readers will excuse a short digression here, in order to do justice to that distinguished officer. During the short stay he made at that time on the Banks of the Weser, he left a deep and permanent impression on the inhabitants, by his condescension and conciliating manners; and the discipline he maintained among his men, was the subject of universal praise. But to return to our subject, this regulation consisted in a temporary diminution of the pay. The privates were allowed no more than sixpence a day, whilst the remainder was preserved for them till their return. This was productive of several advantages. Besides a considerable sum they had to receive on their return, it preserved them from those excesses which their full pay would have exposed them to in a country, where brandy is so very cheap. As the Spaniards are the soberest and most decent people upon earth, the necessity of a similar regulation for our army which is going to assist them, will be strongly felt; for no vice would sink our national character lower in their estimation, than that of drunkenness. It is now very high in that country; and if we wish to preserve the affection and esteem of that high-minded people, we must adopt their temperance. This virtue should be particularly recommended to our young officers, for regulations will be useless unless they give the example to their men. They cannot be ignorant that the fate of Europe and of their country is in their hands; and what must be sacred to a soldier, the fame of the British army is attached to their conduct.

Another circumstance cannot be too strongly, and too frequently recommended, we mean a respect for the worship of the inhabitants. They are strongly attached, like all honest men, to the religious institutions of their fathers. Any pleasantries on that subject would betray as much ignorance as brutality; and would contribute more to alienate the inhabitants, than any other excess they could be guilty of. It would also be adviseable, that such of our soldiers as are Catholics, should, on their arrival in that country, march every Sunday to Church, under Officers of that persuasion. They should be accompanied likewise by the band of their regiment, as this custom is usual in Spain. This liberality will remove from the minds of the natives any prepossession they may have imbibed about our bigotted severity to the Catholics; and must have great influence on a continuance of harmony between the two nations. The strictest injunctions should be likewise given to restrain licentiousness towards the other sex. The Spaniards are proverbially delicate in that respect. It is too common with the soldiers of every country, when they are on foreign service, to imagine that a great latitude is allowed them on that very point; and the idea, that every brave man is naturally a gallant man, does not contribute to diminish this licentiousness. It has been productive, however, of the most pernicious abuses; and the brave man, who would blush to be guilty of a dishonourable action, is guilty, without remorse, of perfidy and atrocity towards the weaker sex. Soldiers, who are the protectors of the weak and the defenceless, will find it difficult to reconcile with that character, their ungenerous treatment in this respect. It is necessary to make these observations, because there have been examples of perfidy, the recital of which would fill an honest man with horror. To cover these atrocities the sacred institution of marriage has been abused, and soldiers have been known to marry several women in the course of a single campaign. This is a most revolting levity; and it is to be hoped that no instances of it will occur in our army. But should any be guilty of so daring a violation of social and divine laws, he should be punished with the same rigour, as he would be in this country for a similar crime. A relaxation of morals must be as fatal to a soldier's sense of honour, as to a man in private life; and it is worthy of notice that the greatest Generals have been most attentive to maintain in their army a sense of moral and religious feeling. The Greeks and Romans, in the finest ages of their Republics, never engaged in a war, or never fought a battle without first imploring the protection of Heaven for the success of their arms. And shall we, who are Christians, and who are fighting in the justest cause a nation was ever engaged in, overlook so awful an obligation. Two of the greatest heroes, and most extraordinary monarchs among the moderns, Gustavus Adolphus and Charles the Twelfth, were remarkable for maintaining religious sentiments in the minds of their soldiers. The attention of Suwarrow is known in this respect.

But all these regulations would be useless, without a General capable of enforcing them. The bravest army, and most distinguished for discipline, when conducted by a man of moderate abilities, loses its superiority against far inferior troops commanded by a distinguished officer. The history of every war, for more than two thousand years, gives us undeniable proofs of the truth of this assertion. It is not even sufficient that the general, who will command our armies in Spain, should possess distinguished military talents; he must possess all the requisites of a great man; he must join the abilities of the statesman, to those of a soldier. A country which is divided into as many governments, as there are juntas, and which will consequently have such a diversity of interests and views, as soon as the alarm of the present danger has subsided, requires a General, who is a consummate statesman. It is also necessary, that he possess a profound knowledge of their language and manners. The facility which this will give him in his negociations with the different Juntas, may be easily conceived. It will be flattering to the self-love of the nation; and a deficiency in this respect can never be remedied. A single phrase from the mouth of a victorious General, would have more weight on the resolutions of a popular assembly, than all the eloquence and wit of Mr. Canning himself. If he is ignorant of the language, he has no other intercourse with the natives, than through the medium of an interpreter:—how cold, how formal!—or he must speak to them in the language of their oppressors. From all we have said, we have no doubt on our minds that the disunion of the allies, the ill success of every former war, and the vast preponderance of the French, are to be attributed solely and exclusively to the incapacity of the Generals.'

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXIX.

TO MR. COBBETT.

SIR—Your observations on the affairs of Spain and the delicate witticisms with which they are interlarded, though they may afford you and your friends a vast fund of satisfaction, have not had a similar effect on the public. I leave it to the impartial and the honest to judge of the degree of honour they do to your head and to your heart. You are justified, however, in laying claims to the honour of singularity on the occasion; and if it be a mark of genius that you, whilst every bosom in the different ranks of society throbs with ecstacy at the prospect of ultimate success on the side of innocence and virtue, should feel no other sensation but a desire to indulge in scurrility and invective, you have unenvied pretensions to a superiority of intellect. Beware of this exclusive privilege, Mr. Cobbett! An English Public, though far from being inimical to eccentricity on common occasions, are so tenacious in some matters, that they would renounce their characteristic toleration, and view that man more in the light of a monster, than of a hero, who is singular enough to feel in the contemplation of moral and national events, only a desire to indulge in the worst and most perverted feelings of the human heart. Reflect, therefore, seriously if the pleasure of indulging in a gratification, let it be ever so congenial to your principles and disposition, will afford a compensation for the esteem of a British Public. However, I am not qualified to appreciate the satisfaction which a cankered heart, joined to an irregular imagination may enjoy from bidding defiance to those moral sentiments which are so much valued by the multitude. I have never been admitted into our modern school of Ethics, and have no other guide to regulate my judgment and principles, but that ancient system of morals, which will appear to a person of your daring turn of mind, as imposing too many restrictions on the natural liberty of man. If my notions appear to you, in the course of our correspondence, too narrow and illiberal, you will impute them to the prejudices of the school in which I was educated. You, Sir, who indulge in a greater latitude of principle, and are versed in the boldest theories of the French philosophers, will condemn the contractedness of my notions. Indifferent however to your opinion, as you are to my animadversions, I will, without further preface, proceed to the subject of this letter.

The opinions you have constantly insinuated, though you had not the courage to come forward boldly with them, relative to the present contest between the Spaniards and their oppressors, leave no doubt on my mind as to your intentions. I will appeal, however, to the public if your vile attack on the Spanish Nobility be justifiable or not? You must and ought to have known, that not a hundredth part of them were assembled at Bayonne. Besides you were not ignorant that the distinguished Personages, who are Deputies from the Spanish Provinces to our Government are Noblemen, and that the Generals who are beating the French in every direction, and that the Members who compose the several Juntas are Noblemen. I will ask you then how you could have the unblushing effrontery to insert the following passage in the last number of your Political Register: "His (Joseph Bonaparte's) reception upon the road, as well "as at Madrid, clearly shows, I think, that besides the rascally "Nobility, he has a very powerful party in the kingdom, and "which party will, in my opinion, daily increase." This whole passage betrays so absolute an ignorance of the events which have occurred in that country; so base an aspersion of a numerous and dignified class of that nation, because a few from cowardice or compulsion have yielded to the bayonets of Bonaparte; and at the same time, so dishonourable a perversion of facts, that I defy any man, actuated by motives different from yours, to read it without mingled sentiments of horror and indignation. This passage, so replete with ignorance, presumption, and scurrility, will establish your reputation in the judgment of your contemporaries. Having diligently perused your Journal of late, and though disgusted by the self-sufficiency of the writer, I was imposed on by an appearance of candour and liberality; and was willing to impute the grossness and licentiousness of your style more to the manners and education of the man, than to the perversity of his heart. Feeling likewise a strong bias for freedom of discussion, I was willing to exculpate the extreme licentiousness of your pen on account of the supposed honesty of your intentions. "This, Mr. Cobbet," I would frequently say to persons, who have condemned you as much for your opinions, as for the vulgarity of your style, "is "probably sincere in his intentions, notwithstanding the intem- "perance of his language." Though experience and reflection might have convinced me, that an individual, whose philippics, in this agony of universal liberty, are directed against the only Government which is the last prop of independence, must be a very dangerous character, whether his invectives proceed from mistaken zeal, a corroded heart, or innate brutality.

You cannot have forgotten that two months are scarce elapsed, when the most sanguine looked forward with anxiety and diffidence to the termination of the contest we are engaged in with Bonaparte—a man, whose abilities are as extensive as his conduct is flagitious; who joins to the immense resources he has at his disposal, an unextinguishable hatred to this country, her institutions, and even name; who knows that his reputation of a demi-god, or of the greatest villain that ever disgraced humanity, depends on its ruin or prosperity; who is convinced that his vast empire is tottering as long as Englishmen retain their independence and opulence. I will now ask you, if you have any feelings of an Englishman left, how you could indulge in that outrageous attack on the Spanish nobility, after a great majority of them have come forward with life and fortune against the man I have now described? Sir, whatever indignation I may feel in the perusal of your Register, I will not descend to the baseness of calling you a rascal, but declare your conduct to be the most unexampled and unprincipled that a public writer could have been guilty of. Whilst you are indulging yourself at Botley, under the protection of a government, which secures you in the enjoyment of opulence and liberty, you have the unparalleled insolence to denominate rascals, the very men who are shedding their blood to resist the inveterate enemy of your country and their own! What is General Castanos but a nobleman? What is Count Tilli, Marquis de Compigny, General Palafox, Cuesta, the Members of the Juntas, and the Deputies now in England, but noblemen? Sir, I have observed with shame and regret, because I am not your personal enemy, however I may detest your principles, and reprobate the indecency of your invectives, that the abilities of an Englishman should be employed to calumniate the ostensible persons in Spain and England, who are peculiarly called on by their situation to oppose the pernicious ambition of Bonaparte: but in speaking of that man, you seem to lay aside the savageness of your disposition, and, with the fawning servility of a Parisian journalist, call him "Napoleon," the "Emperor Napoleon." There is some excuse for Frenchmen, for the slightest deviation from etiquette would be punished with imprisonment, and the confiscation of property. But where are your English feelings?—Where is your vaunted detestation of tyrants, when you can have the baseness to call that traitor Emperor? On what occasion have the government or people of this country acknowledged his usurpation? And when did he arrogate this title of Emperor? After the murder of Pichegru, and after he attempted to murder Moreau! He sealed it, as he did every other act of his life, with murder—with that of the amiable and enlightened Palm. And this usurper, this avowed enemy of liberty, this murderer, the humane Mr. Cobbett, the sturdy champion in the cause of freedom, never mentions without the greatest respect; whilst he brands the noble patriots of Spain with the infamous epithet "raschls!"—Shame on the feelings of that man who will speak of a villain with respect, and call honest men rascals! I would advise you, as interest seems to have great influence on the approbation you bestow, to be more circumspect in your future numbers, for the cause of patriotism in Spain and England, in spite of your virulence and obloquy, will triumph over that of the Bonaparte's.

I would likewise wish to know whence you received your information that Joseph Bonaparte was received with such distinguished marks of affection at Madrid, and on the way thither; and that he has a very powerful party in the kingdom, besides the rascally nobility? Inform the public how numerous this very powerful party is—a third part of the population, or more? Condescend to be more explicit; for you cannot but know, Sir, that the destinies of Spain and of Europe depend on a circumstance which you treat with so much nonchalance. For so positive an assertion you must have unquestionable authority. And will you have the courage to include so large a proportion of the Spanish population under your denomination of rascally? But to return to your important information:—It must have been transmitted to you by our accredited agents, or you have taken it from the Seville Gazette. Or has it been suggested by your own heart? Or have you extracted it from the Moniteur? For my part, I see no other way of accounting for this strange opinion, than that you either wished it were so, and gave credit to it; or that, in writing it, you were suddenly deprived of memory and judgment. However, I will be more careful of your reputation than you are of your own, and will rather consider you a political blockhead than a political knave.—Your ungovernable disposition has placed you in the unfortunate predicament, that you must pass either for one or the other. I will, therefore, notwithstanding any indignation you may express at my charitable explanation of your conduct, not impute it to villainy, but to folly. But whatever were your motives, the palpable falshood of your declaration must be exposed; and whatever reluctance I may feel in accusing you of a dishonest attempt to counteract the magnanimous exertions of our countrymen in favour of the Spaniards, I feel no inclination to allow you to delude or damp the ignorant by your insolent affectation of infallibility in political matters. Your information has been entirely derived from the French papers. Which shall we believe? the Moniteur and you, or that of our agents in Spain, which is supported by the experience of ages, and the unadulterated feelings of mankind? It is impossible, Sir, that a Bonaparte could have been well received in Madrid, where, about a month before his arrival, his sanguinary brother-in-law, the infamous Murat, butchered so many thousands of the inhabitants. Whatever degrading conclusion you may be justified in drawing of the feelings of men, there are injuries which can rouse even the basest and most insensible to resistance and revenge. These injuries have been done to the unfortunate inhabitants of that capital. There is not a family which has not the loss of some relative to lament; and you have, nevertheless, the audacity to assert that a Bonaparte, whose name is associated in their minds with perfidy, pillage, and murder, has been joyfully received at Madrid, where there is not a stone that is not stained with the blood of the unfortunate victims, who have been immolated to the ferocious ambition of that detestable family. However, Mr. Cobbett, whatever information you may have received, and whatever may be your wishes, I congratulate my countrymen and the Spaniards, that neither the suggestions of your head, nor the feelings of your heart, have a decisive influence on the success of the united cause.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

CORUNNA GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY, AUG. 1.

"The following official dispatches have been received by express:—

"Head Quarters at Andujar, Six o'Clock in the Evening, July 19, 1808.

"Most Serene Seignors,

"At half-past five, an Officer came in with a flag of truce, requesting that orders should be given to General La Pena to suspend hostilities whilst General Dupont should hold a conference with General Reding. I replied in the negative. A few moments after I received a letter from General Pena himself, informing me that they had solicited terms of Capitulation. I grant them no other terms than that they shall be prisoners of war, with permission to the General and his Officers to wear their swords, and to take with them a portmanteau each, filled with their clothes only, in consequence of the pillage which they have committed in our towns; assuring them, however, at the same time, that they shall be treated with the same respect as those belonging to the squadron at Cadiz, and in a manner worthy of Spanish generosity. Whilst the details are preparing, I beg leave to acquaint your Highnesses, that we have taken some cannon and prisoners, and, in short, that General Dupont is completely hemmed in on all sides.

"May God preserve your Highnesses many years.

"The Most Serene Seignor Xavier de Castanos.

"The Most Serene the Supreme Junta of Government."

"N. B. A dispatch of the same date, and communicating the same intelligence, has been received from Seignor Count Tilli, a member of this Supreme Junta, who accompanies the General of the army."

NOTE OF THE SUPREME JUNTA.

"Seville, July 20.—The Supreme Junta has the most entire satisfaction to inform the public, that by a dispatch received this day, by express, from the Most Excellent Seignor D. Francisco Xavier Castanos, Captain-General of the Forces of Andalusia, of which a literal extract is hereto annexed, a most convincing proof is giving of the military talents with which the operations have been conducted, inasmuch as the results exactly correspond with the well-digested plan which had been formed. So fortunate have they been, that from the very first encounter, the enemy has continued to fly with the utmost disgrace, and his flight has been a complete rout: this effect having been produced by events which he certainly could not have prevented.

'Most Serene Seignors,

'In my dispatch of the 17th, I acquainted you with the state of our operations and proceedings. On the 13th, General Reding wrote to inform me, that at nine in the morning he entered Baylen with his own division and that of the Marquis de Compeigne, which I had ordered to join him; and that the enemy were retreating from that place to Guarroman, having left behind only a grand guard, which was put to the rout. I instantly wrote to Reding to attack Andujar, in flank, with the two divisions, whilst I should attack it in front. I was preparing to execute my plan at day-break this morning, when, at two o'clock, I was apprised that the enemy were evacuating Andujar, and making a precipitate flight by the road to Madrid. I cannot conceal my surprise, that the inhabitants of Andujar did not give me the slightest notice of this movement.

'Finding that the enemy were making their escape from me, I ordered General Lapena, with his division and some reinforcements, to harass their rear; a disposition so much the more proper, as I had just received a letter from General Reding, informing me that he had marched from Baylen at three in the morning, with the intention of making his attack upon Andujar at eleven; so that in consequence of his active and opportune movement, Dupont will find himself placed between these two divisions and that of General La Pena. I flatter myself that the result will correspond with the well-combined dispositions of the plan. Your Highness may hourly expect intelligence of the intended attack of to-day, for which every thing is prepared. I occupy this city with the division of General Jones, where I have taken a position adapted to circumstances. The enemy have left 300 sick, and it is believed that General Vedel was killed in the affair of Menjibar. I have also received advice from Commandant Cruz, that he had proceeded with his sharpshooters to Los Banos, in order to cover the movements of the respective divisions; and, if Col. Balderanos has followed my instructions to him, a most favourable opportunity will occur of occupying Despenaperros; since, in a dispatch which we have intercepted, dated the 16th, from the Chief of the Staff of the French army at Baylen, to the Commandant of both Elena, the latter is directed to march to Guarroman, leaving only 300 men at that point. May God preserve your Most Serene Highnesses many years.

'Head-quarters at Andujar, 8 o'clock in the morning, July 19, 1808.

'The Most Serene Seignor Xavier de Castanos.

'The Most Serene Seignors the President and Members of the Supreme Junta of Government.'

"By the same Courier Extraordinary has been received a dispatch from the Most Excellent Seignor Count de Tilli, a Member of the Supreme Junta, which, in addition to the communication from his Excellency the General in Chief, mentions the deplorable situation to which the enemy has reduced the town of Andujar. It is undoubtedly a matter of surprise, however well practised these banditti are in the arts of corruption, that there should be room to suspect any of the inhabitants of that place of disloyalty, or adhering to the enemy. But should these suspicions be confirmed, they may well tremble at the example which this Supreme Authority is preparing, in order to satisfy the public, and to prevent similar proceedings in other places which may have the misfortune to fall into the enemy's hands. This dispatch also contains the inventories of two magazines which the French left behind them at Andujar; but it likewise mentions a third which there had not been time to examine, and as we are in expectation of the still more important results of a decisive action, the whole of the requisite details will be subsequently communicated.

DEFEAT AND SURRENDER OF THE FRENCH ARMY UNDER GENERAL DUPONT.

LETTERS FROM GENERALS CASTANOS AND TILLI, TO THE SUPREME JUNTA OF SPAIN AND THE INDIES.

"Most Serene Seignor,

"I have the satisfaction to communicate to your Highness the most complete victory which has followed the battle of Baylen. General Dupont, and the whole of his division, with guns, artillery, baggage, &c. are prisoners of war. Those troops which had not entered into the action, although they had embarked in disaster, are included in the capitulation, and obliged to return to France by sea; so that there does not remain a single Frenchman in Andalusia. The general details will be communicated by my nephew, Colonel Don Pedro Augustin Giron, Adjutant-General of the Infantry; and whilst the circumstantial details of the whole are preparing, I think it proper to inform your Highness, that the bravery of the troops and Officers, their constancy, suffering, and privations, correspond with the just opinion which your Highness entertains of them, and with the conception which I had formed of their patriotism and zeal for the public cause.

"I take the liberty of requesting of your Highness to perform for me the vow which I had made of dedicating this action to the glorious St. Ferdinand.

"God preserve your Highness many years.

"The Most Serene Seignor Xavier De Castanos.

"Head-quarters, at Andujar, July 21."

"To the Most Serene the President of the Supreme Junta of Government."

"Yesterday the 20th instant, Spain, or to speak more properly, the army of your Highness, gained the most glorious victory which this nation has witnessed for many ages. The result is an exact copy of the action of Pavia. In a few hours the Andalusians were freed from the French armies. The division of Dupont, with all its baggage, booty, and all its generals, are prisoners of war; and besides these the division which occupied his Majesty's dominions, from the summit of the Pyrenees, as far as Bayles, are bound to evacuate the peninsula by sea.—This is in brief the sum of the Treaty, which I and his Excellency Seignor Castanos had last night the happiness of signing; and as we retired from the field of battle at twelve o'clock at night, without sleep, and exhausted, it is not possible to send to your Highness a detail of the capitulation, and of the military achievements that have been performed, which shall be done as soon as time will permit.

"The bearer of this agreeable intelligence is the Lieutenant-Colonel of the Column of Provincial Grenadiers, Don Pedro Augustin Giron, Brevet-Colonel, and Adjutant-General, an Officer of the greatest merit, who, by the talents and valour which he has displayed in many actions, and particularly since he has been with this army, has shewn himself worthy of every favour which your Highness can bestow upon him.

"I have this day given orders for taking the oath of allegiance to our Sovereign Don Ferdinand VII. which proceeding had not previously taken place in this city; and also that Te Deum shall be sung, and that there shall be an illumination for three nights successively.

"May God preserve your Highness many years.

GENERAL CASTANOS' ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

AN ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY BY THE MOST EXCELLENT SEIGNOR D. FRANCIS XAVIER DE CASTANOS, COMMANDANT OF THE CAMP AT ST. ROCHE, NOW GENERAL-IN-CHIEF OF THE ARMY OF THE ANDALUSIANS.

"A man, upon whom flattery and meanness alone have conferred the title of hero—a man full of ambition, and the petty band of slaves who surround him, have formed the great project of subjugating us. Deception, perfidy, and treason, have hitherto been the instruments of so ill-premeditated an enterprize. The Spaniards will doubtless unite, and cause their most sacred rights to be respected. We already know that many provinces and communities are animated with the same heroism which we ourselves have displayed from the moment that the evil was rent asunder which covered this iniquitous project. It is extremely important, nay indispensable, that all of us should move to secure the attainment of so noble an object. Each and all ought to contribute all that lies in his power. This is an obligation dictated by the heart from the moment that we remark its first emotions.

"Generous and heroic inhabitants of this happy town, you require not the aid of eloquence to stimulate your ardent souls. You have given and great this moment giving sufficient examples. Rush to the field of honour in quest of our brothers, who are soldiers by profession, that they may instruct you in the first elements of the military art, on which strength and victory principally depend. In the mean time be assured that your families will not be reduced to want or beggary. The opulent ranks of this place will provide for your subsistence. Fear not that the wealthy will spare their treasures. They will deposit all their services of plate in the hands of the Government; and when they eat and drink out of wooden spoons and earthen vessels, they will enjoy the pleasing satisfaction that these instruments of mere luxury are destined to the defence of our Religion, our King, our Country, and our Liberty.

"Ministers of the Sanctuary, be you the first to preach, and to give the example of this important confidence. Be persuaded that both ecclesiastical and civil laws admit of selling the property of the Church in circumstances of such urgent necessity as the present. Convince the faithful that you are penetrated with this genuine doctrine, which, in times not so calamitous, was taught by St. Bernard; for he said, 'it was not conformable with our holy religion, that the Church should flourish in its possessions whilst her poor were necessitous; that she should decorate her walls with gold, and abandon her children to nakedness.'

"And you, Mothers, worthy of so many heroes, who know how to excite the most noble and heroic passions of the human heart, hasten to present to Government your jewels, your rings, and ornaments. Fear not the decay of your attractive graces; you will always be agreeable; and though your exterior decorations should be less conspicuous, you will acquire such a degree of mental perfection and heroism as to attract the esteem of virtuous men, and to command respect even from the weak, the vicious, and the prodigate. "F. X. C."

MURCIA, JULY 4.—On the 26th Seignor Caro attacked Moncey's army at Bunols, and made great havoc among his cavalry and infantry. After this defeat, Moncey retreated to between Quarte and Mislata, where he was attacked a second time by Seignor Caro, and sustained considerable loss. During the night of the 27th, Seignor Caro advanced to cover and defend Valencia. The enemy directed his march towards that city on the 28th, and made a furious attack upon it. They began a discharge of musketry and artillery at one P. M. and continued the firing incessantly until eight in the evening. The inhabitants returned the fire with cannon planted on the gates and on the walls, and also with an incessant discharge of musketry from the tops of the houses. The gate of Quarte was the principal object of attack throughout the whole of the action. But the continued firing from the citadel, and the glorious resistance made by the army of Seignor Caro, who charged with their bayonets, occasioned so great a slaughter among the enemy, that at eight o'clock they were obliged to retreat to their head-quarters, between Quarte and Mislata, which was defended by strong batteries. On the 29th, the forces under the command of Seignors Gervellon and Llamas advanced towards the enemy, in order to attack him on all sides, by placing him between the fire of the City and of the Murcian and Valencian armies; and it last this moment thought that there is not a remnant left of these robbers, who, to their other losses, have to add that of six pieces of cannon.

Since writing the above the Post has arrived, and brings intelligence that the French were entirely destroyed, with the exception of from one to 2000 men, who were wandering about the country and endeavouring to make their escape, but who were expected to share the same fate with the rest.

RIO SECO, JULY 23.—The French, driven to rage and madness by the great slaughter and discomfiture which they had sustained in the battle of the 14th, entered this place with fire and sword, putting to death every one who fell in their way in the streets, and in the houses. In one street they killed 129 individuals, and in a single ward upwards of 200. The place is every where filled with dead bodies. This carnage was followed by an indiscriminate pillage, which continued during the whole of the night; and whatever they could not carry away with them they destroyed. Church vestments, and utensils, plate, challices, pyxes, and sacred hosts, all carried off, all plundered—the images dashed in pieces!—virgins, matrons, widows, * young and old, all *****.

VALENCIA, JULY 24.—On the day of San Buenaventura we were kept in a state of constant alarm from five in the morning until about twelve at noon. During all this time nothing was to be heard but an uninterrupted cannonade in the direction of Montealegre, Palacios, and the convent of Mattalana. After the battle, the French having first pillaged and destroyed the places just mentioned, entered the town of Rio Seco, where they committed the most horrid enormities, and killed an incalculable number of people. Among these were five Franciscan friars, five Carmelites, and three Dominicans. They cut off the hands of a Curate, who sought to protect himself from outrage by elevating the host, robbed him of the cup, and threw away the sacred elements. It is impossible to ascertain the number of the French killed in the battle; but it is a fact that it is difficult to pass through those places, on account of the fœtid smell of the dead bodies. From the 16th up to this date, 150 waggons have passed through here, filled with their wounded, exclusive of those who still remain in Rio Seco. The Hospital, the Infirmary, and the streets, are filled with the wounded. Their army was one of the finest that France could produce.—They were all picked men. Their loss must have been very great; for a reinforcement of 1400 men, who arrived here on the 23d, had scarcely entered the place, when they received orders to proceed on their march.

LOWER SAXONY.

HAMBURGH, JULY 29.—We are assured, that intelligence was received at Copenhagen on the 23d, that the Russian General Buxhovden had surrounded and captured General Klingspor, with 12,000 men.

A rumour was also in circulation, that the alliance between Sweden and England is interrupted.

It was further reported there, that the Swedish squadron, under the command of Admiral Cederstrom, which appeared off Abo, met with such a reception from the flotilla and the batteries, that it was compelled to retire from that place with very considerable loss.

A Spanish regiment is encamped at Roschild, in the Island of Zealand, and 2000 Danes are encamped at Brunlingen, in the County of Holbeck.

The day before yesterday, the Spanish officers and soldiers at the military depôt at Altona and in the vicinity, took the oath of allegiance to their new King, after the new Constitution had been read to them. Nothing was heard but acclamations of "Long live the King, Don Joseph Napoleon!" The French General Dupas gave a grand entertainment to the officers. After dinner, the health of the new King was drank, and repeated several times with unbounded applause. The Commander of the depôt is Seignior Hennosillas.

STATE PAPERS.

PROCLAMATION BY SIR CHAS. COTTON, BART.

ADMIRAL OF THE BLUE, &c. COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

"INHABITANTS OF PORTUGAL—Deputations having reached me from all parts of the kingdom, soliciting succour, aid, and assistance, and stating to me the loyal, brave, and manly determination of the people of Portugal to establish the Government of their lawful Prince, and emancipate their country from French oppression:

"I send, agreeable to your requests, ships, troops, arms, and ammunition, and have directed the standard of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal to be reared, round which every loyal Portuguese is hereby invited immediately to rally, and to take up arms in so just and so glorious a cause.

"To be successful, Portuguese, you must be unanimous; and, joined by your brave neighbours and friends the Spaniards, you must not be intimidated by menaces, nor seduced by promises.

"Some months experience must have convinced you of the effect of French friendship; it is now to British faith and assistance, aided by your own energy and efforts, that you will, I trust, be indebted to the restoration of your Prince, and the independence of your country.

MANIFESTO OF THE PRINCE REGENT OF PORTUGAL AGAINST FRANCE,

ON JUSTIFICATORY EXPOSITION OF THE CONDUCT OF THE COURT OF PORTUGAL WITH RESPECT TO FRANCE, FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE REVOLUTION TO THE TIME OF THE INVASION OF PORTUGAL, AND OF THE MOTIVES THAT COMPELLED IT TO DECLARE WAR AGAINST THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH, IN CONSEQUENCE OF THAT INVASION, AND THE SUBSEQUENT DECLARATION OF WAR, MADE AFTER THE REPORT OF THE MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

[After a few general observations of State-formality, and an enumeration of the circumstances under which Portugal was placed last war, in respect to France, which are so well known, the Manifesto proceeds thus:]

"No sooner was the Treaty of 1801 concluded, than the Court of Portugal hastened to fulfill all its burthensome conditions, and to shew by the religious and punctual observation of all its engagements, how much it desired to confirm the good understanding which was re-established between the two Governments, and which ought to cause to be forgotten all the injuries it had suffered, and which certainly had never been provoked on its part. The conduct of the French Government was very different; as from the first moment peace was re-established, it required all kind of unjust sacrifices on the part of the Portuguese Government, in favour of the most extravagant and unfounded pretensions of France. Europe ought then to have foreseen that its subjugation from Lisbon to Petersburgh was determined in the Cabinet of the Thuilleries, and that it was necessary to combine to level the Colossus with the ground, or submit to be his victims.

"After a short interval, war broke out anew between England and France, and the Court of Portugal having made the greatest sacrifices to avoid war and the harsh and humiliating propositions of the French Government, thought itself fortunate to be able to conclude with the greatest sacrifices of money, the Treaty of 1804, in which France promised in the Sixth Article as follows:

"'The First Consul of the French Republic consents to acknowledge the neutrality of Portugal during the present war, and not to oppose any measures that may be taken with respect to the belligerent nations, agreeably to the principles and general laws of neutrality.'

"The French Government, from that time, received all the advantage of such a treaty; it never had occasion to make the smallest complaint against the Portuguese Government; yet was it during this same war, and after such a stipulation, that it required of the Court of Portugal, not only the infraction of the neutrality, but the declaration of war, in violation of all the treaties that existed between the two countries; and in which, in the case of war, acknowledged possible, it was determined how the subjects of two nations should be treated; and all this without Portugal having any cause of complaint against the British Government, which had even given it every kind of satisfaction, when the commanders of its ships of war had failed in that respect which was due to a neutral flag.

"The Emperor of the French, in the mean time, caused one of his squadrons, on board of which was his brother, to put to sea. It anchored in the Bay of all Saints, where it was received with every kind of respect, and was supplied with all sorts of refreshments. Yet, what is worthy of attention is, that at the very time the French Government received, on the part of that of Portugal, so many marks of friendship and consideration, the squadron burned some Portuguese vessels to conceal its route, with a promise of indemnity to the Proprietors, which promise was never performed. Europe may hence conclude the fate which awaits it, should the French Government acquire an ascendancy by sea, equal to that it has obtained by land, and may properly estimate the foundation of the complaints it so loudly utters against the British Government. England never made any remonstrances against the succours granted to the French squadron, for they were within the acknowledged limits of the Law of Nations: but the Minister of Foreign Relations of France has dared to assert, in the face of Europe, that Portugal gave assistance to the English for the conquest of Monte Video and Buenos Ayres; while it is a fact known by all the world, that that expedition which sailed from the Cape of Good Hope, received from Portugal neither vessels, money, nor men; nor, in fine, any merchandize considered as contraband in time of war; and that the English squadron during this war, obtained nothing at Rio de Janiero, or the other ports of Brazil, except what is not refused to any nation, and which had been supplied plentifully to the French squadron; the Court of Portugal defies the Court of France to produce any fact in contradiction to this assertion, which is founded in the most impartial truth.

"France received from Portugal, from 1804 to 1807, all the colonial commodities and first materials for her manufactures.—The alliance of England and Portugal was useful to France; and in the depression suffered by the arts and industry, in consequence of a perpetual war by land, and a disastrous war by sea, in which she only met with defeats, it was certainly a great advantage to France, that the commerce of Portugal should suffer no interruption; undoubtedly, it was equally useful to both countries. By ravaging Portugal, by subjecting her to excessive contributions in an unheard-of manner, without war, or any resistance having been made on her part, France has not obtained that advantage which a commerce, useful to both countries, would have procured to her.

"The Court of Portugal then began to adopt measures for securing its retreat to that part of the Portuguese dominions which is not exposed to any invasion, the consequences of which ought to create alarm. For that purpose, it ordered all the ships of war fit to keep the sea, to be fitted out; and also directed all the English to leave its dominions and sell their property, with an intention of shutting the ports against England, in order thus to avoid an effusion of the blood of its subjects, which would probably have proved useless, and to endeavour to comply with the views of the Emperor of the French, in case he should not allow himself to be softened down by that justice, with which the Court of Portugal asserted the rights of its independence, along with those which resulted from the Treaty of Neutrality concluded in 1804. The Court of the Thuilleries was unwilling to agree to any conciliatory measures, and having demanded not only the shutting of the ports, but the imprisonment of all British subjects, the confiscation of their property, and a direliction of the project of retreat to America. His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, who knew, on the one side, that his Britannic Majesty, his true and old ally, informed of all the transactions which were going on, would consent to the shutting up of the ports, in order to save Portugal from the invasion of the French, and who was convinced, on the other side, that there was no longer any Englishman in Portugal, who was not naturalized in that country, and that all English property had been sold, and even its amount exported, adopted the resolution to shut up the ports against England, and even to comply with the rest of the demands and pretensions of France, declaring however, at the same time, that should the French troops enter Portugal, his Royal Highness was firmly resolved to remove the seat of Government to Brazil, which formed the most important and best defended part of his dominions. His Royal Highness then ordered his whole army to move to the coasts and sea-ports; supposing that as France had essentially obtained all she demanded, she had nothing more to ask; confided in that good faith which ought to be considered as the fundamental principle in every Government which has ceased to be revolutionary, and felt conscious that having done every thing in his power to secure the tranquillity of his people, and avoid an useless effusion of blood, he had fulfilled all the duties of a virtuous Prince, beloved by his subjects, and who to the Supreme Being alone has to account for his actions.

"The Court of Portugal might then justly, and with every kind of foundation, flatter itself that that of the Thuilleries would respect a neutrality which it had acknowledged by a solemn treaty, and from which it derived such decided advantages, when it was awaked from its security in the month of August, 1806, by a formal declaration of the Minister of State for Foreign Relations, M. Talleyrand to Lord Yarmouth, by which the former noticed to the latter, that if England did not make a maritime peace, the French Government would declare war against Portugal, and order that country to be occupied by 30,000 men. It was not with 30,000 men that the invasion of Portugal could be effected, but the Emperor of the French, who knew the secret, in which Portugal found herself in consequence of the Treaty of neutrality, thought he could take her by surprise, and this was sufficient to justify his proceedings. The Court of England was alarmed by the above declaration, and proposed and offered to that of Portugal all kind of succour; but France, which at that period had arranged every thing to crush the Prussian Court, which then alone bid defiance to the superior power of the Emperor of the French; while a twelvemonth before it would not attack him, though she might even have compelled him to receive the law, and have saved Europe, jointly with Russia and Austria, found means to pacify the Court of Portugal, which she then chose to spare, and could not conceive, that a similar perfidy could be the attribute of a Power, whose greatness should keep pace with that integrity, and those dignified sentiments which suit so well an exalted rank. The war which was afterwards continued with Russia, and which might yet perhaps have saved Europe, if the union of the Governments which divide it had been as close as it should have been, still retarded the execution of the views of the Emperor of the French with regard to the Court of Portugal; and it was only by concluding the Peace of Tilsit, that the Court of the Thuilleries, in a dictatorial tone, such as might become Charlemagne addressing the Princes, whose Sovereign Lord he was, caused the strange demand to be made to the Court of Portugal, through the medium of the French Charge d'Affaires and by the Spanish Ambassador, 1st, To shut up the ports of Portugal against England; 2d, To detain all Englishmen who resided in Portugal; and 3d, To confiscate all English property; or, in case of refusal, to expose itself to an immediate war with France and Spain, because the French Charge d'Affaires and the Ambassador of Spain had orders to depart the 1st of Sept. about three weeks after the said proposition was made, in case the Court of Portugal should not comply with all the pretensions of the two Courts. The good faith of the French Government is no less remarkable, with regard to the celerity with which, after having made that declaration, and without waiting for the answer of the Court of Portugal, it ordered all Portuguese merchantships to be detained which were in the ports of France, and by that measure actually began hostilities without any previous declaration of war, and thus carried to a far greater length all the proceedings which formed its continued topic of reproach against England, which, after such a conduct will be justly valued.

"The Court of Portugal might then well have adopted the known maxim of the Romans, and been convinced, that disgraceful conditions frequently saved those who refuse them, and brought destruction over those by whom they were proposed; but on the one side it could not believe that the Court of the Thuilleries made, in earnest, proposals which committed both its honour and its dignity; and on the other side, it hoped to ward off the storm, desirous of sparing the blood of its people, and placing implicit confidence in the friendship of his Britannic Majesty, its old and faithful ally, it endeavoured to render the pretensions of the French Government more moderate, by acceding to the shutting up of the ports, and refusing the two other articles, contrary to the principles of the public law, and to the treaties which subsisted between the two nations; and his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal had no hesitation to declare, that those two articles wounded equally his religion and the principles of morality from which he never deviated, and which are perhaps the true cause of the unshaken fidelity which he has experienced on the part of his subjects.

"The French Government then observed a line of conduct towards his Royal Highness and his dominions, which would be unprecedented in history, were not the invasion of Switzerland by France at the time of the Executive Directory of a similar description. General Junot, without any previous declaration, without having obtained the consent of the Prince Regent of Portugal, entered that kingdom with the vanguard of his army, assuring the people of the country, he was marching to succour his Royal Highness against an invasion of the English, and that he entered Portugal as a General of a friendly and allied Power. He received on his journey convincing proofs of the good faith of the Portuguese Government, for he witnessed the perfect uneasiness which prevailed with regard to France, and that all the Portuguese troops were near the coast. His Royal Highness the Prince of Portugal, surprised in such an extraordinary manner, might have rallied around him the body of troops, which were at a small distance from him, caused the English fleet to enter the port of Lisbon, and thus cut to pieces the small and miserable corps with which General Junot was advancing, with a degree of temerity which would have been ridiculous, had not General Junot, whose conduct at Venice and Lisbon was but too well known, relied on the feelings of a virtuous Prince, who would never have exposed his people to the most dreadful calamities by a sure first success, which would only have served to chasten the audacity of a man, who like many others, abused the power with which he was entrusted, of who acted in pursuance of orders which cannot be justified.

"His Royal Majesty the Prince Regent, then adopted the only measure which could suit his situation, according to the principles which he had constantly followed, to save the blood of his people, and in order to prevent the criminal plan of the French Government from being carried into execution, which had nothing less in view than to secure his Royal Person, and the whole Royal Family, in order to divide, at its own will and pleasure, the spoils of the Crown of Portugal, and the Portuguese dominions. Providence seconded the efforts of a just Prince, and the magnanimous resolution which his Royal Highness adopted, to retire with his August Royal Family to Brazil, disconcerted at once the efforts of the French Government, and exposed in the clearest light, in the face of Europe, the criminal and treacherous views of a Government which aims at the universal domination of all Europe, and of the whole World, if the great European Powers, roused from the lethargic stupor into which they are sunk, do not make common cause vigorously to oppose an ambition so immoderate and excessive. Since his Royal Highness's safe arrival in his dominions in Brazil, he has learned with horror, not only the usurpation of Portugal, and the pillage and plunder practised in that country, but also the shameful proceeding of the Emperor of the French, who, as the true Dictator of Europe, dares to represent it as a crime of his Royal Highness, that he has removed his seat of Government to Brazil, and in his faithful subjects who followed him, to have accompanied a Prince whom all his people revere, still more on account of his virtues than of the rights of his August Royal Family which he has inherited, and by virtue of which he reigns over them. His Royal Highness has witnessed with horror the hardihood with which an attempt has been made, in an official paper, to proscribe the rights of his August Royal Family, to the Crown of Portugal, with which he will never part; and he is entitled to demand of the Emperor of the French, from what Code of the Law of Nations he has drawn similar principles and received such an authority, claiming to this subject the most serious consideration of all the European Powers, who cannot see with indifference what has here been stated, and the introduction of a new Government in Portugal without his consent, as well as the raising of an exorbitant contribution, demanded from a country which opposed no kind of resistance to the entry of the French troops, and which on this very ground could not consider itself as being at war with France. The most remote posterity, as well as impartial Europe, will see with grief similar transactions, the forerunners of barbarism and misery, such as those which followed the downfall of the Roman Empire, and which cannot be avoided, unless exertions be made to restore the equipoise of Europe by an unanimous effort, and with a total oblivion of all ideas and feeling of rivalship, which has hitherto been the true cause of that monstrous Power which threatens to swallow up all.

"After this correct and true statement made by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal to Europe, and to his subjects, of every thing which has taken place between the Portuguese and French Governments; and as the Emperor of the French has not only invaded Portugal, and laid that country under the most dreadful, and almost incredible, contributions, under the cloak of friendship, but has also long ago withdrawn his Embassy from his Royal Highness's Court, and even caused Portuguese merchant ships to be seized which were in his ports, without any previous declaration of war, and contrary to an express article of the Treaty of Neutrality, from which he derived the greatest advantages, and lastly declared war against him; according to the report of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, His Royal Highness after having resigned his cause into the hands of the Almighty, whom he has every right to invoke in so just a cause, thinks it due to his rank, and to the dignity of his Crown, to make the following declaration:—

"His Royal Highness breaks off all communication with France, recalls all the Members of his Embassy, if any should yet remain, and authorises his subjects to wage war by sea and land against the subjects of the Emperor of the French. His Royal Highness declares null and void all the treaties which the Emperor of the French has compelled him to conclude, and in particular those of Badajoz and Madrid in 1801, and that neutrality in 1804, because she has violated and never respected them; his Royal Highness will not lay down his arms unless in consent with his Britannic Majesty, his old and faithful ally, and will never agree to a cession of Portugal, which forms the most ancient part of the inheritance, and the rights of his August Royal Family. When the Emperor of the French shall have satisfied in every point the just claims of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, and shall have relinquished the dictatorial and imperious tone in which he lords it over oppressed Europe, and when he shall have restored to the Crown of Portugal all he has invaded in the midst of peace, and without the least provocation, his Royal Highness will avail himself of the earliest opportunity to renew the connexion which has always subsisted between the two countries, and which ought to exist between nations which will never be divided but by the principles of an inordinate ambition, which, according to the experience of ages, have also proved destructive to the welfare and tranquillity of all nations by which they were adopted.

WEST INDIES.

JAMAICA, JUNE 18.—The outward bound Jamaica Fleet arrived on the 8th of June. In a postcript to the Jamaica Royal Gazette, of the 11th of June, it is stated, that in a detachment of about fifty recruits of the 2d West India Regiment at drill, near thirty rushed out of Fort Augusta with their arms, and before any stop could be put to them, killed Major Dorley, and Adjutant Ellis. Sixteen were brought to a Court Martial, fifteen were found guilty, and sentenced to death. Seven of them were ordered to be shot on the 8th, and the rest were respited.

DREADFUL FIRE AT FALMOUTH.

MONTEGO BAY, MAY 28.—Between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, in the night of Tuesday last, the dreadful cry of fire was heard in all directions. It began in the retail shop of Mr. Francis Lyon, in the centre of Church-street, which, in defiance of all human exertion, soon became general on both sides the street, the greater part of which is burnt down. The flames reaching the corner houses of Messrs. Campbell and Ellis, and Messrs. John Christie and Co. and on the other side in Market-street, rushed into those of Mrs. Blake, which were soon consumed. Here it was thought the calamity would end, but, alas! from a sudden shift of wind, the fire crossed the street to the large house of Messrs. Lyon and Black, then to Mr. Hawthorn's, Messrs. John Watson and Co. Mr. M'Carthy's, Miss Rippon's, occupied in the lower part by Messrs. Wood and Cullum, Mrs. White's range of buildings, occupied by Mr. Thomas Mitchell, and Mr. James Miller, to Mrs Steel's, then to the Barrack, which, with the whole of Mr. Kelly's extensive buildings, Printing-Office, utensils, &c. the Custom-house, &c. in fact; every building down both sides the street, with the exception of Messrs. Lamont and Sumner's house, and the Trelawny wharf, fell a prey to this devouring element. Many houses in Cornwall and other streets were burnt down, but the principal loss appears to have been in the destruction of the greater part of Market-street, one of the best in the West Indies, all of which, stored with goods of late importation, were entirely consumed.

PROVINCIALS.

BATH, AUG. 8.—I am sorry to inform you an unfortunate occurrence took place last evening at Landsdown, near this city. It has been long a custom, on the Sunday preceding Lansdown Fair, for the young people to assemble on the Down, and amuse themselves with the usual sports and pastimes of what they term Lansdown Revels; but the present High Constable for the Hundred of Bath Forum, Mr. Duncan Campbell, was fully determined to suppress, if possible, all tumultuous and populistic proceedings. Unhappily, something occurred that occasioned his interference, and meeting with resistance, he at last had recourse to a pistol, and shot a man of the name of Strong in the abdomen. The poor fellow died shortly afterwards. Mr. Campbell with difficulty escaped the vengeance of the mob, and surrendered himself up to Mr. Justice White, who committed him to prison. Mr. Campbell is a man of family and fortune, and has been particularly active in his office. A Coroner's Jury sat on the body, and has returned a Verdict of Justifiable Homicide.

ANTIQUITIES.—The workmen employed in levelling the ground on the North side of the Nethergate, Dundee, where the houses have been lately pulled down, have found two gold rings of very curious and antique appearance, the handle of a sword, a piece of an old coat, partly embroidered with lace, and an immense number of human bones, supposed to be part of the remains of the unfortunate sufferers who fell when the town was taken and sacked by General Monk, during the Protectorship of Oliver Cromwell.

As the game season is now approaching, we think it our duty to give the following extract from the Game Act, respecting grouse, black game, and bustard:—"No person shall, upon any pretence whatsoever, wilfully take, kill, or destroy, carry, sell, buy, or have in his possession, or use, any heath fowl, commonly called black game, between December the 10th and August the 20th; nor any grouse, commonly called red game, between the 10th of December and the 12th of August; nor any bustard between March the 1st and September the 1st, in every year, on pain of forfeiting for the first offence, any sum not exceeding 5*l.* nor less than 10*l.* and for the second, and every subsequent offence, not exceeding 30*l.* nor less than 20*l.* half to the informer and half to the poor.—13th Geo. III. c. 93.—[Woodcocks and snipes, taken with nets or springes, are not game; if killed or taken otherwise, they are game: the same distinction is made between rabbits destroyed in warrens or upon lands in the occupation of the person killing or directing them to be killed, and rabbits killed in other situations: the former are not game, the latter are.]

HOME CIRCUIT.

MAIDSTONE, KENT, AUGUST 9.

SEDUCTION—BANFIELD v. MASSEY.

This was an action to recover a compensation in damages for the seduction of the Plaintiff's daughter. The Plaintiff was a shipmaster at Feversham, in this county, and the Defendant a Captain in the West-York Militia.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd addressed the Jury on behalf of the Plaintiff, and having made many observations on the nature and consequences of the Defendant's offence, observed, that it was much aggravated at the circumstance of his being a married man at the time it took place. The Plaintiff he represented as a respectable man, but of circumstances not equal to the Defendant, who was a gentleman of fortune, and a Captain in the Militia. He was received into the house of the Plaintiff as a lodger, and then availing himself of the access which his situation enabled him to have to the unfortunate girl, he had succeeded in persuading her to abandon the best ornament of woman, and to yield to his solicitation. In the event she proved with child, and the father now sought compensation, not merely for the expence he had been put to, but also for the distress of mind and anxiety he had suffered on occasion of the misconduct of a child who had been seduced from the paths of virtue, by the artifices of the Defendant.

Elizabeth Banfield stated, that she lived at home with her father at Feversham, who was a shipmaster, the Defendant was an Officer in the West-York Militia. He came to lodge at their house. Her father was a great deal from home, and her mother had the management of the house. Shortly after the Defendant came to the house, he began to be particular in his attentions to her, and ultimately succeeded in seducing her; about six weeks after he was in the house; the consequence was, that she became pregnant, and was delivered of a child, which is still living, and had been maintained at the expence of her father. On her cross-examination, she admitted that she had occasionally taken her meals with the Captain in his room, and that her mother knew of it. She once complained to her mother of his behaving rude to her, and she was afterwards permitted to go to his room.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow addressed the Jury for the Defendant, and insisted that the Plaintiff was not entitled to any exemplary damages, inasmuch as the mother, who ought to have guarded the purity of her daughter, conducted herself in so negligent a manner, that she afforded every facility to the Defendant to gratify an irregular passion he might cherish.

William Shaw, a private in the West York Militia, stated, that he lived in the Plaintiff's house; that he saw familiarities between the Captain and the daughter the very first day he went to the Plaintiff's lodgings; and that after he had been there a few days the Captain went to Doncaster, on leave of absence, and when it was announced that he was about to return, the Plaintiff's daughter seemed quite overjoyed. After his return, Eliza often dined and supped in the Captain's room, and the mother frequently dressed the dinners which the Captain had provided. He, the witness, was often sent to let her know that dinner was ready, and from all that passed, he had no doubt but that the mother knew of the intercourse between them. He once saw the Plaintiff's daughter nursing a neighbour's child; the witness jocularly observed to her that she had better have one of her own. She replied, that perhaps she might have had one. The witness said he laughed at her, and went away. He mentioned the story to her mother, and she said it was very true, for Eliza had had a child by an Officer in the West Middlesex, and that a Sea Officer, who was about to marry her, hearing of the story, had refused her in consequence of it.

The Defendant's servant also gave evidence of a free intercourse between the Plaintiff's daughter and the Defendant, and he said he thought the mother must have known it.

Mr. Sergeant Shepherd made a very animated reply, in which he deprecated the conduct of the Defendant as a gross aggravation to the former injury which he had done to the Plaintiff; for by the defence which he had set up, he attempted to rob the girl whom he had deluded of every particle of remaining character. By seducing her, he had degraded her, and disgraced her in the rank of respectable females, but now he attempted to blacken her reputation to the utmost, and represent her as a being never having had one particle of respectable feeling or conduct. Such, indeed, was too frequently the course pursued by abandoned libertines; they had too little regard for the situation of females in the lower ranks. Indeed, he must say, that females of that class were but too often treated with a want of decorum and regard, which a truly honourable mind must ever lament, because from their situation in life they were frequently obliged to present themselves alone in the presence of a man.—The libertine called them "fair game," and thought himself warranted in attacking them with indecent liberties. But the man of honour felt far differently; he felt they were thrown into his way as objects rather of protection than oppression, and from that circumstance alone would be more guarded than on ordinary occasions. He reprobated the evidence given by the two last witnesses, and insisted it was such as no Jury would give a moment's credence to.

Lord Ellenborough observed, that most certainly the last witnesses made a large demand upon human credulity; at the same time it was clear, from the testimony of the girl herself, that her mother was apprised of the Defendant's conduct, and therefore it became her to act with more guarded caution, particularly when a daughter was exposed to the company of young military men. The Jury, in considering the measure of damages, must take several things into their consideration; for cases of this sort differed most materially—in some, money would hardly be a means of recompence, and in others scarce any was merited: they were to consider the feelings of a parent; and in estimating those feelings, they must look at the conduct of a parent. In the present case, it appeared that the mother, who was left in the guardianship of her daughter, had not acted with all the caution which became her. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, they would measure the just and prudent degree of damages the Plaintiff had sustained.—Verdict for the Plaintiff—Damages 100*l*.

YORK ASSIZES.

Joseph Ingleson, of Meadwith, near Otley, in the West Riding, charged with the commission of a rape on the person of his own daughter, a girl of fifteen years of age.—Grace Ingleson, the unfortunate daughter of the Prisoner, stated, that on the 11th of July, she went with her father to cut turf at Radlish, a distance of six miles; that on their return, her father had thrown her down in the cart, and, notwithstanding her cries, had perpetrated the foul and unnatural crime of which he stood charged; yet, when the question was put to her by the Judge, though she was almost convulsed with agony, by the recitation of the transaction, she asserted and persisted in it, in the face of her own evidence, and the repeated admonition of the Judge, to speak the truth, that the crime was committed with her own consent, and that her father neither used violence nor threats. Every moment, while she was giving her evidence, she turned her eyes towards her father, with a look, which, if he had any thing human about him, must have struck daggers to his soul.

A person of the name of Robert Hudson, deposed, that he saw the crime committed, but as he is entirely deaf, he could not say whether the daughter cried out or not.

The Judge in his address to the Jury, said, that whatever suspicions they might have, and however well grounded they might be, that the unhappy witness, Grace Ingleson, had, to save her father's life, suppressed a material part of the dreadful transactions; yet, as she had repeatedly declared upon her oath, that she was consenting to the great crime which had been committed, the Jury could not safely convict the prisoner.

The Jury accordingly returned a verdict of Not Guilty. When the Judge addressed the prisoner in the following terms:—

"Joseph Ingleson, you have narrowly escaped paying the forfeit of your life to the offended laws of your country. You are, there is too much reason to believe, a very bad man; and if you do not repress your wicked propensities, you will certainly terminate your life at the gallows; you ought to be for ever ashamed of yourself, and hide your face from the view of your fellow-creatures."

The prisoner quitted the bar, amidst the general execrations of a crowded and indignant Court.

CHELMSFORD ASSIZES, August 6.

On Saturday, William Williams, the Captain of the American ship Croydon, was tried, on a special commission, for the murder of Thomas Barnes, a seamen, on board the same ship. It appeared that part of the crew had refused to do the duty of the ship. The Captain, in order to compel them to man the windlass, brought a pair of pistols from his cabin, and fired at one of the refractory seamen, the ball went through his shoulder, and killed Barnes. The Jury considered the mutinous state of the ship to be an excuse for the conduct of the Captain, and acquitted him.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The intelligence received from Spain in the course of this week, will afford every man, who is interested in the cause of freedom, and justice, the most unspeakable gratification. The unconditional surrender of DUPONT and his army, which was so frequently anticipated by the wishes of the people of this country, has, at last, taken place on the 20th of last month. This decisive event, with the capitulation of another corps of about 9000 men, which was hastening to his assistance, has freed the southern provinces of the peninsula from their oppressors. From Valencia, Murcia, Arragon, and Leon, the accounts are equally gratifying. They confirm the defeat and annihilation of MONCEY's corps, the failure of a new attempt against the city of Saragossa, the retreat of BESSIERES towards Burgos, where the miserable remnant of an army of more than a 100,000 of BONAPARTE's best troops appear willing to unite. They bring likewise an address from the inhabitants of Murcia, to other provinces, signed, among others, with the respectable name of FLORIDA BLANCA, for the purpose of assembling the Cortez, and forming a central Government. They communicate the important intelligence, that after the capture of DUPONT, the Andalusian army, under the brave General CASTANOS, which is mostly composed of veteran troops, is hastening to Madrid, and that a corps had already arrived a few leagues from that capital. They speak of the indefatigable exertions of General BLAKE, in organizing and disciplining his army, which is said to amount to more than 50,000 men. A part of this army was in pursuit of BESSIERES, and harrassing him in his retreat towards Burgos. The arrival of 12,000 men, all veteran troops, which garrisoned the Balearic Islands, was daily expected. The Canaries have manifested the same spirit of resistance and indignation, as the inhabitants of Spain, at the first account they received of the atrocious perfidy of BONAPARTE towards their Sovereign and family, and there is not a single possession of Spain, from whence we have been as yet able to receive any information, which does not breathe vengeance against the French and their tyrant. These accounts also mention the arrival of Gen. CUESTA, at Salamanca, with the artillery and cavalry, of whose movements, after the battle of Rio Seco, no intelligence could be previously obtained. The united levies of Valencia and Murcia, 60,000 strong, passed through Tarancon on the 27th ult. on their way to Madrid, from which it is no more than 45 miles. It was the approach of this army which had occasioned the precipitate retreat of JOSEPH BONAPARTE from Madrid, from which he took all the plate and every article of value belonging to the Court, which he could carry with him in his flight. On his entry there, which took place on the 20th, notwithstanding the orders which were published previous to his arrival, no illuminations took place, every window and every door were kept shut, and not a Spaniard appeared in the streets, only a few were seen who were not natives, and who were hired for the purpose, made a dismal noise about his carriage. It is unknown whither he has retired, if he went to condole with his Imperial Brother, or will return to Naples; however, the latter is not very probable, as a flight from that city may be more difficult, in case of an insurrection on the part of his Neapolitan subjects. The accounts from Portugal are equally pleasing. The retreat of JUNOT is now entirely impracticable, and we may daily look forward to an account of his army having surrendered to Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY, who effected his landing at Peniche, and whose advanced guards, according to the latest accounts, have reached Mafra, which is about 25 miles from Lisbon. His army amounts to 14,000 men. Gen. SPENCER sailed with the force under his command, consisting of 5,250 men, from Port St. Mary, on the 18th of July, in order to co-operate in the destined attack of JUNOT. Our Readers will see, in another part of our Paper, a Proclamation of the PRINCE REGENT of Portugal, after his arrival at the Brazils, containing an account of his negociation with the French Government, previous to his departure, the motives which induced him to take that resolution, and a declaration of war against France.

Such are the important accounts received from Spain and Portugal, in the course of this week. They surpass even our most ardent expectations. We have entertained no doubts of their ultimate success. But that they should have scoured their country in a single month, of so formidable an army, commanded by the most distinguished Generals, inured to danger, and intoxicated with former victories, is an event, affording as honourable a testimonial of Spanish heroism, as it is unparalleled in modern history. That this event has not been anticipated but by men, who prefer death to slavery, and the subjugation of their country—by men, who are actuated with the same feelings which encouraged the Spanish nation to spurn every kind of compromise with an individual, whose extraordinary military talents, whose success, whose vast resources, whose uncontrouled dominion over the Continent, whose crimes and whose audacity induced Europe to suppose that resistance to his most licentious pretensions would be absolute madness. We repeat that this event has not been anticipated is proved by the disposal of the troops, which the tyrant employed for the nefarious project of subjugating Spain. He already considered that country as his prey, and thought only of securing it. How happy it is for mankind, that he, and the wretches who serve him, have formed this worthless conclusion of the feelings of a people. After having been guilty towards them of the most flagrant treachery, after having seized on their capital and strong holds, after having detained, by an unparalleled act of perfidy, their Sovereign and Family, whom he invited to Bayonne under the pretext of arranging their differences, he had the effrontery to suppose that the simple enunciation of his will was sufficient to impose on them another Sovereign. He did not even condescend to have recourse to the little arts of conciliation, but with a brutality and sullen hauteur peculiar to that imperious upstart, he gave them a new King, without deigning to prepare their minds gradually for so unexpected an event. The nomination is made, and then he drags a few reluctant Grandees to Bayonne, to sanction this atrocious act; where they have the mortification (they are men, and we believe the greater part of them very honest men) to witness the debasement of their Sovereign and family. The reluctant consent of such men, collected under such circumstances, is the only formality he thinks necessary, in order to change the constitution and the dynasty of a powerful and ancient monarchy. Individuals puffed up with great power and great success have given a vast latitude to their desires; but not a parallel example of insolence can be discovered in the history of the most worthless ruffians that ever scourged mankind. Either extraordinary prosperity must have weakened his intellects, or he must form a base and contemptible opinion of the feelings, and understanding of other men. Whatever were his sentiments or his motives, he has been guilty of a gross and irretrievable mistake in his appreciation of the moral and national feelings of the Spaniards. He has forfeited his fame. Fourteen years of success and of victories, of great exertions and of greater crimes, are perhaps rendered null by this single miscalculation. Wherever he looks he finds new difficulties and new objects to discourage him. The contest he cannot abandon—the idea is absurd. The ridiculous notion, which has been repeated even to nauseousness, that he would disembarrass himself of Spain by sending back their FERDINAND, proves very little knowledge of his character, and of the nature of the present contest.—His reputation and security are too much at stake.—If he yield to the exigency of the moment, his situation becomes more precarious, than if he fight it out. His concessions will be imputed by the Spaniards, and every other people in Europe, to fear. There are no means left him for palliation: And should he attempt to retrieve his lost honour by turning his arms against the House of Austria, with what front, with what confidence, will he dare speak to his armies of their invincibility, after the disgrace he suffered, and his inability to retrieve it. Is any person silly or weak enough to think, that the members composing the Rhinish confederacy, are satisfied with the despotism he exercises over them? Will they remain ignorant of the reverse he has suffered? After the repeated mortifications they have been exposed to from the insolent upstart, will the wounded pride of German Princes feel no pleasure in this account? There is no reason to believe they will obey so implicitly his dictatorial mandates for assembling new armies to attack Austria. Whatever way he turns, in whatever enterprise he embarks, his difficulties will accumulate. There is not an Austrian soldier or officer, when they are acquainted with the defeat of the French by Spanish peasants, that will feel any apprehensions on the subject of a new war. That Government has been long prepared for the event. It is too well acquainted with the character of BONAPARTE, to have expected security from any other quarter, but from its own exertions and resources. The destruction of the Prussian monarchy, and the infatuation of the Russian cabinet, have increased its danger and alarm. So that if BONAPARTE intends to replace his blasted laurels with fresh ones collected in Austria, he will find it more difficult than is imagined, to effect his purpose. After the sentiments of discontent and indignation manifested in Holland, Italy, and other parts of the Continent, he will not be able to collect a force sufficiently strong to attack that power. Will he leave Holland, Brabant, Naples defenceless, and collect his whole force and overwhelm Austria at once? Persons who calculate in this manner, seem to forget, that if another insurrection break out on any part of the Continent, it will spread like wild fire. They must think his government very paternal, when they reason thus. The more we reflect on his situation, so far from being uneasy about his inundating Austria with troops, the more conviction we feel that he will, on the contrary, endeavour to temporise with that power. But there is no cause to suspect that she feels relative to her situation, all the apprehensions that our humane journalists entertain about the impending storm that is ready to burst over her; and may be therefore not inclined to temporise with BONAPARTE. This is the favorable moment, if she has any energy or virtue left, to retrieve her former honour, reputation, and rank among nations. These are no vain speculations we are indulging in, every account received in the course of the week through an unsuspicious channel, corroborates the statements in our two letters we were first able to lay before the public. The contents of these letters are now confirmed by every subsequent information received from Holland, and this confirmation will shew, in the most palpable light, the levity and inconsiderateness of some of our contemporaries, who allowed themselves some insinuations relative to their authenticity. Let our last letter be compared with every intelligence received this week from Holland, and on perceiving that we anticipated an entire week the accounts last received from that country, the importance of our having been able to secure a Correspondent in Germany, when every kind of intercourse with the Continent is so difficult, will be duly appreciated by our Readers. However, we are happy to perceive that Austria is better prepared for the chances of a new war, than she has been for sixteen years. She must one time or another pass the Rubicon, and the sooner the better, whilst the memory of BONAPARTE's atrocities and disgraces is fresh on the minds of her army.

The following details of the events which preceded the surrender of Dupont has been issued in the shape of an official Bulletin by Government.—

"By letters dated St. Andero, the 1st of August, it appears, that a Nobleman had arrived there who had escaped from Madrid on the 28th July. He says, that there were not above 12,000 French with Joseph Bonaparte at Madrid; that they were fortifying the Retiero, and that the city was the most afflicting spectacle possible. Several of the new Ministers had made their escape from Madrid; and as the Duke D'Infantado was not there, it was hoped that he also had escaped.

"Official advices have been this morning received from General Castanos's camp, up to the 17th ult. These state, that General Castanos having made all his preparations, and determined on his plan of attack, marched to Andujar on the 15th. General Reding was to pass the River above Manjibar, and attack Bayles. The Marquis De Compigny was to pass at Villa Nuova, and support General Reding. General Castanos, with the third division and reserve, was to attack the bridges in front. Lieutenant Colonel Cruz was to pass the river at Mantraologe; and to occupy the Sierra. Colonel Maldo Pinos was to occupy the Puerto del Rey.

"On the 15th General Castanos took his position, and cannonaded the French with effect. General Compigny beat the French at Villa Nuova, and killed about 200 of them. Lieutenant-Colonel Cruz was obliged to retire, by the superior numbers of the enemy.

"General Reding, with about 8000 men, attacked the enemy, who had about 5000, completely beat them, and took two pieces of cannon, but from want of provisions was forced to retire to Manjibar.

"On the 17th, after a Council of War, it was determined to order the Marquis De Compigny to join General Reding, and it was determined that Bayles should be attacked with two divisions, and a feigned attack to be made on Andujar with the third division and reserve.

"By a letter intercepted from General Dupont to the Duke De Rovico, it appears that he was in great distress for provisions, and was in hopes of reinforcement. These particulars naturally led to the glorious events which followed from the 14th to the 20th."

The following Official Bulletin was issued by Government on Thursday morning:—

"Intelligence was this morning received by Government, from Lieut.-Col. Doyle, dated Coruna, the 4th of August, at midnight. The Lieut.-Col. states, that he had read a letter, dated Madrid, 27th of July, which says, that on that morning the French commenced their Retreat from that City; that Joseph Bonaparte had quitted Madrid, and had taken away every thing of value belonging to the Court. Every Frenchman was following him, and they were taking the direction of Burgos.

"The writer of the letter is nephew to a Member of the Junta of the Gallicias.

"A letter from Tarragon, dated the 27th July, states that the army of Valencia and Murcia, which consisted of 60,000 men, had on that day passed through that town, on its way to Madrid. It is also stated, that Echevrias, at the head of the Smugglers, had advanced towards Madrid, and that he was within 13 leagues of that city.

"Private advices from Arragon state, that the Rebels had again been successful in that quarter.

"Marshal Bessieres has evacuated Benevente, and continued his retreat to Burgos.

"The Asturian army, under the command of General Porlier, has made an incursion on the road towards Burgos, and had taken a French convoy, with eight waggon loads with plunder. General Castanos was advancing to La Mancha."

Letters from Holland, of the 9th inst. have been received in town, which state that the Conscripts have been called out to form an army against Austria; and that those who do not come forward in a specified time are to have their names expunged as Citizens, and outlawed.

The Grenadier and Light Infantry Companies of the Guards are expected to be immediately brigaded and sent on foreign service, which will complete the whole force of this corps, with those already under orders, to about 6000 rank and file.

The letters from Rio Janeiro give the most pleasing account of the manner in which the Prince Regent has established and commenced his government. His respect for the English has been manifested in the most handsome way, and there is every appearance of a most prosperous reign. He has constituted a new Order of Knighthood, of which the gallant Sir Sidney Smith is to be one of the companions. Sir Sidney gave an entertainment on board his ship, in honour of his Majesty's Birth-day, at which the Prince Regent assisted. The colours of the two nations were displayed, as in happy union, over the canopy of state where his Royal Highness was placed; and he took occasion, after the repast, to take the Portuguese flag and present it to Sir Sidney Smith, with a short address, in which he desired him to bear it in future on his coat of arms—an honour which the gallant Knight received with grateful complacency.

Letters from Madeira were received in town on Wednesday, dated the 28th July, brought by the indefatigable lugger, arrived at Plymouth. Our troops were particularly healthy: several had been sent out to the West Indies. On the 18th July, the Sybille frigate and Sappho sloop arrived there with a fleet from Cork, bound to the West Indies, and sailed again on the 17th July.

Scots Law Arrangements.—The Lord President of the Court of Session in Scotland is to be succeeded by Robert Blair, Esq. Dean of the Faculty of Advocates.—It is supposed Matthew Ross, Esq. will succeed Mr. Blair as Dean of Faculty.—It is further stated, that Lord Dunsinnan resigns both his gowns, and is to be succeeded as a Lord of Justiciary by Lord Hermand, and as a Lord of Session by Archibald Campbell, Esq. younger, of Succoth. We have not heard who is to replace Mr. Campbell as one of the Commissaries of Edinburgh.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be continued at 12½d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 10½d. household.

Lieutenant-General Sir Harry Burrard, who has the command of the expedition to Spain and Portugal, at his first entering the army in 1776, held a commission in the 60th, or Royal Americans, in which regiment he served seven years: he was thence promoted to be Major in the 14th Foot. In these regiments he saw actual service in America and the West Indies. In 1789 he exchanged into the First Regiment of Foot Guards, of which he is now the Lieutenant-Colonel, and served under the Duke of York in Flanders; at Ostend (where he was taken prisoner) he was the second in command under Major-General Coote. He had a brigade in Holland, and in the Expedition to Copenhagen, was appointed second in command to Lord Cathcart.

Sir J. Piers who has been so long an exile from Ireland in consequence of the verdict against him for seducing Lady Cloncurry, has committed suicide in the Isle of Man, which has been some time the place of his retreat. The cause of this unfortunate man's catastrophe is of a most melancholy nature. He had debauched the daughter of a respectable clergyman, who, on discovering his disgrace, instantly shot himself; and it was upon hearing of this that Sir J. Piers put an end to his existence by shooting himself through the head. The unhappy female is in a state of distraction that threatens her life.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor. At two o'clock his Majesty held a Private Levee, when the following Military Gentlemen had the honour of being presented:—

General Finch, on his promotion to the command of the 54th regiment; Lieut.-Gen. Nicolls, on his appointment to the command of the 96th regiment; Gen. Gwyn, on being appointed to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Isle of Wight; Gen. Calcraft, on being appointed First Major to the Coldstream Regiment of Guards.

His Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers.

Our venerable Sovereign continues to gratify the loyal crowds who resort to Windsor with his presence on the Terrace, every Sunday evening, like a father in the midst of a numerous and affectionate family. 'Here is no parade of Guards, no jealous regulations to separate, and shroud the Monarch from his people, for in his health and happiness is their welfare; and indeed what stronger bulwark can there be than his confidence and their affection. The mornings of the Royal Family are generally spent on horseback in the Park; and the rest of the day is filled up in a calm domestic way, enlivened by such little plans of entertainment as are suggested by the taste of the Princesses. On Wednesday, her Royal Highness the Princess Elizabeth gave a splendid dejeuné at her charming little cottage near Old Windsor, to her Majesty, and her lovely sisters, to which also about 120 of the neighbouring nobility and gentry were invited. Among the number we noticed Lord Ashbrook and family, the Walsinghams, Colonel Desbrow, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Villiers, the Freemantles, &c. &c. and their families, forming an interesting groupe of future courtiers, statesmen, and dames, to grace Britannia's Court. Her Royal Highness, with her accustomed attention to gratify the juvenile part of her company, had prepared a rustic fair on the lawn, where booths were erected, and furnished with toys and trinkets of all kinds, selected by her own taste, and adapted for the youthful minds to which they were presented. 'Midst this assemblage of royalty, rank, and fashion, the charms of music were called in to aid the general effect, the bands of the Blues and Staffordshire playing a number of martial tunes on the lawn; a rapid transition from those warlike strains to the dulcet notes of softer melody, and of the merry dance, prompted the Younger Branches to enliven the scene by featly tripping it away on the green sward, until more substantial amusement called their attention to the internal regulations of four superb marquees, amply supplied with every delicacy. At three the company sat down, and enjoyed the festive scene till seven, when her Majesty and Princesses returned to the Castle. The company then separated, all highly delighted with the grateful hospitalities of their fair and Royal Hostess.

On Monday afternoon, the family compact of the Russels and Stanhopes was completed by the union of the Heir of Bedford to Lady Anna Maria Stanhope, eldest of the lovely daughters of the Earl of Harrington, a numerous and splendid assemblage of the friends of both houses took place at Lady Harrington's, in the Stable-yard, St. James's. A little after three, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales arrived, to act as father to the fair Bride, and the ceremony was performed at four, by the Archbishop of Dublin.—The company assembled to grace these distinguished nuptials, consisted of the Dukes of Bedford and Newcastle, Duchess of Bedford, Duchess Dowager of Rutland, Newcastle, &c. &c.; and on the benediction being given, they all sat down to a superb entertainment in the drawing-room. As His Royal Highness intended leaving town for Brighton, his departure at six was a signal for breaking up the happy party, when the enraptured pair set off in a chariot and four for Oakley, in Bedfordshire, to commence their honey-moon. This estate of 6000*l.* per annum, had been given a few days before to the Marquis of Tavistock, by his father, as a nuptial present. The Bride was attired in rich point lace, looked enchantingly interesting, and was supported during the awful ceremony by her elegant sisters, Lady Charlotte and Lady Caroline. The satisfaction of the company was without alloy, the match being the result of ardent affection of the juvenile pair, and formed under the sanction of their noble parents. If any thing had been wanting to promote the general happiness, the cheerful hilarity and dignified affability of the Prince would have chased the deepest wrinkle from the brow of care.

Notwithstanding the dignified retirement in which her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales passes her time, it is pleasing to see her select those occasions which offer themselves, of marking the interest in the welfare, and in the concerns of this, now alas! her only country. On Thursday, her Royal Highness entertained a select number of her friends at Blackheath, by an elegant dinner, to which the Spanish Patriotic Deputies were invited. These little traits of well-timed attention, even to the political scene around her, must endear her to every English heart.

The Birth-day of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was marked with all that bustle and splendour which emanate from the glowing loyalty of a happy and contented people. In town, the ringing of bells, and splendid illuminations, attracted the attention of the passenger; and Vauxhall presented a most elegant display of rank and beauty, intermingled with honest John Bull's family, all enjoying the magnificent scene around them, and all happy in being able to commemorate the occasion free from French overseers. At Brighton, the entertainments of the day were of the most superb kind, and were graced by the presence of all the Royal Dukes, who had assembled there in compliment to their brother's natal day.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

RELIGION has long been considered of the utmost importance to mankind. The community is not yet discovered, in which a species of theological belief did not predominate; influencing the conduct of individuals, and entering into their public institutions. Strangely do those undervalue the purest System of Piety, who imagine the political application of its principles inconsistent with the views of its original promulgator. Contemplating religion only in connection with the purposes of human government, as presenting the most effectual check to immorality and crime, how does it rise, in estimation and result, above every other scheme of moral restriction! Consonant indeed must that persuasion be to the unsophisticated feelings of our nature, which, by its inherent and independent force, can controul the passions and purify the propensities of men. Certainly it is more noble, and more agreeable to the freedom of the human soul, to be awed by internal conviction, than by any external, or arbitrary, agency. Wise statesmen have therefore always sedulously enlisted Religion under the banners of Legislation.

While such is the attention paid by enlightened politicians to Religion, its concerns are otherwise altogether neglected: piety is left to its own propagation, and the professors of theology to their own direction. Literature has its reviewers, the stage its strictnists, and painting its connoisseurs; but as for the expounders of our creed, with reference to them it may be said, in the language of the poet from whose writings our motto is selected, of these

"The world takes little thought. Who will may preach;
"And, what they will!"

Leaving to theological critics the task of watching the motions of the Press, it will, therefore, be the province of the present writer to keep a vigilant eye on the proceedings of the Pulpit. His plan is not without novelty, and may be productive of very general utility. What are styled POPULAR PREACHERS, whether in or out of our Ecclesiastical Establishment, possess such ascendancy over the minds of the people, that it is surprising no person should have contemplated them as subjects of peculiar attention, alternately calling either for the approbation or animadversion of the pen. We pore over the orations of senators; we scrutinize, and estimate, forensic ability. It is concerning the Eloquence of the Pulpit, sensible as we are of its effects, that we do not seem to be sufficiently interested.

Something is due from national seriousness. Signalised, as we have been, by our adherence to "the Faith once "delivered to the saints;" preserving, as we have done, amidst the inundations of scepticism, the sacred institutions of our forefathers; let us more generally evince a becoming zeal for the highest of human concerns, and anxiously guard our Common Religion from innovation, eccentricity, and error. Christianity has too often been wounded by its friends.

Books, which constitute the usual channels of information, have the least influence in religious instruction. Where one sermon is read, many thousands of sermons are statedly heard! Hence the necessity of endeavouring to establish a tribunal, to which Preachers may feel themselves fairly amenable; and thus, as well as writers, be compelled to consult the legitimate voice of opinion. This attempt remains now to be made. Let it be seen, while we hesitate not to ridicule the puerilities of the Senate, and reprobate the licentiousness of the Bar, whether the extravagances—not to say absurdities—of the Pulpit are alone to be exhibited with impunity! He who faithfully "negotiates between God and man," as the Ambassador of Immortality, can have nothing to apprehend from the most serious inquisition. It is nevertheless proper to ascertain, who are the Popular Preachers of the age; how the arduous functions of their office are severally discharged; and WHAT are the doctrines which they inculcate? While those who fill it exert only "the sober use "of its legitimate peculiar powers," while the "workmen "need not be ashamed," while "the labourers are "worthy of their hire," THE PULPIT is immoveable; it is that rock, against which the assaults of infidelity and impiety will ever be directed in vain.

Circumstances then have determined me to elect "THE "NATIONAL REGISTER," as the medium for communicating these Clerical Criticisms to the world. It is extensively and respectably circulated; it first appears on the day most suited to the nature of my undertaking; and the frequency of its publication may enable me to accomplish my plan with celerity, as well as success.

ONESIMUS.

Chapter Coffee-house, Pater-Noster-row.

 No. 2. of POPULAR PREACHERS will appear on Sunday next, and will exhibit an impartial estimate of the Clerical Character of the Bishop of London. Religious Disquisitions of considerable importance at this time, but incidental to the subject, will likewise be submitted to the Public.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S INN, Aug. 13.

BEFORE THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

IN THE MATTER OF LADY AUGUSTA MURRAY, BARONESS AMELAND, v. HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

This day an application was made on the part of the Noble Plaintiff, by Mr. Thompson, praying to set aside an order made by his Honour the Master of the Rolls, in July last, for appointing Guardians for the care of her Ladyship's children by the Royal Duke.

Her Ladyship's affidavit stated, that in 1802 she had applied for an injunction to restrain the sum of 4000*l.* a-year, which his Royal Highness had settled on her Ladyship, out of the allowance granted to him by his Majesty, from coming through the hands of his Royal Highness: a conditional injunction was granted, but the merits of the case never have been discussed, in consequence of the late Mr. Pitt's having taken on himself the care of negociating the differences subsisting between the parties at the time. This was followed in 1806, by a deed of settlement, under which his Royal Highness agreed to allow her Ladyship, for the maintenance and education of her son, 500*l.* a-year, and for the like purposes to her daughter, 200*l.* a-year; and it was also agreed thereby, to appoint the Earl of Moira and Lord Fincastle trustees for the payment of those annuities, and superintendants of the childrens' education. This adjustment, however, not having proved finally satisfactory to all parties, a bill was filed in July last, praying that an order might be issued to appoint Guardians for the care and education of the children; and an order was accordingly made.

The present application, then, was urged upon the ground that the deed which settled the annuities for the support of the children likewise appointed trustees for their education, and that the Noble Lords thereby appointed, were, to all intents and purposes, guardians of the children. It was also stated, that her Ladyship was taken by surprise, and had not been served with due notice. The Learned Advocate urged the hardship which the latter appointment would occasion to her Ladyship, who, by such an order, would be deprived of the satisfaction of having her children under her own immediate superintendence, and that she might also be liable to be called on for payment of the sums advanced on their account, should the order be confirmed.

The Lord Chancellor, however, was of opinion, that the order should be confirmed; for, as the Duke of Sussex was not legally authorised to appoint a guardian for those children, it was incumbent on the Master to direct the appointment of legal guardians. The Master was of course bound to examine all the parties concerned in this matter, upon oath, in order that proper guardians might be chosen for such trust.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

PORTSMOUTH, AUG. 8.—Last night, the Pluto, 18, Captain Jauvern, came in from Gijon.—The Hon. General Meade is arrived to go out in the Decade, 36, Capt. Stuart, to Madeira: she is taking on board a million of dollars for Oporto.—Yesterday, the Fylla, with the 18th Dragoons, composing a part of cavalry of the Expedition, arrived at Portsmouth from the Downs, and this day Brigadier-General the Hon. C. Stewart, accompanied by Captains Dashwood and Wade, Aids-de-Camp, embarked on board the sloop of war, and sailed from St. Helen's.—It is understood that Brigadier-Gen. Stewart is to command a Brigade of Cavalry in the Expedition.

The Eliza Ann, of London, W. Smith, Master, arrived off Portsmouth on Monday from Rio Janeiro. She sailed from thence on the 12th June, and left there the following men of war, viz. Foudroyant, 80, Sir Sydney Smith; London, 98; Marlborough, 74; Monarch, 74; Bedford, 74; Agamemnon, 64, and Surveillante frigate; and the following merchant-vessels, Friends, Brilliant, Invention, Kingsmoor, Adriatic, Venus, Vulture, Integrity, and a lugger belonging to London; Pitt and Hydra transports; Princess of Wales, and a brig belonging to Liverpool, and two brigs from St. Helena.

PLYMOUTH, AUG. 11.—Arrived this forenoon the Morning Star Cartel, from Morlaix, to which place she carried two French Ladies and two Gentlemen, with their servants, by virtue of passports from the British Government. The Cartel stood into Morlaix Harbour, and was hailed from the Outer Battery, that she must immediately tack and stand out to sea, as none of the passengers would be suffered to land. This order was forthwith complied with, and the Cartel stood out to sea, but the Captain from the pressing solicitation of his passengers again tacked and proceeded for the Harbour; when she got within range of the guns, the Battery opened its fire, and the Cartel was compelled to stand off to sea; one of the Frenchmen, however, with his servant, by permission of the Captain, took the Cartel's boat, and persisted in going on shore, which he did, and when within reach of the guns, it was observed on board the Cartel that the Batteries opened their fire upon her, but of her fate they were unacquainted, as they lost sight of her as soon as she entered the Harbour. The other passengers are all returned in the vessel.

POLICE.

JUSTICE ROOM, GUILDHALL.—THURSDAY, AUG. 14.

David Ap Athins, a Cambrian gallant, and porter of Mr. William Wright, cheesemonger near Queenhithe, was brought before the Magistrate, charged with having embezzled a certain portion of his master's kitchen furniture, called a servant maid on Monday last, of whom nothing was since heard, and of whom the prisoner refused to give any account.

The master stated, that the girl in question was about 22 years of age, and "a pretty plumpish kind of body;" that she had lived some time in his service, and having some anxiety to visit her friends, she left his house on Monday night for the purpose, the prisoner undertaking to carry her box with her to her aunt's, in the Surrey road: instead of which it was found he carried it elsewhere, to the lodgings of a person near Whitechapel, and had since carried it away from thence, no person could tell whither; the girl was last seen in his company on Tuesday, in Tooley-street, and no account had since been heard of her, the prisoner refusing to give any explanation; besides, he had a wife and child of his own.

The prisoner, in his defence, told a very incoherent sort of Welch story, in which he denied positively that he knew any thing of the girl. Still, however, it appeared palpably she had eloped with him, and to defeat enquiry, he had changed lodgings twice since Sunday.

The Magistrate observed, that it appeared the girl, though not very discreet in this matter was yet come to years of discretion to act for herself, and therefore he could take no cognizance of the affair.

It happened, however, that a ham had vanished from the Master's shop much about the same time with the girl, and therefore he demanded a search warrant to overhaul the prisoner's lodgings which he promised to point out. A Peace-officer was immediately dispatched for the purpose.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Yesterday at Marlborough-street, a handsome young woman of the name of Moulde, exhibited a charge against an artist in Mary-le-bone, of assaulting her person, and making a breach of promise. It was stated with considerable reserve by the complainant, who is a tradesman's daughter, that she had known the defendant the last six months, and had frequently accompanied him to public places. The consequence was, he had made frequent attempts to seduce her, and he accomplished his object a fortnight since at an inn at Hounslow; the wedding day had been fixed on, however it had turned out that the defendant was married. On some questions being put to the complainant, it did not appear that any degree of violence had been used, and consequently it was not recognizable in this court, an action at law being the only remedy.

Last Friday, as a poor woman in Holywell-street, Commercial-road, went on an errand, she left an infant two years and a half old in a yard; during her absence, the infant fell into a tub of water and was drowned, which drove the woman almost frantic.

On Tuesday last the Coroner's Inquest sat at the Stone Kitchen in the Tower, on the bodies of Mr. Thomas Cooper and Mr. George Payne, two young men, both in the service of Mr. Golding, of Cornhill. The circumstances attending the death of these young gentlemen, are singular and distressing.—They were living together upon terms of great friendship; and on Sunday morning between seven and eight o'clock, along with another friend, walked down to the Thames to bathe. When they got to the water side, Mr. Payne objected to go in, saying, he had a reason for changing his mind, which he did not chuse to state. Mr. Cooper went in, and after he had been in the water about ten minutes, and was preparing to come out, Mr. Payne suddenly again altered his mind, undressed, and jumped in. At this time they were a short distance from each other. Neither of them being aware they were on the edge of a place that contained ten or twelve feet water. It unfortunately happened at the same instant (for it does not appear they had time to speak to each other) they got out of their depth, and neither of them swimmers, were both drowned within a few feet of each other. Their companion as soon as he saw their distress, went to their assistance, when Mr. Cooper, in a very exhausted state, caught hold of his wrist and pulled him under water, and for a short time it was feared by a number of persons who saw the situation they were in, that he had shared the fate of his friends:—luckily he got extricated from Mr. C.'s grasp, and with great difficulty reached the shore. A boat, as soon as possible, put off to them, but too late to render them any assistance, though it arrived at the fatal spot time enough for one of them to have been caught hold of by the head, but the hair was so short the waterman could not keep his hold, and was obliged to let him go again. Mr. C. was taken up in ten minutes, Mr. P. remained under water near half an hour. Every assistance was procured on the bodies being brought on shore, and every possible means used under the direction of several medical gentlemen for their recovery, but without success. Mr. C. was in his 23d year, and Mr. P. in his 19th, both worthy young men, and deservedly esteemed by Mr. Golding, who with their relations and friends, lament their untimely fate with the deepest distress.

DIED.

Lady Diana Beauclerc, relict of the Honourable Topham Beauclerc, and sister to the Duke of Marlborough, and the Dowager Countess of Pembroke.

On Saturday last, in Lower Grosvenor-street, Lieutenant-General Churchill.

Same day, at Sutton, Yorkshire, the Rev. John Sarrande, late Fellow of Exeter College.

On the 5th instant, at Clifton, Hugh Mack, Esq. of Friday-street.

Lately of the yellow fever, at Trinidad, Mr. Thomas Rae, of the 37th foot.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-FOUR.

REAL STATE OF THE FRENCH ARMY; WITH A COMPARATIVE VIEW OF THE AUSTRIAN, RUSSIAN, AND PRUSSIAN MILITARY FORCES.

There is no feature more prominent in the character of man than a propensity to exaggeration. Whenever he speaks of his country, her institutions, local advantages and military establishments, no measure is adopted in the indulgence of this inclination, as he thinks it ennobled by the mark it assumes of patriotism. The history of our time recommends particular caution to the political writer in the speculations he would found on these effusions of national self-love. If this circumspection be necessary in our examination of the accounts published on any of these subjects by the individuals or governments of most countries, it would be particularly so with regard to the French. What was the effect of, folly or vanity in the one, was, on the part of the latter, the highest refinement of Machevialism. If we take a retrospective view of the last ten years we are astonished at the boldness and success of these exaggerations, as well as at the credulity and weakness with which they were received by other nations. After having been repeatedly deceived in this respect, it might be presumed, that some degree of scepticism would be adopted; but they continued from year to year to credit the statements of a government, which had an interest, and manifested unequivocal intentions of a design to deceive. The grossest falsehoods were received as self-evident truths: and these besotted governments maintained diplomatic agents in France, one would be inclined to suppose, more for the purpose of attending the levees and making a part of the Consular and Imperial State of Bonaparte, than of collecting intelligence relative to the projects and resources of that restless and enterprising man. The supineness, incapacity, and trifling submissive deportment of most of the Envoys and Ambassadors at Paris, were subjects of equal indignation and contempt to every man who visited that capital. The superiority, which Bonaparte arrogated in his relations with the Monarchs of Europe, made them apprehensive of sending any man who might be obnoxious to him, on account of his talents, patriotism and penetration. Even the harmless, obsequious mortals, who attended his levees as representatives of their Sovereign, were constantly surrounded by his spies, and to avoid giving him dissatisfaction, they confined the important duties of their mission to the punctilio of constant attendance at the Thuilleries and to the reputation of connoisseurs. They all, with very few exceptions, seemed to vie in baseness. The insecurity of the post gave them likewise justifiable cause for supposing that any dispatches they might send through that channel, would fall into the hands of the tyrant; and their messengers were frequently murdered and robbed of their papers. Even their hotels were not secure. The fidelity of their servants they had reason to suspect, as no means would be left untried to induce them to betray the confidence of their masters.

After these observations, which are only a faint description of the immorality and insolence of the one, and the debasement and inaction of the other, every doubt will vanish about the absolute ignorance in which every government must remain relative to the finances and armies of France. This was one of the great causes of the blunders, miscalculations and disasters of the Continent. Under such restrictions, moral as well as personal, it was absolutely impracticable for any ostensible agent, let his talents and zeal be ever so great, to make communications to his government which could be relied on. A veil of impenetrable mystery was, at the same time, thrown over the finances and the number of conscripts that are annually raised. The exact amount of the one, and the number of the latter have never been satisfactorily ascertained; for it would betray more than ignorance, it would be a mark of the grossest stupidity, to take as the rule of our calculations, the communications made to the Senate and Corps Legislatif. The regiments were never stationary. They were continually marching from one place to another, never confined within the lines of a camp, where the police was so severe that no means were left to the most intelligent and enterprising to collect information.

But the conduct of the French government was diametrically opposite. Its Ambassadors to the Courts of Madrid, Vienna, Berlin, &c. were men, consummate in the arts of intrigue and equally skilled in peace and war. Their national characteristic pertness gave them a latitude of inquiry, which would not be overlooked in any other man; and, in contempt of all the laws and usages of nations, they maintained an intercourse with every disaffected individual in the army or in a civil capacity, took them literally under their protection, and by their means, and with the assistance of emissaries, who were scattered in every province, they were able to transmit a more exact knowledge of the Austrian, and other armies than the weak cabinets possessed themselves. The superiority which this gave the French in their military operations will be easily conceived. Their combinations were consequently bold and certain; and their movements had all that regularity and promptitude which were always missed in the plans and motions of the allies. This confusion and uncertainty on the part of the latter, occasioned all the disasters sustained by Mollas, Mack, and the Duke of Brunswick. A few days previous to the battle of Jena no determined plan of operation had been adopted by the Prussian Generals: and what was decided in one council of war was rejected in the next. No certain information was received of the motions or designs of the French, till the advanced guards of the left wing were cut to pieces near Saalfeld; and the magazines at Naumburg were taken by Davoust. As soon as the former occurrence was known at head-quarters, it was debated a considerable time, whether the army should quit its position; but the disorder in the councils of war held for this purpose was so great, that no resolution was taken, till even retreat became impracticable by the movement of Davoust's corps d'armée rear. Their situation now became deplorable. The main army was separated from its reserve at Halle. The advance of Bernadotte as far as Gera cut off every communication with Saxony; and no resource remained but to fight under disadvantages were defeat was ruin; or to effect a precipitate and disorderly retreat over Muhlhausen into Hanover and to the Elbe. Each plan was equally desperate. Had the Prussian army, after the loss sustained on the Saal, retreated towards Halle, destroyed their magazines at Naumburg, effected a junction with the Prince of Wurtemberg, and taken a strong position behind the Elbe, and, in case of imperious necessity, retired as far as Frankfort on the Oder, they would have been able to await there the Russian armies which were hastening to their assistance, and probably saved the monarchy.

These considerations have induced us to chuse for our disquisition, a subject which it is the highest interest of this country and of Europe to ascertain. The late events in Spain, and the suspicious inactivity of Bonaparte, whilst Austria is making a vast augmentation to her war establishment, give a presumptive right to reject established opinion on this head. We always entertained strong doubts relative to the generally-received amount of the French army; whilst the French themselves, and the nations they subdued, seemed to vie with each other in exaggerating its number. But before we enter on our subject, we will take a review of the other armies of the Continent, and after having contrasted their real strength with the official accounts published at Berlin, Vienna, and Petersburgh, our Readers will be better prepared for following us in the subject of our inquiry.

It had been for many years a prevailing opinion on the Continent, that the Prussian army amounted to 250,000 men. However, we find in an Etat, published by the Court of Berlin in January, 1806, that it consisted of no more than 239,667, viz. 3174 guards, 175,301 infantry, 40,478 cavalry, 13,240 artillery, and 7470 men which are not particularly denominated. About the time that this Etat appeared, orders were issued for raising 70,000 militia in the Prussian States. This great augmentation of military strength, whilst it shewed the dangers of the monarchy and the prospect of a war with France, received the warmest tribute of applause from every patriotic individual in Germany. Whilst the independence of the North was to be secured by this vigorous and enlightened measure, it was considered as the surest check to universal despotism. The personal friendship existing between Frederick William and the Emperor Alexander fortified these expectations, and this intimate alliance of two powerful monarchs was regarded by the most timid as a sufficient guarantee of their respective possessions. If we add an army of 54,000 Saxons, and 16,000 Hessians, we shall find the Prussian government was generally thought to have at its disposal, exclusive of the Russians, more than 350,000 men, as brave and disciplined as any in the world. But, alas! this immense army existed only in imagination. Either the impotence of the government, the treachery of its servants, or, more probably, the state of the finances, which were not adequate to such extraordinary exertions, frustrated the expectations of the Continent, and prevented the execution of this grand project of national defence.

Let us now compare with the foregoing statement, officially made, the number employed against the French in 1806. The disasters sustained by the other states of the Continent, and the reputation of the army, it may be presumed, engaged the Prussian government to bring its whole force into the field; in particular, as the approach of the Russians allowed it to withdraw every regiment from Poland and Silesia. The writer happened to travel at that time through Westphalia, Hanover, and Saxony, and had an opportunity, from an intimate knowledge of the language, a long sojourn in Germany, personal acquaintance with several Prussian officers, and from other circumstances, of acquiring a minute knowledge of that unfortunate campaign. The Prussian army at Jena consisted of 96,000 men, besides 18,000 Saxon auxiliaries. The reserve at Halle, commanded by Prince Eugene of Wurtemberg, amounted to 25,000 men; and the corps in Westphalia, under the orders of Lestocq, was about 14,000; making in all about 135,000. On adding a few battalions left at Berlin, Potsdam, Custrin, Breslau, Magdeburg, Hameln, Nienburg, &c. which were computed at 12,000, we will find that the Prussian military force, instead of 239,667 regulars, and 70,000 militia, did not amount, at the highest calculation, to 150,000. It will be naturally asked how this monstrous exaggeration could have taken place, and have been so long believed? It will be best resolved by another question: How have every deception and exaggeration found their way into society? Because there were a number of persons, from vanity, weakness, and rapacity, interested in keeping up the delusion. It is probable, and we have strong reason to believe it, that the King himself was as unacquainted with the real state of his army, as the most ignorant and the most obscure of his subjects. But there was a confederacy of traitors in the army and ministry, who found their account in the deception; and made no scruple of sacrificing the monarchy and army to their infamous avarice: The confederacy comprised almost all the officers of the army, from the generals down to the very captains; and this was the reason why a company in the Prussian service was worth 3000 dollars a-year, whilst the lieutenant had only 250; but the latter had a prospect of participating some day in the infamous profits. This excessive disproportion proceeded from the incompleteness of the company as to numbers; and as the colonel, the lieutenant-colonel, and the majors had their respective companies, the abuse magnified in proportion as it remained unpunished, and the Monarch and the State were equally defrauded by a few traitors; and, as may be expected, the country was subjugated by the enemy in a campaign of six weeks.

Let us now take the official etat of the Austrian army, as published in the beginning of 1805. It amounted to 350,945 men: Infantry, 271,871; Cavalry, 50,800; Artillery, 15,994; and 12,280 Garrison Troops. Let us compare with this etat the armies employed against the French in the campaign of the same year. Mack had under his command at Ulm, 70,000 men; the Archduke Charles on the Etsch, and John in Tyrol, had about 80,000, making altogether no more than 140,000 men. As Russian armies were likewise hastening to their assistance, we may conclude that their whole force, with the exception of a few battalions on the Turkish frontiers, was collected at Ulm, Verona, and in Tyrol. So that, instead of 350,945 men, we shall find their army consisted of little more than 150,000. The same contradiction, inaccuracy, and disproportion, are visible in the Russian accounts, published in 1803. According to these their army consisted of 522,870, viz.—13,103 Guards, 52,084 Cavalry, 226,121 Infantry; 72,150 Garrison Troops, 44,052 Artillery, 13,920 Invalids; and 100,954 Irregulars; and three years after this statement, the army was represented as far more numerous. If we will give ourselves the trouble to contrast with this pompous enumeration, the force which this power opposed last campaign to the French, when it had time enough, after the first accounts were received of the arrival of the enemy on the Banks of the Vistula, to collect its scattered force from the very extremities of the empire. If we do it, and can rely on the declarations of Lord Hutchinson, which there is every reason to believe were true, the Russian army in Poland never did amount to 100,000 men. We feel, on this occasion, a strong inclination to indulge in the mingled sensations of laughter, contempt, and indignation, at the folly, rodomantade, credulity and hectoring vanity of the European Cabinets. It would appear they had entered into a tacit agreement to give full credit to their mutual falsehoods. We know no other plausible way of accounting for their vanity and extravagance.

We have entered into this detail relative to Austria, Prussia, and Russia, in order to prepare our Readers for some observations on the French military system, which might otherwise be ill-received on account of their singularity and novelty. The popular prejudice inclines to numerous armies; and it will be no easy task to refute an opinion sanctioned by unparalleled success and the most brilliant victories.

The numerous armies the Republic maintained in the years 1793 and 4, when it had to contend against Spain, Holland, the States of Italy, Austria, the Empire, Prussia, and Great Britain, induced the multitude, and even persons who laid strong claims to judgment and ingenuity, to believe that this force had never diminished. The conclusion was as absurd as to expect from the wheel of a mill the same velocity of motion during a common wind, as it received from a storm. The impulse of the Revolution had ceased, and it was expected, when every trace of it excited discouraging reflections, that it would continue to produce the same effects. This is reasoning in a very novel manner, and notwithstanding its palpable inconsistencies, we forsee the number of objections we will have to encounter in opposing it. The obstinate adherence which most men feel to inveterate prejudices, will not, however, discourage us from asserting, that the French have been guilty of as great rodomontade in their military etats, as the three States already mentioned. We hope likewise to prove, not by ingenious suppositions, but by the strong testimony of facts, that their military establishment is not HALF so numerous as they give out themselves, and is generally believed by others. If we can shew this clearly and satisfactorily, its importance is manifest, and we will find ourselves fully rewarded by the beneficial influence it cannot fail to have on the result of the present contest.

As early as the year 1800, the writer first began to entertain very considerable doubts relative to the amount of the French Army. He was then in the south of Germany; and his doubts were confirmed by the conversation he had with well-informed Frenchmen, who held a high rank in the army of Moreau. These doubts were entirely removed by the difficulties which Bonaparte had in collecting an army to attack Melas in Italy. It is certain that the French army did not amount, at the time the battle of Marengo was fought, to 200,000 men. Moreau's army, after the two divisions he sent to reinforce that of Bonaparte in Italy, consisted of between 60 and 70,000, and that of the latter to about 60,000. The rest of the French army was very inconsiderable; and in fact none was necessary in Holland or along the coasts of the Channel, after the ill-success of our Expedition to the Helder, and the dissatisfaction expressed by the Emperor Paul against our Court and that of Vienna. After the peace of Luneville, Bonaparte began to augment the army, as much as the exhausted state of the finances would permit; and it was placed on the most respectable footing it had been for several years in 1805. According to the etat of that year, published by the Minister of War, it amounted to 607,671, viz. 6,265 guards, 1,930 general staff, 441,561 infantry, 52,584 artillery, 68,983 cavalry, 15,691 gens d'armes, 13,950 veterans, and some free corps consisting of 6,722. An immense force! and twice more than the Romans had in the most splendid epoch of their history. But we believe our readers will not require a long train of argumentation, to be induced to believe that their army did not amount to that number; the only difference of opinion, therefore, which we may have will proceed from our attempting to reduce it to less than half that sum. If we agree with regard to the falsehood of this official statement, it will not be so difficult to expose the whole system of falsehood and dissimulation, which is a principal trait in the policy observed by Bonaparte. As soon as this fact is acknowledged, we are justified in feeling an equal diffidence with regard to his official statements relative to the finances, number of conscripts, &c.

Let us now examine if the etats of the French army are not as false and exaggerated as those of the three States above-mentioned. But we must make a material discrimination. The exaggerations of the French are not an effect of vanity and folly, but a characteristic feature in Bonaparte's system. By this pompous display of his military resources, he expected to strike a terror into all the States of Europe, and to convince them how useless resistance would be to such an army. Let us now see how far the armies he employed against Austria and Russia in the year 1805, will agree with the etat he published in the beginning of the same year.

Bonaparte long foresaw the coalition forming against him by this country, the Emperors Alexander and Francis. In order to convince the French, however, that this event was unexpected, he gave orders that the army collected at Boulogne, Brest, and Holland, should embark in order to make the vaunted invasion of England. He had two objects in view when he made this gasconade. He wanted to convince the French that this project was capable of execution, and thus save his own reputation; whilst he hoped to prevent our Government from sending immediate assistance to the Allies. His second object was to make his soldiers, whom he knew to feel the greatest repugnance and apprehension to a meeting with our seamen, enter with greater alacrity on a Continental War. The wary Usurper was not mistaken in his expectations. He kept the soldiers confined for about five or six days on board the vessels destined for this grand Expedition; and when they were informed that the perfidy of the Austrian Government obliged them to defer their vengeance against the tyrants of the ocean, they gave unequivocal proof of their joy at being employed on any other service, than that of attempting a descent on our shores. They, therefore, proceeded with greater alacrity than they would have otherwise done, to attack the Austrians and Russians on the Banks of the Danube. The terror they felt at the possibility of a rencontre with our mariners, outweighed every consideration, and though they by no means forgot their former ill success against Suwarrow, this circumstance was trifling in their opinion, compared to the danger of being exposed to the thunder of our navy. As we had an opportunity of procuring at that time an exact amount of three corps of that army, we hope to be able to form a satisfactory conclusion as to the amount of the whole.

This army, with which Bonaparte intended to oppose Mack and the Russians, consisted at first of eight corps, to which a ninth was afterwards added. When Marmont's corps passed through Cologne, the writer happened to be in that city, and as he was intimately acquainted with the mayor and one of his adjuncts, he had an opportunity of knowing precisely its amount. It consisted of 18,000 French and 6000 Dutch, the latter commanded by Dumonceau. The whole corps, cavalry, infantry, artillery, and baggage, passed in the course of three days. No mistake could occur as to their number, because orders were every day received at the mayoralty, to provide quarters for those who were to arrive on the following. He had in like manner an opportunity of ascertaining the amount of Bernadotte's corps, having spent a considerable time in Cassel, after it had passed through that city. From every intelligence he received during his stay there, he is led to believe that it did not amount to more than 14,000, though the Newspaper published in that city made it consist of 17,500. The amount of Ney's corps he received from one of his Aide de Camps, with whom he lodged in the same inn, at Frankfort on the Mayne, a short time after the peace of Presburgh. If his statement may be relied on, it consisted of somewhat more than 20,000. We have thus the amount of three corps, making altogether about 61,000 men. If we take the same proportion for the other five corps, we shall find that the army, commanded by Bonaparte in person, consisted of about 160,000. When we reflect that it was joined by the troops of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and Baden, and had to contend with only 70,000 Austrians conducted by a Mack, we will find it more than adequate for overrunning Austria. However, very far from thinking we under-rate its number, we are rather inclined to believe we estimate it too high. It surpassed any force the Allies could oppose to it as much in number, as it did in celerity of operation and superiority of skill on the part of the Generals. Bonaparte may be a very great

General, and those who look on success as the criterion of ability, may consider him as distinguished a Statesman; but when the vast advantages he possessed over the Allies, are taken into consideration, his victories at Ulm, Austerlitz, and Jena, must cease to excite admiration. The army commanded by Massena was never computed at more than 60,000. This distinguished officer was ordered to act on the defensive; and it is natural to suppose that Bonaparte was too jealous of his reputation to intrust him with a more numerous force. To oppose the attack which the Russians and Swedes, in conjunction with Lord Cathcart, threatened to make on Holland, orders were given to collect an army of 100,000 men. We know it, however, to be a positive fact, that 85,000, notwithstanding every exertion, were never assembled for that purpose; and we are happy to hear that our statement on this particular point coincides, with very immaterial difference, with that of Lord Cathcart. In summing up, therefore, the different armies which were employed against Austria, and for the defence of Holland, we shall find they amounted to about 250,000.

Before we proceed further, it will be necessary to revert to the conduct observed by Bonaparte in all the wars he has been engaged in. If any thing is to be particularly admired in his military operations, it is the audacity with which he leaves a number of points exposed, in order to bear down with his whole mass where the danger is most imminent; calculating very justly that any partial defeat he may sustain in any of those places will be easily remedied, after he has disabled the principal antagonist. Persons who have travelled much in France, cannot have failed to observe, that in time of war scarce a soldier is to be seen in the interior; and after the peace of Presburg our Readers will not have forgotten the reproaches Bonaparte made our Government, that it made no attempt against Boulogne, as every soldier had been withdrawn from the coasts. His reproach was well founded; for there were not 8,000 men left for its defence. We had been frequently informed, and we have our information from the best authority, that 20,000 were not left for the defence of the coasts, during the whole course of the Austrian war. This account we the more easily credit, as it was conformable to sound policy, and perfectly coinciding with the uniform conduct and character of Bonaparte. He knew that Europe estimated his armies much higher than they really were; and he calculated as a sound politician, when he supposed this country would make no attempt against Brabant, as long as he was successful against Austria. His audacity, therefore, so far from deserving to be considered as rashness, was the most consummate wisdom; and the result justified his combinations. He did not overlook, in like manner, the demonstrations which Prussia began to make about that time. Is there any reason then to suppose that a man, whose great abilities are universally acknowledged, would have left—useless soldiers in the interior, when their presence was so necessary in Germany. We are therefore justified in drawing the conclusion, that all his armies at that time, in which we have included his Dutch and Italian Auxiliaries, with the gens d'armerie, did not amount to 300,000 men. This opinion is irrefragably proved by the difficulty which Mortier had, during the Prussian war, of collecting a sufficient force to resist a small army of about 14,000 Swedes in Pomerania, and his inability to keep Colberg in constant blockade, whose garrison was in the habit of making excursions of several leagues from the fortress, in one of which they made General Victor prisoner. It is necessary once more to observe that the French had only 100,000 Russians to oppose in Poland. However, notwithstanding their Rhenish Confederates, their Dutch, Italian and Spanish Auxiliaries, it is astonishing how very few men they left for the defence of the country between the Rhine and Vistula, a circumstance which will strongly prove the incapacity and criminal indifference of the late Administration. They looked with as much apathy on the last struggle of European independence, as if it had been a predatory war between the Deys of Algiers and Tunis; though every letter from Mr. Thornton must have convinced them that a diversion of about 30,000 between the Ems and Weser, particularly after the battle of Eylau, would have raised Hanover, Hessia, and perhaps Holland. But let us abandon that disgraceful subject; and hasten to our conclusion. From the facts we have alleged, supported by the late events in Spain, and the unaccountable indifference of Bonaparte relative to the Austrian armaments, we are convinced we risk nothing in maintaining that the French army, Dutch and Italians included, does not consist of more than TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND MEN.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

SPAIN.

ST. YAGO, JUNE 29.—The Supreme Junta of this Principality hasten to communicate to this kingdom the information they have received from our Deputies in Great Britain, whose Government offers a succour not only to this Principality, but every other Principality of this kingdom, as will be seen by the annexed Copy of the Letter of the English Minister to our Deputies:—

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S DECLARATION TO THE ENVOYS OF ASTURIAS.

Office of Foreign Affairs, 12th June.

MY LORDS—I have laid before my Sovereign the Letter which you were authorised by the Junta of the Principality of Asturias to deliver to me, together with the powers entrusted to you by the Junta, entreating, in their name, his Majesty's assistance. His Majesty has desired me to assure your Excellencies that he feels the warmest interest in the resolution of the Principality of Asturias to sustain against the atrocious Usurper of France, a contest in favour of the independence of the Spanish Monarchy: That his Majesty is disposed to grant every kind of assistance to efforts so magnanimous and praiseworthy.

His Majesty has, therefore, ordered me to declare, that no time shall be lost in embarking for the port of Gijon the succours that you require, as being the most pressingly necessary; he will besides send a naval force capable of protecting the coast of Asturias against any attempt which France may make, and of introducing troops by sea into the country—His Majesty will make further efforts in support of so just a cause.

His Majesty has also ordered me declare to your Excellencies, his readiness to extend the same succours to every other part of the Spanish Monarchy, which may be animated by the same spirit as the inhabitants of Asturias, as well as his Majesty's sincere desires to renew those ties of friendship which subsisted so long between the two nations, and to direct his united efforts against any power which may evince hostile intentions against Spain, as well as Great Britain.

I recommend to your Excellencies to communicate as soon as possible to the Junta the manner in which his Majesty has received the proposals transmitted by your Excellencies. A vessel has been got ready at Portsmouth, to carry any person who may think proper to dispatch.

I beg your Excellencies to accept the assurances of my high consideration.

PROCLAMATION OF ADMIRAL COTTON.

"COIMBRA, JULY 18.—The undersigned Admiral commanding the Fleet of his Britannic Majesty on the coast of Portugal, loses not a moment to make known, that he has received an express from the Loyal Inhabitants of Sines, and to assure them, as well as every true and loyal Portuguese engaged in a just, honourable, and glorious cause, such as the re-establishment of its rightful Prince, that all the support lying in the power of his Britannic Majesty's Fleet shall be given.

"Capt. Smith commanding his Britannic Majesty's ship Comus, is charged to deliver this express, and instructed to proceed to Sines, in order to lend a prompt and immediate assistance.

"The British Admiral undersigned can assure the inhabitants of Sines, of the whole kingdom of Portugal, that the most energetic, valorous, and decisive efforts have been displayed with the completest success to frustrate the perfidious designs of the French against the independence and even the existence of this nation. The French ships in Cadiz have been [illegible] and compelled to surrender to the brave Spaniards: the [illegible] not in every part risen in arms, and the result cannot fail proving glorious. Similar energy must be attended with the same success in Portugal, and thus will the inhabitants of both kingdoms hold an equal right to the esteem, applause, and admiration of Europe.

"The Undersigned has received deputations from the Provinces of the North of Portugal, already in arms, swearing to re-establish the Government of their legitimate Prince, and to resist their oppressors. At Oporto, Viana in Entre Minho e Douro, and part of Beira, one hundred thousand Portuguese have risen in arms; and if their gallant countrymen in the South unite themselves to them, they cannot fail overthrowing the small handful of Frenchmen now occupying the capital: but to vanquish, unanimity is requisite; let them not be intimidated by menaces, or be corrupted by promises; let them bravely and resolutely determine to rescue themselves from oppression, and to restore the Government of their lawful Prince.

"General Junot as even in his last Edict, of the 26th of June, fabricated the most sanguinary threats against the inhabitants of Portugal: they are threatened with the destruction of the most loyal and populous cities, and these inhabitants doomed to the point of the sword, by a handful of men, amounting at most to ten thousand, bearing no comparison to the population of Portugal. Woe to the criminal oppressors, if the loyal Portuguese encounter them fearless: the righteousness of their cause must triumph. Noble enthusiasm pervading the ranks can never be damped, if all access to seduction be precluded. A vigorous resistance conjoined to the energetic efforts now exerting by your valorous neighbours and friends, the Spaniards, resolutely engaged in the same glorious cause, must have the happiest issue; as yet there are thousands in Portugal anxious to emulate the deeds of their forefathers in loyalty and glory. I repeat it to each loyal Portuguese, that all the aid of which his Britannic Majesty's fleet is capable, shall be given in behalf of a cause so just, glorious, and honourable, as the restoration of its lawful Prince, in whose name the Standard ought to have been raised in the South, as has been done in the North, for all the loyal to repair to.

"Given on board his Britannic Majesty's ship Hibernia anchored at the Mouth of the Tagus, July 1, 1808.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL MONCEY.

PARTICULARS OF THIS GLORIOUS EVENT, PUBLISHED OFFICIALLY AT GIBRALTAR.

"Gibraltar, July 24.—D. Vincente Ronch, master of the Spanish vessel, la Virgen de la Cueva Santa, a native of Valencia, forty-seven years of age, and married in the said town, where his family resides, has made the following declaration upon oath, before D. Felix Herrera, Honorary Commissary of the Spanish Armies, and Spanish Consul at Gibraltar:—

"On the night of Friday, the 8th inst. he sailed, on public service, from Valencia, for this place. On the 26th and 27th of the month, a French army of 12,000 men, having made its appearance within a league of Valencia, in the plain of Quarte, General Caro attacked them with a few regulars, but a considerable number of armed and unarmed inhabitants, whose exertions, however, could not prevent the enemy reaching Valencia on the 28th. Upon their arrival they summoned the town to surrender, sending in a flag of truce, which returned with a refusal. The French then attacked the town by the Quarte Gate, that of Pichina, and Santa Lucia. There were no regulars in the place.

"On the preceding day, 5000 muskets and a quantity of powder, had been received from Carthagena, which greatly contributed to the glorious issue of the contest. Nine thousand armed inhabitants manned the walls and forts. The deponent served a piece of cannon at St. Austin's Gate. The attack began at two in the afternoon, and ended at eight in the evening, when the enemy retreated at Quarte (one league from Valencia), where he remained the whole night. Two thousand five hundred men were found dead, whom the enemy had left round the walls of the town on the 28th, besides those in the fields. As the enemy continued his retreat, on the 29th, by the road of Alcira, he was pursued by General Count de Cerbellon, reinforced by General Caro, their united armies amounting to upwards of 4,000 men, chiefly armed and unarmed inhabitants. At the mountains, a number of the latter were posted in the mountains of Novella, with three 8-pounders, so that the French were attacked both in front and rear. In this last action, which was fought more than ten leagues from Valencia, the whole of the French army was destroyed, two or three hundred horse excepted, who effected their escape. This account, the deponent heard on the day of his departure, at noon, in the Hall of the Board of Government, where he was receiving the orders relative to his voyage. One of the Members inquired about Moncey, and the Messenger answered, that he had been wounded in the arm; and that another French General had also received a severe wound, which, he thought must have proved mortal. One hundred French prisoners had been brought from Cuenca to Valencia, who, together with fifty more taken in the neighbourhood of the latter town, were sent to Carthagena.

"The French came by way of Cabrillas, where an action took place, in which they lost 3000 men, including a few who had been killed previous to this—notwithstanding which they pursued their march. Only a few Spaniards were killed in the attack upon Valencia; but, in the preceding actions, the loss had been considerable, particularly at Las Cabrillas, where upwards of 700 Swiss, and nearly the whole of the regiment of Savoy, perished. All the clergy, and even the women, made themselves very useful in the defence of Valencia, the former with muskets and in moving cannon; the latter, in making cartridges, after providing themselves with stone to annoy the French, if they had entered the town."

Coimbra, July 26.—General Loison passed through Carvallos on the 18th, with part of his troops, and three pieces of artillery, having fled from the neighbourhood of Leiria, for fear of being cut off by the Spaniards, who have entered Abrantes. At Villa Franca the French found 150 felucca which they were carrying to Lisbon.

Madrid, July 30.—In the middle of the night, Joseph Bonaparte set off, and took the road to France, according to preparations previously made.

Some say, this precipitate flight was occasioned by the surrender of Dupont, with a considerable number of prisoners; others think, that it is the result of the discovery of a plot of two French Generals. The truth is, that this morning more than 3000 left this capital on the road to France. The fact is certain—the cause doubtful. We hope that to-morrow there will not be a Frenchman here.

Manzanal, July 31.—We hear that Bessieres is retiring hastily upon Burgos. This is considered as most favourable. Some say it is the effect of the entrance of our army into Madrid, and of the flight of Joseph Bonaparte; others, that some revolutionary movements have broken out in France, and that Napoleon has been seized. Others, with more probability, consider it as the effect of the defeat of Dupont and Moncey.

Corunna, Aug. 8.—Dupont's division consisted of 8000 men, who surrendered at discretion; Gen. Wedel's, of 5000, laid down their arms, and are to go to Cadiz to be embarked for Rochefort. The French had 3000 killed and wounded; the Spaniards 1500. We took 3000 horses, and a great number of waggons laden with plate, gold, and other valuables, 10,000 muskets, great quantities of cloathing, &c.

The Junta of Seville have appointed Castanos Commander in Chief. In short, the result of the victory is, 25,000 prisoners (infantry), 3000 cavalry, 75 waggons of gold and plate, the plunder of Cordova.

FROM THE SWEDISH PAPERS.

EXTRACT OF A REPORT FROM GENERAL ADLERCREUTZ, TO HIS EXCELLENCY COUNT KLINGSPOR.

Pursuant to your Excellency's order, I proceeded on the 13th July from Lower Harma to Kaukava, and at seven o'clock the next morning the army was in full march. I rode up to the vanguard, which had advanced three-fourths of a mile from Lappo, and on my arrival they were attacked by a superior force, and driven back with some loss on our side, but immediately on the main body coming up, I engaged the Russians, who encouraged by their first success, made a most desperate resistance. However, we forced our way by fixed bayonets.—The nearer we approached Lappo, the greater was the enemy's fire.—At four o'clock in the afternoon, the army arrived on the plain before the village of Lappo, where the enemy had posted himself in order of battle—his right wing, consisting of riflemen and infantry, was stationed before the village Leochtala—and the left wing consisting of infantry, stood before the church.—In the center was a battery of 6-pounders and howitzers, and the space between the right and left wings, all along the front, was filled with cavalry. The enemy kept up a continual fire from our army which stood on the hill opposite Lappo, but as their guns shot could not reach us, nor ours the enemy, I ordered the brigade under Colonel Von Dobeln's command, to enemy's left wing, as I intended the third brigade to attack the right wing, but I received at the same instant information that a considerable force had appeared at the village of Alapan. I ordered Col. Grepenberg, the Chief of the Brigade, with two battalions, to attack them, and thereby cover the attack on the enemy's left wing, and in the mean time the fourth brigade was ordered to proceed through the forest to observe the motions of the enemy.

Colonel Von Dobeln attacked the enemy's left wing, and as the enemy had placed a number of riflemen and infantry in the unreaped corn-field, which was before them, a most desperate battle ensued. The Colonel, with his usual courage, advanced with one battalion after the other into the village, but as the enemy made a vigorous resistance, and as I then learnt that there were no troops at Alapan, I ordered Colonel Grepenberg to support the attack against the enemy's left wing, whereupon the enemy's left wing fell back. I then immediately order'd Count Cronstedt to attack the right wing, when the enemy at last retreated, and were pursued for half a mile towards Kporniwune; and, in order to secure their retreat, they burnt the village of Leochdale, which prevented our artillery from proceeding.

Four of our brave officers were killed, and thirteen were wounded, and we had 120 men killed and wounded.

The loss of the enemy cannot be estimated, as they carried away a great many wounded during the battle, and threw the killed into the river and village, which they burnt. We have taken about 500 prisoners.—According to calculations made by the enemy, and which have fallen into our hands, and agreeable to the assertion of the prisoners themselves, the enemy's force consisted of 6000 men, including artillery and cavalry. Our force was 3300 men. C. Adlercreutz, Major-General.

FROM THE DUTCH PAPERS.

Paris, Aug. 2.—His Majesty the Emperor arrived at Toulouse on the 24th of July.

In the Newspaper called The Journal of the Empire, of this day, we read the following:—"For some time past various reports have been propagated with regard to Spain and Portugal. It has been asserted that the English have obtained some advantages in these two kingdoms; but the uncertainty and contrariety of these reports would alone be sufficient to expose their improbability. It is true, that the English, according to their usual custom, have endeavoured to excite disturbances; but it is also certain, that "all their efforts to make themselves mas-"ters of the ports and fleets of Spain, have again and again been "frustrated. We learn from authentic information, that they "are not in possession of one harbour or fleet." In Portugal they have not succeeded better. They have dared to make propositions to the Russian Admiral lying in the Tagus, but these were rejected with scorn and indignation."

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAILS.

Gottenburgh, Aug. 5.—A report has been current here to-day, said to have arrived in private letters from Koningsberg, that Russia is about to join France in a war against Austria, and that a large Russian force is shortly expected in the neighbourhood of Koningsberg.

IRELAND.

At Armagh Assizes, on the 4th inst. Alex. Campbell, Brevet Major in the Army, and Capt. in the 21st Foot, was indicted for the wilful murder of Capt. Boyd, of the same regiment. Mr. Adams, assistant-surgeon of the regiment, stated, that on the 23d June, 1807, they were inspected at Newry, by Gen. Ker. After the review Major Campbell and Capt. Boyd had some conversation respecting the manner in which the Major had given the word of command, and for which the General had corrected him: Capt. B. insisted it was not correct. Major B. left the room. In about 20 minutes he was called to visit Capt. B. whom he found sitting on a chair, vomiting, having received a wound from a pistol bullet: in 18 hours he died.—It was then proved that the duel took place in a small room adjoining the mess-room; they were not attended by seconds.—Lieut. M'Pherson stated, that on going up stairs he heard Major C. say, "on the words of a dy-ing man, is every thing fair?" When witness got into the room, Capt. B. replied, "Campbell you have hurried me—you're a bad [illegible] repeated, but at length he forgave Major C. [illegible] character. The Jury found the [illegible] recommended him to mercy. He [illegible] the 18th inst.

A few evenings since, the servant-man of a Gentleman near Dublin, while in his master's garden pulling turnips, overheard some men on the road, close by the garden wall, laying plans for robbing the garden, which induced him to put his back to the door which opened into the road, for the purpose more distinctly ascertaining their plan. One of the fellows then came to the door, against which the servant was leaning, and put his finger into the key-hole, which was large enough to admit it, to try if he could have any effect on the bolt, when the servant, with a knife he had been trimming the tops of the turnips, cut off the first joint of the finger. The fellows ran off, and the sufferer cried bitterly.

PROVINCIALS.

At the Devon Assizes an action for Crim. Con. brought by Lieut.-Colonel Guard, of the 45th regiment of foot, against Charles Hodge, Esq. of Ottery St. Mary, excited considerable interest; the damages were laid at 10,000*l.*

Mr. Serjeant Lens opened the case, by which, and by the evidence, it appeared that the Plaintiff, in the year 1800, had married Miss Coxon, of Kinsale, in the kingdom of Ireland, and that three children were the fruit of this union: that they lived together in terms of the greatest possible affection; that in November, 1806, the regiment being ordered to Buenos Ayres, the Plaintiff was obliged to accompany it; his wife could scarcely be prevailed on to remain at home, and nothing but the positive orders of the Commander in Chief hindered her from sharing with her husband the dangers of the campaign. Lieut.-Colonel Guard having embarked at Plymouth, his disconsolate wife came to reside, during his absence, at Ottery St. Mary, near the friends of her husband. Here her acquaintance with the Defendant first commenced. The Lady was about twenty-six years of age; Mr. Hodge twenty-three. It came out in evidence, that Mrs. Guard was a fine handsome woman, of a volatile disposition, possessing a levity of manners, and fond of admiration. Mr. Hodge was a handsome gay young man, particularly attached to the fair sex. The consequence of this intimacy was a mutual attachment; and in the March following the criminal connection appeared to have taken place, which continued, in the most open and unguarded manner, till the return of the husband. A child was the consequence of this amour. On Lieut.-Col. Guard's return from abroad, a correspondence took place between him and his wife, in which she acknowledged her guilt, upbraided herself for the levity of her conduct, which had brought her into this state of disgrace, and sent to her injured husband all the letters of her paramour. These being the principal points which came out on the prosecution, Mr. Jekyll, on the part of the Defendant, made a most excellent speech in mitigation of damages, described the Defendant's age and situation, the temptation placed before him, as well as the inability of his client to pay large damages, if they were awarded. The Jury consulted a short time, and returned a verdict of 3000*l.*

At Lincoln Assizes, which commenced on Thursday week, Richard Long, aged 19, lately of Sisk Willoughby, labourer, charged with maliciously maiming and killing a mare, and maiming two other mares, the property of his master, E. Robinson, of that parish, farmer, was Acquitted of killing the mare (on account of some informality), but found Guilty of maiming the others, and sentenced to Death. It seemed that the prisoner had no other inducement to commit the barbarous offence, than revenge for the discharge of his sister and mother from the service of the prosecutor. He inflicted the wounds with a sheep-hook, which he stabbed twenty-one inches into the bodies of the poor animals.

Burton, Aug. 16.—About ten days ago, when the fleet of transports were going down Channel for Spain, three of the brave fellows belonging to the 95th regiment, on board the Mary transport, nine miles south-west of the Bill of Portland, wrote three letters, which they sealed up in a bottle, and committed to the troubled ocean; fortunately it was wafted on shore, on a sandy beech, one mile east of Bridport harbour, and picked up by a Mr. Williams, who sent the letters to Bridport post-office. The directions were as follows: Mrs. Jane Cook, Colchester; Miss Sarah Corniowles, Colchester; Mr. George Steed, Manchester. The bottle also contained a note, addressed to the person who picked it up, signed Serjeant Cook. From the date of the above note it appeared the bottle had been [illegible] four days.

One of the most awful thunder-storms ever remembered, was experienced at Newcastle and its vicinity on Monday last; the Newcastle Paper says—"No idea can be conveyed of the tremendous loudness of the thunder, and the astonishing vividness of the lightning. The flashes followed in rapid succession, and some of them were seen to explode in stars of fire, similar to a rocket. Many houses were struck and damaged by the lightning. A woman was killed, and several persons were struck down. Many horses, cattle, and sheep, were also killed. A rick of hay was burnt at Cramlington. A girl standing at a door with a comb in her hand, the lightning struck the back of the comb, singed it, and curled up some of the teeth, without doing the least injury to the girl. By the torrents of rain which fell, the waters were swelled to an amazing height, and walls, hedges, bridges, and trees, were carried away. Some smelting mills were nearly swept away, with large quantities of ore."

There was lately pulled in Bell's Park, near Glasgow, a stalk of oats, full an inch and a half in circumference, and having upon it 360 grains; and in a field at Cross-my-loof, a stalk of oats was pulled, on which were 304 grains.

Learned dogs and pigs have formerly given much amusement to the public; and in all probability we shall soon hear of learned cats, as there were last week sent to the master of an academy in Monmouthshire, a hamper containing twenty-three living cats, the music of which was so harmonious to the passengers, that the coachman was obliged to take them from the roof, and leave them to be brought on by the next stage, to the great mortification of their owner, who anxiously expected their arrival.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Downing-street, August 16, 1808.

A Dispatch, of which the following is a Copy, has this day been received by the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, from Lieutenant-General Sir Hew Dalrymple, K. B. dated Gibraltar, July 24,

My Lord, Gibraltar, July 24.

I inclose a report from Captain Whittingham, containing the details of a complete victory obtained on the 19th instant, by General Castanos, over the French corps commanded by Generals Dupont and Wedel; and I take the liberty of congratulating your Lordship upon the glorious result of the day.

I have the honour also to state, that I have received a letter from General Castanos by the same Courier, expressing the satisfaction he has received from the services of Capt. Whittingham. I have the honour to be, &c.

H. W. Dalrymple.

The Viscount Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c.

Sir, Head-Quarters, Andujar, July 21.

I had the honour to inform you, in my letter of the 17th July, that in a council of war, held on that day at head-quarters, it was resolved that the division of the Marquis De Coupigny should join that of Major-General Reding, and that the attack upon Baylen should be undertaken with the united force of the two divisions, whilst the third division and the reserve should occupy the attention of the enemy by a feigned attack upon Andujar. Major-General Reding entered Baylen on the morning of the 18th, at nine o'clock: he met with little opposition. The enemy retreated towards La Carolina. The Major-General wrote to the Commander in Chief for orders, either to advance against Andujar, or to pursue the column which was retiring upon La Carolina. General Castanos ordered him to advance upon Andujar without delay.

On the 19th, at two in the morning, the General received information of the retreat of the French from Andujar. Lieut.-General Pena, with the reserve, was ordered to advance immediately towards Baylen. The French began their retreat at nine o'clock P. M. 18th July. A letter from General Reding informed the Commander in Chief that he intended commencing his march from Baylen towards Andujar at three o'clock A. M. 19th July. At two o'clock P. M. the advanced guard of General Pena's division came up with the enemy. At this moment an express arrived from Major-General Reding, to inform the Lieutenant-General that he had been engaged with the division of General Dupont from three o'clock in the morning till eleven: that he had repulsed the French, and remained master of the field of battle. The guns of the advanced guard of Lieutenant-General Pena's division had scarcely begun to fire when a flag of truce arrived to treat upon the terms of a capitulation. The [illegible] did not last long.

General Dupont was told he must surrender at discretion.

Lieut.-General Pena halted and formed his division upon the heights of Urabla, distant three miles from Baylen; between nine and ten o'clock General Castenick, Aide-de-Camp to Bonaparte, was sent by General Dupont with orders to treat with General Castanos in person.

At nine o'clock P. M. Major-General Reding informed the Lieutenant-General, that during the truce he had been treacherously attacked by General Wedel, who was just come from La Carolina with a reinforcement of six thousand men; and that the battalion of Cordova had been surprised and taken prisoners, together with two field-pieces.

The negotiations lasted till the evening of the 20th, and the glorious result I have the honour to inclose, as also as exact an account of the killed and wounded on both sides, as I have been able to collect in the hurry of the moment.

The French themselves acknowledge the bravery and steadiness of the Spanish troops; their firmness, constancy, and perseverance, under the greatest possible privations, are worthy of the admiration of the world, particularly when it is remembered that half the army is composed of new raised levies.

The Marquis Coupigny is detached with his division to take immediate possession of the passes of Sierra Morena.

General Castanos deserves the highest praise for his well conducted plan, and for the cool determination with which he has carried it into execution, in spite of the popular clamour for an immediate attack on the position of Andujar.

Whilst the negotiations were carried on, Gen. Castanos received an intercepted dispatch from the Duke of Rovego to Dupont, ordering him to retreat immediately upon Madrid, as the army of Gallicia was rapidly advancing.

This determined the General to admit the capitulation of General Wedel.

Downing-Street, August 16, 1808.

By letters received from Lieut.-Colonel Doyle at Corunna, and from Major Roche at Oviedo, of the 8th and 9th instant, addressed to Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, it appears that various letters, from respectable authorities at Madrid, and also public Gazettes had been received, both at Corunna and Oviedo, stating, that on the 29th ultimo, in the evening, the French began the evacuation of Madrid. Upon the 30th the evacuation continued; and, upon the 31st, Joseph Bonaparte, with the remainder of his troops, quitted the capital for Segovia. This measure was attributed to the French having received the account of the surrender of General Dupont's army in Andalusia.

The French carried with them all the artillery and ammunition they could find means to convey, and spiked the cannon, and damaged the powder they left behind; they also plundered the palaces and the Treasury; they were followed by the Spanish Ministers who had acted under the French, and, in general, by all the French who had settled in business at Madrid. Upon the 1st of July it was believed there was not a Frenchman remaining in the capital.

His Majesty's Ship Unité, off Premula, June 1, 1808.

MY LORD,—Having taken shelter under Lusin, in a heavy N. E. gale, on the 28th ult. which continued until the afternoon of the 31st, when I weighed; getting from under the land about five P. M. three sails were seen close under Premuda, on the starboard tack, with the wind at east, and were soon made out to be brigs of war; chace was instantly given. On seeing us, they wore, and stood with the apparent intention of gaining the Channel of Zara. As the night was likely to be clear, and the wind moderate, I determined following them, although the navigation (as your Lordship will perceive by the chart) is extremely intricate, and we not acquainted with it, but trusting entirely to the lead and a good look-out. Fortunately, we kept sight of them until half-past eleven, and by carrying a press of sail, we again got sight of two, a little after three A. M. about two miles on our lee beam; the helm was immediately put up, but the sails were hardly trimmed, when the third was observed on the starboard tack on our larboard bow, we hauled to the wind and passed her within musket shot to leeward, and gave her our larboard broadside with such effect, as to completely knock her up, so that she struck without firing a gun, the people having run from their quarters. Boats were immediately dispatched to bring the officers on board, and secure her, and sail made after the other two, who were making off through one of the passages to get to sea; it falling little wind, and they making use of their sweeps, it was not until nearly seven that we got within shot of the sternmost, who, after receiving a few from us, and seeing no chance of escaping, fired her broadside, struck her colours, and run on shore. It continuing to fall less wind, the other brig, being much smaller, by the help of her sweeps, was leaving us fast, as there was no appearance of its freshening, and she having got amongst a cluster of small islands, I thought it most prudent to secure what we had got, and endeavour to get the one which had run on shore off, which we soon effected, without her receiving the least damage.—They prove to be the Nettuno and Teulie, of sixteen thirty-two pounders, brass carronades, and one hundred and fifteen men each, sent from Zara the day before, for the purpose of attacking us, having heard that we had so many men absent and sick, that we must fall an easy prey. They are exactly the size of Il Ronco, that we took a month ago, and but a few months old.

I subjoin a return of the killed and wounded, and it affords me the greatest possible satisfaction that we have not a man hurt. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) PAT. CAMPBELL.

SIR,—Enclosed herewith I transmit, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, a copy of a dispatch received by me this day from Vice-Admiral Lord Collingwood, detailing the defeat and surrender of General Dupont's army, together with the capitulation of the force under General Wedel to General Castanos: by these fortunate events, the whole of Andalusia is said to be cleared of French troops.

I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) C. COTTON.

Ocean, off Cadiz, July 24.

By the Scout, I informed you that the French forces under General Dupont have surrendered to the Spanish army; and having to-day received from the President of the Supreme Junta of Government at Seville, the official account of it, I do myself the honour of transmitting a copy of it for your information. COLLINGWOOD.

Admiral Sir Charles Cotton, Bart. Commander in Chief, &c. off the Tagus.

MOST EXCELLENT LORD.—It is with the greatest satisfaction that the Supreme Junta informs your Excellency of the happy success which our arms have had over the French army under Generals Dupont, Wedel, and Gobert, they having laid down their arms, as is set forth in the inclosed papers, which accompany this for your information, being persuaded of the noble interest your Excellency has in our most just cause.

The victory could not have been more complete, and there does not remain one Frenchman in Andalusia; there not being a single individual of the three divisions, which, by their own statements, amounted to more than twenty thousand men, that has not been either killed or taken prisoners.

The rejoicing is so general and so lively, that an idea of it cannot be given; and we expect it will be the same in your Lordship's squadron, through the favour which the Spanish nation owes to British generosity. God save your Excellency.

Copy of a Letter from George Byng, Esq. Captain of His Majesty's ship, Belliqueux, to the Hon. W. W. Pole, dated on board that ship, off Cadiz, March 13.

SIR,—I think it my duty to inform you, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that his Majesty's ship St. Fiorenza this morning anchored off Columbo, having brought in the Piedmontaise French frigate, totally dismasted, which she captured after an action renewed three successive days, and on the last day that excellent and gallant Officer, Capt. Hardinge, was unfortunately killed.

By all information a more severe and determined action has not been fought during the war, nor British valour shewn more conspicuously; and I hear the St. Fiorenza had 13 killed and 24 wounded, and the Piedmontaise 50 killed and 100 wounded.

I have the honour to be, &c.

SIR,—I inclose the copy of a Letter from Capt. Daly, of the Comet sloop, to Admiral Lord Gambier, giving an account of the capture of the Sylphe French National brig, of 18 guns.

I am, &c.

(Signed) W. YOUNG.

His Majesty's sloop Comet, at Sea, Aug. 11.

MY LORD,—On the 9th instant, I left Gijon, and at half past eight this morning, being in lat. 45. 38. N. and long. 5. 4. W. I observed three strange sail N. N. E. At nine, I distinguished them to be a corvette and two men of war brigs; having hoisted the private signal, their not answering it induced me to conclude they were enemies.

In the face of so superior a force, I thought it most prudent to continue my course under all sail, as by altering it they might be inclined to chase me. I am happy to say, that by so doing, the enemy were so far intimidated as to tack and make all sail from me to the N. N. E. At noon, the corvette having much outsailed her consorts, tacked and stood to the southward. I now carried all possible sail in chase of the two brigs, and at half past three the headmost brig tacked and passed me to windward about two guns' shot distance. At five, the remaining brig hoisted French colours, and began to engage me with her stern guns. At twenty minutes after five, having got within pistol shot of her, I commenced close action, which she sustained for twenty minutes, and being then much disabled, hauled down her colours to the Comet.

She proved to be the French national brig Sylphe (commanded by M. Louis Marie Clemont Capitaine de frigate, and a member of the Legion of Honour) mounting sixteen twenty-six pounder carronades, and two long nines, with a complement of 98 men.

Her Second Lieutenant, and a Midshipman, and five men, were killed in the action, and two Midshipmen, and three men wounded, most of them severely.

She is a very fine vessel of her class, copper-bottomed and copper-fastened, reported to be an excellent sailer, abundantly found in stores, four years old, about three hundred tons burthen; and, in my opinion, very fit for his Majesty's service; her consorts (who so shamefully deserted her) were the Diligente of 22 guns, and 140 men, and the Espiegle of 18 guns and 120 men; they had left L'Orient two days before, having each a quantity of flour on board, and I have reason to believe they were bound to Martinique.

I am happy to say no person belonging to his Majesty's sloop under my command was hurt; but her main and maintop-masts were badly wounded, and her sails and rigging cut.

I beg leave to recommend to your Lordship's notice Lieut. Tomkinson, First of the Comet, for his zeal and activity in this contest, and to represent, that the conduct of every Officer and the ship's company, (the latter chiefly consisting of new raised men) was such as to merit my highest approbation.

I have the honour to be, &c.

To Admiral Lord Gambier, &c. &c. &c. — C. F. Daly, Commander in Chief,

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The Dutch and Paris Papers, which have been received this week, observe the deepest silence relative to the disasters sustained by the French in Spain, or endeavour to prove the absurdity and falsehood of those rumours. How long BONAPARTE will be able to keep the French and his vassal States ignorant of these events, we cannot precisely determine; but that the Journals which are under his controul, should endeavour to invalidate the reports of Spanish success, is what may be naturally expected. The Spanish Journalists are equally silent as to new successes obtained by their patriotic countrymen; from which we can only infer, that the French corps which have as yet escaped the fate of DUPONT, retreat with so much precipitation towards the Pyrenees, that they appear to feel some reluctance of giving the Spaniards an opportunity of gaining new victories. The question which now intrudes itself on our minds, is whether BONAPARTE will abandon his project of subjugating that country, and endeavour to enter into some kind of compromise with it, in order to be able to employ his whole force in some other quarter, where he may hope to efface the stigma his arms have sustained beyond the Pyrenees. This important question appears to divide the public opinion, and certainly engages a considerable part of its attention. The extraordinary inactivity of that ambitious individual, his having sent no adequate reinforcements to his armies, the flight of his brother from Madrid, the retreat of his remaining troops towards the French frontiers, the extraordinary armaments of Austria, and the apparent policy of the measure, are the basis on which this opinion rests. We must acknowledge, however, that none of these arguments convey that conviction to our minds, as to prevail on us to adopt an idea in such absolute contradiction with the whole tenour of that man's preceding life since the beginning of his political and military career. Were he an ordinary character; were he restrained in the pursuit of his projects by humane feelings or moral ideas; were his unbounded ambition and inordinate love of fame distracted by softer passions, there would be some plausibility in the foregoing opinion. But it rests on no other foundation than that the persons who argue thus, would probably act in that manner, were they in the place of BONAPARTE. "Were I Alexander, I would do so." This is generally the key to the speculations of the great majority of mankind, when they appreciate the conduct and designs of that extraordinary individual. However, it does not require much reflection to be convinced that BONAPARTE will not be much swayed by these reasons in his future operations with regard to Spain. There is one strong trait in his character, which has been likewise a prominent feature in that of every other person, who has run in the same extravagant career of crime and ambition, that unexpected difficulties and disgraces only serve to sharpen his desires, when vengeance and the shame of unsuccessful infamy join, at the same time, their powerful stimulus.—If we do not mistake his character, if the experience of his whole life should have any influence on our present judgment, we are convinced that he would make France, Spain, and the whole Continent one common scene of desolation, sooner than renounce his designs and vengeance on a country where fortune first abandoned him, towards which he has been guilty of a degree of perfidy, in comparison of which all his other atrocities are mere bagatelles, and where he obtained no other result than that his fleet has been lost; his armies have been routed and destroyed; the cowards and traitors who adhered to him, sacrificed to the irritated feelings of their Country; and he himself branded with eternal ignominy. The Ruffian knows mankind too well, not to be convinced, that their appreciation of events is generally regulated by success. He will, therefore, whatever designs he may have against Austria, or whatever jealousy and apprehensions he may entertain of her armaments, never abandon his intention of subjugating and punishing that country. We have treated this subject thus largely, because the history of that man, and of persons who have acted from similar motives, justifies us to conclude that Spain, or the French departments adjoining that country, will continue to be a scene of all the horrors of war, as long as BONAPARTE can raise a soldier. We must be prepared for this event; otherwise our surprise and grief will rise in proportion to our disappointed hopes. The public now see a prospect of internal peace and security for that country; and when they hear of powerful armies approaching its frontiers, and perhaps of partial reverses sustained by the Patriots, they will, with all the levity and inconsiderateness so peculiar to our age, pronounce the sacred cause of freedom and independence as desperate; and the measures adopted for its support, as obstinate and useless. These suggestions are not made in order to discourage an opinion of Spanish success; we know the Spaniards will be successful; anticipate even the moment when their country will cease to be the scene of their heroism and victories; when they will rush beyond their frontiers, and encounter the satellites of the Tyrant on their own ground. This will be the probable result of the contest. These reflections open a comprehensive field to cheering speculation. The Spaniards are now wound up to that point of exaltation which produces, and has always produced, great events. The active, the young, and the ambitious have now a theatre open to their exertions. The love of their country, of fame and honours, with the boundless hatred they feel against the French, will excite energies in their bosoms, the effect and extent of which, it is not at present easy to calculate. This energy must be directed towards some object. They are thrown into a state of fermentation like that which their efforts and success against the Moors occasioned. But there is now no new world for them to conquer. Religion, personal and national feelings, a sense of vengeance, and a desire to distinguish themselves in the eyes of Europe, point out the departments beyond the Pyrenees as a scene worthy of their exertions and courage. BONAPARTE cannot overlook the justice of this observation; he will, therefore, could he even forget the outrage he has offered them, endeavour to provide against this event, by giving them employment at home. The difficulties which these extraordinary exertions will throw in the way of his operations in any other part of the Continent are insurmountable. We will not here endeavour to appreciate his talents or resources too low; but they have their bounds. The finances of a country, where there is no foreign commerce, and a very circumscribed internal trade, cannot be very high. He may [illegible] some defenceless town in Germany, but this resource will also fail, because in a short time they will have nothing to be robbed of. All these circumstances must be taken into consideration, if we will be able to appreciate justly the difficulties of his situation in case of a new Continental war. If any credit can be attached to the accounts received, through various channels, from the Continent, the efforts which Austria is making to meet this event, are adequate to resist his collected undivided force. All our politicians, from those who discuss the news of the day in our porter-houses, through the different gradations of genius and information, up to the Editors of Newspapers, who are infallible on such subjects, coincide in the opinion that the fate of Austria will be decided in this contest. There are, we would willingly believe, some statesmen in that country who possess an equal degree of penetration as the politicians we just mentioned. They cannot be insensible to a circumstance which we even see at this distance. Their personal interest is so closely united with that they must feel as citizens, that it would be temerity to suppose they will not make more than ordinary efforts in the case of a new war. The revolutions of states offer no prospect of advantage to men of great property. Men of that description in Austria will, therefore, make sacrifices commensurate to the exigencies of the state; and the middling and lower classes of people, who are strongly attached to the Catholic persuasion, if the great lever of religion be employed to raise them, particularly after the degradation of the Head of their Church, will shew an energy equal to that displayed by the Spaniards. The situation of the Continent allows us also to make powerful diversions in their favour. We are sorry to be reduced to the necessity of so frequently repeating, that every exertion which any government or people make against the French, is as much in our favour as it is in their own. We certainly have it in our power to prevent BONAPARTE, whilst a part of his army will be employed against Spain, from sending the rest against Austria. Holland, Brabant, particularly Italy, are assailable points. And if it be in our power to occupy some point on the coast of the Adriatic, particularly Venice, with about fifteen thousand men, whilst we have another army in Sicily, we will be able to throw great obstructions to any attempt which BONAPARTE may make to invade Austria from the side of Italy. So strong a force in the rear of an invading army, in particular as the Austrian States are weakest in that direction, will rather damp its ardour. For our part, we totally disbelieve the rumoured alliance between France and Russia. However impolitic and disgraceful the part which the latter has acted of late, it is not justifiable to suppose that the Emperor ALEXANDER and his whole Cabinet are in a state of absolute insanity. Will they consent, will they even contribute to pull down the last barrier between them and a power, whose dangerous encroachments they cannot be insensible to? We have as much, and, in fact, greater reason to suppose that the Russian camps, forming on the frontiers of Gallicia, are intended for a co-operation with Austria, than with France. Sound policy, as well as prior accounts, support this opinion; and there must be stronger reasons than mere report, before we can renounce it.

An Expedition is fitting out with the greatest promptitude. Its destination is unknown. However, from the great quantity of heavy artillery which is embarking, there is no reason to suppose that it is intended for Spain. From the information we have been able to collect, we think it is destined for the Adriatic. Its object is said to be to take possession of the Seven Islands; but when we reflect how unreasonable any such attack would be at present, we do not feel much inclined to give credit to this report. Our force can certainly be more advantageously employed than to use it, in the present juncture, in a conquest which can have no direct influence on the liberty of Europe. If the Adriatic be its destination, there is more probability that Venice is the object. If this city were in our hands, we could render the most material assistance to Austria, in case of a war between that State and France.

By the Hopewell, Capt. Sheppard, which is arrived from Cadiz, Capt. Ferrier, who is a man of intelligence and observation, has come to this country. This vessel left Cadiz on the 30th ult. Capt Ferriers states, that the enthusiasm of the people of Cadiz, and particularly of the women, exceeded any thing we have heard of even during the more ardent period of the French Revolution. Some of the most respectable women employed themselves daily in visiting and attending the wounded Patriots even in the hospitals, in making shirts, bandages, &c. &c. Nothing, indeed, appears to have been omitted on their part which could serve in any degree to excite their countrymen to oppose the enemy, and to soothe and reward those who suffered by such opposition.

The Spaniards were actively preparing ships to convey to France that portion of Dupont's army (General Wedel's division) which Castanos had covenanted to send home. This activity is an additional evidence of the noble character of this gallant people. Even the extreme of irritation cannot withdraw them from the honourable fulfilment of their promises.

Dupont and his companions were hourly expected at Cadiz. They are not to be sent back, as erroneously stated in our Gazette. They are to be held prisoners of war; and vessels in the harbour were preparing as prison ships.

The confidence of the Spaniards as to their own security may be inferred from this circumstance—that immediately after the surrender of Dupont, Castanos detached 10,000 of his troops to Portugal, for the purpose of co operating with Sir Arthur Wellesly. Castanos himself with the remainder of his force marched towards Madrid, which route both Cuesta and Blake, with the force of Gallicia, are also understood to have taken. Their hope was to catch Joseph, but he had eloped, and in a very extraordinary way, for it is stated, that this redoubted Sovereign thought proper to escape by a subterraneous passage, which was above a mile from the Palace of Madrid, into the country. This escape he effected in company with O'Farril, and a few other faithful followers, at the hour of four o'clock in the morning of the 1st instant, at which time the whole of the French left Madrid. The departure of Joseph and his force was quite sudden, and unexpected on the part of the inhabitants. He certainly was under the influence of panic. He set off in disguise, being dressed in black, and wore a patriotic cockade. It was generally intimated to the Spaniards, that the object of his removal was to take a more eligible military position at Segovia; where it was given out that he meant to fortify himself. But it appears that he did not even think it prudent to halt at Segovia, but has taken flight to France. The opinion at Cadiz was, when our informant left it, that the French had, or immediately would, evacuate Spain altogether.

The victories which have crowned the efforts of the Patriotic armies, have led the Junto of Seville to turn their thoughts to the internal organization of the kingdom. The Junta of Galicia has joined that of Seville in preliminary steps, to the calling of a national cortez. They have invited the several provincial Juntas to concur; and the Duke de Montijo, a Grandee of Spain, has made no less than three tours of all the provinces, to bring the Assemblies to one mind upon this subject. His Patriotic efforts have not been in vain. All the jealousies which it was feared would stand in the way of one grand national Council are likely to be done away, and it is thought that the Duke de Montijo will be declared the President of the Cortez.

The following letter will serve to show the enthusiasm which glows in the breasts of the people:

"CADIZ, JULY 24.—It would have afforded you gratification to see all the Provinces simultaneously united in the cause which they have espoused of resisting the French. The public spirit has operated on the inhabitants with such force, that they have taken up arms in emulation, and enlisted in the defence of the glorious cause. There have been a few solitary instances of treason and perfidy among the Chiefs, these, however, have not at all interrupted its progress; they speedily fell victims to the public vengeance. The Solanos, Truvillos, Filangiers, Borsas, Alabas, and others, have all been immolated by the exasperated people. At the present day, Spain has already 500,000 men in arms, who, without any other qualification than that of bravery, have given battles and gained victories in every direction. Spain does not bemoan those victims sacrificed to its national honour, though many have fallen, especially in the commencement of the conflict. The scenes of Numantia and Saguntum have been renewed at Valencia, Saragossa, and Barcelona, but with better success. There are yet many a Viriatus and Sertorius found in these suspicious times, and we hear nothing here of robberies, massacres, and disorders, the usual attendants of anarchy in other countries.—Happy nation, which even in the lower orders of its inhabitants knows to uphold and command respect to its accustomed point of honour!—God, the author and protector of justice, is our guide. Thus then are the French Eagles trampled in the dust, and of the Conquerors of Jena, Austerlitz, and Friedland, scarcely any thing will shortly remain but the reminiscence. Nothing obstructs our stages to Madrid, and our armies have sworn that they will fly and shut up the passes of the Pyrenees, as the sole guarantees of our liberty and independence. In the end we shall treat about organizing our internal Government, at the head of which we place our King Ferdinand VII. proclaimed and supported by all the provinces composing this kingdom."

Friday dispatches were received by the American Minister from America, brought by the Hope in 23 days. She sailed on the 24th July, and having landed the Messenger at Falmouth, she proceeded to Havre, with dispatches for Mr. Armstrong. In this instance the vessel touches at England first. The Osage had arrived in America about a fortnight before the Hope sailed, so that she brings the answer to her dispatches. The President and Government were also acquainted with the Bayonne Decree, confiscating American ships under certain circumstances. They had also heard of the Revolution in Spain; but of course they had heard of it only up to that point of time when opinion was divided as to the issue, and when, perhaps, the prevailing sentiment (particularly among military and diplomatic men who had been the most accurate observers of the armies, and the intrigues of Bonaparte) was, that the French Emperor must triumph, and trample Spain under foot. It is not to be expected, therefore, that the first burst of this miraculous event would, in any material degree, influence the decision of the Government.

Mr. Erskine had been at Washington, and expectation was on the alert as to the object of his journey. It was hoped that he had received some new instructions to treat; but the hopes in that respect were speedily dissipated. He returned after a few days stay.

The Congress had separated, leaving it to the discretion of the President to raise or continue the embargo. The people were, as heretofore, divided on the question, but on the whole perfectly tranquil on the subject; and there was no rational expectation that it would be taken off while our Orders in Council remain in force. The different letters we have seen are all in the same spirit with those which the public have so often read, breathing the passion and party of the writers. One letter, from a high person in the Government, was particularly dwelt upon yesterday on 'Change, because it was said to contain an expression to this effect—"We hope soon to see Mr. Rose here again, with enlarged powers."—This, as indicating the wishes of the American Government, was particularly insisted upon; but many of the best informed American merchants doubted of the existence of such a letter.

Letters from an Officer of our Fleet, dated off the Tagus, as low as the 3d inst. state, that General Sir A. Wellesley had landed at a place sixty miles northward of Lisbon—that he had been joined by General Spencer, their joint army being 16,000 effective men—that the 1000 marines that took post near Coimbra, had returned on board the Fleet to assist in the attack of the Russian Fleet in the Tagus, which they did not doubt of carrying, while Sir A. Wellesley proceeded to the attack of Junot on the land side.

The following were the first General Orders issued by General Sir Arthur Wellesley, relative to the mode of landing his troops, at Mondego Bay, which debarkation has taken place:—

"Mondego Bay, his Majesty's ship Donegal, 26th July, 1808.

"In the event of a landing being determined upon in Mondego Bay, a signal will be made to Captain Malcolm, which will be settled, at which time it will be proper to moor the horse ships, and the ships having the ordnance on board, in the river. The infantry will then be landed from the transports in the boats, and be rowed into the river, and landed on the south bank of it. Gen. Fane's Brigade first, save the Veteran Battalion, which will remain on board: Gen. Ferguson's next; and Gen. Crawfurd's in the rear," &c. &c.

The Alfred lost from fifteen to twenty of her crew in sending boats ashore at Mondego Bay, and some people belonging to the transports were drowned.

Though Sir Arthur Wellesley commands the troops now in Portugal, he is not Commander in Chief of the forces sent to assist the Spaniards and Portuguese, as is generally supposed. The following is the order, as to rank, in which the Commanders stand, to whom the direction of the British auxiliary force is entrusted, viz. Lieut.-Generals Sir Hew Dalrymple, Sir Harry Burrard, Sir John Moore, Major-General Sir A. Wellesley.

There was a report on 'Change yesterday, that Bonaparte has been assassinated, in the vicinity of Bourdeaux. This report was echoed from a letter dated Rotterdam, on the 10th inst. where it is stated to have been very current. The assassination is said to have been effected by a band of about 100 young men, who had previously concerted their plan of attack, and effected it with great resolution and address.—We dare say it is a fable.

We have the satisfaction of announcing the arrival of the following vessels belonging to the East India Company, in the Downs, under convoy of the Monmouth, of 64 guns; they sailed from St. Helena on the 19th of June: the Earl Howe, Lord Castlereagh, Metcalf, Devonshire, Charlton, Castle Eden, Marquis of Wellesley, City of London, Lord Hawkesbury, Airley Castle, Surry, and Windham.

LOCAL MILITIA ACT.—The following Circular Letter from the Secretary at War, has been received by the Commandants of Volunteer Corps:—

"Sir, War-Office, Aug. 5, 1808.

"As a considerable proportion of the Volunteer Corps, which have already offered to transfer their services into the Local Militia, have been assembled upon permanent duty in the course of the present year, and as it is understood that it would be particularly inconvenient to many other corps desirous of transferring their services into the Local Militia, to be assembled and called out for exercise during the ensuing autumn, unless in cases of absolute necessity; I have received directions to acquaint you, that it is not his Majesty's intention to call upon any Corps of Volunteers transferring their services into the Local Militia, to assemble for exercise until the spring of next year.

"I have the honour to be, &c. "Jas. Pulteney."

From the above Letter, and from other circumstances, it is now generally believed, that the Local Militia Act will not be carried into execution this year.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be continued at 12½d. The quartern loaf wheaten, and 10½d. household.

THE COURT.

Wednesday at noon his Majesty arrived in town, from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace, by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York and Kent.

At two o'clock his Majesty held a Private Levee. The following had the honour of being presented:

The Rev. Mr. Jenkinson, Prebend of Worcester, Colonel Sir George Smith, on being appointed his Majesty's Aide-de-Camp.

THE WORLD OF FASHION.

Brighton never was more brilliant than on the commemoration of the Birth-day of the Heir Apparent; the glow of loyalty will at all times enliven, but with the inhabitants of that watering place, it is more, and ought to be accompanied with bursts of gratitude, as nothing but the fostering care and attention of the Prince has raised their town to its present pre-eminence as a fashionable resort. At an early hour the town was crowded by company from all the surrounding watering places, and the fashionable residences in its vicinity; the morning was ushered in with ringing of bells, and every other demonstration of joy, and the whole party of Royal Brothers met to breakfast at the Pavillion. At 10 o'clock the line of troops was formed on the review ground, whither all the beauty and fashion of Brighton was seen hastening in all directions. The Prince's barouche arrived at noon, in which were the Duke of Sussex in Highland uniform, Mrs. Fitzherbert and Miss Seymour, Lord Erskine and Major Hanger.—At this instant Lord Craven's yacht came to an anchor in the roads, and fired a royal salute, after which his Lordship and a large party of aquatics landed and proceeded for the review ground. At a little past 12, the Heir Apparent, attended by a numerous equestrian and ped. strian suite rode up in front of the line on a spirited charger; his Highness looked remarkably well, and in high spirits; he was habited in the Austrian costume richly embroidered, an elegant cap and blue pelisse, the Insignia of the Garter, and armed with a sabre of most exquisite workmanship. Three feu de joies were then fired, after going through the usual evolutions, when his Royal Highness returned to Brighton in a cloud of beauty, fashion, equipage, and dust. All was bustle and gaiety, hilarity and confusion; and a splendid party at the Pavillion, with universal brilliant illuminations, closed the day.

On Tuesday a Grand Fete was given at Oatlands by the Duchess of York, in honour of her royal husband's birth-day, to their Majesties, the Royal Family, and a splendid assemblage of rank and fashion. At half past twelve their Majesties and the Princesses arrived, and were received at the grand entrance by the royal host and hostess, accompanied by the Prince of Wales. The royal party immediately rambled into the park, where two marquees were pitched in the lawn; in one was a military band playing martial and appropriate airs; in the other, to which their Majesties were led, was a joyous party of 50 orphan children, supported under the patronage of her Royal Highness, regaling on a comfortable dinner, provided for them by their kind patroness. His Majesty was highly delighted by the scene, and diffused much happiness through the humble group, by his condescension in putting several appropriate questions, indeed the children were much exhilarated by the affable attentions of the whole royal party. Their Majesties having partaken of an early dinner returned to Windsor, when the remaining party of fashionables sat down to an elegant repast, and spent an evening of mirth and conviviality, much enlivened by the conversation powers of the Prince, who staid till a late hour.

On Wednesday her Majesty gave a dinner, with splendid accompaniments, to a large party of the nobility and gentry in the vicinage of Windsor; the Fete was held at Frogmore, under the direction of the Princess Elizabeth, and was throughout elegant and impressive, as might be expected from her distinguished taste. All the Royal Brothers were there, and at three they sat down with her Majesty to a superb dinner, in a large Chinese tent on the lawn, the rest of the company being entertained in the same style, in surrounding marquees. The bands of the Blues and Staffordshire played during the repast; and the Pandeans from Vauxhall being introduced after dinner, the juvenile part of the company were gratified by a rustic ball. The happiness of the evening was much enlivened by the arrival of his Majesty from town, who joined the festive party, and with great good humour entered into the spirit of the scene. Among the great number of visitors, we particularly noticed the Cornwallis, Ashbrooke, Boston, and Ilchester families, the Officers of the Blues, Staffordshire Militia, &c. &c.

On Friday his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge reviewed several regiments on Wanstead Common, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Royal Dukes. After the Review the Prince, with his brothers, took the opportunity of paying a familiar morning visit to Louis the XVIII, and his party at Wanstead House. The plain gentleman-like manner of the visit, divested of all fastidious forms, was highly acceptable to the Royal Emigrants, and the whole party sat down to an elegant collation, where the Rose and the Lilly of France and England were blended in one friendly nosegay; soon may the time arrive when the friendship thus subsisting between the two families, shall be the pledge of the happiness of two nations, too long, alas! rivals, too long for their own happiness and that of civilized Europe.—His Royal Highness had a long interview with the exiled Monarch, and returned to town in the evening.

THE RIGHT REVEREND BEILBY PORTEUS, D. D. LORD BISHOP OF LONDON.

LOOKING back no earlier than to the era of our last political renovation, in 1688, it is pleasing to recollect the number of those distinguished Divines, who, while enjoying the highest dignities and emoluments attainable in the Church of England, have justified their elevation by their deserts. Not to enumerate various subordinate characters, subordinate only as to the comparative rank or revenue of their respective preferments, what true churchman can review the career of a Sancroft, a Tillotson, a Secker, a Kenn, a Burnet, a Sherlock, a Butler, a Stillingfleet, a Law, a Horne, a Lowth, a Hurd,—who, I ask, can seriously contemplate the individual exertions, and collective excellence, of such eminent ecclesiastics, without feelings of personal complacency, and even of national exultation? It is among these luminaries in the firmament of righteousness, that the subject of our present estimate will shine with perceptible and permanent lustre.

My aim, however, is not to pen a panegyric on the existing Bishop of London. I wish impartially to appreciate his clerical character, both as to its qualities and effects; and to form some general inferences from the inquiry, connected with the State of Religion in this country.—Twenty years have fully elapsed since this venerable prelate was promoted to the See which he now occupies. The situation is at all times an important one; but it has been his lot to fill it during very eventful times, and under circumstances of an extraordinary nature. Dr. Porteus soon evinced his attachment to those principles, for an adherence to which he has been uniformly conspicuous. His strenuous defence of Orthodoxy attracted, in 1761, the notice of Secker, then Archbishop of Canterbury, who became his earliest, and most efficient, friend. "It was not, therefore, "through the channel of powerful court-inte-"rest," as one writer intimates, that he afterwards "succeeded to a bishopric." His opinions, coupled with the ability with which they were asserted, first acquired him the aid of patronage; and his subsequent success was the natural effect of those exertions on his part, which had been so happily discovered and fortunately estimated. If unaffected orthodoxy, in any church, has not the most legitimate claim to preferment, especially when connected with great talents, I know not the principle by which the distribution of ecclesiastical emoluments should be regulated. While censuring then the promotion of this prelate, his opponents seem not to perceive the dilemma in which they place themselves. They condemn him for his conviction of truth which he had most religiously engaged to espouse; and they condemn his patrons, because they have selected, as the object of clerical distinction, a divine whose ability and conduct entitled him even to the highest honours of their church.

Among the objections attempted to be made against the present Bishop of London, no one has ventured to reproach him with having in any manner neglected the high and important functions of episcopacy. But the dignities of the prelate have sometimes obliterated all recollection of the duties of the priest. Of Bishop Porteus, however, the contrary fact is sufficiently established. Minutely as he is known to discharge the functions of his exalted station, his sermons abundantly attest his attention to the more ordi-many occupations of the christian ministry. His Lectures on the Gospel according to St. Matthew, preached by him to crowded and very respectable audiences, during the Lent Season of 1798, exhibit honorable proof of his zeal for religion, and of the discrimination with which it was exerted. He has published various other Discourses, of considerable value; while his Charges to his Clergy, many of which were delivered during the most momentous times of the revolutionary war, bear ample testimony to his vigilance, intelligence, and fidelity. As the Bishop, in common with most of the clergy of the Church of England, prefers written to extemporary discourses, I am incidentally led to consider—Which mode of preaching is, on the whole, best adapted to the end proposed?

The people of this country, as far as I can discover, have always inclined to admire the extemporising system. So rooted does this predilection appear to have been, that, long after the reign of Puritanism had ceased, Charles II. issued an Order to the Universities, by which he prohibited the practice of preaching written sermons to the people, as a lazy and ineffectual * mode of instructing them; enjoining the heads of colleges, at the same time, to look out for, and prefer, zealous and pains-taking clergymen, and to report the names of those ministers who neglected to comply with the wishes of government. It is not practicable exactly to ascertain what effect the King's commands produced; howlong extemporary sermons only were heard, or at what period our clergy resumed their custom of delivering written discourses. From the rise of Methodism, however, we may unquestionably date the almost complete disuse, for a time, of extemporary preaching, both among our established clergy and the regular dissenting ministers. Both parties were equally anxious to stand acquitted of ignorance and fanaticism. Methodists, notwithstanding, have multiplied; and, since one principal cause of this increase has been attributed to the preaching of their leaders, other pastors have become emulous of imitating their example, and extemporary eloquence is found highly essential to the success of popular preachers.

Both kinds of preaching have their advantages. If it is the province of extemporary sermons to attract attention, and interest the feelings; it is for pre-arranged discourses to inform the mind, and satisfy the judgment. To be useful or durable, conviction must be gradual and rational. Violent agitations, either of pain or pleasure, are but transient; and, if the end of preaching be real and ultimate benefit to hearers, perhaps this is most efficaciously accomplished by legitimate instruction. When Felix trembled, it was when Paul reasoned on righteousness, on temperance, and on the judgment to come!

Is there no steering between extremes? While some content themselves with the cold formality of reading, and others conceive all perfection to consist in ranting, to their congregations; is there no medium of communication, between preacher and people, which combines all possible advantages without any great counteracting evils? I shall not lose sight of this inquiry, in some subsequent disquisition; but I must now resume the immediate subject of this paper.

It is the excellence of the Bishop of London's Eloquence, that it is suited to his style of literary composition; and that the labours of his closet, on the other hand, derive uncommon effect from the character of his oratory. His style is easy, perspicuous, flowing, and elegant;† while his enunciation is clear and equable, his emphasis discriminating and forcible, his whole appearance peculiarly interesting, and his manner earnest and impressive. Though he is in highth rather under the middle stature, this deficiency is scarcely perceptible when he is in the pulpit; such is the unaffected dignity of his deportment, and the becoming awfulness of his address. It is, indeed, impossible to describe the sublime emotion with which I have heard him deliver such passages as the following, while scarcely a breath of interruption escaped from the numerous auditory that surrounded him.——"Watch ye, stand "fast in the faith, quit yourselves like men; be strong, "be resolute, be patient. Look frequently up to the prize "that is set before you, lest ye be wearied, and faint in "your minds. The conflict will soon be over, a few years "will put an entire end to it; and you will then, to your "unspeakable comfort, be enabled to cry out with Saint "Paul, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my "cause, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid "up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the "righteous Judge, shall give me at that day!'"——These are the moments of public devotion, this is the triumph of the christian teacher, when, imbued with one spirit of piety, his hearers are full of immortality; and when they forget the man, in the divine. There are persons, however, who consider Bishop Porteus wanting in the quality of energy, as a public speaker; and who pronounce his style to be unnecessarily familiar. I could point out several of those trifling inaccuracies, in his literary compositions, which gratify the pedantry of criticism; but the task would neither be grateful to myself, nor beneficial to others. His eloquence then, let it be observed, has a character of its own. What in others is called energy, is in him impressiveness. Considering his years, the extent of his duties and exertions, and the delicacy of his bodily health, very few men will be found to equal the oratorical qualifications of Bishop Porteus. He has displayed, in an eminent degree, the purity of Pulpit Eloquence.

As his Lordship is firmly attached to the principles of our ecclesiastical polity, so is he a faithful preacher of the fundamental articles of our faith. Were I to hint what I conceive in him rather incompatible with the station he occupies, it would be, that he seems to have a leaning towards our evangelizing schismatics.—I shall have occasion to resume this topic.

ORESIMUS.

 I shall find ample cause to descant on Extemporaneous Eloquence in my next paper, when I propose to scrutinize the Pretensions of the notable WILLIAM HUNTINGDON, S.S.—!! The rise, progress, and establishment, of this still Popular Preacher, offers one of the most curious enquiries to be met with in the history of Modern Churches. When I have dismissed this self-elected Teacher of Divinity, I shall endeavour to call the attention of the British Public to our SUNDAY THEATRES—I mean, the Foundling, Magdalen, Asylum, &c. &c.

* I was ingeniously informed, by a Scotch Divine, who had not the gift of unpremeditated speaking, and who was not permitted to read from his pulpit, that he was first compelled to write his sermons, then learn them, as a player would his part, by memory; and then, at last, toil to deliver them, as if they were purely extemporary!!!—"He," said this divine, "who "did not appear to preach in this way, forfeited all credit for "inspiration with his hearers."

† There is a good compendium of his Lordship's writings, entitled "The Truths of the Christian Religion evidenced in the "Digest of the Faith, Duties, and Privileges of a Christian, &c. &c.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

TORBAY, AUG. 16.—This morning, in consequence of the wind getting into the N. N. W. the signal guns were fired, and the Channel Fleet prepared to get under weigh, but the winds baffling, they lay fast; but now, the post departing, they are getting under weigh with brigs, cutters, &c.—Wind at N. by W. and fine weather.

PLYMOUTH, AUG. 18.—Came in this morning from Barbadoes, the Subtle armed schooner, after a short passage, having on board Lieut. Senhouse, the bearer of dispatches, said to be of importance, from the Hon. Vice-Admiral Cochrane, with which he landed, and set off for London, for the Admiralty, in a post-chaise. Nothing has yet transpired with respect to their contents; but they are reported to be of a very favourable nature. Sailed last night, the Eurydice, 24 guns, and Primrose, 18, with 22 sail of transports, having on board 650 horse and men of that fine regiment the 18th Light Dragoons, a fit match for Bonaparte's Imperial Horse Guards. They are bound to Portugal or Spain, to assist the patriotic cause.

The strenuous gun-brig Lieutenant J. Nugent, had a smart brush a few days ago with a large French man of war brig, sent out of Cherbourg for the express purpose of taken her. The Frenchmen soon found themselves woefully mistaken; and after an action of three quarters of an hour, saved themselves from inevitable capture by means of their sweeps, in getting under Querqueville Fort, which mounts 50 guns. Lieut. Nugent, however, got hold of the Frenchman's jolly-boat, with one man on board, from whom he learnt that the enemy had two men killed, and sixteen wounded. There were a French frigate and another brig in Cherbourg Roads; and a Captain of the former, with fifty of his picked men, came out to the assistance of the brig, which was then getting away with all possible speed. There was no other English vessel in sight at the time of the action. We are happy to add that the Strenuous did not receive any material damage.

TRIAL OF WILLIAM PILKINGTON FOR THE MURDER OF HIS FATHER.

GUILDFORD ASSIZES, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20.

William Pilkington was tried on an indictment charging him with the wilful murder of Montague William Hyndes, at the Maze, Southwark, on Friday se'nnight, by discharging a pistol laden with ball.

Some particulars of this mysterious business have been already before the public, from the report of the Coroner's Inquest. It will be remembered that the prisoner, who married the daughter of the deceased, and who was also the step-son of Hyndes, who married his mother, was alone with the deceased in the parlour of the Red Lion public-house, in the Maze, when a pistol was discharged, which killed the father. There were five witnesses called on the part of the prosecution, but none of them could prove how the act was committed; but it was admitted that Hyndes had died of the wound he had received at the hands of the prisoner. The only material evidence was the assertion of the deceased, from the time of his having been shot until he died, in which he varied very materially. After he had received the wound, he in rage and agony accused the prisoner of having committed premeditated murder, by pointed expressions, such as "You have killed the best of fathers,"—"You pulled the fatal trigger," &c. It however appeared, that in the moments when death was fast approaching, the deceased imputed the shocking catastrophe to accident, as was stated by a material witness, Mr. Clark, surgeon, of Tooley-street. This witness proved, that Hyndes had died of his wound, and that on questioning him if the pistol had gone off in a struggle, he first said that the prisoner had pulled the trigger, and afterwards that it was an accident, as his son did not mean to kill him, he never had such an intention. It was proved on all hands, that the prisoner was much inebriated, and that his father and him lived on the most affectionate terms. From the evidence in general, it was evident that the deceased who had been using persuasive arguments to get the prisoner home, attempted in a struggle to get the pistol he held in his hand from him, and also that from his pocket, and thus happened the fatal event. The prisoner made a very artless defence in a way so truly penitent and distressed, that tears of sympathy were flowing in every part of the Court. He protested his wretchedness, and the sincere love he bore his father, whom he had for a length of time maintained, and never once excited his anger. Had the pistol discharged its contents in his own body, it would have been desirable, to a being so wretched as himself. The Prisoner was so truly overwhelmed with grief, that he was unable to proceed.

After a humane charge from the Lord Chief Baron, the Jury returned a verdict of Manslaughter.

The Judge passed sentence on the prisoner in a feeling manner. He observed that his situation was truly pitiable, and he hoped that the tears of sympathy shed in the court for his situation would prevent men from carrying fire-arms about them, and particularly men given to drunkenness and dissolute habits. Public justice required that the extent of punishment for Manslaughter should be inflicted in this instance, as the idea of carrying loaded pistols was monstrous, and the most dangerous thing to society. The prisoner was sentenced to be imprisoned 12 months.

Four culprits received sentence of death, and the business on the crown side ended. One of the capital convicts, a notorious pick-pocket, was convicted in the course of the day for stealing a gentleman's pocket book on Epsom race course. His name is John Griffiths.

POLICE.

JUSTICE-ROOM, GUILDHALL.

FORGERY.—Henry Locke, a few days since committed upon a charge of forging a 600*l.* Check in the name of the London Dock Company, was on Friday brought up for examination upon a distinct charge of forgery long previous. Mr. Bavistock, a publican, stated, that on the night of Saturday, the 21st of November last, about seven in the evening, the prisoner came to his house, in Prince's-street, Barbican; had a glass of liquor, and tendered him a note, which he said was a 50*l.* Bank note, for payment, requesting change. Witness could not change. The prisoner said, he should go elsewhere in the neighbourhood and get change; and in about five minutes he returned, saying he had a smaller draft for 10*l.* and asked change for that. The witness's wife at first demurred to change a check for a stranger; but the prisoner said it was for their neighbour, Mr. Richards, in Bridgewater-square, whose men were waiting for payment; upon which the witness seeing the check in Mr. Richard's favour, and being desirous to oblige him, as a neighbour and a customer, he immediately gave the change, a five pound, and the rest in smaller notes and money. The prisoner went away immediately. The witness said his face was quite familiar to him at the time, but he could not recollect where he had seen him. The witness's wife, notwithstanding her husband's confidence, had still some doubts of the check, from the prisoner's manner and mode of address, and she went to Mr. Richards to ask if it was right, when Mr. Richards informed her he had no knowledge of it whatever. Mr. Bavistock himself then went to the Bankers on whom the check was drawn, but was there informed that no such person as Bliss, the name signed to the check, had ever kept cash there.

Neither the witness nor his wife had any doubts of the prisoner's person. The former said he had seen his face frequently, but could not tell at first where; but he afterwards recollected, that having himself wrought 23 years in the watch manufacture, it must have been in the course of his trade he saw the prisoner, who he understood was a watch-finisher in Clerkenwell, about two years since. He had, when he passed the check, a wen on his cheek the size of a nut, but it had since been removed, and only a slight scar remained.

The prisoner, by advice of his Solicitor, said nothing for the present in his defence, and he was fully committed to take his trial upon the charge.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Friday morning, as the lady of Mr. Curtis, of Islington, and a Mrs. Wilson, were driving past the Yorkshire Stinge, in a one-horse chaise, the horse took fright, and ran furiously up Chapel-street, towards the Canal, and coming in contact with the post at the corner of Mr. Wood's chapel, the chaise was broke to pieces, the horse leaped the Paddington gate with the shafts and harness, the ladies were thrown out, and we are sorry to add, that Mrs. Curtis was taken up by Mr. Mackinder, the surgeon (who was near the spot), apparently lifeless, her shoulder being dreadfully lacerated, and her collar-bone broke. Mrs. Wilson was shockingly bruised in the face. After receiving every attention from Mr. Mackinder, they were safely conveyed home to Islington.

The following singular instance of insanity must be considered worthy of remark:—A young woman, from an attack of fever, became deprived of her senses; the circumstance being communicated to another sister, she in a short period was equally affected, and with the same degree of violence. The situation of these poor girls rendered their removal to a place for the reception of lunatics, absolutely necessary. Strange as it may appear, a third sister, receiving the intelligence, and who visited one of them prior to her removal, was immediately impressed with the melancholy catastrophe to such an extent, that she fell a victim to the same lamentable derangement. The latter was removed to the parish house of St. Pancras, where she met with every humane attention and kindness.

BIRTH.

Yesterday, the Lady of Lord Viscount Anson, at his house in Arlington-street, of twin sons, one of which was still-born.

DEATHS.

On Thursday the 18th, aged fifty-eight, Mr. James Yeomans, steward to Colonel Thornton, at Kenyon-house, Lincoln's-inn-fields.

On the 28th of June last, at Dusseldorf, Edmund, Baron Harold, General in the Bavarian service.

At her house, near Ellesmere, the Right Hon. Dowager Lady Kenyon, relict of the late Lord Chief Justice Kenyon.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-FIVE.

CONTINENTAL ALLIANCES.

Much declamation has been employed on the subject of Continental Alliances. Writers, who were perfectly adequate to rectify our ideas on that subject, considered it only as a means to annoy the existing administration, and consequently misled the public in order to serve the purposes of faction or intrigue. From voluntary misstatement on the one hand, and the desultory remarks of superficial observers on the other, arose this strong bias in most people, against a direct interference on our part in the disputes of the Continent. There was something so gratifying to self-love and national prejudices in the passionate distorted observations which were made on this head, that it is by no means extraordinary that the public should attribute a considerable part of the real or imaginary evils they complain of, to this very source. The accumulation of our national debt, with the necessary increase of taxation, was not the smallest evil which resulted from it in the popular opinion. For more than half a century our gravest politicians continued to amuse the public with the disadvantages which resulted from Hanoverian connexions. This served as a very convenient alarm-bell to every opposition to rouse the people against the existing Ministry; and nothing less than the ruin of our liberty, the subversion of our constitution, with the introduction of German soldiers to keep the people tranquil under the threatened system of despotism were predicted as its unavoidable consequences. Such was the impression which declaimers in and out of Parliament thought fit to keep alive in order to serve as a permanent bug-bear to scare the people into a compliance with their projects. But time with his exercising influence has driven away this terrific spectre which haunted our imagination during a considerable part of the last century. Yet though men may laugh at the terrors of their childhood, they continue, during life, to feel the effects of early prejudice. German politics and German wars have not entirely lost their scaring influence, and we feel an uneasiness, a kind of involuntary terror, whenever our state conjurors menace with their re-appearance.

Exclusive of the objections made by prejudice and misrepresentation, it has been asserted with some plausibility, that every coalition which has been formed since the beginning of the revolutionary war, under our auspices, and at our instigation, was followed by the humiliation of the members, and the augmentation of the enemy's power and resources. Another objection was raised in consequence of our insular situation, which pointed out the ocean as the proper element of our exertions. On this theatre it was said we were certain of success, and any deviation from this mode of warfare would be attended with disadvantages, because it was in opposition to our local resources. Whilst the popular opinion was for the augmentation of our Marine, as the securest means of attaining power and opulence, without any danger to our privileges as a free people, every attempt to augment our army was considered as unconstitutional, and at the same time impolitic. However specious these objections, or well founded the arguments may be, which were employed on this subject, we are now placed in a predicament, that we must act in opposition to them. For some years we have not been contending for preponderance, or a few islands, or to tear a frontier town from the enemy, we have been contending for existence, for every thing that can be dear and sacred to a people. Even this situation might have been easily supported, and the menaces of the enemy scorned, but he has succeeded in depriving us in part of those resources which were reckoned on for the support of the immense defensive establishment the danger of our situation compelled us to adopt. The enemy has succeeded effectually in shutting us out from every European market, and the losses we have sustained in consequence of this exclusion, prove the futility of the arguments against continental connexions. We must make a voluntary renunciation of all the advantages we enjoy from our extensive trade, and abandon our colonies, or we must open a market to our merchants and manufacturers. It is in vain at present to make a peace with the enemy, and to enter into a determined resolution, that we will consider ourselves for the future as connected with the continent only by a reciprocity of commercial advantages. This pacific and philanthrophical scheme would be frustrated by the injustice and ambition of our neighbours, and our protestations of perfect neutrality would be as much disregarded as those of Genoa and Venice had been some years ago.

Those observations we acknowledge to be perfectly superfluous, if there did not exist a number of individuals who still advocate for the former opinion. Whether they do it from conviction or singularity, we will not take upon us to determine. But they still continue to recommend to us the experiment of pacific measures, and assure us that the enemy would have no objection to second our views in this respect. The number of people who reason in this manner is not inconsiderable; for besides party declaimers, those persons who suffer a momentary stagnation in their business, or any diminution of their usual profits in trades, hope that a Peace may bring a redress of the grievances they now suffer. It would be very difficult to convince people of this description of the danger that might accrue from the experiment, they consider only their present sufferings, and would willingly submit to any conditions which may hold out a prospect of amelioration. The country and its permanent interests are very secondary objects with them, when placed in competition with their individual and immediate advantages. Though we despair of converting those persons to our opinion, we will take, however, for granted, that by far the more numerous portion of the community feel the necessity of making great exertions and great sacrifices to renew our former intercourse with the Continent. They are convinced, we believe, that negociation, as long as France retains her present preponderance, would not secure us our former commercial advantages. She would consent to make a Peace, we will suppose, but after the ratification, she would always find some pretext to keep possession of the principal harbours of the Baltic and the Mediterranean. Those persons who may be inclined to doubt this, we take the liberty of referring to the conduct she pursued subsequent to the Peace of Amiens. In this Treaty it was particularly stipulated that she should withdraw her troops from Holland and other countries. However, instead of conforming to this stipulation, she continued to keep in them considerable armies, and to throw restrictions on our trade. As she has not since that time displayed greater respect for treaties, or pursued a more equitable mode of conduct, it would be rather imprudent to reject experience for speculation, and bestow too much confidence on any future protestations she may make. If precedent and example should have any weight on the conclusions of men, there is strong reason to presume, that in the event of a new Peace, she would, notwithstanding any stipulations we may make, continue to keep military possession of the countries she now occupies. We should be exposed to the same difficulties and vexations, throughout this large tract of Europe, as we had been in the ports of Holland and Italy, after the Peace of Amiens. Should ever Bonaparte be prevailed on to abandon the States of the King of Prussia, and by this means open to us the Oder, there is no reason to conclude that he will withdraw his troops from the Hanse Towns, and from the Duchy of Warsaw. As long as his two brothers retain the sovereignty of Holland and Westphalia, we shall be as effectually shut out from the Rhine, the Elms, the Weser, the Elbe, and the Vistula, as we are at present. Peace offers us then no prospect of regaining our former commercial superiority; for it would be absurd to conclude that the present Ruler of France, to the detriment of his own subjects, would allow us our former free intercourse with Italy, Holland, and the different States of Germany. This advantage we can alone derive from the successful efforts we make in rescuing those States from the grasp of the Common Tyrant. Every thing portends that an opportunity will be soon afforded us for trying the experiment; and when the benefits we shall gain, in case of success, are weighed against the sacrifices we may be called on to make, no false motives of economy, nor remembrance of former disasters, should prevent us from seconding, to the utmost extent of our resources, military and pecuniary, any future efforts of the Continent, which may contribute to re-establish the ancient connexion.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XXX.

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

Sir,—Though an English Public may continue for a few days to be the dupes of an insolent and even ignorant impostor, and to be biassed by the unwarrantable and injudicious comments of some of our daily prints, this infatuation cannot long resist their characteristic good sense, and aversion to injustice. The treatment you have suffered has been ungenerous, unprincipled, and almost unprecedented. Your name has been used as a mark for the shafts of the malignant and indiscreet, and for the shields of the selfish and the cunning. Though you have already suffered more from the insidious defence of pretended friends, than from the acrimony and malignity of your detractors, your cause is at present so connected with that of justice, that we would consider silence and neutrality in a contest, where innocence is opposed to calumny, impudence, and indiscretion, as marks of as great cowardice and baseness, as if we entered the lists in favour of your antagonists. In advocating your cause, we come forward in support of our own dearest and most sacred rights. When a single individual, whatever be his rank or station, is attacked, without a justifiable cause being assigned, without even a plausible pretext being given, the whole community is as much aggrieved as the single member against whom the attack is directed. Our silence would be particularly criminal; because we know the man, and we know his motives. Though mistaken zeal, and perhaps something worse than levity on the one hand, and a sincere attachment to the interests of the country on the other, have induced some writers to discuss, perhaps with too much freedom, the pretensions of the several candidates for the supreme command of the army destined to co-operate with the Spaniards, a vile writer has the audacity, in the presence of his astonished country, to publish, with your supposed connivance, and under the sanction of your name, the most daring and the most libellous accusations against the worthiest and most distinguished characters in the country. Whilst the whining hypocrite affects to commiserate the injustice done to your Royal Highness, he has the effrontery to associate the respectable name of a Mr. Canning with that of a Cobbett, as united in the same plan of obloquy and persecution. No other man but a H—t could be guilty of the blundering insolence as to suppose that a British Public would believe that a Statesman, whose genius is only inferior to his integrity, would associate with an individual, whose very name, without the necessity of further proof, would stamp a stigma on the cause.

The noblest institutions are not free from abuses. The Press which is the securest fence against the encroachments of power serves also as a cover to the ruffian who lies in wait for the distinguished and the honest. Though your Royal Highness may disdain dragging a wretch of this description to justice, we are not restrained by similar motives from undertaking that office. He may still glory in his imagined security, and laugh at the success of his imposture, but we will draw the caitiff from his cover, and expose him trembling and naked to the detestation of the public.

Your Royal Highness must naturally feel both surprise and indignation that any man in this country could be so weak and unreflecting as to suppose you capable of countenancing such a production. But the error was natural, if the Closet and Finance Council had any where existence out of the shallow head of the bungling scribbler, that some individuals should suppose that such a production could only proceed from the influence of a mysterious and invisible party, the existence of which is as repugnant to the feelings of a free people, and in such discordance with the principles of a free government. The intemperance and want of candour manifested by the daily Press on this disgraceful subject, unfortunately contributed to foster the delusion. In exculpating your Royal Highness of any knowledge of this writer, we will expose the dangerous tendency of his constitutional principles, and the impudence with which he intrudes himself on the public as your defender.

Whatever difference of opinion may be expressed by the two parties in this country, relative to some constitutional questions and the execution of public measures, will any man have the audacity to declare that they do not coincide in an ardent love of their country, a profound veneration for her institutions, and a respectful attachment for their Sovereign. The existence of those very parties is inseparable from a free government, and cannot, in fact, exist without them. What does this fellow then mean with his Domestic Party—a kind of Family and Closet Council, whom he may occasionally interpose between your Ministry and himself. Our Sovereign surrounded with this party to whom no responsibility is attached!—What [illegible] cannot fail to counteract the ostensible advice of Ministers, to [illegible] the interests of the Monarch from those [illegible]

ple. Sir, as we are convinced that no such party does exist; and that you are incapable of approving of such a dangerous innovation in our constitution, it is a duty incumbent on every honest man to detect the malignant and unconstitutional principles of a Pamphleteer, who could invent so bold a fabrication. The very idea of your being favourable to the existence of such a party would throw an odium on your character, which the most distinguished services would not be able to efface. Thrice happy is that state, where the principles and the solid interests of the monarch harmonise with the liberty and rights of the subject. We are that happy community, and we can vauntingly say that the power and security of our Sovereign and family are greatest, in proportion as the people enjoy their liberty undiminished.

The dangerous tendency of this declaimer may be perceived in his attempting to isolate you from his Majesty's confidential servants. If they enjoy the confidence of their Sovereign; if they are men respectable for their talents and services, why does he assert that your Royal Highness feels a reluctance in associating with them? Does not your office of Commander in Chief imply such a connexion? But if they are unqualified for the high station they fill, why don't you make use of that access which you have to his Majesty, in order to enlighten him with regard to their incompetency. Your double duty of son and citizen, would render delicacy and circumspection on so awful a subject, an unpardonable breach of trust. But we know his motives for endeavouring to occasion a schism in the Cabinet. The present Administration, in the most portentous situation in which this country had been ever placed, have displayed so much energy and undeviating adherence to the interests of the Monarchy, that they must be particular objects of detestation to the worthless and disaffected. If there exists an individual in this country, who is dissatisfied with the present establishment, he must mark out the existing Ministers as peculiar objects of his rancour and obloquy. We have strong reasons to believe, that this very writer, who is so profuse of his animadversions on a certain class of declaimers, is more intimate with the Cobbetts, the P——s, and the W——s, than he might think it prudent to acknowledge in a publication, in which he proposed to himself no other object, than to make it sell to advantage, by amusing the credulous with the supposed neglect and injustice your Royal Highness suffered from the Members of two consecutive Administrations. That an individual should be daring enough to publish the most glaring falsehoods, and the vilest calumny against the worthiest and most distinguished members of the community, for the purpose of gratifying the most indecent avidity, will not be credited by persons who are unacquainted with the tricks of some unprincipled writers. Our belief of a connexion between this pamphleteer and a certain class of libellers, has been changed into certainty, on remarking that extracts of his publication have appeared, without comment, in a paper of the most extensive circulation, and whose principles are in such perfect unison with the persons we have alluded to.

In another place this hypocrite makes a most whining appeal to the interests and feelings of the Ministry, and expresses a great deal of astonishment, that in a time when there is so little respect and obedience to Government, that there is no defensive union among them. Does he mean to insinuate that the people of this country feel a want of affection and respect for the best of Sovereigns. What proofs will he bring forward in support of this daring outrage? Had your Royal Highness an opportunity of hearing unobserved, their effusions of unadulterated attachment to their King, you would be better able to appreciate the character and views of their detractors. There is not a dreadful or accomplished quality of the great, which is lost on them. But it were to be sincerely regretted, if they had the misfortune to suppose that rank and station, without virtue and merit, will obtain their respect. It is happy for the great, for us, and for us all, that the feelings of the people in this respect are unadulterated. This just discrimination will be a surer resource in the moment of danger, than our standing armies or our militia. You may therefore rely on the word of a man, who is as superior to adulation, as he is to calumny, that every virtue and useful accomplishment your Royal Highness possesses, will be done justice to by a British public; but without those qualities no adventitious circumstance of birth or fortune will have any influence on their affections. Behold their enthusiastic veneration for Nelson, Pitt, Chatham, Abercromby, &c. &c. and you will turn away with indignation from the vile calumniators of a public, who know to appreciate real merit and virtue.

We have no intention of discussing in this Letter the great question relative to the competency or incompetency of your Royal Highness for the command of our Expeditions. But we have reason to suppose you possess that liberality and knowledge of the principles of a free Constitution, as to find neither matter of surprise nor offence in this freedom of discussion. We are not unaware, however, that some have manifested indiscretion, illiberality, and intemperance on the subject. We as sincerely condemn these effusions of malevolence or unreflecting zeal, as your Royal Highness will despise them. But our rights, our liberties, our preponderance, our existence as a community, and the interests of our Sovereign and Family, are so closely connected with this nomination, that it would be an alarming symptom of approaching ruin, were the public indifferent to this choice. As a candidate for public honours, you must expect to have your claims freely and fully discussed. What pleasure would it afford to a generous mind to hear he owed his exaltation, not to merit and services, but to the degrading advantage of birth and protection. Whatever detractors may allege, we have that opinion of your high sense of honour, that you would disdain any promotion you did not owe to the honourable way of competition. The career of preferment is open to every citizen in a free country; and where there is most genius, experience and personal worth, there the preference ought to be given. It is this freedom of competition which raised Rome to universal empire; which created so many heroes and statesmen in the small States of Greece, and as soon as it ceases among us, our country descends from her present height, to move in the degraded situation of a vassal State.

This detestable writer, who is well acquainted with this circumstance, and would, perhaps, find matter of exultation in the degradation and ruin of his country, has the infamy to insinuate that the present Ministry have been guilty of injustice, and feel a kind of jealousy and prejudice against your Royal Highness. But he honours Mr. Canning, in particular, with a principal share of his malignity. He knows too well what a loss the secession of so distinguished a member would be to the country in the present crisis; nor does he forget what a vast preponderance his splendid eloquence, his knowledge, his reputation of integrity and disinterestedness would throw into the scale of another party. This is the secret of his clumsy accusation. Because this distinguished Statesman does not neglect the important duties of his office, in order to refute the malevolent charges of every petty writer in our papers, he is, therefore, guilty of injustice towards your Royal Highness, and unqualified for the station he fills. We will willingly acquit you Royal Highness of countenancing so insane an opinion. The Ministry deserve the gratitude of their country for examining minutely the merits of every competitor. On them the responsibility falls. And their integrity in this respect proves them worthy of the confidence of the public, and entitles them to your utmost esteem and support. Men, who would be capable of overlooking the son of their Sovereign, when they can find a more distinguished officer, and when the magnitude of the service calls for this impartiality, would not lose in the estimation of a British public, were they, in consequence of it, exposed to your disapprobation. We speak with this degree of candour to your Royal Highness, because we coincide so far with this pitiful Declaimer, that flattery must be unwelcome to a mind which pretends to soar above the vulgar level.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GOTTENBURGH, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, AUG. 5.—The Official Journal contains the following articles:—

"The Publiciste, of the 20th July asserts, on the authority of Foreign Journals, that the Austrian troops were to evacuate Trieste and Fiume, and that both these places were to be occupied by the troops of a great power. This intelligence is false, and owes its origin to disaffected persons, who wish to create disturbance, to exasperate a great power, and to impel her to her own ruin, by inducing her to adopt a perverse system of policy. The French Journals ought to be more circumspect, and not circulate any absurd and ridiculous rumours merely on the authority of Foreign Papers.

"The Journal de l'Empire says, that the Arch-Chancellor was to proceed to Germany to organize the troops of the Confederacy of the Rhine, thus involving the French Government in a misunderstanding with the allied States. Justice requires us to remark, that this journal says the intelligence was circulated in Germany; but persons of judgment will observe, that reports translated from Foreign Journals into the French Papers acquire greater credit, and that the only object of such reports must be to excite envy and hatred against France.

"Other Journals state, that there are affairs of great importance in discussion between the Courts of Vienna and Paris. This is false. We have nothing to settle with the Court of Vienna. If that Court is well directed, it will apply itself to heal its wounds, to recruit its finances by wise measures; and it must be sensible that a levy-en-masse is always destructive to a Government, and particularly to a Government which has nothing but a paper currency.

"It is reported that American vessels laden with colonial produce have entered the Austrian ports under convoy of some English frigates. This is true; for under all circumstances, smugglers have found means to frustrate the vigilance of the Constituted Authorities; but the Court of Vienna has taken measures to put an end to this violation of the laws, and to carry into execution the regulations which itself established on the breaking off of all commercial intercourse with England.

"Other Journals talk of the expeditions which the English have sent to Sweden, consisting of 20,000 men, who were to be landed there in the mouth of April. The season is now drawing to a close, and they have not yet thought of disembarking them. The truth is, that General Moore has 8000 men, half English, half Germans, who have been for a month lying off Malmoe. During this period, the Swedish frontiers have been attacked by the Danish army in Norway, and the Swedish troops have been every where defeated. Finland has been taken from them by the Russians, who, whatever may have been said, have not for a moment ceased to obtain the most brilliant advantages. Most certainly, it is not 8000 men that the English ought to send to support their ally. It ought to have been 50,000 men, provided they had them to send. But, in short, the 8000 men have been landed in Norway; they have joined the Swedish Expedition which attempted a landing at Abo, and were completely defeated by the Russians, or perhaps they have been landed in the North of Finland. It is unprecedented, that the army of an Ally should remain two months upon a coast without disembarking, and wait the result of a campaign. Such things happen to the English, and could happen to none but them.

"The Journal de l'Empire, the abovementioned paper, of the 20th July, says that the Pacha of Widdin has had an engagement with the Grand Vizir, and that from three to four thousand men were killed on both sides, and that the latter was defeated. How can men repeat such idle stories? It is in vain for the Journal to say that he has copied this from the Bayreuth paper, a paper of no credit, which has for several years been conducted at the pleasure of the Agents of England, and edited by men destitute of knowledge, understanding, and morality. The Grand Vizir has not left Adrianople. The Pacha Widdin consequently never was in a situation to have an engagement with him, nor have they had any misunderstanding.

"The Bayreuth Courant, however, is henceforth suppressed; it is a lying trumpet, which shall no longer excite disturbance on the Continent. It is to be wished that the journalists may take warning from this salutary example. The mercantile classes, the peaceful citizens, and the upright tradesmen, are entitled to demand justice against that band of intriguers who are disposed to pervert truth, and always to promote disturbance."

AUG. 16.—On the 14th, at four o'clock in the afternoon, their Majesties the Emperor and Empress arrived at St. Cloud, in good health.

At five o'clock, all the Theatres were opened for the free admission of the public; and at six, the anniversary of the Emperor's birth-day was announced by several discharges of artillery.

It is reported that the Court, after passing a few days at St. Cloud, will proceed to Fontainbleau.

ITALY.

VERONA, JULY 22.—The Senator, Lucien Bonaparte, passed through Modena in the night of the 14th, on his way from Florence. He preserved the strictest incognito. It was generally supposed he was proceeding to France.

NAPLES, AUG. 1.—The impatience of the Neapolitan people is satisfied. They are now informed of the name of the Prince to whom his Majesty the Emperor Napoleon has committed the charge of rendering us happy. It is the Grand Duke of Berg, the brother-in-law and companion in the field of his Majesty. The following Documents on this important subject were yesterday communicated to the Council of State, who had an extraordinary meeting for this purpose:—

ROYAL DECREE.

Joachim Napoleon, King of the Two Sicilies, having heard the Report of our Minister for Foreign Affairs, has decreed as follows:—

ART. I.—The title we assume on ascending the Throne of the Two Sicilies is the following:—Joachim Napoleon, by the grace of God and the Constitution of the State, King of the Two Sicilies, and Grand Admiral of the Empire.

II.—The present Decree shall be inserted in the Bulletin of the Laws, and communicated to all the Departments of the State.

III.—Our Minister for Foreign Affairs, and our other Ministers, are charged, each in his own department, with the execution of the present Decree.

(Signed) JOACHIM NAPOLEON.

Given at Bayonne, July 20.

PROCLAMATION.

Joachim Napoleon, by the grace of God and the Constitution, King of the Two Sicilies, Grand Admiral of the Empire, to the People of the Two Sicilies:—

"His Majesty the August Emperor of the French, our dear and beloved brother-in-law, having ceded to us, conformably to the designs of Divine Providence, the Crown of the Two Sicilies, it affords us extreme satisfaction to find ourselves called to govern a people possessing the happy disposition proper to acquire that ancient glory which illustrated their ancestors, and perpetuated their name in our days.

"All our efforts, our constant study, shall be directed to excite this enthusiasm, upon which depend the grandeur and prosperity of the country and our crown. The first duty which we impose upon ourselves is to manifest to Europe, under all circumstances, the gratitude by which we are bound to the August Emperor Napoleon, and to impress upon our people all the advantages which must result to them from the close union of their interests with those of the great French empire.

"The Constitution proclaimed by our august Predecessor, and guaranteed by his Majesty the Emperor, having been solemnly accepted by us, shall be inviolably observed, and shall form the basis of our Government.

"And as we find pleasure in following the steps of a Sovereign who has made our people happy, we confirm in all the military, civil, and political employments of the State, the persons by whom they are at present filled, and ordain that each of our subjects shall continue to enjoy the rank and pay received until this day, and exercise the functions with which he is invested.

"It is our wish to appear soon in the midst of you, with the Queen Caroline, our august spouse, with the Prince Royal Achiles Napoleon, and our young family, whom we shall have pleasure in entrusting to your love and fidelity. They will begin from this moment to imbibe the sentiments which should attach them to the country, and to learn the duties which they will have to fulfil in contributing to the glory and happiness of the kingdom. For our part, we make no doubt that all the Ministers and Officers of the State will zealously endeavour strictly perform their duty, each in his particular province, in order that our people may be assured of that happiness which is their due. All our subjects may rely on our good will and attachment.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, JULY 23.—The greatest exertions are made here in organising the militia, and exercising them to the use of arms; and the Archduke John has signified to the inhabitants of Trieste, that though they are free from the conscription, it is their duty to do all in their power for the safety of their country, and to promote the salutary views of their sovereign. This has had so good an effect, that the merchants have not only raised many men, but have subscribed considerable sums of money. The same prince has likewise, by his presence, appeased a trifling disturbance which took place on account of the protest made against the American ships which attempted to unload their cargoes.

JULY 30.—It has been notified, by a proclamation, that the enrolment for the land militia among the subjects of Lower Austria is finally completed, more than the appointed number having been already raised by the voluntary zeal of all ranks of the people. The general amount of this levy, exclusive of Hungary, and taking only the German hereditary states into account, is calculated at considerably more than 200,000 men.

The town of Oedenburgh has been almost totally destroyed, by a fire which broke out there.

An order has been issued in the course of this month, in which it is directed, that as a general embargo has been imposed in the United States, in consequence of which no vessel can sail from thence, no ship under the American flag shall be admitted into any of the Austrian ports.

GRATZ, JULY 18.—On the Archduke John's arrival at Clagenfurth, the States of Carinthia, and on his arrival here, the States of Stiria, made an offer of all the arms in their magazines for the use of the land militia. The same spirit of patriotism and loyalty has also been manifested in the Low Countries. Every where well-appointed companies, and in many districts whole battalions, assemble to learn the use of arms. In many places there has been no ballot, the requisite quotas having been completed by voluntary offers of service. The 1st battalion of the Gratz militia is entirely composed of the inhabitants of the town and suburbs. It consists of eight companies, among which are two companies of students. The strength of the corps is 1404, of which 70 are balloted men, and 1334 volunteers.

FRANKFORT, JULY 26.—Letters from Mentz state, that the repairing and strengthening the fortifications of that place have been resumed with great activity. A number of masons have gone from this city to assist in taking down a considerable number of houses. Last week an advertisement from the French Commissary at War at Mentz was circulated in the Jews quarter here, soliciting supplies of linen and rags for the use of the field-hospitals. Several thousands of labourers are employed in finishing the fortress of Cassel opposite to Mentz.

Several hundreds of Frenchmen are daily employed in the suburb of Praga, on the other side of the Vistula, in constructing fortifications and throwing up entrenchments. That suburb now puts on the appearance of a strong fortress.

AUG 2.—A considerable number of troops are expected to march through this city in the course of the present month.—Eight thousand Poles are passing through from the army in the North of Europe for France; and 12,000 conscripts are marching in this direction from that country, to join the French army in Germany. Among the troops of the neighbouring Princes of the League of the Rhine, various movements are observed, the ultimate object of which is hitherto unknown. We particularly allude to the troops of Bavaria, Wirtemberg, and Baden.

AUG. 12.—From Prussia we learn, that, on the 29th July, two regiments belonging to Marshal Soult's corps arrived at Berlin from Pomerania, and continued their march, without halting, towards Wesel. Several of the regiments encamped near Berlin have unexpectedly received orders to march to the Rhine.

From Silesia we are informed, that the French troops in that province have formed two camps; one in the environs of Breslau, and the other near Brieg.

Letters from Rome, of the 30th ult. state, that the Spanish cavalry and grenadier regiments of life-guards had arrived there, and that they had been reviewed by General Miollis.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, AUG. 2.—The conscription completing the army goes on briskly in Bavaria. The number wanted at present, over the whole kingdom, does not much exceed 8000 men.

Marshal Ney's Corps, we are assured, is expected at Plauen. Numerous bodies of troops are assembling in the South and East. Several corps have received orders to assist in making cartridges in the powder magazines nearest their quarters.

The Imperial Austrian Ambassador at the Court of Holland, Baron Von Felz, passed through Frankfort on the 1st inst. on his way to Vienna, which he has obtained permission to visit on family affairs.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, AUG. 12.—We have no news here, but various reports which sometimes reach us from the Baltic, of the preparations of Austria for a war with France, &c. We have just received private accounts that there has been an action between the Swedish and Russian flotillas, in which the Swedes have suffered considerably, but no particulars have reached us. It is reported that the Swedish Admiral was killed in the action.

STOCKHOLM, AUG. 6.—According to the last intelligence from our army in Finland, the victory lately obtained over the Russians near Lappo, has been productive of the most important results; the enemy having been necessitated, in consequence thereof, not only to quit Landulax, but also the strong position near Salmo. The head-quarters of Field-Marshal Count Klingspor were, on the 25th of last month, at Lappo, and our advanced posts occupied at that time Knortane and Tistijocki.

SPANISH OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF BAYLEN.

The Camp Marshal Don Theodore Reding, has sent the following communication, under date of the 22d inst. to His Excellency Don F. X. Castanos, Commander in Chief of the Army of Andalusia:—

MOST EXCELLENT SIR,

Subsequently to the dispatch which I had the honour to transmit to your Excellency, on the 17th inst. relative to the attack made by the division under my command, on that of Gen. Gobert, (killed in the action,) which was dislodged from all the positions it had occupied, as far as the proximity of Baylen, and completely defeated, and to the motives which had induced me to fall back on Menjibar, I repassed on the evening of the same day the river of Guadalquivir, and took a position on that night, in which I was joined next morning on the 18th by the second division under the command of the Camp-Marshal the Marquis de Compigny. We jointly broke up for that city, with a view to attack the enemy if he occupied it.

Immediately on my arrival, in compliance with your Excellency's orders I disposed the columns of attack with a direction to Andujar; but at three o'clock in the morning of the 19th, and when our troops were forming for the march, General Dupont, with his army, attacked our camps, and opened a fire with his artillery, in the hopes undoubtedly of taken us by surprize; but with the celerity of lightning, the troops of the different divisions, led on by their intrepid Chiefs, repaired to all the points of attack, assisted by artillery; the shock was so vehement, that the first company of horse, and also of foot, suffered greatly from the enemy. At the break of day our troops were already in possession of the heights, which they had occupied before, and the enemy attempted his attack on various parts of the line, having the advantage of forming his columns under the cover of our fire, by the superior position he occupied, under protection of his artillery.

He has been driven from all points, and even pursued in defiance of all his vigorous attacks, which he reiterated without any farther interruption than what arose from occasional recession and the formation of new columns, until half-past twelve o'clock of the day, when overcome by fatigue, without having been able to gain ground, although he had at intervals broke our lines of defence with the courage peculiar to troops so accustomed to vanquish, and even arrived at our batteries, which were served on this day in a manner that astonished and terrified the enemy, and of which there are few parallel instances, as they not only instantaneously dismounted his whole artillery, but annihilated every column in measure as they presented themselves, still protecting the points attacked and varying its positions according to the exigency of circumstances.

The last attack was made by Gen. Dupont, who with the other Generals, placed himself at the head of the columns, under the fire of the artillery, and was sustained with a firmness truly admirable, but with no better success; he had fourteen guns dismounted, two thousand men killed, and a vast number wounded, among whom are General Dupont himself, with two other Generals.

Under such circumstances General Dupont begged to capitulate. Hostilities were accordingly suspended in both armies, and it was stipulated that each should maintain its respective position. The fruits of the valour and perseverance of the generous troops that compose these two divisions, are the total rout of the enemy, the army of Dupont being made prisoners, and that of Wedel being subjected to the same fate, without any other distinction than that of the latter receiving their arms at the time of their embarkation only, for having taken position against military law, during the suspension of arms conceded to him and to his Commander in Chief.

The Camp-Marshal Marquis de Compigny, Chief of the second division, has not only, in concert with me in the direction of the movements of this day, contributed to their successful termination, but having selected the corps of which I have made mention, he led them in person to the hottest points of the three general attacks, and secured by his judgment and gallant example the said happy result.

Brigadier General Don Francisco Reneval, Chief of the van of my division, placed on my right wing, disposed with skill, and much presence of mind, the proper corps and artillery on all the points attacked by the enemy, and ably contributed to repel him in all his partial successive attacks, as well as in the last general and obstinate one, by which he attempted to turn the said wing, at the same time that he was attacking the center.

PROVINCIALS.

The following singular act of heroism has been communicated to us as a fact, on the authenticity of which our readers may rely:—While Mr. Turner, now resident at Kildwick in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was in India, in the Company's service, he and five of his comrades in arms, when tracing one of the extensive wilds in that country, were menaced with an attack from a Royal Bengal Tyger. The animal was making towards them with full speed, and his companions, intimidated by the ferocious aspect of the enemy, sought their safety in flight, and in order to disencumber themselves from every thing that might retard their escape, left their muskets on the field. In the midst of this general panic, Mr. Turner stood undismayed, and before the animal reached him, had discharged his musket and lodged several shots in his body. Rendered furious by the torture, the tyger now came to close quarters, when the intrepid soldier received him with a fixed bayonet, which by some accident came from the muzzle of the firelock, and lodged in the animal's body. The tyger's eyes flashed fire and making a second spring at his adversary, seized him by the loins, and had it not been for his cartouch box and side arms, which broke the force of the ravenous gripe, certain death must have ensued. In this dreadful dilemma, vibrating as it were betwixt life and death, Mr. Turner had the good fortune to fix his hands in one of the wounds of his furious assailant, and by a preternatural effort of strength derived from his perilous situation, tore open the wound and laid his enemy lifeless at his feet. From this daring and heroic action he obtained the name of the Man-tyger, and the East India Company settled a pension him a pension for life.

Last week an Inquest was taken on the body of an Officer of the King's German Legion, which was found in a ditch, at Fratton, near Portsmouth, on Sunday se'nnight in a putrescent state, with a razor in the hand. It is supposed that he had lain there three weeks. There was nothing but the skeleton of his head remaining, the birds having eaten the flesh off from every part of his body that was uncloathed. It appeared, however, on the testimony of an Officer of the German Legion Artillery, that the unfortunate man's name was Augustus Slothen, a Lieutenant in the second battalion of the King's German Legion; he arrived at Spithead in the expedition from Gottenburgh, on the 20th ult. came on shore immediately afterwards, and had been missing ever since. He had long been in a low melancholy way, and there is no doubt but he cut his throat. There was nothing found about him but a silver watch, which was of little value. Coroner's verdict—Lunacy.

On Thursday se'nnight, a private of the First West York Regiment of Militia, was tried at Plymouth, by a Court Martial, and sentenced to receive 700 lashes, for maiming his own person, by having for several months past, after the surgeon had daily dressed a wound in the back of his hand, introduced some lead buttons with the shanks next the flesh under the plaister and bandage.

On Saturday last, a soldier belonging to the 3d Regiment of Guards, of the name of Thompson, was found hanging in a wood, near Street End, in the parish of Chatham. It is now a month since he absented himself from the regiment, and was generally supposed to have deserted. It appears that he had gone in search of his wife, who had left him, in consequence of some words between them, and not succeeding in finding her, formed the desperate resolution of putting a period to his life. He must have been hanging some time, as his body when found was in a most putrid state.

A melancholy accident occurred on Friday se'nnight, after the review at Wanstead Flat. A number of carriages were driving close together, and at a very fast rate, towards town; a man got up behind one, and on the coachman perceiving him, he whipped over the roof of the coach to drive him down; the man, in endeavouring to get down as quick as possible, fell, and the wheels of another carriage, which was close behind, went over his head before the post-boys could stop their horses. He died instantly, his skull being crushed to pieces.

Extraordinary Leap.—On Sunday, the 31st of July, as the Rev. C. Cook (tutor to the two sons of the Hon. H. Vernon, of Wentworth-house, Yorkshire) was riding an high-spirited hunter in the park, some of the deer crossed him, and caused the horse to run away with him. In vain his rider endeavoured to stop him; the beast ran at his fullest speed at the park (an iron) gate, which is 7 feet 9 high, and with very large spikes on the top; above the gate is a fine arch of Portland stone, and about three feet above the top of the spikes. The horse nevertheless endeavoured to cover the gate, but in the exertion broke the two cross bars of heavy massy iron, and by the shock wrenched the lower hinge from the post; by this means the gate hung obliquely, when frantic with the pain, to the surprise of every beholder, he directly staunch leaped the gate, and carried his rider over perfectly safe, who had some difficulty to stop him afterwards from running away. So great was the concussion, that the bone, from the forehead to the nose, was fractured completely into two parts. The horse struck his rider a most violent blow in his right eye, immediately before covering his leap, which has nearly deprived him of the sight of it. the horse is expected to recover.

LINCOLN ASSIZES.

SPECIAL JURY.—THE KING v. SHUTTLEWORTH.

This was an indictment to procure the removal of a nuisance at Gainsborough, alleged to be committed by the Defendant, in improperly carrying on the business of a soap-boiler, in a populous part of that town. The manufactory of the Defendant was stated to be in Cask-gate-lane, where not only the usual business of a soap-boiler was carried on, but pans had been erected for boiling the refuse or lees of the manufactory, and extracting from them, by steam, a sort of salt, by a process which produced to the neighbouring inhabitants, effects the most noisome and unwholesome that a tortured imagination could conceive.

Mr. Sergeant Vaughan, with great humour, detailed some of those effects: nothing, he said, that depended upon the natural principle of respiration for existence could endure the "abominable superlative sublimate of stench" with which the manufactory of the Defendant invaded all around it; a tallow-chandler's melting-house in dog-days was, in comparison, a nosegay to which any man who had breathed in the air infected with the odour of these steaming pans, would run five miles with distended nostrils to catch the fragrant gale. "But," said the learned Sergeant, "I need not look for evidence beyond the "enemy's camp that this is a nuisance of the foulest cast. My Learned Friend Mr. Balguy, jun. who has been prudently retained on the other side, would himself be a sufficient witness to establish my client's case. Being lately at Gainsboro', on a day when this abominable operation was carrying on at the soap manufactory, he sat down to a dinner at an inn a considerable distance off, but the horrid stench pursued him like a ghost, and not a morsal of meat could he eat. It was in vain the poor tortured inhabitants of Gainsboro' had new doors and new window-frames, made to fit with the utmost nicety, in the hope of keeping out the invasive mist and stench; without they would deprive themselves of the very principle of vitality it was no way to be eluded. To be sure there was some advantages which they enjoyed, in return, of a very peculiar cast—they were in possession of a compendious recipe for transmuting metals—thus if a person hung a silver watch to his bed's head at night, in the morning he was sure to find it changed to a gold one; and so with all the plate in the houses of those who resided within the range of this pestilence. Cask-gate-lane, since the Defendant had made it an emporium of his processes, had, as well as neighbouring streets, been a ruinous neighbourhood for any one in business. If the cabinet-maker exposed for sale furniture fresh from the hands of the workman, in a few days it assumed such a hue from the fog of the soap-manufactory, that every customer accosted the poor shopkeeper with—"Well, Mr. Cabinet-maker, for second-hand goods you of course ask a second-hand price!" The poor barber could no how entice a customer to him, notwithstanding he shaved at a proper reduction of price, in consideration that every one that walked down his street came with his chin ready soaped; but unless the operator held his customer so hard by the nose that the pain was intolerable, the latter was sure to fly from the maddening stench of the manufactory, and run ready-lathered, to a shop in some more felicitous district of the town.

The Learned Serjeant mentioned some other instances of the prejudicial effects of the nuisance; such as a boarding-school being shut up, meat rendered tainted, &c.

The Counsel for the Defendant agreed to submit to a condition which had been insisted upon as a preliminary to a reference, and the Defendant undertook to remove the evaporating pans within two months.—The other part of the alleged nuisance, the soap-manufactory itself, was left to be decided upon by arbitration.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 24.

Admiralty Office, Aug. 23.

Dispatches, of which the following are Copies, have been this day received at this Office from Rear-Admiral Keats, addressed to the Hon. William Wellesley Pole:—

Superb, off Sproe, in the Great Belt, Aug. 13, 1808.

SIR,—I have the honour herewith to transmit a copy of my Letters to Vice Admiral Sir James Saumarez, relative to the escape and embarkation of great part of the Spanish army serving in this part of Europe. An event produced, as well by the honour, patriotism, and talents of its distinguished Chief, as by the assistance and protection which I was directed by their Lordships orders to afford it.

If the weather proves moderate, I hope to disembark the greater part on the Island of Langeland this day, where we have already a post of 2,500 men.

I have the honour to be, &c.

To the Hon. W. W. Pole, &c. R. G. KEATS.

Superb, off Sproe, in the Great Belt, Aug. 11, 1808.

SIR,—I have the honour and satisfaction to inform you, that by an immediate and zealous pursuit of the measures recommended in the duplicate of instructions, received by the Musquito, on the 5th inst. his Excellency the Marquis de la Romana, and nearly 6000 of the Spanish troops under his command, were embarked this morning, at Nyborg, which place he took possesion of on the 9th. By a combination of the same plan, more than 1000 have joined us this morning, by sea, from jutland, and another 1000 are thrown into Langeland, to strengthen the post held by the Spanish forces in that island, where it is proposed to land the remainder the moment circumstances of weather will permit of our moving. The arrival of the Spanish officer in the Edgar, on the 5th, of whose spirited escape to the squadron you were informed by Captain Graves, greatly facilitated our means of communication. No doubt could be entertained of the honour and patriotism of soldiers, who, indignant at the proposal of deserting their allegiance, though surrounded by hostile battalions, planted their colours in the centre of a circle they formed, and swore on their knees to be faithful to their Country. All were equally anxious of returning to it. But one regiment in Jutland was too distant and too critically situated to effect its escape; and two in Zealand, after having fired on the French General Frision, who commanded them, and killed one of his Aid-de-Camps, have been disarmed.

Some untoward circumstances having occasioned suspicion, and made a premature execution of the plan necessary, the wind and current being adverse; I left the Superb on the 8th, and went in my barge to the Brunswick, off Nyborg, and two hours after my flag was hoisted. On the 9th the General took possession of the town. Although the Danish garrison yielded to circumstances, an armed brig of 18 guns, the Fama, and a cutter, the Salomon, of 12, moored across the harbour near the town, rejected all remonstrance on the part of the Danes, and every offer of security made by the General and myself. The reduction of these vessels being absolutely necessary, and the Spanish General being unwilling to act hostile against Denmark, such small vessels and boats as could be collected were put under the command of Capt. M'Namara, of the Edgar, who attacked and took them. On this occasion I have to lament the loss of Lieut. Harvey, an officer of much merit of the Superb, and two seamen wounded; the enemy had 7 killed and 13 wounded.—I should have noticed that the Spaniards, irritated at the opposition their friends who came to their support met with, departed in some measure from the General's intention, and fired some shot at them before they struck.

Expedition being deemed of the greatest importance, I shifted my flag to the Hound in the harbour; and as neither of the three ships of the line, from circumstances of the weather, could be brought near in, 57 sloops or doggers, found in the port, were fitted out by the seamen, into which great part of the artillery, baggage, and stores, were embarked that night and the following day and removed to the Point of Slypsharm, four miles from Nyborg, where the army was embarked safely, and without opposition, this morning, notwithstanding the very unfavorable state of the weather, and they are now under the protection of his Majesty's ships at the anchorage off the Island of Sproe. Some sacrifices of horses and stores were conceived necessary by the Generals; and as I considered it right under the peculiar circumstances, to enter into the views and wishes of the Marquis de la Romana, every unavoidable act of hostility was rigidly abstained from, for I did not consider it any to bring away the brig and cutter that rejected our offer of security, and forcibly opposed our entrance into the port; and I even undertook to liberate the vessels employed as transports, provided no interruption was made by any to the peaceable embarkation of our friends.

I should be unjust to the meritorious exertions of the officers and seamen employed on this short but fatiguing service, if I neglected to represent their merits on this occasion to you; Captain Graves's services were required afloat; Captain M'Namara, of the Edgar, undertook the equipment of the transports, with the embarkation of the stores; the embarkation of the troops was made under the direction of Captain Jackson of the Superb, and Captain Lockyer of the Hound; Captain Smith, of the Devastation, and Captain James, of the Kite, were indefatigable in their exertions in the various duties I assigned them. Many circumstances having combined to make an attack on the rear probable, great precaution was necessary. Such guns as could be brought against us were spiked, and the embarkation was covered and most effectually protected by the Minx gun-brig and the two prizes, and by the very judicious disposition of the gun-boats under the command of Capt. May, of the Royal Artillery, who volunteered, and whose services on this and other occasions were highly useful.

It is not easy to express the joy and satisfaction felt by every class of the army at this event; and no circumstance, I believe, could have afforded more pleasure to us all. One, the Regiment of Zamora, made a march of 18 Danish miles in 21 hours.

I transmit herewith for your further information, copies of such letters as I deemed it requisite to address to his Excellency the Marquis de la Romana, and the Governor of Nyborg, on this occasion. The replies to the former were verbal, through a confidential officer, and the latter were made personally.

I have the honour to be, &c. R. G. Keats.

Vice-Admiral Sir James Saumarez, &c. &c.

Note.—Since this letter was concluded, we entertain some hopes that part of the regiment in Jutland, we thought lost, has escaped to the post at Langeland, by the Western Channel.

Superb, off Langeland, Aug. 5.

Sirs,—I have the honour to inform you, that I have received from my Government the most positive instruction to endeavour to communicate with the Spanish Officers commanding the troops of that nation in the vicinity of my command, and to concert with them measures to secure their retreat from any place of embarkation which they may possess, and for placing them in a state of security until transports for their reception can be provided to convey them to Spain, for which, as well as the necessary provisions, measures have already been taken, and indeed of the arrival of them I am in hourly expectation. Until that period shall arrive, they are welcome to share in the accommodation and provisions of the ships under my command; but as that might not afford ample means at present, although I am in expectation of the Commander in Chief, I would suggest under the pressure of circumstances, the removal of the troops to some of the Islands in the Belt for their perfect security. But as a measure of this magnitude to the interests of the Spanish nation would necessarily require a concerted plan, lest by attention to partial interests the general one might suffer, I request an unreserved and confidential communication, either to the ships off Nyborg, that stationed off Langeland, or any of his Britannic Majesty's ships in the Belt, and through the bearer of this, or by any other means. I propose sending on Sunday, unless I should earlier receive some person on board, a flag of truce, under some pretext, to the Spanish post at Spoysberg, and if this should be safely received, I wish, in token of it, a small guard might parade in some conspicuous situation at noon to-morrow, near the English ship at anchor, or under sail near Spoysberg.

In my present situation it is impossible, ardently as I enter into the views of my Government and the Spanish nation, to attempt to lay down any fixed plan. My services, and that of every Englishman under my command, are devoted to the cause; but before measures can be adopted, we must communicate, agree on, and combine as far as it may be possible, the interests of the Spanish troops in Jutland and Zealand with those in Funen and Langeland. I shall keep a ship for some days off Spoysberg; and every ship under my command will be on the look-out to receive any boats that may approach them. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) R. G. Keats.

To the Officers of his Most Catholic Majesty's troops.

Superb, off Langeland, August 7.

Sir,—Understanding from the Spanish Officer that the accompanying paper* is the true state and situation of the Spanish troops in Denmark and its dependencies, the following, according to the various circumstances that present themselves to my view, appears to form a plan that promises the fairest prospect of success to ensure their security and ultimate embarkation.

Those in Zealand I would propose to force their way to the peninsula, of which Halskoo, near Corsoir, forms the projecting point towards Sproe. That Isthmus appears capable of being defended, or at least seems to afford the means of defence for a few days, till I could remove them to the Island of Sproe. Those at Frederisca, by seizing on vessels, might possibly force an embarkation, and unite with those on Funen, which might perhaps be favoured by some movements of the troops at Cadence. Separate, or united with those in Jutland, I apprehend those in Funen could secure themselves in the Presqu' Isle (Peninsula) which terminates near the Island of Romsoe, of which the Pass near Kurteminde appears to form the George, and I could, if necessary, remove them to Romsoe; it would greatly facilitate the necessary naval operations, and might enable me to send a ship of the line towards Frederisca to favour the troops in Jutland, if those in Langeland should be thought in security on that Island; if they should, the other troops might be landed at leisure on that Island, and the whole embarked from thence; but if the troops at present there, are incapable of maintaining themselves at that place, in that case I must leave a ship of the line and a sloop, which could at almost any time receive them on board, and convey them to any other place that might be approved of, till transports could be procured for their reception. My means (three ships of the line and half a dozen small vessels at most), are not, perhaps, sufficient to embrace all these objects at once; but the zeal and exertion of the Officers and ships companies would greatly diminish the difficulties, and I should be much aiding in lending assistance to the troops at Frederisca, if, as I have before said, those in Langeland should be considered capable of maintaining that post without any immediate support.

I am aware some sacrifices of horses, and perhaps cannon, might be necessary, and we must be prepared to encounter even unforeseen difficulties; naval arrangements and movements are ever dependent, in some degree, on weather; but I should hope to surmount them all. It would of course be right to drive in cattle, and take whatever provisions might be practicable with the troops, as it would not only save our present supply, which the victuallers, not having at this moment arrived, is rather scanty for the Spanish army, but would put me at ease on that score, provided any unavoidable delay should intervene and prevent my sending supplies to them on shore.

In my present uninformed state, I am not in a situation to judge how far it might be in the power of, or deemed preferable by the Spanish Commander to seize on Nyborg. It would secure the inactivity of the gun-boats in that port.—But such a measure might possibly involve the safety of the troops in Zealand and Jutland, by inducing the Danes to act hostilely, when otherwise they might be disposed to wink at, or make no serious efforts to impede the quiet removal of the Spanish troops.

But if the principles of this plan should be approved of and deemed feasible by those in command, I would recommend the movement to be general. That it be agreed to act upon it in all its parts the same day, except a discovery should take place, in which case each party should act immediately without hesitation. I acknowledge I should have little expectation of the success of any negociation for the peaceable removal of the troops. But a declaration immediately after the movement shall have commenced, of the peaceable and unoffending object in view, accompanied with a threat of retaliation in the event of any hostile opposition on the part of the Danes or French, might perhaps be found disadvantageous.

In stating the naval force at present under my command, it is right to observe, I am in expectation of more ships, and have been informed that a sufficient supply of provisions for all the Spanish troops is now on its passage to me.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) R. G. Keats.

To his Excellency the Marquis de la Romana, Commander in Chief of the Spanish Troops in Denmark.

N. B.—I have just heard that the expected supply of provisions is in part arrived, which obviates difficulties on my part.

Brunswick, August 9, 1808.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of this morning, and to congratulate you and the Spanish Nation on the firm and manly step you have taken on this important occasion. Circumstances of weather unavoidably prevent the arrival of two ships of the line, now in sight. I send Captain Greaves, of the Brunswick, informed of my ideas, to see what use can be made of the vessels at present in Nyborg.—In my present situation I can receive nearly 1500 men on board; and under all circumstances it appears to me the most advisable to convey the troops with all expedition to Langeland; and as it appears to be the opinion of your Aid-de-Camp that you will be in a situation to maintain that Island, to take post there till the arrival of transports to embark the army, I shall order seamen to man twenty of the smacks at present in the port, and more as the ships arrive. I apprehend the baggage and artillery had better be embarked in them, and moved out under my protection. Among the Spanish troops perhaps boatmen may be found: and I would suggest the propriety of the immediate establishment of a marine corps on the most extensive scale possible; and I request your Excellency to keep in mind the embarkation of water and provisions with the troops, in case present circumstances, is of consequence. I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) R. G. Keats.

Brunswick, off Nyborg, Aug. 9, 1808.

Sir,—His Excellency the Commander in Chief of the Spanish forces in Denmark, having deemed it expedient, under the present circumstances, to take possession of Nyborg, my duty naturally calls me to a co-operation with the troops of that nation, and a consequent frequent communication with the town of Nyborg. To place your Excellency as much at ease as possible respecting the line of conduct that may be adopted in the present event by the English Admiral commanding in the Belt, notwithstanding the hostility of this day, I have the honour to inform you, that I have given the strictest orders to all under my command, to observe towards the inhabitants of Nyborg the utmost civility; and it is my wish to abstain from every hostile and offensive act, so long as no hostile or offensive measures are pursued by the troops of Denmark or France against those of Spain: but if any opposition should be attempted either by the Danes or French to the peaceable and unoffending object in view, namely, the quiet embarkation of the Spanish troops, I shall certainly, though most reluctantly, take measures which, it is to be apprehended, might occasion the destruction of the town of Nyborg.—I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) R. G. Keats.

Hound, Nyborg Harbour, Aug. 10.

Sir,—It must be evident to your Excellency, that as my entrance into the harbour of Nyborg was hostilely opposed, I am bound by no absolute law or usage to abstain from hostilities, and to respect the property of the inhabitants. But although neither one nor the other could be better secured than by the word of a British Officer, still it must be evident to your Excellency, that under existing circumstances the Spanish General has occasion for several of the small craft in port, and that unless the masters and crews of them will lend their aid to equip and navigate their vessels, it may not be in my power to secure them from injury; but if they will, I pledge myself, after the service on which they are required (and which will be of short duration), shall have been ended, that I will not only use every means in my power to secure them from injury, but grant passports to them all to return in safety. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) R. G. Keats.

Superb, off Langeland, Aug. 13, 1808.

Sir,—I have detained the Euryalus a few hours, for the further satisfaction of assuring their Lordships, that the whole of the Spanish troops taken off by his Majesty's ships at Nyborg, will be landed in the course of this afternoon at Langeland.

A Convention has been entered into between his Excellency the Marquis de la Romana and the Governor of the Island, which, on one hand, enjoins abstinence from hostility, and, on the other, a sufficient supply of provisions, provided the Island, which is fertile, can produce it.—I am, Sir, &c.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Government has received the important intelligence that the Province of Biscay is in a state of complete insurrection against the French. If the bravery, the characteristic independant spirit of the Biscayans, the geographical position of the country, their inaccessible mountains, the circumstance of its commanding the principal roads leading from France to Spain and Portugal, and its hardy and numerous population be taken into consideration, it must be acknowledged that its influence on the result of the Spanish contest will be decisive. Whilst this account gives us the cheering conviction that every kind of provincial jealousy and prejudice has yielded to the abhorrence they feel in common with the mass of their countrymen, against the ruffian and his satellites, who aimed at their debasement and subjugation, it allows us to draw the satisfactory conclusion, that the force which the Tyrant still maintains in that country is small; that its danger is imminent, and that his means of reinforcement and subjugation, are much smaller than has been hitherto supposed, as his Generals have been obliged to withdraw a considerable part of the force, which kept that important Province in awe. Should the Expedition under Sir DAVID BAIRD, at Cork, joined with any of the Expeditions preparing at present in this country, be able to sail immediately for that Province: and should Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY succeed in reducing JUNOT, and, after that event, sail for the same destination, the fate of the greater part of the French force in Spain would be soon decided. Whilst the intrepid CASTANOS, the Arragonese, and the army under General BLAKE, are hastening to attack the remnant of the French armies collected in Old Castile, so powerful a diversion in their rear, seconded by the intrepid Biscayans, would render their retreat in the highest degree difficult, if not impracticable. In consequence of this important intelligence, we are now strongly inclined to believe that BONAPARTE will order his army to fall back into Navarre, probably as far as Pampeluna. Should the efforts of our Government in Biscay, be commensurate to the exigency of the service, we may expect that the whole peninsula, before the commencement of the rainy season, which is extremely violent in the Northern Provinces, will be scoured of the French. That loyal and magnanimous band which has so nobly declared for the sacred cause their country is engaged in, and which, through the well-concerted measures of our Government, has been liberated from Fuhnen and Jutland, would produce an incalculable effect, if landed in Biscay. We seize this opportunity, with all the heartfelt pleasure and sympathy of freemen, who know to appreciate every effort made in the divine cause of liberty, to bestow our tribute of admiration and applause on that small army of heroes, which, under their gallant and patriotic General, so nobly effected their deliverance from the tramels of the perfidious wretch, who had crimped them from their country. Thanks also, unfeigned thanks to the administration which assisted them in the generous work of deliverance, and without entering into a disgusting examination, whether this object was effected soon enough, we will abandon ourselves to the gratifying sensations we feel on its success. We will leave to The Times the gratification, if it can consider it as such, of vaunting the degree of merit it had in recommending this subject to the notice of Government. If we possessed the same degree of self-sufficiency, and had the selfishness, to see, in the contemplation of so pleasing an object, only a convenient source for the gratification of vanity, we could also lay our claims to the humble merit of having early suggested the expediency of the measure, and the means of putting it in execution. We will leave

The Times to this self-indulgence, and resume our subject. This insurrection of the Biscayans will now convince the most incredulous, that the military and financial resources of BONAPARTE are entirely incompetent for his plan of ambition and subjugation. Spain he cannot abandon, and his means are inadequate for its conquest. He will be, therefore, reduced to the fatal necessity of a defensive War on his own frontiers. What an effect this will have on the unfortunate and degraded people he now tyrannizes over, can scarce be appreciated, when they see their own country participating of the misery and devastation which his lawless ambition and perfidy have so profusely spread over other nations. These vile instruments of his rapacity, when they see armies of Spaniards rushing towards that very city where the Tyrant announced to some of their degenerate Grandees, his promise of extending to their country the blessings of his empire, will perhaps awake them from their shameful apathy. The keen sense of their misery and degradation was somewhat mollified by the victories of their countrymen on the Vistula, in Saxony and Moravia. They seemed to overlook, in this splendid series of conquests and successful battles, the misery they suffered from the usurpation of a stranger. But when they begin to suffer themselves, without even the miserable compensation of seeing the armies of their Tyrant victorious, they will feel in all its poignancy how deplorable their present situation is. Whilst the South-West of Europe presents this cheering prospect, the affairs of the North and the East portend as happy a change. Russia begins at last to rouse from her lethargy. Her conduct, since the peace of Tilsit, has been the most shameful and unjustifiable, we believe, a powerful nation had been ever guilty of. But could she still continue, after the outrage offered to the Royal Family of Spain, to pursue the same disgraceful system of politics, her government would have been the most worthless and imbecile that ever dishonoured a nation. Every account from the continent corroborates the intelligence of the Emperor ALEXANDER having bestowed the most unqualified disapprobation on the Corsican's perfidy. All these accounts coincide, at the same time, in stating that the harmony existing between the Courts of Vienna and Petersburgh has been never greater. A considerable Russian army has assembled in Poland; and, it is universally believed on the Continent,—will co-operate with Austria, for the purpose of liberating Germany from the oppression of the French. The strong works the French are throwing up in the suburbs of Warsaw, give a great appearance of probability to this rumour. The greater part of the Prussian territory has been already evacuated by them; and their soldiers are hastening in all directions towards the Austrian frontiers. The latter are not remiss in their exertions to repel the attack. Their army is stated to be much more numerous than it ever had been in any former period. Their Ambassador at the Hague has positively quitted Holland, and even stated that Count METTERNICH has been recalled from Paris. Though the latter report may be premature, there is every cause to expect this event daily. The Court of Vienna has lately given unequivocal proofs of a hostile spirit towards the French. Whilst it gave the Russian government permission to draw very considerable supplies of corn from Galicia, for the use of its army in Poland, not a bushel was allowed to pass the frontiers of Bohemia for the use of the French in Silesia, though repeated applications had been made to that purpose. Another circumstance worthy of notice is the assembling of the main body of the French army from Silesia to Warsaw. There is every reason to believe that an attack on the Austrian provinces from that side is much more difficult than if it were made from the side of Bavaria; it would be worth while to examine the cause of this deviation from former wars against that state. By adopting this mode, they seem to have principally in view, to recruit their armies in Poland, to retain possession of Prussia, and thus prevent the Prussian Monarch from taking an efficacious part in the contest, but particularly on account of the great number of fortresses which may cover their retreat in case of discomfiture. Their former confidence then has considerably abated. In their present campaign, they appear to have adopted a system of operation which is far better qualified for a defensive than an offensive war. What was formerly most admired in BONAPARTE's operations was, his collecting his whole force into one great mass, and thus overwhelming the enemy by its irresistible weight. If that mode was admirable, why does he seem to abandon it at present? These different armies must have different Generals. He can himself only regulate the operations of one, at the considerable distance they remain from one another. None of his Generals at present in Italy, in Poland, or in Germany, has ever had any other but a secondary command, except MASSENA alone. DAVOUST is a distinguished officer, so is NEY; but they never yet had a separate and principal command of a numerous army. Why will BONAPARTE try the dangerous experiment at present? Is he afraid of risking his reputation in another general engagement? Or does he fear the genius and experience of the Archduke CHARLES, who commands the Austrian armies in Bohemia and Moravia? This departure from his usual mode of war gives matter for various speculation. His confidence, his audacity, his promptitude, seem to abandon him, with his fortune, at the other side of the Pyrenees. That his difficulties are great, and much greater than was hitherto supposed, may, however, be fairly presumed; and his own arrangements prove, that he looks to a very tedious contest. We must also give him a prospect of employment in Hanover and in Italy. Could Denmark be retrieved from her infatuation, and prevailed on to return to her former lucrative neutrality, which would soon heal all her wounds, BONAPARTE would be obliged to keep near 60,000 men for the defence of the country lying between the Elbe and Rhine; but as long as Denmark retains her hostile spirit, he can withdraw the greater part of his troops from that quarter, and confide a part of the service to the Danes. Her conduct, however, will be greatly regulated by that of Russia; and that the mission of Count MATTEROSA, on the part of the Spanish Patriots, to that Court, will be attended with the desired effect, we sincerely look to. The following Extract of a letter from Konigsberg will throw some light over the affairs of the North:

"An extraordinary activity has appeared at our little Court, since two weeks. Count MURVELDT has arrived here some days ago, on his way to Petersburgh, whither he is going as Extraordinary Ambassador from the Court of Vienna. He has every day conferences with the KING, which sometimes last several hours. The only Minister who is admitted on these occasions, is the Minister VON BOHM; who enjoys at present the greatest confidence of his MAJESTY. Prince DOLGOROUCKY arrived here the day before yesterday, and lodges in the Palace. He is said to be going to Dresden, and afterwards to Copenhagen. He was present yesterday at the conferences held in consequence of the arrival of Count MURVELDT. The Russian army is increasing considerably on our frontiers; and it is said to amount already to more than 60,000. Prince DOLGOROUCKY and the Austrian Ambassador have sent yesterday Couriers to their respective Governments. The several Regiments of our little army have made some movements within these ten days; and the whole is now collected between this place and Memel. This concentration of the remains of a powerful army, once the terror and admiration of Europe, now reduced to about 21,000, has been occasioned by an account our Government is said to have received, of a plan formed by Marshal DAVOUST to disarm a part of it. However, if he entertained such a project, it is now too late: they are out of his reach. Our distress here is every day increasing. Not a ship enters our harbour, in consequence of the severe vigilance of the French Consul. Our good KING, whom misfortune has rendered doubly dear to us, does every thing to alleviate the general misery. His table is not costlier than that of the simplest citizen: no more than three dishes are ever served up at his table for dinner. The QUEEN, by her condescension, her humanity, her fortitude, under these accumulated misfortunes, has gained every heart. She is seen to distribute provisions and raiment to the poor with her own hands. Our situation cannot be worse than it is at present; and if the alliance, said to be forming between our Court and those of Vienna and Petersburgh, be true, we have every thing to hope, and nothing to lose. Heaven send us better times!"

Extract of a letter from Vienna, dated July 30:—

Great preparations are making in Hungary for the approaching meeting of the Diet. Every where dispatches are appointed, and instructions drawn up, in order that they may only act conformably to them. The Chief of the Department of the Police, M. de Summerman, has resigned his employment, on account of the bad state of his health. The organization of the National Guard being completed in the German Provinces of the Austrian States, the exercises are about to begin. We are assured, but in a vague manner, it is true, that a part of the Austrian Cordon on the frontiers of Turkey have received orders to remove from the frontiers and approach the interior of Hungary.

We can state from undoubted authority, that Lucien Bonaparte has applied to the King of Sardinia, and to Mr. Hill, his Majesty's Envoy at Cagliari, for passports for himself and family to go to the United States of America. We hope Mr. Hill has acquiesced in his demand, without even waiting to consult our government. If he has refused, or our Government declined, to give him the requested passports, an irretrievable mistake has been committed. What an influence his example might have on a number of Frenchmen, who now enjoy the highest rank under the tyrant, and who will easily find causes of discontent in the decline of his fortunes. Their disappearance, if unknown, will be attributed to assassination, and consequently increase the abhorrence of the Usurper; but if the real cause of their emigration be made known to their friends by letter, they will not fail to mingle some reflections not very favourable to Bonaparte in these communications. We repeat it again, if his demand has been rejected, a most egregious blunder has been committed. Lucien detests his brother, and abhors his usurpation. He has been averse to all his acts of tyranny; and his steadfast and manly scorn of his threats and his promises should secure him the regard of honest men of every country.

A report is in circulation that a fishing smack had arrived at Mount's Bay, the Master of which reported his having spoken a King's cutter at sea, from Lisbon, charged with most important intelligence.

It was yesterday reported, upon the authority of a letter from Heligoland, that an insurrection of a very serious nature had broken out in Naples. We have not at present the means of ascertaining the truth or falsehood of this report, but it appears by no means improbable. The events which have happened in Spain, of course, are perfectly well known in Italy; and if Bonaparte should withdraw any large portion of his forces from that country, it is not unlikely that the inhabitants may make an effort to shake off his yoke.

Intelligence, we understand, has arrived at Harwich, importing that Sir James Saumarez had signified to the Danish Government, that unless the five thousand Spaniards, who have been prevented from joining their countrymen at Langeland, should be released, he should immediately bombard Copenhagen.

We received yesterday morning French and Dutch Papers; the former to the 17th, and the latter to the 20th inst. These Papers are more important for what they do not contain than for what they do. The Moniteur of the 16th, still preserves the most inflexible silence respecting the affairs of Spain. The Spanish Paper which is published at Paris, called L'Abeja Espanola, is not more communicative upon the subject. The silence of these Papers is the most decisive proof of the disastrous state of the French affairs in Spain.

The Supreme Junta of the kingdom of Gallicia have presented Lieutenant-Colonel Doyle with the rank of Brigadier-general, and the Captains Carrol and Kennedy with that of Lieutenant-colonels in the Spanish army.

Government have, we understand, dispatched a cutter to bring the gallant Marquis de la Romana to this country.

FORCE IN PORTUGAL UNDER JUNOT.—French Grenadiers (good troops) 6,000.—Brigade of Italians.—Brigade of Walloons (chiefly Germans), formerly in the Spanish service.—Hanoverian Legion.—Making in all about 17,000, including 2,000 cavalry.

FOX CHACE EXTRAORDINARY IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.—Monday between twelve and one o'clock, as some boys were amusing themselves gathering mushrooms on the North side St. James's Park, they started a fox, which ran with peculiar swiftness towards the Horse-guards; but by this time the word Fox was echoed in every direction, and the people were collected in such numbers, that they prevented it from getting through the railing. Reynard immediately turned tail, took to the canal, and swam a considerable way up, bidding defiance to his pursuers. At length, two recruits, expert swimmers, stripped and went after him; but they were in a short time distanced. Reynard, however, got tired of his watery excursion, and approached near the shore, when he was taken by Serjeant Lovid, of the 3d Regiment of Foot Guards, and carried to the Guard-house in triumph.

BREAD.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised half an assize, or 1d. in the peck loaf, to commence to-morrow; the quartern loaf of wheaten will then be sold for 12½d. and household 11d.

A new edition of a very old book has just been published at Paris: it is entitled, "Everlasting Prophecies, from the year 1521, to the end of the world." The author is Joseph Justo, of Naples. The Academy of Sciences, at Paris, is said to have transmitted this little work, of 54 pages, to the Minister Louvois; and, what is still more, to have found it invariably correct for the last one hundred and forty years. The most important prophecy relates to the year 1811. "It will be difficult to preserve the cattle through the severity of winter; from that year, a peace of a whole century will be enjoyed by Christendom; bread, wine, and clothing, will then be cheap."

POPULAR PREACHERS.
No. III.

" A LIVELY FAITH will bear aloft the mind,
" And leave the luggage of good works behind!"
DRYDEN.

WILLIAM HUNTINGDON, S. S. AND PASTOR OF PROVIDENCE-CHAPEL.

DOUBTLESS it is a strange transition, from having attempted to appreciate the merits of one of the most distinguished prelates of our national church, to proceed now to investigate the pretensions of one of the sturdiest preachers of sectarism. The respective feelings of the two characters are as opposed as their situations are dissentient. While one, honourable as is the sphere of his exertions, conspicuous as is the purity of his conduct, humbly and tremblingly implores the mercy of his Creator; the other, pernicious as is the tendency of his teaching, and problematical as may be the complexion of his character, confidently asserts his superiority in the scale of salvation, and glories in declaring himself above the possibility of spiritual reprobation!!—S. S., which, according to his own definition, purports Sinner Saved, announces the degree that he presumes to have attained in the school of christianity. I should not wonder, if the daring audacity of such a man urged him still further; if, with that monstrous immorality characteristic of the age in which we live, he shortly declared himself (giving to his theological diploma another interpretation) the Saviour of Sinners! There is no end to the perversity of the human mind, there are no bounds to the infatuation of the human heart; and ———" He that will be cheated to the last,

" Delusions, strong as Heli, shall bind him fast!"

Lord Verulam, adverting to Mahomet, makes some profound observations on those characters who are emulous of propagating any particular species of belief. He considers such persons as actuated by spiritual ambition; and labouring to acquire and consolidate a dominion over the minds of men, which (he justly asserts) is infinitely more flattering to the pride of its possessor, than any extent of power affecting their persons only. Writers and orators, philosophers and poets, legislators and politicians, have alike contended for the empire of intellect. It is, therefore, by no means difficult to conceive that so universal an incentive to excellence, so uniform in its operations, must mingle, however imperceptibly, with the purest passion for publicity. If it be not even the original stimulus to action, it will at least be engendered by success.

Few men, indeed, enjoy intellectual domination so considerably as the leaders of religious sects. Methodism is, in this respect, very closely allied to Popery. Like the priest, the preacher is every thing; he is the arbiter of families, and the controller of consciences. Secrets are open to his observation, and actions are determined, or annulled by his fiat. He must be more than mortal who is unaffected by such circumstances. How inefficacious are the efforts of external force, compared with this consentaneous subjection of the mind! These reflections obtrude themselves upon me, when I am considering the origin, the pretensions, the progress, the rapid success, and ultimate establishment, of the extraordinary individual whom I have selected as the subject of this paper.

I shall not stray, however, into the regions of contemporary biography. With many events in the life of WILLIAM HUNTINGDON I have, at present, no concern. The world has been his confessional; to which he has made known, with a frankness worthy of Rousseau, his various wickednesses. His admiring followers have, most devoutly, absolved him from all past obliquities; and he esteems himself freed, by an "imputed righteousness," from the effects of any subsequent transgressions. Admirable sinner! wonderful saint!—But, "Faith can remove mountains;" and he has a "Bank of Faith."

There are three characteristic causes, which strike me as having essentially contributed to the prosperity of Mr. Huntingdon. His EFFRONTERY, his VULGARITY, his SINGULARITY. I shall not particularly insist either on the ignorance or credulity of his disciples, though these also have conduced to his success: for, to borrow one more remark from my Lord Verulam, it is "a part of special "furtherance, to all such as have achieved great things, "when they have found matter disposed to receive form." This is an incontestible fact. Let the reader apply it.

When has the Effrontery of this individual been exceeded? Look at his history. Boasting, as it were, of the immorality and impiety of his early life, he suddenly assumes the garb of holiness, pretends to special providential interferences on his behalf, and in his minutest and most unworthy concerns; and, thus working on ignorance and credulity, partly indebted to the sottishness of men and partly to the weaknesses of women, he establishes himself as the infallible dictator of divinity. Him and his adherents are to be esteemed a chosen and immaculate people; while he openly arranges, and eternally anathematises, all who differ from his spiritual dogmas. When the leader of our present Arminians, the late Rev. John Wesley, died, it was then that William Huntingdon declared, from his pulpit in Providence-Chapel, that John Wesley was burning in Hell!

As to the Vulgarity of this Apostle of Antinomianism, it is impracticable to describe it adequately. He has eminently learned so to "condescend to those of low estate." Whether he is contemplated in the familiar intercourses of society, or in the exercise of his public functions; whether you attend him in the arrangement of his agricultural concerns at Ealing, or survey him employed in the pious, and still more profitable, offices of little Titchfield-street; meet with him and listen to him, when or where you may, he is the same, and always the same. He has lost nothing of the rudeness of his original blackness.

It is to his Singularity, however, that he seems principally to owe his celebrity; and, of course, much of his opulence. His career has been singular; many of his opinions are singular; his personal appearance is rather singular; his chapel is singular; his manner, as a preacher, is entirely singular; and his fate is also singular. Whatever be his defects, WILLIAM HUNTINGDON is a man of penetrative genius: he knows, perhaps as well as most men, the value of singularity. Nature has endowed him with considerable vigour and originality of mind, but he has, at the same time, wisely extended this originality to all he does. I shall chiefly dwell on his Style and Manner of Preaching.

Extemporary eloquence, I remarked in my last number, is most agreeable to the taste of the generality of hearers. The effects of this eloquence are instantaneous, and decisive. Deprived of the connectedness and solidity of studied elocution, it insinuates by its colloquial ease, interests by an appearance of ingenuousness and veracity, and animates by being susceptible of incidental illustration and adventitious aids. 'Till audiences become more extensively enlightened, or their instructors know how to blend the fruits of premeditation with the graces of delivery, it is probable that this species of oratory will always obtain the suffrages of the multitude.

Mr. Huntingdon not only excels in what is called public speaking, but his peculiarities likewise distinguish him from other preachers. With a bulky bible under his arm, in the old dissenting style, he enters his pulpit: his text once announced, the bible is then closed, and put aside, with as much method as it was first introduced. Here is one secret of Huntingdon's success. Whether it arise from due reverence to the Sacred Scriptures, from the undoubted necessity of being correct in quotations from them, or from anxiety to impress their congregations, by immediately referring them to chapter and verse, with the accuracy and propriety of such quotations, the clergy, of every denomination, consider it incumbent on them to give to biblical citations the sanction of authenticity, by grounding them either on transcribed or printed documents. Mr. Huntingdon, however, has all this at his "fingers' ends." Having laid on one side the volume of inspiration, and disdaining the trammels of transcription, he proceeds directly to his object; and, excepting incidental digressions, as—"Take care of your pockets!" "Wake that snoring sinner!"—"Silence that noisy mum-"skull!"—"Turn out that drunken dog!"—excepting such occasional digressions, which, like the episodes of poetry, must, when skilfully introduced, be understood to heighten the effect of the whole, our orator never deviates from the course in which he set out. He has other advantages over many of his pulpit competitors. Being of the metaphorical and allegorical school, as well as possessing his citations by rote, there is seldom to to be found the passage, from the Book of Genesis to the Revelation of St. John, that may not have, remotely or allusively, some connection with the subject immediately under his investigation. Hence the variety, as well as fertility, of his eloquence! Hence the novelty of his commentaries; his truly astonishing talent of reconciling texts, else undoubtedly incongruous; and of discovering dissimilarities, and asserting difficulties, where none were believed to exist!—"He who has ears to hear, let him hear *."

"What, preach without a Bible; and yet be able to re-"peat the Bible from beginning to end!"—Yes, this can be done, and it is done, by WILLIAM HUNTINGDON. The effect of this is still more surprising. There is, however, something imposing in such displays of superiority; and by those who are capable of estimating the bias of ordinary minds, consequences may easily be calculated. Add to this, the nature of his tenets and the confidence with which he maintains them, his manner, and his system of interpreting and applying the Sacred Scriptures, and his success, though enigmatical, is not inexplicable.

Such is WILLIAM HUNTINGDON, S. S. Lavater, where he alive to physiognomise this celebrated individual, especially with reference to the awful functions which he exercises, might, probably, discover some objections even to his countenance. To the character of an orator he has no legitimate pretensions. His style of preaching is that of talking; his discourses have all the air of story-telling. His intellectual acquirements are confessedly superficial. He owes his distinction to the absence of those qualities by which other men obtain reputation.

Still he is a man of genius; and, what to him has been infinitely more important, he is a son of Providence itself! It is the property of superior men to have either fate, or fortune, or a providence, on their side. Mr. Huntingdon has been happy in this respect; and his "Bank of Faith" has drawn pretty largely on the "Bank of England." With great natural endowments then, and greater supernatural assistance, what marvel that he has attained the eminence upon which he is now fixed; and whence, I doubt not, he looks down without emotion to the efforts of his assailants! Like many exalted personages, the destinies, it appears, are for him. There is no contending against destiny †. ONESIMUS.

Chapter Coffee-house, Pater-Noster-row.

* WILLIAM HUNTINGDON has his imitators. I perfectly recollect being present, not many years past, at a Baptist Meeting, where one of his Disciples in Divinity happened to hold forth. He chose, for the topic of his discourse, the circumstance of Christ riding on the Ass; but the Ass, as well as our Saviour, must have something typical through all ages of the Church. Take then this Preacher's account of them.—"THE "BELIEVER," said he, "IS THE ASS; FAITH IS THE SAD-"DLE; AND CHRIST RIDES HIM INTO THE HEAVENLY "JERUSALEM."—!!!

† While writing this sketch, I was considerably amused by accidentally taking up the Morning Chronicle of August 26th, 1808, where I find the following Extraordinary Matrimonial Paragraph.—"Married, on Wednesday, by Special Licence, the Rev. William Huntingdon, of Cricklewood, to Lady Saunderson (I suppose, Sun-)" &c. &c. Another providential interposition! The "Bank of Faith" is really inexhaustible: but, more of this hereafter.

 POPULAR PREACHERS, No. IV.—THE FOUNDLING, and its MINISTERS.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HIS MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, and was received by his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private levee, when Major-General Sir C. Green, had the honour of being presented, on his return from Malta.

His Majesty gave audience to the Cabinet Ministers present, and left town, for Windsor, about half-past four. His Majesty looked remarkably well.

On Tuesday all the fashionables round Woolwich, and the neighbouring parts of Kent were highly gratified by a ship launch. At an early hour, Lord Hood's barge was in waiting at Greenwich, and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, accompanied by the Lady in Waiting, and his Lordship, proceeded down the river to Woolwich, where they found the Trinity yatch moored off the dock-yard, for Her Royal Highness's reception. An immense crowd was assembled on the occasion, and two elegant booths were erected for the accommodation of the fashionables, who were very numerous, consisting of Sir Richard Bickerton, Sir Edward Hamilton, General Fraser, and with their Ladies and Families. Expectation stood for some time on tiptoe, when at length the wished for signal was given, and at twenty minutes before three, the gallant ship glided off in a capital style, into that element which she is to command. She is a 74, of the largest class, and christened the Blake, in remembrance of the gallant Admiral of that name, whose patriotism induced him to support the honour of the British Flag, even under the Protector, though his loyalty induced him to assist in putting an end to the usurpation, and in the restoration of his lawful Monarch. The figure head is a bust of the Admiral, decorated with a laurel wreath, and all the embellishments are in a style of the choicest elegance.

Egham Races began and closed in the past week, and though they did not produce much sport, have been attended with circumstances which will employ all the ingenuity of the Jockey Club to settle. On Tuesday her Majesty and the Princesses honoured the race-ground with their presence as usual, and were received on their arrival by the Stewards, the Dukes of York and Clarence. A platform was erected for their reception, close to the winning post, and a handsome marquee was pitched for the convenience of refreshment for the Royal Party. The Noblemen's and Gentlemen's Plate was won by Lord Barrymore's Pavillion, both heats in a canter. There was some contest for the Subscription Plate, five horses being placed; it was won by Canopus, against whom the odds had been not quite 2 to 1. The best race of the day, however, was for the Surry Stakes, won by Mr. Durands brown colt. The odds were 6 to 4 on the field against him, but he won it easy. Much laughter was excited by a hack race, which closed the sports of the day; 'twas run by horses belonging to the Officers of the 9th dragoons, but three of them were distanced, and the fourth previous to his arrival at the winning post, entertained the company with his knowledge of military manœuvres, going through all Dundas's evolutions without book.

On Thursday the knowing ones were completely on the wrong side of the post, in a dashing Sweepstakes, in which six horses were placed. Jocasta was next to the favourite before starting, the odds being only 5 to 2 against her, though she came in last, and the race was won by Lord Egremont's chesnut filly. The races closed with the Egham and Staines handicap, which remains yet for the investigation of the Jockey Club; before starting there was much betting, and the odds were great, 5 to 4 on Brighton Lass, 2 to 1 on Pavillion, and 5 to 1 on Rumbo and Jump-off, yet Rumbo was the winner, for all the horses having taken the wrong side at the turn into the strait mile, Brighton Lass and Jump-off ran in, but the others having returned and gone round the post, the two former of course were distanced, and Rumbo was declared the winner of the first heat. The betting now on the field, against Rumbo, were only 2 to 1, for the second heat, which he won easily. The bets have been paid, subject to a future investigation; but the losers insist that a post was down, and therefore that the first heat under all circumstances ought to have been run over again. Her Majesty enlivened the course every day with her presence, attended by the Princesses, and was much amused with the sport; it has been rumoured, however, that these races will be discontinued, and that the different matches in future will be run at Ascot.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Brest fleet attempted to escape from that port a few days ago. It stood out some distance from the land, but observing our squadron bearing down, it made immediately for the outer road again. One of the frigates belonging to it got on a rock, and was destroyed by the Minerva. The crew had previously quitted her. We have been favoured with the following extract of a letter on this subject:—

"Off Brest, Aug. 19, 1808.

"I hasten to inform you, that unfortunately the French squadron, so long cooped up in this port, has had a fortunate escape. One of our look-out frigates descried the enemy at sea, consisting of four sail of the line, four frigates, and six gun-brigs.—Every heart beat with transport at the sight, and we saw, or thought we saw, another laurel decorating the brows of our gallant Commander, Admiral Duckworth, who was leading up his fleet to the attack, in a most admirable style. Oh that we had been at hand, or they had been further out at sea! I suppose we were discovered from the telegraphs ashore; for, after some signals passing to the enemy, he suddenly tacked about and made the best of his way to the harbour, which they all reached in safety, except a frigate, who, in her hurry, touched the ground, and was so complaisant as to wait the arrival of the Minerva, who had orders to blow her up, which service was done in a seaman-like manner. About two o'clock we heard the explosion, which was terrible."

DEAL, AUG. 25.—Came in from a cruize off Flushing, the squadron under the command of Admiral Gardner, seven sail of the line, and remain in the Downs.—Twelve sail of transports sailed from the Downs this morning for the Nore, where, it is said, they are to be joined by several others, and to proceed immediately to the Baltic, to take on board the Spanish troops, to convey them to Spain.

CORONER'S INQUESTS.—Four Inquests were held before C. Jemmett, Esq. Coroner for Surrey. The first was held at Chertsey, on the body of Mr. Thomas Swaine. It appeared, that he was returning from Egham Races in company with another gentleman on horseback. Crossing a furrow in a field near his own residence, in Chertsey parish, Mr. Swaine's horse stumbled and threw him, by which he burst a blood vessel, which produced his speedy dissolution.—The verdict, of course, was Accidental Death. The second was held in Upper Kennington-lane, upon the body of Mr. William Grisbrook, a gentleman upwards of 60 years of age, who died suddenly on Wednesday morning last about nine or ten o'clock. The evidence of Mrs. Margaret Staff, a gardener's wife, and Mr. John Revans, a surgeon residing in the same place, went to prove, that as the deceased was taking his usual morning's walk, he was seized with a sudden illness, fell down, was lifted up by the former witness, assisted by an unknown gentleman, and brought into his own house where he died. According to the opinion of the professional gentleman, the cause of his death was apoplexy.—Verdict, Died by the Visitation of God. Another Inquest was held by the same Coroner, at the King's Head, in High-street, Lambeth, on the body of Richard Bennett, a boy about 10 years old, the son of poor people in St. Ann's-street, Westminster, who fell off the battlements of Westminster Bridge, on Wednesday evening. The misfortune was evidently occasioned by the boy's own imprudence, in having ventured into such a situation.—Verdict, Accidental Death. The other Inquisition was taken upon the body of a male child, name unknown, which was found near Cupet's Bridge, Lambeth, on Tuesday evening, between nine and ten o'clock, by a waterman of the name of John Hagley, as he was shoving off his boat from the causeway. It was proved by the surgeon who examined the body, that it was in the same state as live-born children usually are; and, in his opinion, it was not above 48 hours old. The head, arms, and upper part of the body were inclosed in a pillow case, at the bottom of which there was a string, with a stone at the end of about ten pounds weight.—Verdict, Wilful Murder by some person unknown.

A MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—Two respectable tradesmen, in the vicinity of Bayswater, went to Marlborough-street Police Office yesterday to make affidavit, that they suspected a reputable woman, the wife of a working tradesman at Bayswater, had been murdered, by poison having been administered to her. Their depositions went to state, that the woman in question, who was buried on Thursday last, was about to appeal to the Court of Chancery to recover some property she had been kept out of. One of the persons who gave in his deposition stated that he waited on the deceased a few days previous to her death, but it was not very convenient to settle the business at that time, and she appointed a future day, and added, that she did not know whether she should not be murdered previous to the appointed time. It appeared that she was dead in a few days, and her body was hideously swollen. There were several other facts in the depositions, which it would be improper at present to mention, as we understand the body will be taken up and examined by Surgeons.

The Royal Family and Ladies and Gentlemen of Distinction and Fashion, use Prince's Russia Oil, for moistening the hair when dressing, which is so great a nourisher to the hair, as to prevent it turning grey to all periods of life; promotes the growth, and making the hair grow thick and long; prevents its falling off; and restores it on bald places, if the least roots remain. Several Gentlemen that were bald, have declared, after using the Russia Oil regularly for three months, the bald places became nearly covered with hair.—Ladies and Gentlemen going to watering-places, ought not to neglect to use the Russia Oil, as it prevents the general ease of the water occasioning the hair to fall off or become shaded. Also Gentlemen should not omit applying it to the whiskers, to prevent them turning grey, which is too generally experienced on account of the constant wetting they receive from shaving; this fact is clearly proved, as the whiskers mostly change colour sooner than the hair on the head.—Promotes whiskers, eye-brows, &c. at 1s. per bottle, or a bottle containing four small, at one guinea. Sold wholesale and retail, by the Proprietor, A. Prince, No. 9, John-street, Oxford-street; and by most principal Perfumers or Medicine Venders in England, Ireland, and Scotland.—Caution.—As noxious counterfeits are selling in petty hair-dressers shops, and to deceive, have imitated the Russian Eagle on the show bills and covers, purchasers will therefore be particular in asking for Prince's Russia Oil, and observe the label on the outside wrapper of each bottle is signed in Russian gold ink—"Mochrikufsky and Prince;" any without that signature are counterfeits.

DEATHS.

Yesterday morning, at one o'clock, at his seat at Forthampton, near Tewkesbury, Gloucester, the Right Hon. Right Rev. Father in God the Lord Bishop of Ely.

Lately, at Pancker, in Holstein, the Prince of Hessenstein, in the 47th year of his age. The whole of his property, estimated at a million and a half of rix-dollars, is bequeathed to the Landgrave Charles, of Hesse Cassel.

Mrs. Warren, late Mrs. Merry, formerly Miss Brunton, eldest sister of the Countess Craven, at Alexandria in America.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-SIX.

RUSSIA.

This immense empire has apparently done nothing as yet to extricate itself from the disgraceful and impolitic engagements it was compelled to submit to after the battle of Friedland. The signature and ratification of the treaty of Tilsit were considered as the effects of a disastrous campaign, and imputed to imperious necessity. As soon as this necessity should cease to operate; as soon as the terror of the moment had subsided, and the army and finances were rendered adequate to the exigency of the occasion, it was fondly believed that the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh would resume its independence and former policy. But the powerful spell, which charmed Alexander during the conferences with the victor, has not lost its fatal influence; and the young, and once promising Sovereign continues to waste his armies, his resources, and his honour in unprincipled and flagitious efforts to rob his late Ally and Brother-in-law of one of the most considerable of his provinces. Whilst the Spanish people are giving a glorious and instructive example to Kings and Nations, how tyranny may be resisted, and perfidy punished;—whilst Austria is organising numerous armies, and arming her whole population, to recover her ancient independence;—whilst Great Britain continues to maintain her proud and eminent character of Protector of Nations;—the Russian Autocrat, the descendant of Czar Peter, and the Grandson of Catherine, is kept in the most ignominious bondage, in the midst of his capital, by a phalanx of French buffoons, musicians, harlequins, murderers and spies. Those vile and profligate emissaries of a Foreign Usurper besiege his palace, surround his throne, watch his minutest actions, and govern his vast dominions. Unfortunate Alexander! Is this the result of all the fond hopes and ardent expectations, which were entertained by the philanthropist and philosopher in the beginning of your reign?—Will you make no effort to disengage yourself from the ignominious leading strings of the murderer Caulincourt and the traitor Romanzow? Will not the voice of honour, the stimulus of national interest, the remembrance of your former glory, the keen sense of present dishonour, the shame and indignation of the honest and enlightened among your servants and subjects, be powerful enough to rouse you from your lethargy and degradation? Is every trace of Peter's creative genius, and of Catharines's comprehensive policy effaced, and a whole century of aggrandisement and amelioration frustrated? That imposing power, which menaced the crescent, dismembered Poland, intimidated Europe and Asia, whose Alliance was the great object of Frederick's policy, and Joseph's ambition, lies now prostrate and trembling at the feet of a Corsican Adventurer? There it stands the pyramidal edifice, in the midst of its deserts and forests, serving rather as a sepulchre to its Monarch, than a monument of national greatness. That very Sovereign, whose appearance in Berlin and Moravia was hailed by Austrians and Prussians as the sure signal of their safety, is now interred alive in that vast pyramid, which had been erecting, for more than a hundred years, by his glorious predecessors. Degrading and awful revolution! An empire, extending from the Vistula to the utmost extremity of the Eastern world, with forty millions of hardy population, with incalculable resources for offensive and defensive warfare, raised and consolidated by a succession of distinguished Monarchs, is reduced, in consequence of one unsuccessful campaign and a single treaty, to a vassal state of a Foreign Tyrant. Its vaunted institutions, its liberal encouragement to foreigners, and that celebrated Municipal Code which had been formed for their advantage and security, all the projects and establishments which had been so successfully adopted for civilizing the ignorant, half savage inhabitants, are abandoned; and their former contracted, barbarous restrictions, which kept them so long isolated from, and almost unknown to the rest of Europe, have been lately substituted for the comprehensive and liberal policy of Peter the Great.

This sudden degradation of that once powerful and ambitious state, has induced a number of political writers, in this and other countries, to form the rash conclusion, that the strength and resources of that empire were by no means equal to its reputation; that the Empress Catherine was not insensible to its real debility, and with great political sagacity avoided every kind of direct interference in the contest between France and the Continent; that she therefore very prudently confined her exertions to menaces and the war of diplomacy; but that her two immediate successors, by acting in opposition to her wisdom and foresight, had convinced Europe that this immense state was an unwieldly body, terrific only from its bulk, but possessing neither energy nor activity sufficient to be formidable to any other state but the degenerate Ottomans. Such is the important discovery which our profound journalists have made within these twelve months; a discovery which had escaped the penetration of the greatest statesmen of the foregoing century. They triumphantly produce the battles of Eylau, Friedland and Austerlitz, the defeats sustained in Switzerland, and her present inability to tear Finland from Sweden, as unquestionable proofs of the short-sightedness and political imbecility of Frederick the Great and his ministry—of the Empress Maria Theresa, her successor Joseph, and the celebrated Kaunitz. Our enlightened politicians, who find success a very convenient criterion of capacity, have also discovered of late, that the resources and power of Bonaparte are likewise much inferior to his reputation, and that the calculations and apprehensions of all the cabinets in Europe, for the last twenty years, were erroneous and extravagant. However those gentlemen, whatever opinion they may now entertain of the Continental Autocrat, after his ill-success in Spain, seem to have imbibed something of his conclusive method of reasoning, and to have benefitted much by an attentive observation of his political subterfuges. This wary politician likewise, whenever he was opposed by that state in his project of aggrandisement, very fortunately discovered that the power of Russia was a mere shadow, and he declared to Europe, immediately after the battle of Austerlitz, that it was far inferior to that of Austria, and even to that of Prussia. But Bonaparte has conducted himself with much greater inconsistency than our Journalists; for immediately after this declaration, he manifested no small degree of disappointment and rage that the treaty between d'Oubril and Talleyrand had not been ratified by the Emperor Alexander. This circumstance at least affords a strong surmise that his contemptuous opinion of the resources of that country was regulated by his interest at that time. He seems also to entertain a different idea at present; for the fulsome compliments which are paid Alexander in The Moniteur, are a literal translation of those which our Journalists so profusely heaped on him after the battle of Eylau. But their motives were different. These profound Statesmen were perfectly well acquainted with the weakness of that Sovereign's means, and only predicted his successful resistance to Gallic invaders, in order to encourage him to supernatural exertions. Happy country! which contains even in the obscurest of its political writers, Statesmen capable of foreseeing and regulating the destinies of nations.

The resources of the Russian empire are very great; and we risk nothing in advancing greater than those of any other state on the continent. Her population is extremely numerous, bold, inured to hardship, and accustomed to privation;—strongly tinctured with national vanity, extremely attached to their country, possessed of strong active bodies, and possessing uncommon docility and versatility of intellect; a proof of which is the no uncommon circumstance of Russian noblemen speaking the French, German, Italian, and sometimes English, with uncommon facility and elegance; and common Russians, who have travelled through the continent in the character of servants, have shewn still greater proficiency than their masters in this respect. It is astonishing what vivacity and alertness they display in their national amusements; and their fidelity to their engagements and attachment to their masters, are greater than is to be found in any other people. With such qualities, it would be absurd to deny they are qualified for war. It will be asked then why their exertions and success have not been proportionate to their moral and national resources? A satisfactory explanation of this circumstance would carry us further than the extent of a newspaper will permit.

The Finances of a country, when trade and manufactures are still in a state of infancy, cannot be very considerable. The nobility, who possess almost exclusively the landed property, enjoy, as is the case under every Feudal Government, very great immunities. This exemption, together with the poverty of the lower class, the vast projects of amelioration the Government has been continually engaged in, and the Asiatic magnificence of the court, formed insurmountable impediments to the ambitious views of that cabinet. The Finances, which do not amount to 10,000,000 of our money, are consequently inadequate for the purpose of carrying on warlike operations on an extensive scale, and at a distance from their frontiers. These observations will still have greater weight in the present reign, when we reflect on the mild and humane character of the present Emperor, who was averse to any augmentation of the burthens on his people. It was this humanity on his part, joined to the dissatisfaction he must have felt at the inactivity of Austria, after all the efforts he and his father had made in favour of that State, but above all the indigation he must have suffered at the unaccountable remissness and indifference of the Grenville Administration, which frustrated the sanguine expectations which were formed in this country and on the Continent, of the successful resistance of the Russians. Under all these disadvantages, however, with an army of about 100,000, they maintained an obstinate contest of more than eight months against all the armies of France. And whenever the moment arrives that she awakes from her present disgraceful stupor, her exertions will be equal to her ancient reputation. The character and energy of the Government have so much influence on those of the people, that it is no way difficult to discover why that nation has descended, during the present reign, from the eminence it stood on, under the vigorous Administration of Catherine. As soon as our friendly connexions with that Court are renewed, and that period is not very remote, we can easily recover our former influence in its councils. The present Emperor has always manifested a decided partiality for this country; and if we are happier in our choice of diplomatic agents, than we have been hitherto, we could render the resources of that empire more effectual towards the deliverance of Europe, than it is now fashionable to suppose.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

MADRID, AUG. 2.—On the 29th ult. about four in the evening, it was reported that Joseph Napoleon was marching, and that all the troops in the city were following him. This report was confirmed by the movements made by the French milliners, and all those who did not belong to the army. The same evening they withdrew from the hospitals, and conducted to Retiro all the infirm soldiers. They put in requisition all the carriages and horses that could be found, and the troops prepared to march. In fact, that very night, and on the morning of the 30th, a great part of the army, the sick, milliners, tradespeople, &c. of the French nation set out. On the whole day of 30th, there followed preparations for the march of Joseph, and the remainder of the army. He dined at half-past four in the afternoon, in order to proceed, in the dusk, to sleep at Chamartin. The carriages were harnassed, and repaired to the Court of the Palace, but the coachmen and mule-drivers, and most of the attendants of the Royal carriages had disappeared; on which account, Joseph could not depart that night, and was obliged to suspend his journey to the morning of the 31st, when he departed on horseback, as he was unable to put the carriages in motion. The same morning he took from the stables all the mules, horses, and harness, and shamefully sold all at the lowest price. In the evening of the same day, they forced open the gates of the public Treasury and Bank, putting the people in such terror, that we passed the most anxious night, thinking that a general pillage was about to take place. They took from these buildings above fourteen millions. At two in the morning of the 1st inst. was heard a cannonade, which, though at first it was taken for a fatal signal, was in fact but the precursor of the brightest and happiest day that ever rose over Madrid. On this signal all the guards were withdrawn, and all the French filed off towards the parade, whence they marched off. Scarcely did day appear, when the people ran through the streets, and the posts of the guards, but nothing was to be found. They passed to the Retiro, and there they found only a few dying wretches, and here and there a dead body. They beheld with amazement the ditches, pallisadoes, and terrible batteries, directed against this city. The gun-carriages were in flames—above 70 cannon were spiked, and about 3000 barrels of powder thrown into a large pond. The Madridians, on seeing themselves delivered from this destructive apparatus, gave thanks to the Supreme Being, and immediately began to assume for their badge the portrait of Ferdinand VII.

MADRID, AUG. 6.—Yesterday the Junta of Council and the Alcaldes of the Court, ordered that every one from the age of 16 to 50, should immediately inlist and take up arms; but we are assured that this order will not be put in force, owing to the arrival of two aids-de-camp from General Castanos; and to-morrow a Te Deum is to be sung. It seems the French have taken the road to Navarre; and besides having put their mules and horses to feed on our corn, they have burned all the Indian corn, and sacked the towns. This is the manner in which these ungrateful wretches have repaid us for the reception they got from us; but this ought not to astonish us, as they do not regard the welfare of their own nation. A well-known milliner in this city sought the protection of her countrymen, and proceeded with the army, carrying with her many millions, the fruit of the ridiculous Spanish taste for French fashions; but on the road her protectors robbed her, violated her person, and afterwards murdered her! A party of Andalusian smugglers, who left this place in pursuit of the French, were fortunate enough to overtake some settlers who were with the army, and took from them seven hundred thousand reals, with other effects. Two close coaches entered here, and went immediately to the new Palace, where they left the equipage that they were conducting. They went afterwards to the jail of this city, where they lodged the people that were in the carriages, without our being able to know to this moment who they were.

MADRID, AUG. 10.—Yesterday entered this city the troops of Valencia and of Andalusia, which are going to drive out the French, who are retreating to the frontiers. We have sent all the troops of the garrison, for we have not retained any; in consequence of which the Police of the city is entirely preserved by the inhabitants; from which duty no one is exempt.

We have also ordered an enlistment of all persons from 18 to 50 without any exception.

Present position of the Gallician Army:—The Vanguard at Astorga; First Division at Grbigo; Second at Manzanal; Third at Visorens; and Fourth at Leon.

MADRID, AUG. 17.—At seven o'clock this evening, a post arrived with the pleasing intelligence, that the French who were at Saragossa had fled with precipitation and fear, taking the road to Pampeluna; and that the Arragonese, Catalonians, and Valencians, all valiant, all heroes, and all covered with laurels, were closely in pursuit of them. The bravery and valour of these provinces of the Crown of Arragon were sufficiently known before, but now the fame and glory of the nations who had gained immortal honour in history is becoming obscure. Historians will no longer cite the Lacedemonians and the Numantians: the brave Arragonese have surpassed every thing done by them. The French, having scattered balls and shells over the streets of Saragossa, after so many days siege and bombardment, had become masters of one part of the city, and entered the street del Coso, after having blown up the mount del Torrero, and the excellent work which had been raised on the margin of the canal, the explosion of which shook violently the most solid buildings; but the iron hearts and bosoms of the brave Saragossans did not shake. Five hundred French had entrenched themselves in the Convent of St. Francis, occupying the last dormitorio. A brave Catalonian headed a troop to dislodge the enemy, and having broken the stairs of the Convent, every one of the French was put to death. The women fought like Amazons, and mothers were proud of having sacrificed their sons for their country's salvation. The whole of the provinces of the kingdom shared in this spirit of heroism.

At the same time arrived a post from Aranda, with intelligence that the French had left Burgos, and that Joseph Bonaparte was at Quintinapala, three leagues beyond the city.

Other letters pretend that the French army, on their way to Vittoria, were forced to march back to Burgos, where it is said they are entrenching themselves; but this wants confirmation.

On the evening of the 6th, intelligence was received that Ferdinand IV. King of Naples, had disembarked at Algesiras.

There are already entered here, Generals Llamas and Cervellon, and it is expected that we shall soon have General Cuesta, with 800 cavalry, and 2,000 infantry, and General Castanos, and a part of his army. The divisions of Reding and Coupigni are gone to Portugal to act against Junot.

MADRID GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY, AUG. 18.

Yesterday the following dispatches were received from D. Josef de Palafox y Melci, Captain-General of the Army and Kingdom of Arragon:—

"I have the satisfaction to communicate to your Highness, that the French army, which, during two months, has besieged this city, pursuing a conduct the most abominable ever known, fled this morning, leaving behind them vast quantities of provisions, ammunition, and other effects. They attempted to make a fresh assault last night from the small part of which they had already possession; but they were withstood by my troops with such firmness, that they fled precipitately. Last night I dispatched a division of 4000 men (excellent troops) to cut off the enemy's retreat to Navarra, where they will be joined by other troops, and the armed peasantry of that province. The 6000 men who arrived here yesterday from Valencia, united to 4000 other troops of my army from Calatayad, are in pursuit of the enemy's rear, to chastise him, and to prevent his committing, as he is accustomed to do, new robberies, exactions and atrocities, in the towns through which he retreats.

"To-day public rejoicings have been held, and to-morrow Te Deum will be sung.

"It is of great importance that a reunion of Deputies from all the provinces of Spain should take place as soon as possible; and I think it would be proper to fix a day, which might be the 10th of next September. I have given notice of this to the other Generals and Supreme Juntas throughout the kingdom, and I give your Highness an intimation of it, that it may be communicated to the Council.

"God preserve your Highness many years."

"Head-Quarters of Saragossa, August 14, 1808."

"JOSEF PALAFOX Y MELCI."

MADRID, AUG. 19.—On the 11th inst. the Supreme Council of Castile issued two edicts; the first declaring null and void the abdication of the Spanish Throne, in favour of the Emperor of France and his brother Joseph, with the new Constitution agreed to at Bayone; the second enjoining all the cities and towns in the kingdom to concur in the solemn proclamation of the accession of Ferdinand VII. which was ordered, by an edict of the 9th, to be celebrated at Madrid and Toledo, on the 24th instant.

The Supreme Council of the Indies has issued the following circular letter:—

"Divine Providence, which, on so many and repeated occasions, has conspicuously manifested the special protection which he confers on the Spanish nation and their Indies, has just given a sensible proof of the continuance of his favour in the precipitate flight which its most perfidious oppressors have made from this capital.

"On the 10th of April last, a royal dispatch was transmitted to the dominions in the Indies, containing two Royal Decrees, dated the 19th and 20th of March; the first, being from our Sovereign Lord Don Carlos IV. in which, for the reasons therein stated, he freely and voluntarily abdicated the Crown, in favour of his son, the Signor Don Ferdinand, Prince of Asturias; the second from the latter Sovereign, declaring his acceptance of the Crown, and ordering that he should be proclaimed with the accustomed solemnities in all the kingdoms of the Indies.

"Already at this epoch, in consequence of treason, deception, and perfidy, were the chief fortresses of the kingdom occupied by the veteran troops of France; and there were in the environs of this capital 60,000 men of the same nation, who soon after took possession of it, under the fraudulent pretext of an intended march to the maritime parts of the south.

From that moment the unfortunate Ferdinand was deprived of his liberty, and became actually a prisoner. But the repeated and seductive professions of the Emperor of the French, and his continued false declarations of his anxiety to pay a visit to our Sovereign, his intimate ally, in order to treat of matters involving the happiness of both nations, which he carried so far as to forward his equipages, to cause a place of residence to be prepared for him, and even to fix a day for his entrance into this capital) took by surprize the innocence and good faith of his Majesty, who, anxious to pay him every compliment, made his august brother, the Infant Don Carlos, set out to receive him at Vittoria. The deceitful guest was not found in that city; and with the same good faith, or in consequence of some new perfidious profession on his part, D. Carlos proceeded to Bayonne, whence he was to return along with him. From that city, Napoleon continued to carry on his frauds, pretending engagements of business, and promising, day after day, to realize his so long announced journey.

The King, who anxiously wished for it, in order to dissipate the suspicions which were thickening around him, and to shake off, as soon as possible, the yoke of the troops who oppressed him, resolved to facilitate the interview by repairing to the city of Burgos, and thence to Vittoria, under the impression, strengthened by repeated assurances, that in some one of these places the Emperor would present himself, without any excuses, and with greater facility than in the capital of the kingdom: but all his hopes were disappointed; for the latter did not even repair to the vicinity of Irun, whither he finally took the fraudulent precaution to invite him, nor did he once move from Bayonne, where he had resolved to seize his person. In fact, under the pretext of business, and the superior facility which that city presented for adjusting the interesting subjects that required an interview of the two monarchs, he pressed the king, with the most solemn promises of security, but the most perfidious and unheard of treachery, to proceed to Bayonne.

With this invitation his Majesty complied, being actuated by his characteristic honour and good faith, and being desirous of putting an end to so many calamities; having previously, while at Vittoria, out of pure condescension to the wishes and professions of the Emperor, given orders for delivering over to the French troops the person of Don Manuel de Godoy, the principal author of so many misfortunes, whom his Majesty rescued from the fury of the people, who were ready to assassinate him, engaging that he should be punished according to the crimes that might be proved against him at his approaching trial, in order to which he was kept in safe custody. Napoleon, being already master of the sacred persons of the King, and his august brother, concerted measures, through the medium of Prince Murat, the General in Chief of his troops, by which the parent Sovereigns should also repair to Bayonne, under the specious pretext of composing and adjusting the supposed differences existing between them and his Majesty; and finally, he caused all the other Members of the Royal Family to be conducted to the same place, dragging them from the bosom of their country, to insure the execution of the detestable object which he had in view. All being now prisoners, and by means of the most shameful and unheard of violence, Napoleon made the King D. Ferdinand renounce in favour of his father the Crown which the latter had freely abdicated, and caused Charles IV. to renounce it in favour of himself, compelling the Prince, and the infants D. Carlos and D. Antonio, to sanction this iniquitous usurpation by the absolute cession of their respective rights. Thinking himself already master, by this detestable artifice, of Spain and the Indies, he ceded them to his brother Joseph, King of Naples, nominating and appointing him Sovereign of this vast Monarchy; and in the sequel he compelled a multitude of persons, of all classes and estates, to repair to Bayonne, under the pretence of establishing a new Constitution, which he had formed beforehand, and with regard to which the only choice left to the persons assembled was that of signing it.

"Anticipating these last-mentioned events, and seeing itself on the one hand deprived of its beloved Sovereign and the rest of the Royal Family, and on the other, oppressed by the vexations and insolence of the French troops who occupied it, this loyal city proclaimed its fidelity on the 2d of May, and attacking the French troops, notwithstanding their immense superiority, engaged them in a bloody battle, in which many honourable and worthy Spaniards fell, but accompanied by an incomparably greater number of their iniquitous French oppressors. The consequence was, that for two days and nights after, this city was a witness to the barbarous inhumanity with which they put to the sword, in cold blood, a multitude of innocent persons, who, either during the moment of insurrection, or after a solemnly proclaimed pardon, they apprehended with a pen-knife, a pair of scissars, or any other implement of their respective trades in their possession. —The melancholy intelligence of this act of cruelty flew in a moment through all the provinces of the kingdom, who, unanimously making a common cause, declared war against France, and prepared with incredible celerity to shake off the yoke which oppressed them. Asturias, Leon, Gallicia, St. Andero, Arragon, Valencia, Catalonia, the Andalusias, La Mancha, Murcia, Castile, Estramadura, and Carthagena, assembled numerous armies, and adopted such measures and dispositions as in the short space of two months confounded all the plans of our enemies, who were completely vanquished and routed at every point where they were attacked.

"Notwithstanding so many glorious and successive victories, in which the enemy suffered a diminution of more than two-thirds of his force, and with very slender means of replacing it, Joseph, determined to repair to his capital in the persuasion, undoubtedly, that his presence would allay the general uneasiness, and reimpose his yoke upon the provinces. For this purpose he caused himself to be proclaimed here, on the 25th ult. but he was so ill received by its loyal inhabitants, that, notwithstanding all his troops and his precautions, he had the mortification of seeing himself almost alone wherever he went, and even in his own Palace; the whole of the Grandees, the Officers of State, and a great number of other persons of all classes, estates, and conditions, having absented themselves in expectation of his arrival. Finally, having received positive intelligence, on the 28th, ult. of General Dupont's surrender in the Andalusias with 17,000 of the best troops of France, Joseph determined on retreating, or rather flying from this capital. This purpose he, with all the rest of his army, precipitately executed, directing his march towards the frontier, and committing on their route the most execrable acts of robbery, sacrilege, assassination, and excesses of every description. To their disgrace, he was followed by Don Mariano Louis de Urquiso, Don Miguel Joseph de Azanza, Don Gonzalo o'Farril, Don Joseph de Massaredo, Count de Cabarrus; in short, all the Ministers with the exception of Don Pedro de Cevallos.

All the Supreme Tribunals of the nation resident in the capital have till this moment existed in a state of oppression, without freedom of deliberation or action, and subject to the severest yoke which perfidy and treason could impose upon them; but the instant they were able to make their voices heard, they hastened to declare null and void whatever was done, under the apprehensions of violence, against the lawful rights of the House of Bourbon to the throne of Spain. All classes of the State are in consequence re-invested with the full and free exercise of their lawful duties, which are those alone that are comprised in the solemn oath taken to our august Sovereign Ferdinand VII. when Prince of Asturias, binding us to recognise him as King of Spain and the Indies, in case of the death or formal abdication, which has actually taken place, of his August Father."

[The letter then concludes with an order for proclaiming Ferdinand VII. declaring null and void his abdication, as well as every act done by the authority of the usurped Government."

ARANJUEZ, JULY 25.—Castanos, after the battle of Baylen, proceeded without loss of time towards Aranjuez, and is already at St. Clemente, distant from Madrid 18 leagues. General Dupont has been conducted to Malaga, as General Reding, who had made him prisoner, declined ceding him to the Commander in Chief. Gen. Wedel has been conducted to Seville. Jovar fell in battle, by a shot through his temples.

Among the articles of capitulation it was stipulated, that the whole of Mancha, as far as the Tagus, was to be evacuated by the French within six days, for which purpose the nephew of Dupont, who was prisoner on parole, was sent to collect the straggling parties. The surrender and capitulation took place on the 21st.

The army of Andalusia consists now of 90,000 men, whereof 50,000 are of the line, and 8000 cavalry. It will be augmented by from 3000 to 4000 horse taken from the French.

CORUNNA, AUG. 13.—Generous act by an individual of the British nation:—

Letter addressed to Messrs. Don Manuel B. de Cannedo and Don F. P. G. Polo and Nephew, merchants, &c.

"GENTLEMEN,—You will have the goodness to pay to the Supreme Junta of this kingdom, in my name, that it may be applied at its pleasure on their account, and that of the other Constituted Authorities in Spain, who have united together against France, the sum of 45,176 reals, and 17 maravedis (i. e. 500*l.* sterling. Your's, &c.

"FREDERIC GRELLET, Merchant, of London."

The Government and the inhabitants, grateful for the especial favours which they have received from his British Majesty, and the generous English nation, know not how to return them the thanks which are due to them; and having daily fresh cause to admire the heroic virtues of this wise, great, and generous nation, they assure it of its gratitude and eternal friendship, and include in the catalogue of good Spaniards the generous Englishman, Don Ffederico Grellet.

GRANADA, JULY 27.—The Junta of Malaga has officially announced to the Government here, that on the 25th a vessel arrived at that port from Ivica, the Master of which declared, that on the 14th inst. there arrived a packet giving intelligence of the arrival at Alcudia of an English frigate, which had suffered severely in a combat which a British squadron had had off Toulon, with a French squadron, which had left that port with eleven ships, containing 13,000 troops, who were to be disembarked on the Belaric Islands, or on the coast of Catalonia, which squadron was beaten: two vessels had been taken by the English, two had sunk, and the rest were pursued.

IRELAND.

MAJOR CAMPBELL.—The Dublin Papers of the 24th state, that the respite granted to this unfortunate Officer, convicted of the murder of Capt. Boyd, in a duel, at the late Assizes of Armagh, having expired on Tuesday, the 23d, an order was sent off on that day, from Dublin Castle, to Armagh, for his execution on the 24th; and the Dublin Papers of the 25th, state, that by letters from Armagh, received that morning, this unhappy man underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, on the preceding day. His fate has been rendered peculiarly interesting by the unremitting exertions of Mrs. Campbell, to procure a mitigation of his punishment, in the prosecution of which, she appears to have endured fatigues of body and mind, which might be supposed too great for female strength. On her arrival at Windsor, with a Memorial to his Majesty, supplicating mercy, it was eight o'clock and his Majesty had retired to his apartment. Her Majesty, notwithstanding, presented the Memorial that night, and Mrs. C. received the kindest attention from the whole of the Royal Family; but it appears to have been a case to which the Royal mercy could not be extended, and the law has been accordingly permitted to take its course.

Major Campbell made his escape from Ireland after the duel, and lived with his family under a fictitious name for several months at Chelsea; the duel took place in June, 1807; but his mind became so uneasy, that he at last determined to surrender himself to take his trial, be the result what it might. He was a first cousin of the Earl of Breadalbane, a man esteemed and beloved by all his friends. It is superfluous to add, that Mrs. Campbell is a most amiable woman. She has four infant children.

The recommendation of the Jury to the Judge who tried Major Campbell, and their subsequent Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, have completely rescued his memory from any imputation of unfairness, under all the circumstances of the case, in his unfortunate duel with Capt. Boyd.

PROVINCIALS.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

In the southern parts of the island the harvest work has been chiefly finished, and the grain mostly well secured; and in the more northern districts this sort of field labour is in an unusual state of forwardness; a fortnight will, probably, if the season continues fine, put a period to their work. In both parts of the kingdom the crops are very fine, and in general full; but in the former, the wheats have been more injured by the smut and mildew, than in the latter. There can, however, be no doubt of there being generally a very good harvest. The turnip crops, especially those put in at a late period, have come on better than could have been supposed; and if the weather should be droppy, they will probably be good crops. Those which were early sown, are, in general, excellent. A great extent of land has been well prepared for wheat in both the above parts of the kingdom, and will be sown as soon as seed can be provided. The potatoes in all the more northern parts of the country have the most promising appearance. The prices of grain continue rather stationary. Wheat fetches from 60*s.* to 84*s.* per quarter. Barley, from 40*s.* to 46*s.* and Oats, from 36*s.* to 40*s.* The live stock, both of the fat and lean kind, are somewhat on the decline. In Smithfield market, Beef fetches from 4*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* per stone. Mutton, 4*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* 8*d.* Veal, 5*s.* to 6*s.* and Pork, 6*s.* to 6*s.* The prices of Hay and Straw are much as in our last. Hay fetches from 5*l.* to 6*l.* 18*s.* Straw, from 1*l.* 19*s.* to 2*l.* 5*s.* and Clover, from 6*l.* 4*s.* to 7*l.* 16*s.* Hops continue promising in most places.

THE PONEY AND MAIL-COACH.—The Poney which has excited so much interest in the sporting world, and started with the Exeter Mail on Saturday night, is the property of Mr. Wardel; it is only twelve hands high; three grooms had the leading of it, and Mr. Wardel went off with the Mail. It was accompanied from town by several amateurs, as far as the second stage. The poney and its conductor arrived at Salisbury at the same time with the mail coach; there they gave it a feed of ale and bread, and started as the mail coach horses were put to, keeping the lead from Salisbury—6 to 4 were betted at that time on the poney, who appeared quite fresh. Within forty miles of Exeter, it was three miles a-head of the mail: bets at that time were 2 to 1 in favour of the poney. The poney entered Exeter forty-five minutes before the mail, which is equal to a distance of ten miles. This little animal lately carried a weighty rider seventy miles in one day. It is accustomed to drink ale and beer, and has frequently drunk a pint of port at a time.

The following instance of canine sagacity is worthy of record:—A dog bred in Hull, and which had never crossed the Humber, by some accident fell from a London trader, on board of which he was, into the sea, off the coast of Lincolnshire, about six miles from shore. After swimming to land, he found his away across the county to Barton, a distance of upwards of 30 miles, and walking into the ferry-boat, was conveyed across the Humber to Hull, where he took up his abode at his old master's, who, as may be imagined, was not a little surprised at his return.

A man named James Wood, was tried at the Cumberland Assizes, for the murder of Margaret Smith, wife of Thomas Smith, of Longburn, and Jane Pattinson, her sister. He had applied for work, as a weaver, at the house of Smith; and after being some time there, he took the opportunity, during the absence of Smith, to murder the two women, and rob the house of some money. He was traced to Scotland, where he was apprehended, and confessed the crime. He was sentenced to death, and was executed on Thursday se'nnight.

At Somerset Assizes Duncan Campbell, high constable of the hundred of Bath-forum, was tried for having fired a loaded pistol at Robert Strong, at Lansdown revel, the contents of which entered the abdomen of Strong, and caused his death the third day after. He was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to pay a fine of 5*l.* to the King, and to be imprisoned in the county prison for three calendar months.

Dispatches, of which the following are Copies and Extracts, were last night received from Lieutenant-General Sir Harry Burrard and Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, dated from Head-Quarters at Lourinha, addressed to Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and brought by Capt. Campbell, Aid-de-Camp to Sir Arthur Wellesley.

Extract of a Letter from Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, dated Head-Quarters at Caldas, the 16th of Aug. 1808.

I marched from Lyria on the 13th, and arrived at Alhobaça on the 14th, which place the enemy had abandoned in the preceding night; and I arrived here yesterday. The enemy, about 4000 in number, were posted about ten miles from hence, at Boriça; and they occupied Brilos, about three miles from hence, with their advanced posts. As the possession of this last village was important to our future operations, I determined to occupy it; and as soon as the British infantry arrived upon the ground, I directed that it might be occupied by a detachment, consisting of four companies of riflemen of the 60th and 95th regiments. The enemy, consisting of a small piquet of infantry, and a few cavalry, made a trifling resistance and retired; but they were followed by a detachment of our riflemen to the distance of three miles from Brilos. The riflemen were then attacked by a superior body of the enemy, who attempted to cut them off from the main body of the detachment to which they belonged, which had now advanced to their support; larger bodies of the enemy appeared on both the flanks of the detachment, and it was with difficulty that Major-General Spencer, who had gone out to Obidos when he had heard that the riflemen had advanced in pursuit of the enemy, was enabled to effect their retreat to that village. They have since remained in possession of it, and the enemy have retired entirely from the neighbourhood.

In this little affair of the advanced posts, which was occasioned solely by the eagerness of the troops in pursuit of the enemy, I am concerned to add, that Lieutenant Bunbury, of the 2d battalion of the 95th, was killed, and the Hon. Capt. Pakenham wounded, but slightly; and we have lost some men, of whose number I have not received the returns.

My Lord,

The French General Laborde having continued in his position at Roleia since my arrival at Caldas, on the 15th instant, I determined to attack him in it this morning. Roleia is situated on an eminence, having a plain in its front, at the end of a valley, which commences at Caldas, and is closed to the Southward by mountains, which join the hills, forming the valley on the left, looking from Caldas. In the centre of the valley, and about eight miles from Roleia, is the town and old Moorish fort of Obidos, from whence the enemy's piquets had been driven on the 15th, and from that time he had posts in the hills on both sides of the valley, as well as in the plain in front of his army, which was posted on the heights in front of Roleia, its right resting upon the hills, its left upon an eminence on which was a windmill, and the whole covering four or five passes into the mountains in his rear.

I have reason to believe that his force consisted of at least 6000 men, of which about 500 were cavalry, with 5 pieces of cannon; and there was some reason to believe that Gen. Loison, who was at Rio Major yesterday, would join Gen. Laborde by his right in the course of the night. The plan of attack was formed accordingly, and the army having broken up from Caldas this morning, was formed into three columns; the right, consisting of 1200 Portuguese infantry and 50 Portuguese cavalry, destined to turn the enemy's left, and penetrate into the mountains in his rear; the left, consisting of Major-Gen. Ferguson's and Brigadier-Gen. Bowes's brigades of infantry, three companies of riflemen, a brigade of light artillery, and twenty British and twenty Portuguese cavalry, were destined, under the command of Major-Gen. Ferguson, to ascend the hills at Obidos, to turn all the enemy's posts on the left of the valley, as well as the right of his post at Roleia; this corps was also destined to watch the motions of Gen. Loison, on the enemy's right, who I had heard had moved from Rio Major towards Alcoentre last night. The centre column, consisting of Major-Gen. Hill's, Brig.-Gen. Nightingale's, Brig.-Gen. Craufurd's, and Brig.-Gen. Fane's brigades (with the exception of the riflemen detached with Major-Gen. Ferguson), and 400 Portuguese light infantry, the British and Portuguese cavalry, a brigade of nine-pounders, and a brigade of six-pounders, were destined to attack Gen. Laborde's position in front.

The columns being formed, the troops moved from Obidos about seven o'clock in the morning. Brig.-Gen. Fane's riflemen were immediately detached into the hills on the left of the valley, to keep up the communication between the centre and left columns, and to protect the march of the former along the valley; and the enemy's posts were successively driven in. Major-Gen. Hill's brigade, formed in three columns of battalions, moved on the right of the valley, supported by the cavalry, in order to attack the enemy's left; and Brigadier-Generals Nightingale and Craufurd moved with the artillery along the high road, until at length the former formed in the plain immediately in the enemy's front, supported by the light infantry companies, and the 45th regiment of Brig.-Gen. Craufurd's brigade, while the two other regiments of this brigade (the 50th and 91st), and half of the nine-pounder brigade were kept as a reserve in the rear.

Major-Gen. Hill and Brig.-Gen. Nightingale advanced upon the enemy's position, and, at the same moment, Brig.-General Fane's riflemen were in the hills on his right; the Portuguese infantry in a village upon his left; and Major-Gen. Ferguson's column was descending from the heights into the plain. From this situation the enemy retired by the passes into the mountains with the utmost regularity and the greatest celerity; and, notwithstanding the rapid advance of the British infantry, the want of a sufficient body of cavalry was the cause of his suffering but little loss in the plain.

It was then necessary to make a disposition to attack the formidable position which he had taken up. Brigadier-General Fane's riflemen were already in the mountains on his right, and no time was lost in attacking the different passes, as well to support the riflemen as to defeat the enemy completely.

The Portuguese infantry were ordered to move up a pass on the right of the whole; the light companies of Major-General Hill's brigade and the 5th regiment moved up a pass next on the right; and the 29th regiment, supported by the 9th regiment, under Brigadier-General Nightingale, a third pass; and the 45th and 82d regiments, passes on the left. These passes were all difficult of access, and some of them were well defended by the enemy, particularly that which was attacked by the 29th and 9th regiment. These regiments attacked with the greatest impetuosity, and reached the enemy before those whose attacks were to be made on their flanks: the defence of the enemy was desperate, and it was in this attack principally that we sustained the loss which we have to lament, particularly of that gallant Officer, the Honourable Lieutenant-Colonel Lake, who distinguished himself upon this occasion.

The enemy was, however, driven from all the positions he had taken in the passes of the mountains, and our troops were advanced in the plains on their tops. For a considerable length of time the 29th and 9th regiments alone were advanced to this point, with Brigadier-General Fane's riflemen at a distance on the left, and they were afterwards supported by the 5th regiment, and by the light companies of Major-General Hill's brigade, which had come up on their right; and by the other troops ordered to ascend the mountains, who came up by degrees. The enemy here made three most gallant attacks upon the 29th and 9th regiments, supported, as I have above stated, with a view to cover the retreat of his defeated army; in all of which he was, however, repulsed; but he succeeded in effecting his retreat in good order, owing, principally, to my want of cavalry, and secondly, to the difficulty of bringing up the passes of the mountains with celerity, a sufficient number of troops, and of cannon, to support those which had first ascended. The loss of the enemy has, however, been very great; and he left three pieces of cannon in our hands.

I cannot sufficiently applaud the conduct of the troops throughout this action. The enemy's positions were formidable, and he took them up with his usual ability and celerity, and defended them most gallantly. But I must observe that although we had such a superiority of numbers employed in the operations of this day, the troops actually engaged in the heat of the action were, from unavoidable circumstances, only the 5th, 9th, 29th, the riflemen of the 95th and 60th, and the flank companies of Major-General Hill's Brigade, being a number by no means equal to that of the enemy:—their conduct, therefore, deserves the highest commendation.

I cannot avoid to take this opportunity of expressing my acknowledgments for the aid and support I received from all the general and other officers of this army. I am particularly indebted to Major-General Spencer for the advice and assistance I received from him;—to Major-General Ferguson for the manner in which he led the left column, and to Major-General Hill, and Brigadier-Generals Nightingale and Fane for the manner in which they conducted the different attacks which they led. I derived most material assistance also from Lieut.-Col. Tucker and Lieutenant-Colonel Bathurst in the Offices of Deputy-Adjutant and Deputy Quarter-Master General, and from the Officers of the Staff employed under them. I must also mention that I have every reason to be satisfied with the artillery under Lieutenant-Colonel Robe.

I have the honour to inclose herewith a return of killed, wounded and missing. I have the honour to be, &c.

Head Quarters at Lourinha, August 18, 1808.

My Lord,

Since I wrote to you last night, I have heard from Brigadier-General Anstruther, that he is on the coast of Piniche, with the fleet of victuallers and store ships, in charge of Captain Bligh of the Alfred, with a part of the force detached from England under Brigadier-General Ackland, in consequence of the receipt of orders which I had left at Mondego Bay for General Ackland, which he had opened. I have ordered Brigadier-General Anstruther to land immediately, and I have moved to this place, in order to protect his landing, and facilitate his junction.

General Loison joined General Laborde in the course of last night at Torres Vedras; and I understand that both began their march towards Lisbon this morning: I also hear that General Junot has arrived this day at Torres Vedras, with a small corps from Lisbon; and I conclude that the whole of the French army will be assembled between Torres Vedras and the capital, in the course of a few days. I have the honour to be, &c.

Head-Quarters, Maceira, Aug. 21, 1808.

My Lord,

The report which I have the honour to inclose to your Lordship, made at my request to Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, conveys information which cannot but prove highly gratifying to his Majesty.

On my landing this morning, I found that the enemy's attack had already commenced, and I was fortunate enough to reach the field of action in time to witness and approve of every disposition that had been, and was afterwards made by Sir Arthur Wellesley, his comprehensive mind furnishing a ready resource in every emergency, and rendering it quite unnecessary to direct any alteration.

I am happy on this occasion to bear testimony to the great spirit and good conduct displayed by all the troops composing this gallant army in this well-contested action.

I send this dispatch by Captain Campbell, Aid-de-Camp to Sir Arthur Wellesley, no person being better qualified to give your Lordship information. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) Harry Burrard, Lieut.-Gen.

To the Right Hon. Lord Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c.

Vimiera, August 21, 1808

Sir,

I have the honour to report to you, that the enemy attacked us in our position at Vimiera this morning.

Digitized by Google

The village of Vimiera stands in a valley, through which runs the river Maceira; at the back, and to the Westward and Northward of this village, is a mountain, the western point of which touches the sea, and the eastern is separated by a deep ravine from the heights, over which passes the road which leads from Lourinha and the Northward, to Vimiera. The greater part of the infantry, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 8th brigades were posted on this mountain, with eight pieces of artillery; Major-Gen. Hill's brigade being on the right; Major-Gen. Ferguson's on the left, having one battalion on the heights, separated from the mountain. On the eastern and southern side of the town is a hill which is entirely commanded, particularly on its right, by the mountain to the westward of the town, and commanding all the ground in the neighbourhood to the Southward and Eastward, on which Brig.-Gen. Fane was posted with his riflemen, and the 50th regiment, and Brig.-Gen. Anstruther with his brigade, with half a brigade of six-pounders and half a brigade of nine-pounders, which had been ordered to the position in the course of last night. The ground over which passes the road from Lourinha commanded the left of this height, and it had not been occupied, excepting by a piquet, as the camp had been taken up only for one night; and there was no water in the neighbourhood of this height.

The cavalry and the reserve of artillery were in the valley, between the hills on which the infantry stood; both flanking and supporting Brigadier-General Fane's advanced guard.

The enemy first appeared at eight o'clock in the morning, in large bodies of cavalry on our left upon the heights on the road to Lourinha; and it was soon obvious that the attack would be made upon our advanced guard, and the left of our position; and Major-General Ferguson's brigade was immediately moved across the Ravine to the heights, on the road to Lourinha, with three pieces of cannon; he was followed successively by Brig.-General Nightingale with his brigade, and three pieces of cannon; Brigadier-General Ackland with his brigade, and Brigadier-General Bowes with his brigade. These troops were formed (Major-General Ferguson's brigade in the first line; Brigadier-General Nightingale's in the second; and Brigadier-General Bowes's and Ackland's, in columns in the rear) on those heights, with their right upon the valley which leads into Vimiera; and their left upon the other Ravine, which separates these heights from the range which terminates at the landing-place at Maceira. On these last-mentioned heights, the Portuguese troops which had been in the bottom, near Vimiera, were posted in the first instance, and they were supported by Brigadier-General Craufurd's brigade.

The troops of the advanced guard on the height to the southward and eastward of the town were deemed sufficient for its defence, and Major-General Hill was moved to the centre of the mountain on which the great body of the infantry had been posted, as a support to these troops, and as a reserve to the whole army. In addition to this support these troops had that of the cavalry in the rear of their right.

The enemy's attack began in several columns upon the whole of the troops on this height; on the left they advanced, notwithstanding the fire of the riflemen, close to the 50th regiment, and were checked and driven back only by the bayonets of that corps. The 2d battalion, 43d regiment, were likewise closely engaged with them in the road which leads into Vimiera; a part of that corps having been ordered into the church-yard to prevent them from penetrating into the town. On the right of the position they were repulsed by the bayonets of the 97th regiment, which corps was successfully supported by the 2d battalion 52d regiment, which, by an advance in column, took the enemy in flank.

Besides this opposition given to the attack of the enemy on our advanced guard by their own exertions, they were attacked in flank by Brigadier-General Ackland's brigade in its advance to its position on the heights on the left, and a cannonade was kept up on the flank of the enemy's columns by the artillery on those heights.

At length, after a most desperate contest, the enemy were driven back in confusion from this attack with the loss of seven pieces of cannon, many prisoners, and a great number of officers and soldiers killed and wounded. He was pursued by the detachment of the 20th light dragoons, but the enemy's cavalry were so much superior in numbers that this detachment has suffered much, and Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor was unfortunately killed.

Nearly at the same time the enemy's attack commenced upon the heights on the road to Lourinha. This attack was supported by a large body of cavalry, and was made with the usual impetuosity of the French troops. It was received with steadiness by Major-General Ferguson's brigade, consisting of the 36th, 40th, and 71st regiments; and these corps charged as soon as the enemy approached them, who gave way, and they continued to advance upon him supported by the 82d, one of the corps of Brigadier-General Nightingale's brigade, which, as the ground extended, afterwards formed a part of the first line; by the 29th regiment, and by Brigadier-General Bowes's and Ackland's brigade, while Brigadier-General Craufurd's Brigade, and the Portuguese troops, in two lines, advanced along the height on the left. In the advance of Major-General Ferguson's brigade six pieces of cannon were taken from the enemy, with many prisoners, and vast numbers were killed and wounded.

The enemy afterwards made an attempt to recover a part of his artillery by attacking the 71st and 82d regiments, which were halted in a valley in which it had been taken. These regiments retired from the low grounds in the valley to the heights, where they halted, faced about, fired, and advanced upon the enemy, who had by that time arrived in the low ground, and they thus obliged him again to retire with great loss.

In this action, in which the whole of the French force in Portugal was employed under the command of the Duke D'Abrantes in person, in which the enemy was certainly superior in cavalry and artillery, and in which not more than half of the British army was actually engaged, he has sustained a signal defeat, and has lost 13 pieces of cannon, 23 ammunition waggons, with powder, shells, stores of all descriptions, and 20,000 rounds of musket ammunition. One general officer (Beniere) has been wounded and taken prisoner, and a great many officers and soldiers have been killed, wounded, and taken.

The valour and discipline of his Majesty's troops have been conspicuous upon this occasion, as you, who witnessed the greatest part of the action, must have observed; but it is a justice to the following corps to draw your notice to them in a particular manner, viz.—the royal artillery, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Robe; the 20th dragoons, which had been commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor; the 50th regiment, commanded by Colonel Walker; the 2d battalion 95th foot, commanded by Major Travers; the 5th battalion, 60th regiment, commanded by Major Davy; the 2d battalion 43d, commanded by Major Hull; the 2d battalion 52d, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Ross; the 97th regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Lyon; the 36th regiment, commanded by Colonel Burne; the 40th, commanded by Colonel Kemmais; the 71st, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Pack; and the 82d regiment, commanded by Major Eyre.

In mentioning Colonel Burne, and the 36th regiment to you upon this occasion, I cannot avoid to add that the regular and orderly conduct of this corps throughout this service, and their gallantry and discipline in action have been conspicuous.

I must take this opportunity of acknowledging my obligations to the General and Staff Officers of the army. I was much indebted to Major-General Spencer's judgment and experience, in the decision which I formed with respect to the number of troops allotted to each point of defence; and for his advice and assistance throughout the action. In the position taken up by Major-General Ferguson's brigade, and in its advance upon the enemy, that officer shewed equal bravery and judgment; and much praise is due to Brigadier-General Fane, and Brigadier-General Anstruther, for their gallant defence of their position in front of Vimiera, and to Brigadier-General Nightingale, for the manner in which he supported the attack upon the enemy, made by Major-General Ferguson.

Lieutenant-Colonel G. Tucker, and Lieutenant-Colonel Bathurst, and the officers in the departments of the Adjutant and Quarter-Master-General, and Lieutenant-Colonel Torrens, and the officers of my personal staff, rendered me the greatest assistance throughout the action.

I have the honour to inclose herewith, a return of the killed, wounded, and missing.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) Arthur Wellesley.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

BRITISH VICTORIES OVER THE FRENCH TROOPS.

To-day we have the inexpressible satisfaction of being able to communicate the long-anticipated intelligence of a signal victory gained by our army in Portugal. Whatever way we contemplate this important occurrence, it affords us equal matter for exultation and pleasure. In the midst of those mingled sensations, we felt no surprise, because the cool, determined, persevering valour of our soldiers was never dubious. This is one of those great, comprehensive events, which comes home to the bosom of every Briton; and which will be as rapturously felt on the Shannon as on the Thames. Thanks, heartfelt, inexpressible thanks to our army and their gallant Commander! They have gloriously fulfilled the duties their country expected from them. She entrusted to them the sacred pledge of her glory and reputation; and her confidence has not been disappointed. The vaunted impetuosity and tactical skill of the Gallic invincibles were unable to withstand the irresistible impulse of British patriotism, seconded by British bayonets. Distinguished warriors! worthy descendants of the heroes of Agincourt, Cressy, Blenheim, and Minden! You have gloriously begun a campaign, whose object is no less than the emancipation of Europe, from the most loathsome and dangerous despotism, that ever scourged mankind. You have been sent to rescue the country of the most ancient, the most faithful of our Allies, from the fangs of the monsters who had been so long preying on their vitals; and after having finished this glorious achievement, you are hastening to co-operate with a distinguished people, whose annals are only a recapitulation of victories; whose fields, whose mountains, whose cities, present eternal monuments of success against the Carthagenians, Romans, and Moors. Whose sense of honour is equal to their bravery, and whose integrity is only rivalled by their patriotism. When all Europe lay trembling and appalled at the feet of an inexorable and haughty adventurer, this generous nation spurned every kind of compromise with the daring ruffian, and formed unanimously the resolution rather to cover their native fields with their mangled carcasses, and those of their parents, their wives, and their children, than to consent to the slavery of their country. Their success has been correspondent with their determination, and the sanctity of their cause. You are going now not so much to assist them in delivering their country from their infamous invaders—they have already achieved that themselves—but to rival and participate in their future exploits, in that very country, from whence, for more than sixteen years, myriads of revolutionary harpeys have taken their flight, to ravage and pollute the temples, the habitations, and the fields of the neighbouring nations. Your country will unceasingly follow you in this distinguished career. Her gratitude will be even superior to your exploits; and when you return, crowned with victory and the benedictions of the universe—you will find in the applause of your countrymen, and the joyful tears of your relatives and friends, an ample compensation for your honourable services.

Such are the grateful effusions of every Briton on reading this important intelligence. Not one of our victories, by sea or land, distinguished as they have been, since the beginning of the Revolutionary War, has excited more universal transports. Our naval superiority was universally acknowledged. But this has removed every doubt from the mind of the most sceptical, every particle of anxiety from the breast of the most timorous, that the bravery and discipline of our land armies are not only equal, but infinitely superior to those of every other people existing.—What proud sensations must this conviction excite in our bosoms! What a field does it open to an aspiring and opulent community! We are the only people mentioned in history, whom the commerce and the riches of the world have not been able to corrupt. If any thing surpasses our national riches, it is our national energy. Let no false squeamishness, no false glare of political morality on the part of methodistical Statesmen, prevent us from pursuing the career of aggrandisement, which our resources, moral and physical, point out to us. Nothing is stationary in this world. If a State does not go forwards, it inevitably goes backwards. This is a moral and political axiom. Let us multiply our armies in this portentous crisis. The news of our victory will soon spread from one extremity of the Continent to another. It will have more effect on rousing their dormant energies, than any other circumstance which could have occurred. Let us guide their efforts, let us encourage their exertions against the common enemy; and when they see a hundred thousand British soldiers, not disgracefully cooped up in their island—the descendants of the Edwards and the Henrys confined to their shores!!—but encamped on the Plains of Picardy, they will recollect what their united efforts had formerly done under the guidance of a Marlborough. Is this language too bold? Is this opinion unsupported by precedent, or invalidated by present feeling and occurrences?—No. In the universal confusion which will soon take place on the Continent;—in the general friction, moral and national, which will ensue, if we do not seize on the supremacy, another more daring nation will do it. Let us resume our ancient motto: that not a single cannon shall be fired in Europe without our permission! Woe to the people who do not seize the advantages of the situation and the moment! Woe to the Statesman, who is scared from the pursuit of a great object, by the scruples of the conscientious, or the resistance of a faction! In politics, the morality of a people is security and greatness;—their immorality arises from weakness and lethargy. The same moral rule is applicable to states as individuals,—only the active and enterprising develope those great virtues which raise states and individuals to the summit of greatness and vigour; whilst inaction engenders all those loathsome vices and nasty passions which are productive of moral turpitude and physical debility.

A letter has been received at Lloyd's, from Oporto, dated August 28, which states, that the French army under General Junot had evacuated Lisbon, after plundering the place of twenty-three waggon loads of valuables, and on the 24th had an action with the British army, in which General Loison and 5000 French were killed, Gen. Junot and the rest of his army taken prisoners. Upon the French evacuating Lisbon, the Russian fleet hoisted Portuguese colours.

The glorious intelligence of the Victory obtained under Sir Arthur Wellesley, was brought about eight o'clock on Thursday night to Lord Castlereagh's Office by Captain Campbell. It was soon after communicated by his Lordship to the Lord Mayor.

"Downing-street, September 1, 1808.

"My Lord—I have the honour to acquaint your Lordship, that Captain Campbell arrived this evening with dispatches from Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, dated Vimiera, the 22d ult. giving an account of two Victories obtained over the French arms in Portugal—the first on the 17th at Zambugeira, over the advanced corps of the French, consisting of 6000 men, commanded by Generals Laborde and Brenier, in which the French were defeated with the loss of 1500 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners; the second, over the whole of the French army in Portugal, consisting of 14,000 men, commanded by General Junot, wherein the French were completely defeated, with the loss of 13 pieces of cannon, 23 tumbrills of ammunition, and about 3,500 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

"In consequence of this action, General Kellerman arrived with a flag of truce at Head-quarters on the 23d, to treat for terms.

"Lieut.-General Burrard landed, and arrived in the field of action after the battle had commenced on the 21st ult.; but he generously declined taking the command from Sir Arthur Wellesley. On the 22d, Lieutenant-General Sir Hew Dalrymple landed, and took the command.—I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) "Castlereagh.

"To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, &c."

As soon as Sir Arthur Wellesley was joined by General Spencer, he lost no time in advancing into the country. By the 15th, the opposing armies had approached so near each other, that an affair of outposts took place on that day near Opedas. On the following day the British army halted. On the 17th, our troops came up with the advanced corps of the French, amounting to 6000 infantry and 800 cavalry. They were most advantageously posted in the passes: but as Sir Arthur had fallen in upon their line of march, he was under the necessity of attacking them, though the advantages were on their side. Only part of our force was engaged, chiefly the 5th, 9th, 29th, 60th, and 95th regiments; of these the 29th and 95th bore the brunt of the battle. Nothing could exceed the steady discipline, and the cool and determined courage with which our troops advanced to the attack. It was a very severe conflict, but here it was remarked that our artillery was infinitely better served than that of the French, vuanted to be the best in Europe. The enemy at length yielded to the valour of our countrymen, and fell back in confusion, with the loss of 1500 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners. On the 18th and 19th Sir Arthur continued his pursuit of the enemy. On the 20th, he halted, and drew off nearer the sea, to cover the landing of General Anstruther's division. As soon as this junction was effected, the whole army was refreshed after the fatigues they had endured. On the 21st, Sir Arthur found that the enemy were determined to give battle. They commenced the attack at Vemeira, rather before it was expected, and with the utmost gallantry and good order. Their impetuosity was, as usual, extreme; and they hoped by means of it to throw our ranks into confusion, and gain the victory. But they were British troops with whom they had to contend; and our brave army, nothing daunted by the violence of the onset, or the furious fire opened upon them, advanced without firing a gun, with fixed bayonets. The enemy became soon dismayed by this steadiness and coolness, and were forced to fall back. The conflict then began to be most severe and sanguinary—but though the enemy fought with great gallantry and determination, they were never able to make any disadvantageous impression upon our troops. At length victory decided in our favour, and the enemy were completely beaten and dispersed into the woods, contiguous to the scene of action. Junot commanded in person, and his main attack was on our centre and left—our right, containing about 7000 men, was not so much engaged as the other two divisions. Two regiments of grenadiers, the flower of the French army, who composed Junot's guard, were cut to pieces to a man. After the battle, 300 of them were found lying dead on the very spot on which they were drawn up. The battle lasted about three hours, and the general result was the complete defeat and flight of the enemy, with the loss of near 4000 men; making their total loss in both actions amount to upwards of five thousand men. That of the British was comparatively small.

The veteran General Ferguson was among those who led the attack. He was accompanied by his Aid-de-Camp, Captain Mellish of sporting celebrity; and as he advanced to the charge, at the head of his brigade, he took off his hat, waved it to encourage his men, in order that, in the first place, they might be enabled to distinguish him throughout; and, in the second, that they might be inspirited to imitate his coolness and self-possession. Col. Lake fell most nobly, as he led his grenadiers through one of the passes, the difficulties of which defy all description. The 36th, commanded by Colonel Burns, performed prodigies. He had enjoined his men, it seems, to with-hold their fire; but as the enemy continued firing with great effect, one or two young soldiers discharged their muskets —Colonel Burns immediately called out, "If I knew the fellow who has just fired, I would knock him down." This remark, at a moment when so many were knocked down by the enemy's bullets, excited no small degree of merriment among his men, notwithstanding the rather serious solemnity of the scene in which they were acting.

The charge of the 20th dragoons was most masterly: had there been a larger force of cavalry, the whole of the enemy's force must have been annihilated: as it was, the French generals consider themselves as completely put hors-de-combat. Of this General Balitier, at least, whom we made prisoner, was so convinced, that he actually applied to one of the officers of the British Staff to take care of his property, (his share of the plunder,) which he told him was at Torres de la Vedras, describing the house in which it was concealed.

At the conclusion of the battle of the 21st, such was the enthusiasm excited by the result among our generals, that they all, to a man, went up to Sir A. Wellesley, congratulating him on his success, and exclaiming, "This, general, is all your work!" The men sympathised with their leaders, and loudly expressed their satisfaction that their old general, as they called him, had won the battle.

After the decisive battle, Sir Arthur proposed to send off the right wing of his army, which had been less engaged than the other two divisions, to push its way to Lisbon, and interpose itself between that city and the retreating army of the enemy. This, we understand, was adopted, and our troops took the road that leads by the sea, through Torres, Vedras, and Mafra.

The negotiations for the capitulation of the French army continued at the date of Sir Arthur's dispatches. It is said, that in the terms proposed by the enemy, they wished to stipulate for the carrying off their plunder, which they have to an immense amount: but this of course, would not be granted them; and there can be no doubt, that long ere this, the whole of the French army and the Russian fleet, are in our possession.

Gen. Kellerman, who came to propose terms of capitulation, acknowledged, that though the French artillery had hitherto been looked upon as the first in Europe, the British artillery in the battle of the 21st, had been served with far superior skill and dexterity. It is but justice to say at the same time, that the advance in column of the French troops on that occasion, is considered as one of the finest movements that has ever been executed. We have heard it described as a sight most sublimely awful.

Junot harangued his troops in the morning, and immediately before the battle, said to them—"Comrades, there are the English, and behind them is the sea—be cool and steady, you have only to drive them into it!" The order issued by Sir Arthur Wellesley to his troops, was briefly and simply this:—"My brave countrymen! drive the French out of the passes on the road to Lisbon;" and his order was fully and promptly executed. It was the French General Shibault who was killed, and General Bernier who was wounded and made prisoner. Loisson was missing, and supposed to be among the slain.

When General Bernier was taken by one of our grenadiers, he offered him his purse and watch to let him go; but the grenadier spurned the offer, brought the General to his Colonel, and was rewarded by Sir Arthur Wellesley with a purse.—The French General expressed to the English Colonel much surprize at the disinterestedness of the grenadier.—"Don't be surprised," said the Colonel, "We are not come as robbers."—Bernier then addressing himself to Sir A. Wellesley, said. "From the manner in which you have fought, I suppose you have got the picked men of the army of England."—"By no means," replied Sir Arthur, this is only a specimen of what the rest are."

GENERAL ORDERS

ISSUED BY GENERAL SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY, AFTER THE BATTLES OF THE 17TH AND 21ST.

"Head-quarters, Lourenha, Aug. 22.

"The Lieutenant-General was perfectly satisfied with the conduct of the troops in the action of yesterday, particularly with the gallantry displayed by the 5th, 9th, 38th, 60th, and 95th regiments, to whose lot it principally fell to engage the enemy.

"From the specimen afforded yesterday, of their behaviour in action, the Lieutenant-General feels confident that the troops will distinguish themselves whenever the enemy may give them another occasion, and it is only necessary for him to recommend to them a steady attention to their preservation of order and regularity, and strict obedience to the commands which the Officers may give.

"G. B. Tucker, D. A. G."

"Head-quarters, Vimeira, Aug. 21.

"Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley congratulates the army on the signal victory they have this day obtained over the enemy, and returns them his warmest thanks for their resolute and heroic conduct. He experienced the sincerest pleasure in witnessing various instances of the gallantry of the corps, and has in particular to notice the distinguished behaviour of the Royal Artillery; 20th light dragoons; the 29th, 40th, 2d bat. 43d, 50th, 2d bat. 52d, 60th, 71st, 82d, 2d bat. 95th, and 97th regiments.—It will afford the Lieutenant-General the greatest pleasure to repeat to the Commander in Chief, the bravery displayed by all the troops, and the high sense he entertains of their meritorious and excellent conduct throughout the day.

"G. B. Tucker, D. A. G."

As a specimen of the men with whom we have been contending, Capt. Campbell has brought home with him in the Kangaroo, about twenty of Junot's guards. Gen. Bellitier was also anxious immediately to visit England, but Gen. Kellerman advised him to stay to assist his countrymen in drawing up the terms of the capitulation.

The Duke of Abrantes (Junot), and his Secretary, have sent home open letters to their Duchesses, that an opportunity may be taken of transmitting them to France. These epistles are very laconic. They only assure their Ladies, they are in perfect health; and express a wish that they may be equally so. Not a word of battles, much less of defeats.

EXTRACT OF A PRIVATE LETTER FROM VIEMORA, 22 MILES FROM LISBON, AUG. 22.

"On the 17th our brave fellows forced a pass maintained by 6000 French, which exploit none but British troops could have achieved.

"Our light companies charged and routed the French with dreadful slaughter. Not more than two men could pass at a time. I have no time to inform you of a more glorious action fought yesterday at this place. We marched on this ground on the 10th inst. rested the 20th, and on the 21st, about nine A. M. we saw the enemy advancing over the hills, about 12 to 15,000 men. Part of our army moved off towards the sea, and the remainder stood in their lines, and waited the enemy's coming up, which they did in a most determined resolute manner, driving our advanced posts before them.

"At length the right of our army charged them, took 16 pieces of ordnance, waggons, horses, &c. The enemy thought to cut off our left, and charged about 5000, but they were completely routed with great slaughter, and lost their general in command. The 82d lost an Officer, Lieut. Deniel. We were completely victorious. The enemy lost 4600 men—their knapsacks were full of plunder—money, church plate, &c. I have a large chalice, taken out of one of their pockets—I have been now 14 days, and never had my clothes off. The enemy poisoned some of the wells on the 17th, of which some men were poisoned. I saw one of the 32d, and one of the 6th, in the agonies of death after drinking it.—Adieu! I write this on the ground."

The accounts from Spain will be equally gratifying to our Readers. That generous and high-minded community, whose devotion to the independence of their country, whose persevering bravery, whose patience under the greatest difficulties and privations, whose enthusiastic attachment to their young monarch, place them on a footing of equality with any people, modern or ancient, continues to obtain the most brilliant victories over their perfidious invaders. The Spanish Gazettes to the 22d corroborate the continued flight of Joseph Bonaparte from Spain; the evacuation of Burgos by the troops under the command of Bessieres, on the approach of Blake and Cuesta, and a complete victory gained by General Palafox over 11,000 Frenchmen, under Lefebvre, who made another desperate attack on Saragossa. In this last assault the enemy lost 5000 men, several pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition. The enemy were pursued by 14,000 Patriots, 4000 of whom were regular troops; and the French were completely driven out of Arragon. Moncey, who, with the remains of his retreating army, effected his retreat through the mountains of Valencia, commands the rear-guard of the retreating French force. The garrison of Barcelona is stated to have offered to capitulate, which, if it does not immediately do, it will be compelled by the Spanish army, which has been conveyed from Majorca by Lord Cochrane to that part of the Spanish coast.

Government have received accounts that General Reding had advanced to Madrid, and that Castanos was shortly expected there, for the purpose of making arrangements for the establishment of a general Government.

We are happy to find that the inhabitants of Cuba have expressed their determination to support their lawful Sovereign. Their example, we have no doubt, will be followed by the other Spanish Colonies.

Accounts from Holland were received on Friday, stating, that the ports of that country are now open to all exports, except hides, bark, and salt. Should this intelligence prove correct, the cause may not unreasonably be traced to the reverses of the French arms in Spain.

Last week one of our gun-brigs, on the Boulogne station, stood close in shore a few miles to the northward of that place, and, hoisting out a boat, a party landed upon the French coast, and penetrated for three miles into the country, without opposition, or seeing a single French soldier. They distributed several hundred copies of the Spanish Proclamations, &c. translated into French, which were received with avidity by the country people; and returning to their boat, rejoined their vessel without having been observed by any of Bonaparte's myrmidons.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised half an assize, or 2d. in the peck-loaf; to commence to-morrow, when the quartern-loaf of wheaten is to be sold for 12½d. and household 11½d.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived from Windsor, at the Queen's Palace, where he was received by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Kent and Cumberland. At two o'clock his Majesty held a Private Levee.

His Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council, which was attended by the Duke of Portland and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers.

Mr. Ryder, the Judge-Advocate, laid before his Majesty the proceedings of several Courts Martial.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Vice-Admiral Dacres, on his return from the command of Jamaica; and his son, Capt. Dacres, on his promotion, and return from the same place. Major-General Sir Charles Green, on his appointment to the command of the 16th regiment of foot. Major-General Skelrett, on his return from Jamaica, presented by Viscount Castlereagh.

The Duke of Portland and Mr. Ryder had long audiences, and were the last in attendance.

The Annual Regatta on the Lakes has taken place this year with unusual brilliancy; and was held on Windermere, instead of Keswick the usual place. The morning commenced with all the awful gloom of mists and storms, but the blaze of beauty which shone on the resplendent Lake, induced the amorous Phœbus to put forth his beams and drive away the envious clouds. Sir D. Fleming was Steward of the day, and the company having assembled at an early hour, ten pleasure yatchs, belonging to gentlemen in the neighbourhood, got underweigh; the race however was declined, as one of the boats, the Victory, it was well known would distance every competitor. After making a complete circuit of the Lake, the company went on shore at three to a sumptuous dinner, and the evening glided happily on midst mirth and rustic revelry. The rocks, the woods, and all the romantic landscape of Windermere, formed a scene for magic spells and incantations wild, and all the gentlemen were of course enchanted by the brilliant display of Lancashire witches.

LADIES' DRESSES.

PROMENADE COSTUME.—An Indian muslin dress, with flat satin sprigs, made high in the back, and brought in a horizontal line round the bosom; it has a hanging collar sewed on to the back and fastened in the front with an antique broach. The sleeves are long and full à l'eveque, vandyked at the wrist, and the dress is also vandyked round the bottom, and in a double row round the waist. The hair is dressed in easy flowing curls, with a vandyked bandeau of fawn coloured satin, placed negligently over the left brow, and ornamented with a wreath of variegated flowers, interspersed with jessamine. Such is the costume at the breakfast table, but when preparing for the promenade, the library or the race ground, the elegante calls for her Valencia cap and cloak; these two articles of dress are in one, and in a style novel and unique; the cap or hood, resembling in shape the cowl of the Order of St. Dominic, is of green lace net, worked with white stripes, with the collar coming on each side of the neck, to this is attached the cloak of green pelong satin, with a vandyke border, edged with narrow white point lace; the tout ensemble of this bizarre and romantic dress, gives a bewitching interest to the fair wearer, and pleases the fancies of the surrounding beaux in recollecting that although their fair companions wear the cowl, they have not yet taken the veil. Shoes high heeled, and of peagreen; the gloves are of straw coloured kid.

EVENING FULL DRESS.—This dress which for elegance and interest has never yet been exceeded, is the Pyrenean robe and tunic of sky-blue sarsnet, over a blue soft satin slip. The robe and tunic have each an Etruscan border, worked on broad white satin, or the border may be enriched with Moresque and Arabesque ornaments according to fancy; the border of the robe is surmounted with an easy flowing wreath of the grape vine worked in dark shades, which, to the eye of taste, gracefully unites the variegated extremity with the broad mass of blue in the robe itself. The tunic is open behind, but fastened with a range of shell clasps, forming a border à la pelerine, in allusion to the costume of the romantic ages, when the enthusiastic females of the northern districts of Spain traversed the gloomy chain of the Pyrenees in their holy pilgrimages. The back of the tunic is full and drawn to the form round the bosom, the sleeves are short and plain, bordered in the Etruscan or Moresque stile, and seamed in open work, the edge of the bosom is also bordered to correspond with the other parts of the dress. Over this is a most superb drapery of rich point lace, studded with stars, or interspersed with sprigs agreeable to fancy; it is in length six yards, and one in breadth, with a rich fancy-worked border, and is thrown over the shoulder, hanging negligently behind, whilst the ends are brought forward and gracefully twined round the arm, or drawn carelessly across the form with a piquante and irresistible simplicity. The hair is dressed à l'Espagnole, with a wreath of flowers interwoven; and the shoes are of blue satin.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES.—Blue coats or dark green, with gilt buttons, are now universally worn, but black coat and waistcoat is sometimes adopted by those who wish not to be as every body. The waists of the coats are pretty long, and rather wide, and the waistcoats are a little longer than they have lately been. For morning wear, either in town or at the watering places, the plover mixture is coming into vogue, single breasted, and with basket buttons; printed striped waistcoats, and white or nankeen trowsers, or lead-coloured pantaloons, with half-boots. As the Races are now so universal, and the shooting-season just commencing, little variety can, indeed, be expected, but green jackets, and jockey costumes must for some time be the order of the day.

Tuesday a Meeting of the Freeholders of Middlesex was convened, at the Mermaid Tavern, Hackney, to take into consideration the relative situations of England with Spain and Portugal, and the propriety of expressing the sense of the County thereupon, as well as of addressing his Majesty on the subject. —A discussion of some length then took place on the propriety of adjournment, and after several other resolutions had been moved and carried, the Meeting resolved to adjourn. The thanks of the meeting were finally voted, and the Sheriffs and the Freeholders were dispersed. No time was appointed for the next meeting.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the destination of the Nottingham was altered to Madras and China, instead of China direct. The Court adjourned at seven o'clock.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. IV.

I venerate the man, whose heart is warm,
Whose hands are pure, whose doctrine and whose life,
Coincident, exhibit lucid proof
That he is honest in the Sacred Cause!—COWPER.

REV. GERRARD ANDREWS, D. D.

OF ST. JAMES'S, PICCADILLY.

SUCCESS is too seldom the result of merit. What was once observed of virtue, that it is its own reward, and of vice, that it is its own punishment, may also be affirmed as it respects genius. It is a consoling persuasion, and it would be an encouraging one—if it were true. The fate of GERRARD ANDREWS, notwithstanding, forms a felicitous exception to the lot of talents generally. His deserts have been discovered, confessed, and compensated.

This gentleman is originally from Cambridge; I believe, from Trinity College. He started fairly in the career for clerical preferment; his competition has been open; and his present eminence is as gratifying to the admirers of real worth, as it is honourable to himself. He is deservedly popular. Let not, however, these remarks be misunderstood. To inculcate the notion that abilities will alone insure success to their possessor, is only to elate the ingenious and mislead the unsuspecting. Great as are the talents of Mr. Andrews, admirable as are his literary attainments, unexceptionable as is the reputation of his character, and arduous as have been his exertions, he depended not implicitly on these advantages. Prudence prepared his prosperity. He united himself to a lady of respectable fortune; and his marriage, while it has enriched the store of his private satisfactions, must be considered as having had very beneficial effects on his public progress.

Not to enter into a tedious specification of the various situations which Mr. Andrews has filled as a preacher, it may be sufficient to observe that he was, during many years, alternate Evening Lecturer at the Magdalen and the Foundling Chapels. Here he attracted very considerable attention. So highly were his sermons appreciated, that a Lady of Distinction presented to him a valuable Living in the country, conditioning principally to be there favoured with his labours. He resigned this preferment on being promoted to St. James's.

The circumstances attending his appointment to that church were extraordinary, and ought to be recorded. He obtained it without solicitation, without expectation, on his part; and, at the same time, in opposition to the intrigues of interest and the demands of power. I believe the facts to be these. During the delivery of his Lental Lectures, in 1798*, the present Bishop of London was sensibly struck with the numbers and quality of those who continually resorted to St. James's Church, especially when he contrasted them with the dismaying appearance of the congregation usually attending there. I remember old Dr. Parker, then rector of this place. From never being an interesting divine, he had degenerated into a species of second childhood. His teeth were gone, his sight had waxed dim, his steps were become tremulous, his memory failed him, and his understanding deteriorated. Discontented hearers and deserted pews, the inevitable consequences of inadequate preaching, appealed silently, but powerfully, to the feelings of our present metropolitan prelate. Bishop Porteus, in fine, determined to remedy the evil. Estimating the extensive importance of the situation, and convinced how much depended on the person by whom it might be occupied, he therefore, on the decease of Dr. Parker, nominated Mr. Andrews Rector of St. James's. I have already stated the honourable manner in which the whole transaction was conducted.

This nomination has been productive of effects the most salutary. It has gratified the great body of a wealthy and populous parish; it has infused animation into the religion of a fashionable and commanding part of this town; and it has excited the admiration, and stimulated the exertions, of many of the younger clergy, by making personal merit, instead of particular influence, the standard of promotion. We want more such appointments. It is in vain to deplore the rapid progress of Methodism, but it is something effectually to have resisted it. Fill our national pulpits with able and conscientious preachers, oppose earnestness to declamation, information to ignorance, and with knowledge mingle zeal. This is the legitimate warfare of orthodoxy. If the church is to triumph over her opponents, it must be the triumph of truth, of honesty, of dignity, of ability. She must attach the affection, conciliate the confidence, cultivate the esteem, and command the admiration of her children. All this it is in her power to accomplish!

Of those modern divines, who seem calculated to support the interests and extend the influence of the Church of England, DR. ANDREWS stands conspicuously eminent. I proceed to comment on his Preaching, both as to matter and manner.

Perfectly recollecting his Inaugural Discourse—I mean, the sermon he delivered on taking possession of the Pulpit of St. James's,—and having since frequently heard him, perhaps, while I particularise his excellencies, I may be qualified to point out what I consider to be his defects, as a preacher.

Argumentative, rather than impassioned, he excels in forming striking inferences from circumstances on which others have scarcely touched. His reasonings, which are often novel, are always able, and, generally, conclusive. He is therefore fond of illustrating the Evidences of Christianity; and of enforcing the practice of the Moral Duties, by shewing, in the same way, their propriety and necessity. All that human information can supply, or all that human ingenuity can suggest, in aid of Divine Truth, as to elucidation or confirmation, occurs readily to his mind, and is seriously impressed by him on the minds of his auditors. Here he is almost unequalled.

His deficiencies are as perceptible. He is too dictatorial; he has too much of the teacher, but too little of the preacher. If he satisfies the judgment, he is too indifferent to the feelings, of his hearers. He always compels consent, but he seldom follows up conviction. He subjugates scepticism, but he operates not on contrition. He confounds the infidel, he establishes the faithful; but, he does not sufficiently alarm the transgressor. Perhaps he has been solicitous chiefly to adapt himself to the character of the age; which, instead of being anxious to understand and imbibe the vital principles of Christianity, calls for fresh demonstrations of the authenticity of the Sacred Scriptures themselves.

When will our established religious ministers confide more in the assurances made by their Divine Master to his first disciples?—"Take no thought, how or what ye shall "speak; for it shall be given you, in that same hour, what "ye shall speak. It is not ye that speak; but the Spirit of "your Father, which speaketh in you." Mr. Andrews is fully acquainted with this consolatory injunction; and, in commenting on the character of the apostle Paul, he has acknowledged its truth, and admired its effects. Still he hesitates to trust himself, even for a few moments, out of the leading-strings of manuscript. I fear this defect is in him irremediable.

There is another topic, however unpleasing it may prove, on which impartiality requires me to dwell. What I now advert to, is his mode of repeating the customary Prayer before the Sermon. I will not harshly call it indevotion on his part; but I want words by which otherwise to describe the feeling Mr. Andrews has communicated to me, as it arises from hearing him pronounce this admirable part of our church-service. Nothing can be more improper, not to say unnatural and irreverential, than his hurried and business-like custom of getting over these prayers, particularly the one denominated our Lord's Prayer! He will excuse this freedom of animadversion. While I perceive and attest his merits, I must regret his inadvertencies and errors.

A correspondent wishes to see "more Free-Chapels," and "good pains-taking and regular ministers." There is something antecedent; and that is, Free-Churches.—Chapels have some excuse, in levying a sort of poll-tax: they have often no parochial resources; they originate in voluntary subscriptions, and they exist by voluntary contributions. Does Mr Andrews know any thing of the interior management of his Church? I hope he does not.

 Circumstances have induced me to defer an account of the FOUNDLING, and its MINISTERS, till next Sunday. This account has been delayed, not merely from the circumstance of the FOUNDLING CHAPEL having been recently closed; but owing to some extraordinary information, materially affecting the Public, with which I have been recently favoured.

THE THEATRE.

HAY-MARKET.

On Wednesday last a severe battle was fought at this theatre, between a nameless author's friends, and the most reasonable part of the audience. The former poured such a volley of plaudits, that the latter whose only means of attack consisted in the musketry of hisses, were at last overpowered by the superior artillery of their foes. The cause of contention was very slight, for all this mighty bustle arose from a single Yes or No, a new farce, the plot of which we would faithfully delineate, did it really deserve so much space and attention.

A wicked hypocritical quaker, who because he knows his intimate friend has settled his fortune on him, should his ward prove unworthy his patronage, blackens the character of the youth, but is ultimately disappointed by his own folly: a young man whose wildness has not impaired the goodness of his heart: an old maid good natured with every one, save her brother; and in raptures with modern improvements: a young girl, who by her labour has supported her brother, a sailor, during a two month's illness: a drunken corporal: an old man obstinate and passionate, a scoffer at present times, and an admirer of the past, form the characters of this afterpiece. A few, improbable mistakes, compose the chief features of its plot; and barrenness of incidents is visible throughout. It cannot boast novelty; for hypocrisy which is the spring of the whole action is now become nearly as common on the stage as in social life. It closes with an appeal to the public, to show whether they were satisfied with its merits Yes or No. More than a hundred Noes attended by numerous hisses instantly burst forth, but the loudness of the Yes compensated for their small number. The author, whoever he be, was at last saved from condemnation by the stentorian lungs of his friends, amongst which three gentlemen in the pit made themselves conspicuous by a tremendous and unceasing discharge of yes and plaudits, which at last won the night.

The dialogue is chaste, but lays but few claims to wit; the improbabilities with which the plot abounds, are too numerous even for a farce, but the music is pretty, and the acting of the performers excellent. Liston, in Broadbrim, was equal to himself in his best characters, Mathews, in Corporal Barrel, did more for his part than the author had done; and Farley, in Captain Fervour, displayed so much vivacity, mixed with feeling, that we are astonished he is not brought more frequently on the stage at our winter theatres, where he would do honour to many characters, which are now in the hands of actors greatly inferior to him in talent. Mr. Grove gave as much effect to Sir Barometer Old Style, and Mrs. Davenport, to Miss Snap, as the part required; and Mrs. Liston sang several songs with her usual delightful simplicity and taste.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

It was reported here on Wednesday that the Brest fleet had again ventured out. The following is stated to be an extract from the journal of an officer on board the Minerva.

"Monday, Aug. 28.

"The French fleet are again out.—The frigate destroyed was called the Artemise, of 40 guns."

About twenty-five transports sailed from the Nore on Sunday, to proceed to Langeland, for the purpose of bringing away the Spanish troops, who will be furnished here with ammunition and cloathing, before they are sent to Spain. Of the latter they have had no supply whatever since they left their native country.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.

Wednesday evening, as a young woman, with a child in her arms, was crossing the Strand at the foot of Catharine street, her foot slipped, and the child fell out of her arms. A Gentleman's carriage was passing violently at the time; and the coachman though called to stop, by a boy belonging to Messrs. Anstey and Co. linen-drapers, immediately opposite, drove on, and one of the wheels went over the head of the infant, who was conveyed into the shop of Mr. Stanton, surgeon, dreadfully lacerated, and died almost immediately afterwards. The carriage drove on with the same rapidity through Temple-bar, and along Fleet-street, amidst the cries of "Stop coach, murder!" but in vain. It had a yellow body and plated mouldings; the coachman wore a dark blue or brown livery, and drove bay horses. There was no footman behind. The child was the son of Mr. Penny, varnish-maker, in Long Acre.—We hope the coachman will be discovered, for his conduct was most criminal.—A Coroner's Inquest sat on the body of the child on Friday, when a Verdict was returned "That the Child came by its death through the extreme negligence of the Coachman, and a deodand of 50*l.* was ordered to be levied on the coach."

BIRTH.

On Tuesday, the 30th ult. Mrs. Fitzhenry, the wife of a soldier in the Life Guards, was brought to bed of four still-born children (all boys), and is now in a hopeful way of recovery.

DIED.

Count Lodovick Tyskewics, formerly Grand Marshal of Lithuania, died lately at Wilna, in the 55th year of his age.

On the 22d of November last, in the fort of Ally Ghur, near Delhi, Lieutenant David Charles Livingstone, youngest son of Sir Alexander Livingstone, Bart. of West-quarter, Stirlingshire.

Lately at Cork, the Right Hon. Lady Ann Margaretta Fitzgerald, daughter of the late Earl of Kerry, and relict of Maurice Fitzgerald, Knight of Kerry, by whom she was left a widow in 1799.

LIEUT.-GENERAL THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY, K.B.

THE public enthusiasm respecting the gallant Hero of Vimiera has induced us to spare neither Pains nor Expence in procuring a Correct Likeness of this distinguished Warrior; we are also happy to meet the general burst of applause, by presenting to our readers an accurate Military Sketch of his extended and various services, procured by particular favour, and the authenticity of which is indubitable. Sir Arthur is brother to the present Marquis of Wellesley, and the Hon. W. W. Pole, and is third son of the late Earl of Mornington; he was born on the 1st of May, 1769, and went to Eton at an early age, where he laid the foundation of a classical education, but his genius prompting him to the profession of arms, his father, at the Peace of 1783, permitted him to proceed to Angers, in France, in order to study fortification and the other sciences connected with a military life, under the tuition of the celebrated Pignerol. On finishing his studies he received his Ensigncy, not as many young Officers do, merely to sport a sword and cockade, but in order to make the army his profession; here he paid that strict attention to his military duties, spending his hours of relaxation in studying the works of the best Authors on the Art of War, that he not only gained the esteem and confidence of his superiors, but prepared himself for those arduous situations in which he has so often gallantly acquitted himself. His rise to the rank of Field Officer was rapid, for at the age of four and twenty, we find him Major in the army, and embarked with that force, which was intended, under the command of Lord Moira, to assist the Royalists in Britanny; but the unfortunate turn of affairs in the Netherlands, rendered it necessary for his Lordship to proceed to Ostend, where he arrived just in time to assist in the evacuation of that post. His Lordship having formed a junction with the British army, was ordered to cover the retreat with his force of 10,000 men, and in this service Major Wellesley had many opportunities of distinguishing himself, particularly at Alost, where they had taken post on the retreat of the Duke of York from Grammont. On the 6th of July the French army had advanced near to Alost, and having attacked the out-posts, drove in all the picquets; but the British rapidly forming kept them in check for a considerable time, and at last obliged them to retire, leaving a number of killed and wounded behind them. During the whole of this memorable retreat, Major Wellesley commanded the rear-guard of this little army, and covered it with a spirited and judicious activity, under the most trying difficulties; so as not only to acquire the approbation of his superiors, but also to raise the admiration of all his brother Officers; some faint idea of the sufferings of the whole detachment may be formed, when we recollect that from the time of their landing at Ostend, they had marched until their embarkation, without either tents or baggage.

Shortly after being promoted to the 33d regiment, Lieut.-Colonel Wellesley accompanied his brother, the then Lord Mornington, to India, and immediately on his arrival was put in orders to embark with his regiment along with the force destined for the attack of Manilla, but the intrigues of France with the native Princes, obliged the new Governor General to change his plans on the instant, and reserve his troops for the defence of the British territories. It was now ascertained that the friendly protestations of Tippoo Sultaun were merely a cloak for his ambitious designs, the Governor General therefore resolved on decisive measures, and the Madras army, under Lieut.-General Harris, received orders to concentrate at Vellore, about which time also the Nizam's contingent, amounting to about 6000 of the Company's troops, and an equal number of his own native infantry, marched from Hyderabad, under the command of Meer Allum Bahauder, and arrived at Vellore in time to join the British army. In order to place the Nizam's force on the most respectable footing, and render it as efficient as possible, the Commander in Chief thought it prudent to augment it with the 33d regiment, giving the command of all the British troops serving with Meer Allum, to the Hon. Colonel Wellesley, an arrangement which was highly gratifying to the native General, and gave additional confidence to his army. Having learnt that Tippoo had moved from Periapatam on the 14th of March, 1799, with his whole force, in order to meet the British; our troops at day break on the morning of the 27th marched towards Mallavelly, Colonel Wellesley's division moving so as to cover the army on the left flank, prepared to act according to circumstances. Our army had advanced but a small distance from its ground, when Tippoo's forces were seen drawn up in order of battle; a cannonade immediately commenced on the part of the enemy, which, as the line formed, was answered by our own artillery and soon general.

The crafty Sultaun determined to make a bold push on the Nizam's force, expecting an easy victory; he however only gave Colonel Wellesley an opportunity of distinguishing himself, for a column of two thousand men having moved forward in excellent order, were unexpectedly opposed by the 33d regiment, who coolly reserved their fire, and having received that of the enemy at the distance of 60 yards, gallantly advanced with the bayonet, when the column gave way, and being thrown into disorder, the whole of Tippoo's army retreated with the utmost rapidity towards Seringapatam.—Lieut.-General Harris having taken post with his whole force for the siege of that city, Colonel Wellesley had many opportunities of proving his worth, particularly on the 5th of April, when sent to clear the Tope or wood of Sultaun Pettah in order to facilitate the approaches of our troops; and on a subsequent occasion was employed on a service which required both skill and promptitude, for the enemy being still in possession of an entrenchment not more than 230 yards from the head of our approaches, it became necessary to dislodge them, to secure our working parties from their musketry; and the direction as well as execution of this attack being entrusted to the Colonel who that day commanded in the trenches, our troops advanced a little after sunset, threw the enemy into confusion and soon gained their object. Such indeed was the high opinion of the Commander-in-Chief of Colonel Wellesley's professional coolness and intrepidity, that on the never to be forgotten 4th of May, when Seringapatam fell to the British arms, he was stationed in the advanced works with a reserve to the storming party, with general discretionary orders to give his support where it might be necessary. In the General Orders he was particularly noticed for the gallant manner in which he had conducted the several attacks against the outworks of the enemy, and immediately after the capture, was appointed Commandant of Seringapatam, where the order, regularity, and confidence which was soon established, were principally owing to his good sense and activity, as he went personally into the houses of the principal people, placing the most orderly soldiers as safeguards, thus convincing the natives that the English were as much to be loved as friends, as feared when enemies. It having been determined on to restore the ancient line of Princes to the throne of Mysore, and to remove the families of Hyder Ali and Tippoo, to a place of security, the Governor-General expressed the greatest solicitude that the removal should be effected with as much delicacy as possible; his instructions therefore to the Commissioners, of whom Colonel Wellesley was one, were strongly marked with his humane wishes to mitigate the most rigorous parts of this revolution, and the details of this affair fell to the lot of the Colonel as Commandant. When we consider the smallness of the British force at this time in the Mysore, and that a detachment must also be sent to guard the Princes to Vellore, through a country in which they still had many friends, too much praise cannot be given to the Colonel for his prudential precautions which precluded the possibility of commotion or escape; and it is to his discretion, activity, and humanity throughout the whole of this difficult and arduous task, that we are to ascribe the facility with which it was accomplished.

Our limits will not allow us to follow the subject of our biography through every intermediate detail, until he became Major-General, a rank which he attained in 1802, before the breaking out of the Mahratta war, in which he shortly afterwards fully established his character. The immediate cause of this war, it is now well known and acknowledged by all parties was the refusal of the Confederated Chieftains to withdraw those armies which they had collected on the frontier of our Ally the Subahdar of the Deccan; impressed with the necessity of a bold and decisive policy, the Governor-General used every means to establish a connection between the Peishwah and the British Government, so as to afford him a protection and security from Scindiah and Holkar, but as Scindiah after the defeat of Holkar, soon began to shew symptoms of hostilities, an army of observation was formed under Major-General Wellesley, who had orders to communicate during some very delicate negociations with the Resident at Poonah. In the course of this business Scindiah and the other Chiefs sent the most friendly letters to the Major-General, but his sagacity soon discovered that these were merely for the purpose of delay, and having conducted the business with the most consummate skill, and informed his brother of every circumstance, the Governor-General immediately assembled a large force, of which a division was placed under his command with orders to direct his operations against Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar, who were posted with an army of 38,000 cavalry and 10,000 infantry at Julgury, at the foot of the Adjuntee Ghaut in the Deccan. He immediately commenced his march against the fortress of Ameednaghur, the Pettah of which was carried by escalade with the utmost gallantry and spirit, and on the 10th of August 1803, batteries were erected against the East, which surrendered two days after, by which the most important advantages were secured.—On the 24th, the Confederate Chiefs entered the Nizam's territories, and directed their march towards Hyderabad the capital, but the Major-General, by his judicious movements, kept them so completely in check, that foiled in their designs, they turned suddenly to the northward where they formed a junction with a large force under Messieurs Pohlman and Dupont, two French Officers who had with them an immense train of artillery; but General Wellesley being joined on the 21st of September at Budnapoor by Colonel Stevenson, with his accustomed promptitude and gallantry determined to attack them before they could strengthen themselves in this position, and a judicious eye may discover a great analogy between his conduct on this occasion, and his quick decision on the late glorious 17th of August, when he forced the passes previous to the battle of the 21st. The British force immediately marched in two divisions, but on the 23d of September, when General Wellesley arrived at Naulnia, he learnt that the Confederates were strongly posted at Assye, with a river in front, whose steep banks were impassable for artillery; though his troops had marched twenty miles through a difficult country, he instantly formed the bold resolution of attacking them without waiting for Colonel Stevenson, and commenced the action on the left, where their guns and infantry were posted, with his small force of 4500 men, although their's consisted of 10,000 infantry, upwards of 30,000 cavalry, and 100 guns. Our little army advanced under a most destructive fire, and finally drove them from their guns, the General himself having his horse shot under him in the hottest of the action; indeed our Hero seems to have displayed the greatest promptitude, judgment, and personal courage, nor did the British troops on any occasion ever shew more exemplary order, firmness, discipline and alacrity; the whole line, which was led by General Wellesley in person, advanced to the charge with the utmost steadiness, although unsupported by artillery, and compelled the enemy, after a hard fought action of three hours, to abandon the field of battle with all their artillery and stores. This gallant conduct of Major-General Wellesley, was recognised by the Thanks of both Houses of Parliament, on the 3d of May, 1804, "for his important, brilliant, and memorable services:" and on the first of September following he was elected a Knight Companion of the Bath.

On his return to Europe, he took his seat as Member for Newport, in Hants, and shewed equal abilities in the Senate as in the field, particularly in the defence of his Brother, from the attacks of a disappointed party. After a life of such activity, he now sought for the calm delights of domestic happiness, and was married to Miss Packenham, of the Longford family, his present amiable Lady, on the 10th of April, 1806; but his talents were not permitted to sink into oblivion, for we find him soon after appointed Chief Secretary to the Duke of Richmond, the Viceroy of Ireland, which also gave him a seat in the Privy Council. From this state of comparative inactivity he was soon called to take part in the memorable attack on Copenhagen, which is too recent to require particular notice; it is sufficient to mention that the Danes having formed an army in Zealand of three or four battalions of disciplined troops, besides a number of armed peasantry, it was found necessary to disperse this force, and keep the country quiet, which service was performed by Sir Arthur, with his usual spirit and humanity.

In 1808, Sir Arthur was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-General, but his latter exploits are so recent, that we can only refer our readers to the interesting and authentic Plan of Attack at Vimeira, together with the Military Memoir which accompanies it.

PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF VIMIERA,

FOUGHT ON THE 21ST OF AUGUST, 1808.

The Plan is placed with the South uppermost in order to preserve the relative Situations of Right and Left as described in The Gazette.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE
BATTLE OF VIMIERA
SERVING AS AN EXPLANATION TO THE PLATE.

The Battle of Vimiera will be an important era in our History. It is one of those decisive occurrences which not only terminate a campaign, and annihilate the resources of the enemy in that quarter, but produce a decided superiority in the subsequent operations of the victors. In this it bears a strong resemblance to the battles of Marengo, Ulm, and Jena. It has changed completely the character of the war. The French, who had been for so many years in the habit of carrying fire and devastation into the states of their enemies, and of subsisting their armies at their expence, will now be reduced to the necessity of defending their own frontiers against an invading force.

The account transmitted by Sir Arthur Wellesley is so clear, so judicious, that it would be presumption to add any thing to it.

The village of Vimiera stands in a valley, through which runs the river Maceira; at the back, and to the Westward and Northward of this village, is a mountain, the western point of which touches the sea, and the eastern is separated by a deep ravine from the heights, over which passes the road which leads from Lourinha and the Northward, to Vimiera. The greater part of the infantry, the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 8th brigades were posted on this mountain, with eight pieces of artillery; Major-Gen. Hill's brigade being on the right; Major-Gen. Ferguson's on the left, having one battalion on the heights, separated from the mountain. On the eastern and southern side of the town is a hill which is entirely commanded, particularly on its right, by the mountain to the westward of the town, and commanding all the ground in the neighbourhood to the Southward and Eastward, on which Brig.-Gen. Fane was posted with his riflemen, and the 50th regiment, and Brig.-Gen. Anstruther with his brigade, with half a brigade of six-pounders and half a brigade of nine-pounders. The ground over which passes the road from Lourinha commanded the left of this height.

The cavalry and the reserve of artillery were in the valley, between the hills on which the infantry stood; both flanking and supporting Brigadier-General Fane's advanced guard.

The enemy first appeared at eight o'clock in the morning, in large bodies of cavalry on our left upon the heights on the road to Lourinha; and it was soon obvious that the attack would be made upon our advanced guard, and the left of our position; and Major-General Ferguson's brigade was immediately moved across the Ravine to the heights, on the road to Lourinha, with three pieces of cannon; he was followed successively by Brig.-General Nightingale with his brigade, and three pieces of cannon; Brigadier-General Ackland with his brigade, and Brigadier-General Bowes with his brigade. These troops were formed (Major-General Ferguson's brigade in the first line; Brigadier-General Nightingale's in the second; and Brigadier-General Bowes's and Ackland's, in columns in the rear) on those heights, with their right upon the valley which leads into Vimiera; and their left upon the other Ravine, which separates these heights from the range which terminates at the landing-place at Macceira. On these last-mentioned heights, the Portuguese troops which had been in the bottom, near Vimiera, were posted in the first instance, and they were supported by Brigadier-General Craufurd's brigade.

The enemy's attack began in several columns upon the whole of the troops on this height; on the left they advanced, notwithstanding the fire of the riflemen, close to the 50th regiment, and were checked and driven back only by the bayonets of that corps. The 2d battalion, 43d regiment, were likewise closely engaged with them in the road which leads into Vimiera; a part of that corps having been ordered into the church-yard to prevent them from penetrating into the town. On the right of the position they were repulsed by the bayonets of the 97th regiment, which corps was successfully supported by the 2d battalion 52d regiment, which, by an advance in column, took the enemy in flank.

Nearly at the same time the enemy's attack commenced upon the heights on the road to Lourinha. This attack was supported by a large body of cavalry, and was made with the usual impetuosity of the French troops. It was received with steadiness by Major-General Ferguson's brigade, consisting of the 36th, 40th, and 71st regiments; and these corps charged as soon as the enemy approached them, who gave way, and they continued to advance upon him supported by the 2d, one of the corps of Brigadier-General Nightingale's brigade, which, as the ground extended, afterwards formed a part of the first line; by the 29th regiment, and by Brigadier-General Bowes's and Ackland's brigade, while Brigadier-General Craufurd's Brigade, and the Portuguese troops, in two lines, advanced along the height on the left. In the advance of Major-General Ferguson's brigade six pieces of cannon were taken from the enemy, with many prisoners, and vast numbers were killed and wounded.

The enemy afterwards made an attempt to recover a part of his artillery by attacking the 71st and 82d regiments, which were halted in a valley in which it had been taken. These regiments retired from the low grounds in the valley to the heights, where they halted, faced about, fired, and advanced upon the enemy, who had by that time arrived in the low ground, and they thus obliged him again to retire with great loss.

In this action, in which the whole of the French force in Portugal was employed under the command of the Duke D'Abrantes in person, in which the enemy was certainly superior in cavalry and artillery, and in which not more than half of the British army was actually engaged, he has sustained a signal defeat, and has lost 13 pieces of cannon, 23 ammunition waggons, with powder, shells, stores of all descriptions, and 20,000 rounds of musket ammunition. One general officer (Beniere) has been wounded and taken prisoner, and a great many officers and soldiers have been killed, wounded, and taken.

ANECDOTES RESPECTING THE CAMPAIGN IN PORTUGAL.

In the battle of the 21st. the French had in the field about 15,200 men, of which 1200 were cavalry: this latter force by no means distinguished itself, not having once come to a charge in the course of the day; but its position and numbers were formidable, and it contributed to keep a considerable body of the British troops in check, occupied by watching its movements. Their uniform was green. The Shrapnell Shells (so called from their inventor, Colonel Shrapnell, of the artillery) in particular made dreadful havoc among the ranks of the French. They contained about 100 musket bullets, and are calculated to explode at given distances, on which they instantly spread death and devastation around. What contributed materially to the defeat of the French, was the scientific manner in which the Commander in Chief met their attack. The French army advanced in three large columns, in such a manner as to bring them all to bear upon the British left and centre.—Invariably as each advanced, independently of the resistance it met with in the front, it was taken on each flank by the fire of corps advanced for that purpose, by a small change in their position; by which means they lost a surprising number of men before they could put it to the issue of the bayonet. In no case did the French come to the resort of this latter weapon, that they were not instantly broken, not standing its push an instant.

The advance of the enemy to the attack was impetuous, and even furious. As they approached, they saluted the English with every opprobrious epithet in which their language is so eminently fertile. While, on the contrary, the latter, in derision, cheered them as they approached. Their dress was singular: it was blue, with white facings; over the whole of which was worn a white woollen surtout, somewhat like a waggoner's smock frock; their caps square, like those of the Hublans; and goat skin knapsacks. Their musquetry was throughout formidable, particularly that of two Swiss regiments in their service, who behaved most gallantly. Their Voltigeurs were, upon the whole, good, but far inferior in activity and real service to the English riflemen. The proportion of forces in the field was greatly in favour of the English, but not so of those who were actually engaged. In short, the battle of Vimiera was decided by superior Generalship in the Leader, and superior bravery in the soldier—every manœuvre was practised in it which could arise out of the combined and various movements of attack and defence—repented change of position occurred on both sides, and the palm of victory was at length the prize of him who best deserved to wear it, after a long and arduous contest of nearly four hours.

Respecting the French Generals engaged on that day, a few words may not be uninteresting. Of the personal conduct of Junot, who commanded at the battle of Vimiera, little is known. His captured Officers, and even those of high rank, spoke very slightly, and even of reprobation, of his manœuvres during the action. General Loison is as little spoken of; he has, however, the reputation of being an able man. General Laborde'd s ingulished himself at Roleia on the 17th, when the mountain passes were so ably contested with the English. His reputation is that of an experienced Officer, but he bears a most ferocious character. General Brenlefe was also distinguished at the affair of Roleia. He thrice led the attack which proved so destructive to the 9th and 29th regiments of foot, and thus covered the retreat of Laborde with the main body of the army, and afterwards retired himself in good order, though with great loss.—Here it was that Colonels Lake and Stewart fell. He was not, however, so fortunate on the 21st, being made a prisoner in the gallant charge of General Ferguson's brigade, which broke the enemy's right column, at the head of which Bremiere fought.—It is impossible here not to notice some circumstances connected with the capture of this Officer. He surrendered himself upon the column giving way, to Corporal Ross, of the 71st regiment, and immediately pulled out his watch and money, which, with his sword, epaulettes, and sash, he pressed upon his captor:—this gallant man, however, refused every thing he was offered, brought the General in safety to Colonel Pack, and delivered him up to that Officer. Bremiere, in astonishment, could not help exclaiming—"What sort of a man can this be—he has done me the greatest services—has brought me here safe at the risk of his life—and yet refuses to take from me all the reward I can at present offer him!" To which Colonel Pack rather drily observed,—"We are British Soldiers, Sir, and not Plunderers." Our readers will be glad, however, to know that such conduct did not pass unrewarded:—as soon as Sir Arthur Wellesley was made acquainted with it, he asked it as a favour from Colonel Pack to make him a serjeant on the field of battle (with which the Colonel immediately complied), and gave from his own pocket a handsome gratuity to this generous fellow. The conduct, on that day, of a cousin of this identical Corporal Ross, who was Piper to the same regiment, is too remarkable to be passed over in silence. As he pushed on in his ranks fighting bravely, his pipes being slung behind him for the present, he received a severe wound in the leg from a musket ball—finding himself disabled, he deliberately sat down on the ground, and, unstrapping his instrument, he called out—"Weel, my bra' lads, I can gang no farther wi' ye a fighting; but de'el ha' my saul if ye sal want music;" and immediately began playing his most warlike airs with his utmost might, and the greatest unconcern. Gen. Kellerman, who was deputed by Junot to treat for terms on which to surrender his army, commanded the Reserve in the action of the 21st. He it was who endeavoured to retake the cannon taken by Gen. Ferguson's brigade, in a desperate attack on the 71st and 82d regiments, which were halted in the valley where they had been lost. In this attempt, however, he was foiled, by a brilliant manœuvre of the Commander in Chief, who, from his situation on the high ground, seeing the disadvantage to which these corps would be attacked in the vale, ordered them to retire to the heights, which they very reluctantly obeyed. Arrived there, they halted, faced about, fired, and charged down the hill upon the enemy, who had by this time reached the low grounds, with such impetuosity and effect, as totally to defeat and oblige him to retire with great loss, leaving the six pieces of cannon behind him. This Officer is the son of the celebrated Marshal of the same name. On arriving at the British Head-quarters on the 22d, he did not seem in the least cast down by the disastrous affairs of the 17th and 21st, nor did he shew the slightest feeling or sympathy for the misfortunes of the many hundreds of his fellow soldiers who were dead and dying of their wounds all around. On dining at the General's table, to which of course he was invited, he seemed surprised at the hard biscuit which he found there, and said—"Faith, General, if I thought you had been so badly provided, I would have brought you some fresh bread!"

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-SEVEN.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF OUR VICTORIES IN PORTUGAL.

Measures of defensive warfare, bordering on pusillanimity, unusual in the councils of this country, were adopted after the battle of Austerlitz. The death of a great Statesman, attributed to grief and disappointment, was considered as a proof of the inutility of our exertions in favour of the Continent. The rapid success of the enemy, the humiliation of a powerful monarchy, the retreat of the Russian armies, and the acquiescence of the Prussian Cabinet in the inevitable exactions of the Victor, were adduced in support of this system; and the declamations of a faction triumphed over the good sense and the policy of the nation. The necessity of peace, and the inefficacy of resistance were proclaimed by one party, and countenanced by the silence and dejection of the other. A few enlightened men, whatever indignation they might have felt in consequence of this unwarrantable despondency, were unable to oppose this degrading innovation in our councils, and yielded to the exigency of the moment. A change of Administration was thought necessary; and with it a change of political conduct. The multitude, as usual, judging from the impulse of the moment, and overwhelmed by the reverses of our Allies, considered as the intuitive wisdom of statesmen, what was only the effect of intemperate and unprincipled opposition. Even the party itself, intoxicated by this unmerited reputation, continued to waver between the duties of their new station and the impolitic measures they proposed when in opposition.

This was the secret of that fatal inconsistency, of that vacillating policy, which marked their administration. They had not the manly candour to acknowledge the destructive tendency of their former suggestions; and from incompetency or want of principle they adopted conciliation and concession, supported by vigorous self-defence, in preference to our ancient vigour and unyielding policy. Weak and unprincipled men! A series of fifteen instructive years, the annals of every people who had risen to power and opulence, our own history for two centuries, the energy and enterprising spirit of the British nation, were inadequate to make them feel the danger and folly of such measures. A pusillanimous fluctuation was visible, for the first time in our councils; and they had the honour to discover that as our generals and soldiers were inferior to those of France; it would be the highest policy to endeavour to obtain an honourable peace from the enemy; and, if disappointed in this expectation, to confine our future efforts to the defence of our own altars and firesides. Thus a disgraceful imprisonment within our own limits, and a voluntary renunciation of the pretensions of former statesmen, were impudently pronounced to be the acme of political wisdom, and rendered imperiously necessary from the preponderance of the enemy. Europe was to be abandoned to its fate; and we were to consider ourselves happy, should we have the fortune of escaping the general wreck. Such was the prospective happiness held out to this country, and such was the beginning of those improvident measures, which led to the negociation at Paris, to the discussions relative to Hanover, to the overthrow of the Prussian state, to the subjection of Europe, and to our disgraceful apathy during that awful crisis.

But a mode of conduct so unconformable to our feelings, resources, genius and policy, so expressive of contempt for the courage and discipline of our army, awakened at last the better feelings of the public, and they saw with indignation how the national character had been degraded by a junto of systematic blunderers. But these men have passed away into that insignificance and obscurity from which they should have never been removed; and with their successors re-appeared British energy, preponderance and magnanimity. Shall we pause for a moment, and compare our dignified situation with the degrading and pusillanimous part we then acted at that time? Shall we indulge our national feelings by contrasting our victories at Rolsia and Vimiera, with our expeditions under Whitelocke, to Alexandria, and to the Dardanelles? Or draw a parallel between our glorious exertions at present in favour of European freedom, and our apathy and fatalism before and after the battle of Jena?—But our constitution is so sanguine to dwell with pleasure on past misfortunes and unmerited dishonour, when we can enjoy all the exquisite sensations arising from the contemplation of immediate and future advantages; and did not a sense of justice towards the army induce us to advert to the transactions of that time, we would willingly consign to oblivion an Administration which brought so undeserving a stigma on our military and national character.

A brighter prospect, than any perhaps in our history, begins to open on us. It is the more cheering; because we have passed through some dreary and disconsolate scenes before we attained this height. In our persevering ascent every object about us attempted to mislead and discourage us; and notwithstanding the insulious remonstrances of treachery, the timid counsels of the weak and the blustering menaces of injustice, we have now reached that commanding height where no storms can assault us. Let us take, then, a comprehensive view of our situation and advantages.—Let no indulgence of frivolous curiosity or ignominious ease turn away, even for an instant, our attention from the object we are pursuing with so much boldness and success.

But to drop this figurative language—the immediate consequences of our victories in Portugal are the emancipation of that country and the eventual liberation of Spain from the despotism of France. From the extraordinary changes which have occurred of late, let us not be tempted to appreciate those advantages too moderately; they are of themselves almost incalculable. There is something of the extravagance of gamblers introduced into political speculations of late;—so many States have been won and lost, that the acquisition of one or two mighty kingdoms, will be considered, perhaps, as a trifling circumstance.—However, this is a fatal and irretrievable check to universal despotism. Mighty armies arise in a quarter where the Tyrant least expected them. They are ready to inundate the immediate seat of his despotism, and by their presence and victories convince the discontented inhabitants of the southern departments of the contemptible, perfidious, and equivocating character of their present Ruler. What a chain of atrocities and falsehoods will be exposed to them! How strongly will they feel their own degradation, and the infamy of their Chieftain and his auxiliary Ruffians! Their provinces have been the nursery of Jacobinism, and the last retreat of the Royalists. The individuals of this kind form the majority of the population. They are, at the same time, the most restless, the most active and enterprising; and if we reflect how egregiously they have been deceived, it would be an excess of political drivelling to imagine that they will oppose any resistance. The cause of the Spaniards is attractive for both parties;—it is that of liberty and of the Bourbons. Nothing can be more amusing, if inconsistency and folly can excite such sensations, than to retrace the fluctuations of opinion for the last ten years. In the early part of that period the public were periodically entertained with insurrections in the South. A proof that our speculative politicians saw the probability of such an event taking place. But now those very men, who were so forward and sanguine in their expectations from the discontent of the natives, have, since a few years, condemned as fanatical and absurd every speculation to that effect.—But those individuals were at both periods mistaken. They were mistaken, because they had neither local knowledge to direct them, nor the slightest insight into the moral and physical character of the natives to guide them. They were mistaken, because without the slightest knowledge of the Continent, without the least acquaintance with the springs and motives of the primary and subaltern characters of the revolution, they consulted their vague and crude theories, and from this troubled source gave us the distorted images, which they had the modesty to assure were perfect likenesses. With all deserving respect for these gentlemen, a change in that country is much easier now, though perhaps not so spontaneous, than it had been during the course of the Revolution. This Revolution will not be effected by themselves, but must be operated from abroad. The slightest impulse is sufficient for that purpose; and no one circumstance will so easily contribute to it, as an invasion from the other side of the Pyrenees.

We cannot be certain whether Bonaparte be sensible of this danger. Whether he has that extravagance, that obduracy of heart and head, as to suppose that his Government is so attractive, so paternal, as to induce the wretched victims of his ambition to make exertions and sacrifices in his behalf. We believe him too wary, and too convinced of his own villainies, to rely on his popularity in such an emergency. There is reason to imagine, from his known character and extraordinary foresight and activity, that his precautionary measures will, if possible, be proportionate to the magnitude of the danger. The idea of his attempting to compromise with Spain, is so notoriously absurd, that it does not deserve a serious answer. All the foreign accounts, whilst they describe, in the most exaggerated colouring, his preparations against Austria, convince us that he is not indifferent to the storm which threatens him in the South. His desperate affectation of popularity, at the feast given by his good city of Paris, is an irresistible argument in support of the danger of his affairs. He would not so ostentatiously expose his sacred person, if he did not see the necessity of adopting measures as desperate as his present fortune. This single circumstance, so apparently trivial, gives us a stronger insight into his present embarrassment, than a whole volume of declamation. Let the Country, let the Ministry, not lose sight for an instant of his present situation. He is an enterprising, a wonderful man. It is, after having made these reflections, that we are able to appreciate the importance of the victories of the 17th and 21st. Our whole undivided force on the Continent, flushed with success, confident in themselves and their leaders, can now proceed rapidly to the Pyrenees. Shall we fix the attention of our Readers by adverting to the impression which such an army, consisting, if necessary, and it is very necessary, of 50,000 will make in that quarter. But it would be superfluous; every man even of the most confined understanding, will easily comprehend it. The success and safety of Austria are connected with the rapidity and vigour of their movements. We have no doubt but they will be proportionate to the danger of that power. Joined to the Spaniards and Portuguese, they will soon drive the French beyond the Pyrenees; and if our Maritime preponderance be taken into consideration, and the advantages this will give the invading army, there is reason to suppose they will adopt the characteristic boldness of the enemy in their operations.

Whatever way we examine the conduct of our Generals and Army in Portugal, and the wisdom and vigour which first planned the enterprise, we find equal cause for present exultation and future safety. It rescues our military character from the stigma which the incompetency of one or two individuals, and the active obloquy of our enemy had contributed to fix on it. We feel, at the same time, the satisfactory conviction that British soldiers, conducted by a Stewart and a Wellesley, are able to perform, in our days, feats of heroism similar to those, which rendered our forefathers the Arbitrators of Europe.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, AUGUST 24.—The Emperor visited on Saturday the Porcelain Manufactory at Sevres. They have just finished some busts in porcelain of the Emperor Alexander. They have been modelled by one of the best sculptors in Paris, after a marble bust of the Emperor made at St. Petersburgh.

The entertainment given on Sunday last, was, honoured with the presence of their Majesties. For a long time there has not been so brilliant a meeting. About half past eight, his Highness the Prince Arch-Chancellor of the Empire, and their Highnesses Prince de Neufchatel and Prince de Benevento, arrived. At nine o'clock their Imperial and Royal Majesties, accompanied by the Queen of Holland, and their Majesties the King and Queen of the Two Sicilies, arrived. As soon as their approach was announced, the Municipal Body, with the Prefect of the Seine at their head, went to meet the Emperor, and to receive him at the bottom of the great staircase as he alighted from his carriage. The Duchess of Abrantes, and twelve ladies who were appointed to attend the Empress during the ball, received her Majesty. Their Majesties first entered the grand hall of the Hotel de Ville, and seated themselves on a throne amidst universal and repeated exclamations of Long live the Emperor! Long live the Empress!—Several quadrilles were danced, in which her Majesty the Queen of Naples and Prince William of Prussia took a share.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, AUG. 12.—General Mack, Prince d'Auersperg, and General Auffenberg, have obtained from his Majesty remission of the rest of their sentence of confinement.

AUG. 13.—Notice has been given to all the inhabitants of the suburbs, that they must furnish a certain number of persons to work at the entrenchments, in proportion to the number of their respective families and inmates. A number of waggons are engaged for the service of Government in the different provinces; and as soon as the harvest is got in, the farmers must furnish as many horses as they can spare at a fixed price.

DRESDEN, AUGUST 14.—Orders have just been received for placing the whole of our contingent for the service of the League of the Rhine, in a condition to take the field within 20 days.—In consequence of these orders, fifteen squadrons of cavalry are preparing to march, including a squadron of the life-guards, twenty battalions of infantry, including a battalion of the grenadiers of the guards, and five companies of artillery, making a total of 15,000 men. Their destination will be to form encampments, until further orders, at Pirna, Newstadt, and Stolpen, on the frontiers of Bohemia. The cavalry will be quartered in the towns and villages, while the infantry will remain in the adjoining fields.

It is reported, that the 6000 Saxon troops in Poland, are under orders to return from that country.

AUGSBURG, AUG. 13.—It is positively stated, that on the 27th inst. a pleasure-camp will be formed in the vicinity of this city, to consist of 10,000 of the Royal Bavarian troops, under the command of Lieut.-Gen. Baron Wrede. An equal number will form a pleasure-camp at Plattingen, on the left bank of the Iser, under the command of Lieut.-Gen. Deroi; and a third encampment of the same force will be formed at Nurenburg, under the command of Lieut.-General Count Von Isenburg.

BAVARIA, AUG. 11.—On the 12th, two considerable convoys of ammunition, with cannon, and a detachment of artillerymen, set out from Munich for Kufstein and the Castle of Oberhaus, near Passau. A number of waggons are at present passing through this country from Italy, with new clothing for a part of the French troops. Numerous parties of the recruits newly levied in the Vorarlberg, are daily arriving at Augsburg. Those from the Bregeuzer Wald are particularly stout and tall.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, AUG. 18.—A numerous levy is making in every part of Bavaria, to complete the deficiency of the different regiments, and to augment the depots. The Wirtemberg troop are said to be assembling at Ellwangen. In several of the Austrian provinces, magazines of wheat are forming, as a precaution against scarcity.

BRESLAU, AUG. 16.—We learn that a certain number of French troops are on the eve of evacuating Silesia. For this favour we are indebted to the benevolent feelings of the Emperor and King, who, being informed of the condition of this province, was pleased to grant us this intermediate diminution of our burdens, preparatory to a total evacuation.

BRANDENBURGH, AUG. 19.—The exalted Monarch of France has graciously granted some relief to the Marquisate of Brandenburg, for the greater part of Victor's corps have already begun their march from this country. The Marshal Prince Bellune accompanied them in person. In Berlin, the National Guards have for some time past done duty at the gates; but they are expected to be again occupied by two French regiments on the 21st. The Prussian State Paper has risen considerably. The Berlin bank notes, which fell to 34, are now at 64.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, JULY 31.—This capital has been, since the evening of the 28th, in a state of the greatest consternation. Sultan Selim wished to re-establish the authority of the Porte, and to keep a well-paid standing army on foot. It was this which occasioned his fall on the 28th of May 1807. Mustapha Bairactar, Pacha of Rudschuck, a man of the best intentions, proposed a plan for re-establishing that which the 28th of May had destroyed. He came to Constantinople with a corps of trusty troops, caused the famous Kavagky-Oglou, Commandant of the Castles of the Dardanelles, and chief author of conspiring against Sultan Selim, to be beheaded, the Mufti and all the new Ministers of the Sultan Mustapha to be deposed, the Agn of the Janissaries to be strangled, and the most important posts of Constantinople to be occupied by his troops. The Grand Vizier, the new Mufti, and several other Members of the Divan, declared themselves the partizans of Mustapha Bairactar.

The Sultan had no suspicion of his project; on the contrary, he thought himself so secure, that on the 8th inst. he repaired in the morning to Besectach. But the Sultan Mother having got information of it on the 28th, Mustapha IV. returned with all expedition by sea to the Seraglio, whilst the Pacha of Rudschuck was entering it by land. The Pacha caused the new Mufti to inform him that Selim only was lawful Emperor. Mustapha, far from following the example given on the 28th of May by his uncle Selim, who voluntarily descended from the throne, ordered the inner gates of the Seraglio to be shut. The soldiers of the Pacha, however, speedily effected an entrance, but they found the unfortunate Selim dead, and covered with blood. Seized with horror at this spectacle, Mustapha Bairactar and the Grandees of the Porte, caused Prince Mahomet, the last branch of the reigning dynasty, to be immediately proclaimed Emperor. This Prince, who is about 15 years of age, has, for the last fifteen months, been confined with the Sultan Selim, who during that space instructed him in the art of government.

On the 29th, the unfortunate Selim was buried at Your, by the side of his father. The Pacha of Rudschuck, the whole of his army, and all the respectable inhabitants of this capital, attended the funeral. During these melancholy occurrences, the public tranquillity was not in the slightest degree interrupted. The greater part of the assasins of Selim have been executed. We know not whether the deposed Sultan is still living. Some people assert that he has been strangled. Mustapha Bairactar has taken possession of the Grand Seal. The Grand Vizier is a prisoner in his camp, for having revealed to the Sultan Mother the plan of replacing Selim on the throne. There is no doubt that the Pacha will soon be appointed Grand Vizier.

Eleven of the principal partizans of the Sultan Mustapha were this day strangled in the Seraglio. The Kislar Aga (the chief of the eunuchs) who assisted in the murder of Selim, was executed on the 29th.

WEST INDIES.

BARBADOES, JULY 19.—His Majesty's schooner Subtle arrived yesterday evening from off St. Martin's, where, with the Wanderer sloop of war, and Matches and Elizabeth schooners, she had been engaged in an attempt to carry that Island by a coup-de-main: but which they were frustrated in, owing chiefly to some false information of the enemy's strength, whom, however, they drove from three batteries in a very gallant manner; but on attacking a fourth, had to sustain a sharp conflict with more than treble their number. The Island of St. Eustatius and has long considered as a shelter to the numerous privateers which infest the West Indies, and obstruct the trade of this country; it became, therefore, a desirable object to endeavour to extirpate this nest of depredators. Our men soon obtained possession of the lower fort, of six guns, which were instantly spiked; their loss so far was trifling; but on ascending the rocky heights, covered with the prickly pear, the superiority of the enemy was very severely felt, as a number of brave fellows fell, among whom was Lieutenant Spearing, their gallant leader, who was shot through the chest within ten yards of the upper fort, and almost instantly expired. His fall occasioned much consternation among his companions, who reluctantly retreated to their boats, but were obliged to surrender. Captain Crofton, of the Wanderer, finding the fire from the fort so tremendous and incessant, sent a flag of truce on shore, which was accepted, and the whole of the prisoners who could be removed with safety, were given up. Thus fell, in the prime of life, in a most daring and gallant attempt, a promising active Officer, whose long services in his profession certainly entitled him to the notice of his country; in whose cause he had received eleven wounds, particularly at the battle of Copenhagen, and in the West Indies, and closed a career of glory, animating his men by his example, on the batteries of St. Martin's.—Lieut Spearing was interred with all the honours of war, the French Commandant himself attending, and also permitting part of the gallant crew of the Subtle to pay their last sad duty to their beloved Commander.

It afterwards appeared, that the enemy had received information of the intended attack, and were prepared accordingly; upwards of 900 troops being in the fort, while the storming party consisted only of 135 men. Out of forty-tree sent from the Subtle, seven were killed and seventeen wounded.

The following is a copy of the order issued on the melancholy occasion, by Capt. Crofton, of his Majesty's ship Wanderer:—

"TO THE COMMANDING OFFICERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S SCHOONERS SUBTLE AND BALLAHOU.

"You all well know the melancholy though glorious death of Lieut. G. A. Spearing, late Commander of his Majesty's schooner Subtle, who fell fighting for his King and Country; his corpse this evening is to receive the honours of war, conferred by his enemies, admirers of his gallantry and courage:—You will join, on a signal from me (when the fort shall have fired a shotted gun), to fire minute guns."—Dated 4th July, off St, Martin's.

JULY 23.—The French sloop Phœnix, from Cayenne, which arrived here on Sunday last as a cartel, having excited suspicions as to the real object of her voyage, has, upon examination, been discovered to have been charged with dispatches from Victor Hughes to the Captain General Ernouf, of Guadaloupe, transmitting duplicates of those sent by Bonaparte from Bayonne, in the lately captured schooner La Rapide, but which were thrown overboard during her attempt to escape from the Belette. On board the Phœnix, these duplicates were found concealed in a bread-barrel; and are not merely dispatches from Bonaparte, but embrace a large mass of edicts, proclamations, and instructions from the fallen Monarch of Spain, and his extinguished satellite, the Prince of the Peace, to the provinces of Caracas, St. Martha, Carthagena, Vera Cruz, Mexico, and the River Plate, and, in short, to the Viceroys, Governors, and Councils, throughout the whole of Spanish South America, announcing, on the one part, the abdication of the Throne; and the elevation to it, on the other, of Joseph Bonaparte, to whom they are enjoined to pay vassalage and obedience, and deliver up all those extensive and valuable Provinces; to which the Emperor Napoleon guarantees a flourishing commerce and extensive trade, under the protection of the great nation which he controuls.

Sir A. Cochrane, upon investigating the several documents discovered on board the Phœnix (by being charged with which she so palpably violated the sacred rights of the cartel flag), had the vessel seized, and she has since been libelled in the Admiralty Court; and M. Bouron, who was in charge of the dispatches, and the Captain of the vessel, have been sent prisoners to England in the Subtle schooner, by which the Admiral also transmitted the discovered papers, entrusted to Lieut. Senhouse, who sailed in the Subtle on Wednesday last.

IRELAND.

TRALEE, AUG. 30.—We are sorry to say, that the tranquillity of this county still continues to be disturbed by nightly meetings and associations of White Boys; a most flagrant and audacious instance of the truth of this statement occurred on Friday [illegible] house of Mr. T. Halloran, at Palace, which [illegible] number of those ruffians, who knocked at his [illegible] Williams, which Mr. Halloran refused to de[illegible] unless they immediately withdrew he and his sons, who were well prepared for defence, would instantly fire upon them. On hearing this the fellows went for a reinforcement (not thinking themselves strong enough to force the house), threatening Mr. H. with the most dreadful punishment on their return. In about two hours after they again made their appearance, greatly increased in number, the whole amounting, as well as could be ascertained, to nearly three hundred; but Mr. H. foreseeing their intent, during their absence, prudently retired with his sons, well armed, into an orchard near the house, where he waited their arrival. The villains on coming to the house a second time, fired several shots through the windows, which they pelted with stones, demolishing the glass, sashes, &c. after which they placed fire in the thatch in order to consume the house. In the mean time Mr. H. and his sons, who were waiting for an opportunity, suddenly discharged the contents of their pieces, and immediately a second discharge, when the villains, alarmed by the firing, and not expecting so warm a reception, ran off in the greatest confusion, leaving behind them five horses, two of whom were killed, which belonged to people in that neighbourhood; they also left behind them a number of muskets, pistols, swords, great coats, hats, shoes, &c. Three of the ruffians, it is said, were shot. The house of several farmers of Bally-M'Elligott, in the vicinity of this town, were attacked on Sunday night last, by a party of White Boys, who robbed them of whatever fire-arms were in their possession.

LANCASTER ASSIZES, SEPT. 3.

Yesterday, the trial of Charles Angus, Esq. of Liverpool, which has been the subject of general conversation, came on, for the murder of Miss Margaret Burns, of Liverpool. At eight o'clock, the Prisoner was placed at the bar. He is a tall stout man, and was dressed in black. The indictment charged him with having poisoned the deceased; and another count charged him with having given her poison to cause an abortion, she being pregnant.

Serjeant Cockell, for the prosecution, stated the substance of the case as follows:—

The prisoner married the deceased's sister, who died about three years since, and left two children, since which the deceased had lived with the prisoner as his housekeeper and governess to the children. For some time previous to her death, she was suspected by the neighbours and others to be pregnant. She died on the 28th of March, and for two days previous she was confined, and no person attended her constantly but the prisoner; and the circumstances of her death were of such an extraordinary nature, that the Coroner, hearing of them, called a Jury to investigate them; and the result was a verdict of wilful murder against the prisoner.

Elizabeth Nixon deposed, that she lived as housemaid to the prisoner, at the time of the death of Miss Burns, who, she said, appeared in good health on the morning of the 23d of March last, at seven o'clock in the morning. At a quarter before nine o'clock she saw her in the parlour, when she appeared very unwell, and was leaning upon a chair. She vomitted the whole of the day black matter, which turned to green; she drank about three quarts of water-gruel in the course of the day; the prisoner was generally with her, and he remained with the deceased all night; she and her fellow-servant offered to sit up, but they were refused. Previous to her going to bed, she took two pillows, a counterpane, and an easy chair into the parlour. The next morning the first thing she did she went into the parlour, and found the prisoner and the deceased, who appeared worse, having vomitted all night. She continued very bad all day; the prisoner continued with her. At night she offered to sit up, but was again refused. The next morning (Friday) she found the prisoner and the deceased in the parlour as usual; the deceased appeared much worse, the vomiting continuing upon her, together with her being disordered in her bowels. She had changed her dress, and had no stays on; was lying on the sofa in a fixed posture; (this was to insinuate that she had been delivered of a child.) She gave the deceased some warm beer, agreeably to her desire, and in a short time after she was sent out by the prisoner for some Madeira wine; on her return she went into the parlour, and observed an object in a corner which frightened her so much, that she ran back and went into the kitchen to the cook. They both went into the parlour, and the object proved to be the deceased, with her face and knees to the wall, and one of her legs bent under her, and she a corpse, which alarmed them very much; they did not observe the prisoner at first in the room; but discovered him sitting in an arm-chair in the corner of the room where they found the deceased, asleep, with a cap over his face, and wrapped up in a counterpane, and had considerable difficulty in awakening him, and when they told him the deceased was no more, he jumped up and exclaimed "Good God!" During the illness of the deceased, no medical man was sent for, but she recollected hearing the prisoner ask her if he should send for a Doctor; to which she replied, he can do me no good. When the deceased was vomitting, she exclaimed to the witness, "O Betty, what have I got on my stomach? I wish I had taken an emetic long since."

The Rev. Mr. Vin, the minister of the parish, said he had known the prisoner some years. On the death of the deceased, some very shocking reports were circulated in Liverpool against the prisoner; in consequence of which he thought it his duty to call upon him to inform him of them, that he might refute them, or bring the business to an investigation. The prisoner denied that the deceased had been delivered of a child; he said it was impossible, for if she had he must have known it; and as to its being by him, he assigned rather an extraordinary reason, viz. that he had the most tender and affectionate regard for her, and as to her being poisoned, that was impossible; for she had taken nothing but what he had given her, and he was, or ought to be, a judge of the composition and decomposition of medicine. The strongest thing he had given her, he said, was castor oil: he had given her a black emetic also. The term black emetic he explained, by saying the discharge was black. The witness had more conversation with the prisoner, during which he gave some inconsistent and contradictory accounts of the transaction, particularly denying being out of his house when the witness saw him at the Athenæum, and conversed with him. This was investigated, in consequence of its being insinuated that he conveyed the child away at that time. The prisoner told him the deceased died the day previous (Saturday), and she died on the Friday.

Jeremiah Steed deposed, that, about last Christmas, he was in company with the prisoner, at the house of Dr. Trail, to supper, when the subject of anatomy was brought up; some drawings of females, &c. were introduced, when the prisoner said he was skilled in anatomy and physic, and instructed some young men in it, particularly in the dissection of the womb, and by touching a certain part of it, would cause abortion; he had told a young man of it, and he had made an improper use of it.

The Prisoner read a very long defence, in which he strongly protested his innocence, and attributed the prosecution to the revenge and malice of two women in Liverpool.

Several women were called on behalf of the prisoner, who were intimately acquainted with the deceased, to prove that she was of a sickly habit of body, and that her increased size was dropsically, and that it was a family complaint, her mother having died of it. One of them lived as servant with the prisoner. On her cross examination, said, that on it being proposed to send for a doctor to the deceased, the prisoner smiled and said, "medicines would not do her any good." The deceased frequently breakfasted in the prisoner's bed-room with him, and the deceased used to take the tea-things from her at the door. She thought the prisoner often took improper liberties with the deceased; so much so, that one day she asked her if she was not going to marry the prisoner.

Doctor Cason said that he had seen the stomach and uterus some days after the body was opened, in the possession of Mr. Hay, and gave a very learned definition of the disorders of the stomach, and the opinions of John Hunter, and other celebrated writers on that subject; and he was of opinion that the disordered state of the stomach took place after death, and the enlarged state of the uterus might be attributed to other causes besides the supposed expulsion. Upon his cross-examination, he said he was not an accoucher, and had not delivered any women.

The trial lasted till past three in the morning, and the Jury acquitted the Prisoner.

RIOTERS.

SEPT. 5.—John Shepherd, John Rhodes, Joseph Sutcliffe, and John Turner, were indicted for having, with divers persons unknown, riotously assembled at Rochdale, and burnt the prison, on the 1st day of June.

John Kershaw, an inhabitant of Rochdale, deposed, that at noon, on the 1st day of June, the town was extremely agitated by the entrance of a most alarming mob, to the number of about two hundred, which increased in the course of the day to about one thousand. Soon after they entered the town, one of them mounted on a large stone, and harangued the mob; he could not hear what he said, but it appeared to please the mob in general, as they shouted and huzzaed several times. Dr. Drake and Mr. Entwisle, the Magistrates, who in general conducted the business of that part of the country, and who reside near there, came into the town, and addressed the mob in the most mild and persuasive language, endeavouring to prevail on them to disperse. They behaved very civilly and respectfully to the Magistrates, but refused to disperse. The Magistrates in consequence went to the house where they usually transact their business, and swore in the witness and about two hundred others special constables. Two-thirds of them were, in the course of the day and night, maimed or bruised by stones being thrown at them, and other violence exercised towards them. The rioters entered the peaceable weavers houses, and forcibly took away their shuttles. The special constables succeeded in securing some shuttles from the rioters, and deposited them in the prison for safety; and they took five or six of the rioters before the Magistrates. However, as they were conveying them to the prison, they were rescued. The windows of the room where the Magistrates were sitting, were broken with large stones, being intended for the manufacturers of the town and neighbourhood, who had all resorted to the room where the Magistrates were for safety, and not intended to injure the Magistrates. The Magistrates remained in the town till seven o'clock. At their departure the prisoners and others of the mob pulled off their hats to them, and behaved very respectfully, but soon after the Magistrates were gone, they behaved in a very outrageous manner. They attacked the prison, in consequence of a number of shuttles being deposited in it for safety; the doors of which had been supposed to be impenetrable, and set it on fire, which was understood to be impossible, so much of it being stone. They, however, contrived to demolish it so much, that it is now merely ruinous walls. After they had set that on fire, they said they would go to the New Hall, the residence of Mr. James Royds, one of the principal manufactures, if he did not give them some money.

Turner, who was admitted an evidence, said, he was standing with Shepherd, opposite the prison, when it was on fire, where he observed, if any man attempted to put the fire out, he would endanger his life. Shepherd told him he got 5*l.* from Mr. Royds; they went to Mr. Dearden's for money, where a guinea was thrown out to them; at one time, Shepherd asked if any man would go with him, to set Charles Trot's manufactory on fire.

There being considerable doubts as to Rhodes and Sutcliffe, Mr. Park, in the most candid and liberal manner, acknowledged it, and said, from the discretionary power vested in him, on the part of the Crown, he should give up the prosecutions against them. The Jury found Shepherd Guilty.

Much alarm has been excited in Hull by a report, that an attempt was made on Thursday night to set fire to one of the powder magazines in the garrison, containing powder sufficient to have blown up the town. About half past 11 on Thursday night, one of the centinels near the store-keeper's magazine (that building which some years ago was appropriated to the reception of French prisoners), observed a man making towards the magazine across the ramparts. Having repeatedly challenged him, without receiving an answer, the centinel fired at him, but missed him, and the fellow ran away. In about an hour after, the centinel again observed him, and at that time he was upon the roof of that part of the magazine which is on a level with the ramparts. He then challenged him again, without effect, and again ineffectually fired at him. Upon this he pursued him with his bayonet, and had come within a short distance of him, when he unluckily stumbled over a heap of bricks, and falling down, the man got clear off. The other centinels on duty heard the reports of the musket, but saw no one; one of them said he heard a noise as if of some one climbing on the roof of the magazine; and one man said, that a short time previous to this occurrence, he saw a light in an adjoining field, which seemed to be sparks proceeding from a flint and steel. An additional guard of seven centinels was placed round the magazine, the remainder of the evening.

A serjeant in the Royal Stamitz Artillery Volunteers has discovered a method by which an object may be hit with a cannon-ball in the night time, with equal ease as in open daylight, and was lately ordered by the Board of Ordnance to proceed to Plymouth-dock to try the experiment, which he did in the presence of Gen. Stephens and several other Officers, and has since received the thanks of the Board and a reward for the discovery. This ingenious man has invented a quadrant, by which a gun may be laid with such accuracy, that he has hit a pole a thousand yards distance and broke it by a single shot.

An inquest was last week held on the body of a young woman at Slimbridge, in the county of Gloucester, who took a quantity of sublimate mercury, to procure abortion: the verdict being felo de se, the body was buried near a cross road.

EARTHQUAKE.—A few minutes before two o'clock in the morning of Friday se'nnight, the shock of an earthquake was felt very sensibly in the town of Whitehaven and neighbourhood, and the agitation, according to the most minute observations respecting it, continued from three to five seconds.

A young woman lately walking out in the neighbourhood of Scarborough, with two young children under her care, belonging to a family upon a visit to that place, was met by a gypsey man, with an ass, who forcibly took the children from her, and carried them away. The girl, finding herself incompetent to rescue them, ran immediately back to the town and gave the alarm. Several persons were instantly dispatched in quest of the man, some of whom overtook him, and succeeded in forcing him to give up the children, though not before he had received a hearty drubbing. One of them he had stripped of his cloaths.

LONGEVITY—There are now living in the parish of Finden, in Sussex, three persons, whose united ages amount to 266 years. The youngest is a labouring man, aged 85, who retains all his faculties unimpaired, and without let or hindrance, follows his daily occupation. The next is a female, who enjoys perfect health and spirits at the age of 90. And the third is a man who has attained his 91st year. He frequently walks eight or ten miles a day, and is remarkable for the tenacity of his memory. He has followed four clergymen to their graves, who had in succession, officiated at his parish church for upwards of 70 years.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

There has not been of late a week so barren of foreign intelligence, and never one, perhaps, in which the public were more disposed to anticipate important occurrences. Speculation is consequently active and officious to account for this disappointment. In the mean time floating rumours, vague, unfounded and absurd, are occasionally circulated to offend, if not to gratify, the public feeling. In one paper it is gravely asserted, that a difference of opinion has been manifested by our Generals in Portugal, relative to their future operations: in another we are gratified with the information that the Hero of Vimiera is returning home, in consequence of Sir HEW DALRYMPLE's having taken the command. We will not insult the understandings of our Readers by adverting to the imbecility or malice of these reports: We will only contrast their dull, discouraging speculations, with the gay, fascinating accounts of the Parisian Journals. In this we behold the characteristic traits of the two nations. Our Journalists, for having been disappointed, only a few days, of another Gazette Extraordinary to fill up their columns, grow grave, fallen, and gloomy, and, in the midst of the public felicity, ponder over imaginary evils. Not so our light-hearted, amiable brethren on the other side of the channel! In the midst of their reverses, when every post brings them an account of the surrender of one of their fleets, the destruction of an army, the loss of a kingdom and a fugitive Sovereign, when, from every quarter of their vast empire, new symptoms of alarm forbode still greater disasters, they fill up their pages with brilliant descriptions of balls, festivals, and illuminations. Senators and Generals, Kings and Princes, Queens and Duchesses, trip on "light fantastic toe," promiscuously through the mazes of their animated quadrilles. Even the savage NAPOLEON forgets his ferocity, and mixes with the joyous throng. Happy people! and still happier innovation! It were fortunate for themselves and your neighbours that you had sooner felt the sting of the tarantula. But vain is this triumph and this ostentation on the part of your wary Tyrant. This hesitation and this affected gaiety, but ill conceal the rankling, vindictive feelings of his ferocious bosom. These sanguinary feasts, and the jealous watchful eye of the police, contribute some time longer to conceal from his good people of Paris, the portentous revolution in his affairs. The greater pains are taken, the more falsehoods are accumulated, the more vigorous the precautions, the more mortifying it will be to his lawless pride, when his miserable subterfuges and his disgraceful discomfiture are discovered. The good citizens of Paris, whatever revolution a series of [illegible] and public calamities, or a succession of monsters, from MARAT to BONAPARTE, may have effected in their feelings, as men and citizens—however insensible they may be to their national degradation and individual profligacy, have retained, through all the variations of their affairs, a deeply-rooted abhorrence of the young Jacobin,—the vile instrument of BARRAS,—who had murdered with grape-shot, near the church of St. Roch, 1800 of their fellow-citizens! Never have they forgiven him this dreadful outrage. And they will with rapture hear of the public disaster, because it contributes to mortify and humiliate a man they so cordially abominate. His resources are great, we know it, comprehensive even as his crimes. And if we appreciate his character justly, his exertions will be proportionate to his embarrassments. This man, or this monster, before he would abandon willingly his prey, would set France and half Europe in a state of conflagration.—His character, his resources, his remorseless ambition, should be strongly impressed on our minds. If we fluctuate, if we relax in our exertions only for an instant, he will recover tenfold the advantages he has lost. It would be an excess of infatuation, it would be the source of irretrievable calamity, were we to estimate his means by those of ordinary men. However, one conclusion we may safely and boldly draw with regard to his present situation:—That his present inactivity proves that his ordinary resource are unequal to the difficulties in which he has been unexpectedly involved. He will avoid, if possible, having recourses to extraordinary means of extricating himself from his embarrassment; in order not to hazard the effects of popular discontent by an augmentation of the conscription. This will be his final resource.—Till then, every intrigue, every refinement of diplomacy, all the engines of Machevialism, will be set at work to embarass Austria. Are there no means of defeating him in the Cabinet, as we have discomfitted him in the field? Would not our guineas have as much influence in the Divan as his louis d'ors? Are there no means left for conciliating Russia? If there were a possibility that the restoration of her ships in the Tagus could produce so desirable an event, we should not hesitate an instant in our resolution. It would be a base renunciation of our present advantages, if we suspected that this condescension might be attributed to pusillanimity. We have given unequivocal proofs to Europe, that we as much disregard the hostility of Russia, as we pity her infatuation. If we make this restitution, we do it to save herself—to save Austria—to save Europe. We bribe the poor, mistaken, deluded Cabinet, to exert itself in its own behalf, and in that of its suffering neighbours. Our military exertions, thanks to an active, enlightened Administration! are worthy of our national vigour and ancient reputation. Our negotiations should keep pace with them. It would appear superfluous to point out how much their success will depend on the abilities of the negotiators. Party, and connexions, and recommendations will have as little influence on their choice, as on that of our Commanders. The nomination of Mr. ADAIR, is an honourable and conclusive proof of the impartiality, and liberal, comprehensive spirit of the present Cabinet. The revolution in Turkey may have been unexpected, unprovoked, or the result of French intrigue. From whatever cause it may have occurred, it would not be very difficult to obtain an influence in the new Divan. A prominent character of revolutions in the Ottoman capital, is a change of foreign policy: would it then be so difficult to undermine, or even subvert French preponderance? Should to be fortunate enough to succed, we render incalculable services to Austria, and ultimately to Russia. If the French are allowed to retain their influence over the Porte, they will not fail to give some employment to Austria in that quarter; as they did to the Russians during the last war. The accounts we communicated several weeks ago, relative to the armament and resolution of Austria, acquire additional corroboration by every mail from the Continent. She is preparing with prudence and energy for the contest. We see in her measures nothing of that hurry, imprudence, and temerity which were visible in the last war. The difficulty of obtaining authentic intelligence from that country, allows us only to hazard conjectures relative to her connection with Russia; but there is reason to conclude, from the wisdom and activity observable in her military arrangements, that she has not been remiss in securing the co-operation, or at least, neutrality of ALEXANDER. In the event of a war, the diversion Sir JOHN STEWART will be able to make in her behalf, will greatly diminish the number of her enemies; and we are very much mistaken if measures have not been already adopted by our Government, efficacious enough to occupy half the force that should otherwise be employed against her.—Italy has been pronounced frequently the grave of French armies.

A vessel is said to have arrived from Gijon, bringing the unexpected intelligence that Bonaparte has arrived at Bayonne with 160,000 men. We would not have condescended to give this catchpenny rumour of one of the Evening Papers a place in our Journal, did we not think it a duty incumbent on us, to declare formally and peremptorily, that there is as much falsehood in this account, as there is reprehensible inconsiderateness on the part of those, who insult the public feeling and understanding with such impertinence. Even were it as true as it is unfounded, we would, by no means, consider it as a cause of dejection: it would only tend to concentrate the energies of a people, whom prosperity, too easily acquired, might tend to divide.—However, the sacred cause of that country, supported by 50,000 Britons, is now too far advanced, and too consolidated, to be endangered by the undivided army of the Tyrant.

Yesterday forenoon Government received dispatches from the Governor of Curaçoa, which state, that his Excellency took the earliest opportunity of communicating to the Governor of the Caraccas, the intelligence which he had received from England, respecting the important events which had occurred in Spain. The Governor of the Caraccas immediately expressed his determination to support the rights of his lawful Sovereign Ferdinand the VIIth, and to act in concert with the loyal Patriots in Spain, and with the British. He also issued orders for the arrest of all the Frenchmen within his Government. The Governor of Maracaybo has also declared a similar determination, and there is no doubt but that their example will be followed in every part of Spanish South America.

We received yesterday afternoon, Spanish Papers to the 1st instant, and two Gottenburgh Mails. The following are the most important articles. We are sorry we have not room to comment on them.

OVIEDO, Aug. 29.

Notwithstanding our Gazette of Saturday announces the total evacuation of Burgos by the enemy on the 20th inst. yet we learn they have since detached 6,000 men to repossess it, finding that Gen. Blake was not nearer than Astorga. The Duke Del Infantado, and the English Colonel Doyle, had set out from thence for Madrid, our business of great importance. Letters have been received here from the latter place, which make mention of a conspiracy which had been discovered there; the object is said to have been entirely in favour of the enemy, and the means to be employed truly diabolical. A certain Marquis, who had since been arrested, was at the head of it. The rumours on this subject are, however, various and contradictory.

From Priesta Santo Maria, we learn, that Dupont and his Staff arrived there on the 14th instant, in order to embark for France. During the embarkation of the baggage, which the populace beheld with the utmost indignation, one of the packages burst open, and part of the sacramental plate fell through: it was then no longer possible to restrain the fury and rage of the people, who immediately rushed upon, seized and tore away the whole. Dupont has since had the insolence to write to Don James Morla, the Governor of Cadiz, to demand restoration of what he and his troops had themselves stolen from the Spaniards.

It is reported that the English Admiral has refused to suffer the French troops to return by sea.

GIJON, Aug. 30.

On the 27th arrived here, under convoy of the Albion sloop of war, the brig Patty, having on board 5000 stand of arms, 700,000 cartridges, and one million of musket-balls, for the use of the Patriots; and on the same day the Iris, Capt. Manby, arrived from off Bilbon, convoying a transport laden with stores, and intended to have been landed there, if the enemy had not been in possession of the City. Major Roche came in the Iris.

FROM THE MADRID GAZETTE, OF AUGUST 29.

General Dupont having written to Don Tomas de Morla, pressing an immediate embarkation of the troops that had surrendered, under his command, received an answer from him, which is inserted in that Paper, and in which the Governor observes, that neither the capitulation, nor the approbation of the Junta, nor even an express order from the King, could make that possible which is not possible.

"There are not," adds he, "transports, nor any means of obtaining them, for the conveyance of your troops. What can be a greater proof of this, than that we retain your troops here at a great expence, instead of removing them to another country.

"General Castanos, when he promised to obtain a passport from the English for the passage of your army, could only engage to solicit one with earnestness, as he has done. But how can your Excellency suppose that the British ships would suffer your troops to pass, certain that they were going to make war on their nation in some other place.

"I cannot persuade myself that either General Castanos or your Excellency would believe that such a Capitulation could be carried into effect.

The object of your Excellency must have been to obtain conditions which, though impossible, might do honour to your surrender. We must, however, submit to the imperious law of necessity.

CORUNNA, Aug. 31.

Yesterday evening a Portuguese Yacht arrived in this Port from Figuera, commanded by Iacipto Pereira Borsa, in six days. She brings the pleasing intelligence, that Lisbon was again under Portuguese Sovereignty, and that the Russian squadron that was in the Tagus, by previous agreement with the British General, had fired on the City; by this means affording the English troops, an opportunity to land, and who, combining their operations with the British army in the neighbourhood, together with the revolt of the Swiss in the French army, contributed to the surrender of the place.—(Corunna Gazette).

GOTTENBURGH, Aug. 26.

The Russian Fleet were spoken with in the Baltic by an American, as late as the 12th inst. They were steering to the Northward, and had springs upon their cables, for the purpose of anchoring among the rocks, to attack the Swedes. It is reported that both Sir J. Saumarez and Sir S. Hood are gone after them, and as they had early notice of their being at sea, it is to be hoped a good account will be given of them: they consist of nine Sail of the Line, two of which are ships of 110 and 112 guns, and eight Frigates, besides smaller Vessels.

A Foreigner of distinction has very lately arrived at Stockholm, from St. Petersburgh, and it is said brought the important intelligence that a marked dislike to the French army has lately manifested itself in Russian Poland, and that an insurrection had taken place; but we have no particulars. I suppose you have long before this heard of the death of Marshal Brune, who, it is said, has either been poisoned or shot by his Master's orders, for permitting smuggling with the English; but Bonaparte has long disliked him. An Austrian Minister, Baron ——, has found his way to Stockholm within the last week, and immediately set off for the King, in Finland. Upon his return from thence, we are told, he will go to London.

These English Mails are now due, and we are all panting for Spanish and Portuguese news.

Aug. 27.—We have just received to-day by some American Captains, arrived here to-day from Copenhagen, the unpleasant intelligence that 2500 Spaniards, who revolted in Zealand, have been overcome by the French and Danes, and put in prison, though not before they had killed several French Officers.

Admiral Keats is just entering here with a large fleet, having on board the Spanish troops from Langeland.

We have just seen Mr. Cobbett's Register. Even this poor, pitiful, vacillating Declaimer seems to feel a spark of warmth and patriotism, on adverting to the victories of our Army. His approbation, we are sorry to say, from the peculiar inconsistency of the man, and his unprincipled character as a public writer, is an insult to any party, his caprice or his interest prompt him to support. The good man, it seems, has at last discovered that Ministers have displayed wisdom and energy in their measures. But how weak, how nerveless are his commendations! He is never in his element, but when he vilifies and abuses. We are sorry we have not room to bestow a few more observations on him.

A Gentleman has just reached town who left Lisbon on the 12th of August. He has afforded us a great variety of information relative to the tyrannical and infamous proceedings of the French in that city:—

"On the 8th of June the French Officers gave a most sumptuous entertainment to General Junot, in the Opera House. The stage was converted into an eating-room, the pit was boarded over for the dancers, and the boxes were allotted to the spectators: on this occasion the Russian Officers were invited.—Previous to the entry of the guests, the curtain was drawn up, and a display of every thing magnificent was presented to the gaze of the multitude. The French flags were placed round the stage, each of which bore an inscription of some victory of Bonaparte, including that of Friedland, over the Russian Army. The moment the Russian Officers discovered the latter, they in disgust withdrew from the scene, and ever after declined the invitation and society of the French, and attached themselves more than ever to the society of the few British subjects, who had been compelled to remain in Lisbon, and who had been released from their imprisonment.

"On the occasion of the Fete above spoken of, a requisition was made of all the plate, chandeliers, and other ornamental requisites in the possession of the inhabitants of the place. Many refused compliance, until a guard was sent to their houses to enforce it. No part of these things were afterwards returned to their owners.

"It appeared evident to every person in Lisbon, that an understanding subsisted between the English and Russian Admirals. Several flags of truce had been interchanged, and one went into the Tagus from Admiral Cotton on the morning of the 12th of August.

"Ninety-six carts, laden with plunder, consisting principally of church plate, remained unpacked at Lisbon when our informant quitted that place; and as the French army marched from thence on the following day, it is presumed the whole booty would fall into the hands of the British, and be restored to the places from whence it was stolen.

"The superb building, which was heretofore the house in which the business of the Inquisition was transacted, had been converted by Junot into a kind of Police Office, to which all persons suspected of being unfriendly to France, were secretly brought, and never afterwards heard of."

Letters from Cadiz received on Friday, contain some interesting particulars:—

"Cadiz, Aug. 10.—The original force of Dupont's army was upwards of 22,000, whereof 17,340 laid down their arms, and of these about 2000 Swiss soldiers immediately joined their brethren in the Spanish service, and now from being enemies compose part of our own army. The prisoners are now on their march towards San Lucar Rota, and Port St. Mary's, and during their journey they always encamp in the open fields, and make no stay whatever in any of the country towns through which they pass, fearing to be attacked by the people, who are most furious against them, in consequence of their scandalous conduct in Cordova and Andujar, which towns they plundered, and committed every other possible degree of excess. These fellows, appealing to capitulation, ought to be embarked for France; but how this is to be carried into effect I know not, for besides our being absolutely without one single vessel fit for such service, it is not quite certain whether the English Admiral would acquiesce in such a measure, so that in all probability we shall be molested with these troublesome guests for a long time, and they amount, including those from the fleet, to more than 21,000 men, which we have to maintain and take care of.

"Dupont was to have been Governor of Cadiz, and the number of rapacious fellows by whom he was accompanied, to take upon themselves all the lucrative employments, both civil and military, is almost incredible; for the revenue department there were two hundred and five, and for the military department nineteen Supernumerary Generals, of various ranks, 10 Colonels, 11 Lieut.-Colonels, 8 Majors, and 440 Subaltern Officers. Hence, it is clear that they would have sent away every person in employment in this province. It is certainly a piece of good fortune, that in our army all the Chiefs are intimate friends, and with scarcely any exception, have always maintained the principles they now profess."

Dispatches have been received by Ministers from the Sicilian Court at Palermo, and from General Sir John Stuart. They were brought to Falmouth by the Marlborough Packet. The most active preparations were making for a descent upon the Neapolitan territory, and particularly an attack on Naples. It was expected that Sir John Stuart would lose no time in the disembarkation of his troops on the opposite coast. He had received certain intelligence that very few French troops remained in Italy, from whence great numbers had marched for Spain. Calabria had been entirely evacuated by them. The Italians were generally well-informed of the successful progress of the Spanish Patriots; and such was the detestation in which the French were held throughout Italy, that the most confident hopes were entertained in the British army, of the whole country rising to join them the instant they appeared.

We feel the greatest satisfaction in announcing, that the Spanish troops who so gallantly withdrew themselves from the power of the French in Fuhnen, are now on their way to the British coast, where they may be daily expected.—Lieut. Hanson has arrived at the Admiralty, with dispatches from Admiral Keats, communicating the pleasing intelligence that the whole of the troops who had been landed at Langeland had embarked on board different vessels, and set sail. A Spanish Officer accompanied Lieut. Hanson, with dispatches from the Marquis de la Romana to the Spanish Deputies.

The Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised to 1s. 1½d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 11½d. household.

Sir Hew Dalrymple, Sir Harry Burrard, and Sir Arthur Wellesley, it is said, are to be advanced to the Peerage.

THE NEW EXPEDITION.

Ramsgate, Sept. 8.—This morning the first battalion of the 1st regiment of Guards, commanded by Colonel Anson, marched in here from Deal, and immediately embarked on board the vessels prepared for them, lying along the Pier Wall. They embarked as follows:—

400	Men on board the Bostock transport,	No. 404.
283	..... Isabella	No. 401.
303	..... William	No. 69.
229	..... Ellen	No. 15.
246	..... ———	No. 402.

Total 1465 exclusive of Officers.

About an hour after, the 3d battalion of the 1st Guards arrived at Ramsgate, commanded by Col. Cheney, and marched directly down to the Pier, on board the transports. The total number embarked to-day of the two battalions is about 3000.—The 95th rifle regiment is expected here to-morrow to embark.

Dublin, Sept. 6.—The destination of the Expedition which is formed at Cork, under the command of Sir D. Baird, is a profound secret; but it is supposed, that in consequence of orders issued to the troops this week, for their heavy baggage to be embarked, that the first plan is altered. None of the vessels to convey them have copper bottoms, by which we are led to conceive their destination is not very distant. The only delay to their starting is occasioned by the transports adapted for horses not arriving, there being 300 of them to accompany the Expedition.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, where he was received by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Kent, and Cumberland.

At two o'clock his Majesty held a Levee, when the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:

The Bishop of Rochester, to kiss hands on his translation to Bishopric of Ely; Major Campbell, Aid-de-Camp to Sir Arthur Wellesley, on his promotion, and on his return from Portugal; and Colonel Brown, on his return from the army in Portugal.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, which was attended by the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers, when Mr. Ryder, the Judge-Advocate, laid before his Majesty the proceedings of several Courts Martial.

The musical world, and the fashionable world, and all the world, have had a most harmonious squeeze at the Music Meeting at Gloucester, this last week; the sick, the well, the lame, the lazy, et tous les malades imaginaires, whether water drinkers, or wine drinkers, from Bath, Cheltenham, Malvern, and the surrounding counties having been crowding into that city, until it has become quite a multum in parvo, of gens comme il faut. Sakespeare's Jubilee was but a hardy gurdy concert, when compared with this Musical Festival, where concerts, balls and sermons formed the bizarre melange: the singers were in concert, the inn-keepers were in concert, and the lodging-houses were in concert, drawing notes in rapid succession of allegretto movements from their customers, whose con strepito accompaniments, proved the musical adage "that perfect harmony cannot exist without a discord."

The fashionables of St. Giles's, Spitalfields, and Wapping, have had a crowded season at that emporium of annual fun and frolic, dedicated to their patron saint, St. Bartholomew: roundabouts, ups-and-downs, hurdigurdies, handargans, vans, caravans, and all other wind instruments, have been crowding into Smithfield pens, as if all Creation had been rushing to the center; some of the royal manufactories displayed a greater assemblage of gilded Kings and Queens, than even St. Cloud can boast, and a witty vender of hot-spiced gingerbread, exhibited his superfine royal hunting nuts, fresh from the oven, but not so hard as the Spanish nuts which Napoleon has to crack! Great decorum was observed by the lions, lionesses, and other wild beasts: fried sausages, and plumb pudding, all hot, were in their usual abundance for the Amateurs; lasses and their lads crowded, as usual, to the ups and downs; Juliet mourned her absent love in the old black gown, often-washed white handkerchief; and Pizarro, with the most pathetic ardour, invited the spectators to his standard; and the whole merry go round went off with so little disturbance, that the Piedpoudre Court had nothing but red-letter-days, much to the credit of John Bull and his family.

Bon Mot.—A fashionable party passing through a certain country borough a few days since, were so unsufferably assailed in their delicate sence of smelling, that one of the Ladies was induced to ask what filthy place it could be? "Do not abuse it, my Lady, said another, for it is a borough that returns two Members to Parliament." "Then, replied the Lady, I am sure it must be a rotten borough."

Spanish brushes are now entirely excluded from the Bonaparte family, their roughness having been found greatly to hurt the Nap.

A few days ago, one of those untutored sons of Erin, who sells, nuts, &c. through the country, happening to go into a shop in Belfast, in which a very tall gentleman was standing, the gentleman, after chattering some time with the autoan for his wares, stepped towards the door, saying, "I am long enough here." "Och! God bless you, my honey," says Paddy, "you're too long any where."

An Irish Gentleman being lately asked his opinion of Bonaparte's last sten, replied. "Oh, and upon my troth, my dear honey, he as at last put his foot in it."

POPULAR PREACHERS.

THE FOUNDLING CHAPEL; AND ITS MINISTERS.

ENGLAND has long been distinguished as the country of benevolence. Every where has piety, or philanthropy, erected temples to humanity; and there is no species of mortal suffering, for which this nation does not offer either remedy or relief. We have built something like palaces for the repose of those veterans who survive the battles of the state, and founded noble establishments for the children of fathers who have fallen in its cause; we have parochial receptacles for indigence, and alms-houses for age; we have schools of instruction even for the blind, and of reformation for the reprobate; we proclaim a refuge for the destitute; we have reared an asylum for female orphans, and a magdalen for female penitents; and we have, or profess to have, a foundling—for deserted illegitimates. Our munificence has been most happily employed, to alleviate every description of human calamity; while our beneficence is most honourably extended to every gradation of human depravity. This is our praise. It must therefore excite surprise, that so many charitable and provident institutions are inadequate to the purposes for which they were specifically designed; and it ought to actuate our indignation—if any one of these establishments is found to have essentially degenerated from the original principle of its application. If only interest and affluence are suffered to shelter themselves under that protection which was intended exclusively for imploration and poverty; if the rich have almost appropriated those advantages which were held out solely to the poor; if charity has become property; if, the powerful having ousted the impotent, the refuge of wretchedness has become the asylum of transgression; if these things be true, or if there exist even suspicion of their truth, enquiry should be stimulated to vigilance, and conviction succeeded by resentment! When appeals are made to the heart, and contributions are thus levied on the pocket, the head has some claim to be satisfied that all is right. Charity ought not to be the great object of pious imposition.

Let the Conductors of the Foundling Hospital look to these reflections. Rumour, and something still louder than rumour, is against them. The whisperings of individuals may become the voice of society; and, where more demands are continually made on public benevolence, it may be felt necessary to consult public opinion. With funds more than adequate to the ends of their institution, and continually augmenting, what is the application of them? Are the doors of this Hospital open to the real objects of its legitimate succour, and to these only? Is access to it, on the contrary, go, as they say of kissing, by favour? Has protection its price, or countenance its currency?—These are rather weighty questions.

It is with the Foundling-Chapel, however, that I am now principally concerned. Were it the business of this paper to enter minutely into the merits of the Foundling Hospital, its interior could scarcely escape notice, and would, in many particulars, justify the language of reprehension. As they are at present conducted, I entertain, indeed, some fundamental objections to most of our public infantile institutions, and even to charitable associations of a higher class. My opinions might appear singular; but they are founded on candid observation, and strengthened by habitual reflection.

Chapels are becoming too numerous. Our fathers, who seem to have acted upon elevated conceptions of religious worship, bequeathed to us temples not unworthy of national devotion, monuments of the august piety of past ages, which still excite our admiration, without influencing our conduct. Money can be found for any thing except the promotion of our established religion. Many people talk of despoiling the church, and conventicles spring up among us like exhalations; but there is scarcely the man, who thinks of raising new national edifices for divine worship. Churches, not chapels, are nevertheless wanted—churches, on an enlarged and devotional plan, where high and low, rich and poor, may fully mingle in the worship of their common Creator, in the way to their common Heaven! Theological affairs seem lamentably reversed. Those to whom the Gospel was first preached, are now the last in ecclesiastical consideration. It is for the rich, and not the poor, that places of religious instruction are erected; and it is to the rich, instead of the poor, that many popular pastors ambitiously address their labours. The Foundling-Chapel has substantial claim to this distinction; and, I believe, the Gentlemen of the Philanthropic are the only managers of those modern chapels, who, believing the poor have souls to be saved, as well as themselves, gratuitously admit them to their Chapel! Liberal minds will not overlook this honourable peculiarity, while enlightened minds will know how to appreciate its effects.

However inelegant the assertion may appear, whatever deficiency of taste it may discover, I must unequivocally object to the Mode of conducting Divine Worship in the FOUNDLING CHAPEL. It is theatrical in the extreme. Survey the audience, particularly the female portion of it, hanging on the extatic warblings, delightful thrillings, and electrifying shakes of two practised singers,—"Charming!" softly exclaims one lady;—"Beautiful! divine!" rapturously adds her friend; while a third, unable to suppress her emotions, heaves the sigh of delectation, and scarcely restrains her applauding hands!!! Are these divine extacies? Is this the enthusiasm of devotion? Every thing studiously aids this sense of temporal fascination. The lightness of the building itself, and, at other times, the brilliancy of its illumination; the youth and gaiety of the greater part of the assembly, not to call it an audience, composed of coquetting lasses and ogling lovers; and (what, however, is of secondary effect) a most accomplished, and fashionably captivating, style of preaching. Religion, of course, ventures rarely to intrude herself among such splendid worshippers of melody and oratory.

It is time to be serious. To expect in such a place, and under such circumstances, that consecration of the heart without which christianity is but a name, is looking for grapes from thorns and figs from thistles. Levity may be gratified, but devotion is distrusted. Infidelity remains unconfuted, disobedience unreproved, faith unexhorted, and transgression unreclaimed. Young persons are induced to consider the affairs of eternity as matters of laudable amusement, while their elders can with difficulty attach themselves to the serious business of religion. Nor is this the whole of the evil. Reverting to those children who are the immediate objects of this charity, a rational spectator will perceive the impropriety of the situation in which they are thus placed. They form a sort of Exhibition; and, as far as the influence of example operates, they must, if they aspire to any particular publicity, be emulous of becoming public singers. Can any thing be more preposterous? Their patrons are absolutely "music mad," and the contagion is rapidly indisposing their whole system.

I am anxious to be accurately understood. Seriously as I deprecate the foundling-worship, I wish not to see piety divested of its fair attractions, its becoming vestments, its appropriate ornaments, its lawful appendages. There is ostentatious plainness, as well as gorgeous pomposity; and, perhaps, Diogenes in his tub was as proud as Alexander in his palace.

Addison, in one of his admirable essays, describes the gratification he felt in accidentally hearing the Ritual of the Church of England seriously and emphatically read. The performance of this portion of our Divine Service ought to be considered of the highest importance; since, in the opinion of many, it would admit of judicious curtailments: and its present length, together with the frequency of its repetition, must be rendered acceptable principally by the manner in which it is delivered. There is, however, much to complain of on this head. Either the ministers of religion do not highly estimate the nature of this part of their duty, or they are too generally incompetent to the discharge of it. Cowper, among his accusations against the clergy, complains of "souls that cannot reach;" but of tongues that cannot read, painful and numerous as they are, he makes no mention. Incapacity and indevotion on the part of the reader, naturally generate inattention and indifference in the minds of his hearers; what he performs as a task, they feel as a toil; and, instead of entering into the spirit of its liturgy, many members of the established church, otherwise heartily attached to it, merely endure the routine of its rites and ceremonies. What aggravates this evil is the cause to which chiefly it may be traced. It is not the want of a volume of voice; it is not the absence of imperative looks and authoritative tones, of arranged gestures and studied emphases; these are not the deficiencies which I should specify in a clerical reader. Tremulousness of supplication, and distinctness of enunciation, are the qualifications he should most cultivate. If his heart be but serious, it will give light to his understanding, and to his manner an awful dignity. His situation is holy; and the sacredness of the office confers sanctity on him who officiates. His deportment, indeed, may dissipate this divine illusion; but, what shall extenuate his offence?

ONESIMUS.

Chapter Coffee-house, Pater-Noster-row.

ONESIMUS has received several letters, and his Correspondents may rest assured that he will, as far as practicable, avail himself of their communications. He has not done with that extraordinary personage, WILLIAM HUNTINGDON, S. S. of antinomian celebrity; nor have the efforts of his Advocates escaped notice.—Amicus, or Observator, will not be forgotten: the contents of his letter are mostly correct, but the Subject of them requires more extended illustration.—Amicus Sincerus puts an important interrogatory, to which, however, only a general answer can be given. "Extemporary Preaching" is not Prohibited by any known "Rules of the Established Church "of England;" but then it is discouraged, as far at least as Episcopal Authority can operate; and it is unnecessary to remind this correspondent, how much even the request of superiors approximate to commands!

Certain "Verses, addressed to the Inhabitants of St. James's "Westminster, on the Death of Dr. Parker and the Presenta- "tion of the Rev. Gerrard Andrews," have been most duly received; and, if the poetry of the writer had but equalled his piety, their length would not have precluded their publicity. Let their circulation, therefore, continue to be prudentially restricted; and, as heretofore, let them still be "handed about "in manuscript" only. This advice is given without the remotest affectation of superiority.

 My next number will analize the clerical character of the PREACHERS OF THE FOUNDLING CHAPEL.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Notice was on Friday received from Yarmouth, that some vessels from Riga were in the Offing. If this intelligence be correct, some relaxation must have taken place in the Franco-Russian system of opposition to British commerce.

The Gloire frigate, Captain Lucas, cruising off the coast of France, a few days since, discovered two of the largest class of French frigates, near Cape Barfleur. Notwithstanding this immense odds, Captain C. with the utmost intrepidity, resolved on attacking them. In a few minutes the ship was clear for action, every gun double shotted, and it was thought one broadside would so disable the sternmost ship, as to enable him to cut her off. The enemy, on perceiving his intention, immediately crowded all sail, and, with the assistance of a strong in-shore current, effected their escape into Cherbourg, but not without receiving a broadside from the Gloire, as they entered the mouth of the harbour. What is still more convincing how much the enemy feel their own inferiority, the Amphitrite, a fine new frigate, ready for sea at Cherbourg, never made the least movement to assist her magnanimous comrades, or even to give them a tow into port.

GENERAL JUNOT, DUKE D'ABRANTES, &c.

Notwithstanding the frequent boast of originality of idea, amongst both the actors in, and partisans of, the French Revolution, yet the whole of their conduct has been marked by a servile imitation either of the Romans, or of the Franks; as a proof of this we need only advert to the assumption of Roman appellatives in the first stages of equal liberty, and the humble imitation of Charlemagne by the present Republican Emperor. If this imitation had been really an imitation of their virtues, we would have been less offended at their more trifling child's play; but when it is merely an assumption of name joined to deeds even more atrocious than the most horrid ravages of the hordes of northern savages who inundated Europe,—when we see rank and distinction assumed by those who have sprung from the very lowest orders of society, and who have emerged from their pristine obscurity merely from pre-eminence in villainy—we would be prompted to close the page of history with detestation and disgust, if it were not that curiosity is now more particularly awake, to contemplate the present rapid changes of scene on the great theatre of Europe, and to enquire into the origin and merits of the different actors; and as we may soon expect the curtain to fall on this motley groupe, when the names and characters of all but a few of the arch fiends must sink into the stream of oblivion, we have judged that an accurate portrait of General Junot, with some authentic particulars of his life, would not be unacceptable to our Readers. Many of the anecdotes have been collected on the Continent, and handed to us through a source of undoubted authenticity and by particular favour, the others are confirmed by a reference to the best histories of the times.

The subject of this day's biography, though now calling himself Duke D'Abrantes, boasts no higher lineage than his August Master. General Junot was born at Orleans, where his father was a corn chandler, of the lowest description in the trade; without education beyond its mere rudiments, or the slightest attention to his morals, the young Junot was occupied in the most laborious drudgery of the business, until the year 1789, when having been tempted to make rather free with the till, in order to gratify his vicious passions, his father turned him out of the house, giving him the wide world in which to follow his aspiring disposition. Paris was at that moment the foyer of the dissolute and discontented, and this young pupil of liberty and equality having turned his steps to the capital, his active philosophy soon gained him admittance into the Jacobin Club, those great patrons of revolutionary genius, who, finding him fit for their every purpose, retained him as a follower, and initiated him in all the revolutionary jargon and policy of the day. In the early scenes of the Revolution, in the horrible massacre at l'Abbaye, and through the whole progress of lanternization, Junot was an active assistant, and having bathed himself deep in blood, was considered as fit for the departments: of course, when the operations on the southern frontier required an augmentation of the national army, this elève of liberty, in his zeal to regenerate the country of Nice, which at that period was still unenlightened, shouldered his musquet, and marched for Provence. It would be beyond our limits to detail the horrors of this expedition, to enumerate the murders of loyalty and the violations of innocence; there is, however, one anecdote of which this monster is said frequently to have boasted, and which merits notice. In a small village near Antibes, where a detachment of the revolutionary army was fraternized, Citizen Junot took up his quarters in the house of a poor peasant, who had seen better days; the man was loyal, but his wife, charmed with patriotism, yielded to the ardour of this military philosopher; in a short time, however, in consequence of some advantages gained by the loyal party, this district was given up to the fury of the soldiery, when the philanthropic reformer not only aided, but joined in the violation of the wife and daughter of his host, who was coolly and tauntingly murdered, after being obliged to witness his own degradation. After this display of revolutionary virtue, he extended his services and civism to the neighbourhood of Toulon, previous to its evacuation by the British and Spanish forces; here during the short siege he served with the artillery, and attracted the notice of Bonaparte, who was then Chef de Brigade. It has been stated, that the Corsican Chief, during a heavy cannonade, enquired if any one near him could write; Junot immediately offered his services, and whilst employed on a drum-head, a shot striking the ground close to his side, covered him with dust; undisturbed by the occurrence, he coolly said, "that will do! I wanted sand for my letter." Struck with his behaviour, Bonaparte exclaimed, "You are a brave fellow! how can I serve you?"—"Give me promotion," replied Junot, "I will not disgrace it;" he was instantly taken from the ranks, and appointed by Napoleon his orderly serjeant, from which, for his abilities and coolness, he was promoted to the rank of an officer. When Toulon surrendered, he had a fresh opportunity of displaying his civic abilities, and was particularly noticed for his activity in assisting in the atrocities which were inflicted on all those who had favoured the British, and when all those who had even lodged an Englishman in their houses, or who were suspected of being favourable to the cause of loyalty, were assembled by a treacherous proclamation in the Champ de Mars, and butchered in cold blood, to the amount of 1500 men, women, and children; an exploit boasted of by his friend, when he wrote to the Convention tion, "upon the field of glory, my feet inundated with the blood of traitors, I announce to you, with a heart beating with joy, that your orders are executed, and France avenged." In the following autumn 1794, when Napoleon was confined in the south as a terrorist, after the death of Robespierre, Junot shared the fate of his patron; but a general amnesty having opened their prison, these two friends repaired to the capital, where their talents soon procured them employment in their own way. When the contest took place between the Convention and the Sections of Paris, respecting the new Constitution, he joined his dear friends Bonaparte and Loison, particularly in the massacre on the night of the 4th of October, 1795, in which Bonaparte, with his artillery, swept the streets in all directions, killing and wounding, without mercy or distinction, until upwards of 8000 of both sexes, and of all ages, were left weltering in their blood. When the thunder of the cannon had ceased, the horrid perpetrators spread themselves through the streets to enjoy the bloody scene; a wounded mother, whose infant lay in her arms, crying in vain for the nourishment of the breast, attracted the attention of these savages, when Junot stabbing the child, tore it from its mother's bosom, and throwing it to some distance, tauntingly told the wounded and disabled parent to seek it, and hush its cries! This equality of disposition endeared him more and more to his patron, who on being elevated to the rank of Commander in Chief of the Army of Italy, in 1796, chose Junot as one of his Aids-de-Camp; throughout the whole of this campaign he acquitted himself so as to preserve the confidence of his General, particularly at Mondovi, at Lodi, Milan, and Padua, where by his cruel atrocities and skill in plundering, he proved his capability of commanding, and was promoted to the rank of colonel. At Tortona, after encouraging the soldiers in every excess, and joining in it himself, it was thought necessary to make an example, and the immaculate Junot was the commanding officer superintending the execution of a poor devil Latouche, of the 5th battalion, who the moment before he was shot, exclaimed, "You see, comrades, the fate awaiting me—and you, commander of the detachment, if you had prohibited me from going to maraud, I would not have been condemned to this ignominious death!" Such is the qualified detail, given even by one of their own historians. His revolutionary fierte was highly gratified by his being introduced by Bonaparte into the elevated societies into which he intruded by force of arms, and here he took every opportunity of insulting fallen greatness, particularly whilst accompanying his General to dinner with the Grand Duke at Florence, whose territories were then ravaged by the French troops. When a courier brought intelligence of the capture of Milan, Junot, turning round from the perusal of the dispatch, rudely exclaimed, "Citizen Grand Duke, tyranny will soon be crushed, Milan has fallen!"—After the battle of Castiglione, this disgrace to humanity had nearly paid the forfeit of his crimes, for being detached by Bonaparte, at the head of the Corps of Guides to occupy Desenzano, and annoy the Austrians, he was opposed by Colonel Bender with a small detachment of Hulans, and so roughly handled, that he himself received six sabre wounds, and was thrown into a ditch, where he would have perished, but for the attention of some of his routed party. At the battle of Senio, where he commanded the 7th regiment of Hussars, under General Victor, this humane officer displayed his bravery, and love for the Church, by cutting down a Capuchin Friar, who had encouraged his countrymen to resist these invaders; and at Loretto (where Augereau robbed the famous Chapel, and after taking down the sacred image, in order to send it to Paris, placed a common strumpet on the pedestal, obliging even the female pilgrims of the highest rank to bow down before her,) Citizen Junot was also a principal actor, and shewed himself a worthy disciple of the new philosophy. On the sailing of the expedition to Egypt, he embarked as Aid-de-Camp, and was an active assistant in that country and in Syria, in fraternizing with the inhabitants; particularly at Cairo, where he took possession of a rich Mussulman's house for his own quarters, and not only obliged the unfortunate owner to supply his table for himself and friends, but not content with the run of the house, insisted on having the run of the harem also. Here he shared Bonaparte's most secret confidence along with Duroc, now Grand Master of the Ceremonies at Paris, with whom he officiated as Deputy Grand Master of the Ceremonies to the unfortunate Turks, who were massacred at Jaffa; but owing to some unaccountable accident, he was not one of those who so slyly accompanied the Conqueror of Egypt, when he ran away nobody from the British who were looking after his [illegible] from his own army. In Egypt, therefore, he [illegible] when he returned to France "covered [illegible] was announced to his countrymen, by [illegible] ors of the then Government; on his arrival he found his friend First Consul, and was immediately appointed a General of Division, and soon after was nominated Governor of Paris, where his despotic and cruel disposition made him an able supporter of Fouché, whom he rivalled in cruelty and extortion, and was strongly suspected of being, as well as Fouché, the private encourager of a daring gang of housebreakers and footpads, who were the terror of the capital in the winter of 1803, and of whom, the few that were detected and brought to justice, were invariably screened by some invisible power, and permitted to elude all punishment. To relate all the anecdotes current of him, whilst Governor of Paris, would require a volume; but of his honour, the following one is told, which we believe to be correct, though we do not vouch for its authenticity. He was in the habit of frequenting the public gambling-houses, in his private capacity, and one evening at Frescati, being in plain clothes, and accompanied by a young man in the same costume, he stood near one of the tables where this young man staked rouleaux, apparently of fifty louis d'ors, at rouge et noir; when the young man lost, he always took up his stake, and laid down another in its stead, but when at last he won, he exultingly told the Banker to count the stake in his rouleau, when it was found to contain bank notes to the amount of one hundred thousand livres, about 4,500*l.*! A demand so extraordinary induced the Bankers to refer it to the company, when Junot immediately interfered, and swore if they did not pay him instantly, that he would confiscate the Bank, and arrest every individual of the company. Not intimidated by this threat, they refused payment, when this virtuous Republican asked the Bankers "if they "knew who he was?" and immediately exclaimed "I am the "Governor of Paris, this is my Aid-de-Camp, and I insist "that you pay him this instant." As they still hesitated, he added, "you are a gang of sharpers and villains! and I shall "soon do your business," then seizing the money which was on the table, a scuffle ensued, and the noise having brought in the guard, he ordered sixteen of them to be taken to prison, where they were detained until they could settle the busines, whilst Junot and his Aid-de-Camp, quietly pocketed all the cash they had laid hold of; and then returned to their usual Seat of Justice!

This mode of raising the supplies, by imprisoning people on trifling causes was often resorted to, and once in the case of a Mr. Campbell, an American, on pretence of his having lent an old English Newspaper to a friend to read: he was arrested, confined to the Temple for ten weeks, and only released on paying down a handsome sum, when he was sent to Havre escorted by gens d'armes and put on board a neutral vessel on the point of sailing, with a caution never to shew himself in France again. As the system of Espionage is now so extensive in France, that every man in office has his regular set of spies, the Governor of Paris deemed it necessary to follow the fashion, but he found at last that these gentry might push their enquiries farther than was convenient. In one of the streets near his head-quarters, resided a ci-devant noble, who had a handsome wife, and the spies reported to Junot that a stranger, wrapped up in a great coat, and otherwise apparently disguised, had often been traced to this house, and that of course he must be some person dangerous to the state; repeated reports were made before the Governor condescended to notice them, but in the mean time the spies of the civil police had made the same report to Fouché, who immediately ordered some gens d'arms to make the necessary inquiries: this was done, and they arrested—the Governor! who, of course, had gone there merely to examine into the reports of his own spies. In 1805, General Junot resigned the command of Paris to our Imperial Brother Murat; and we believe that it was shortly after this he married an Albanian Princess. When Lannes had completed his fortune in Portugal, or when he was wanted for some other purpose, Junot superseded him at Lisbon, where his conduct was as oppressive and insulting as that of his predecessor, though marked with more dissimulation; and on the retreat of the Royal Family to Brazil, he took the command of the army which occupied Portugal; he now shewed his character in its real colours, by insulting every form of religion, by sequestrating the property of the church, and by encouraging every revolutionary meanness and atrocity which so long stigmatized the arms of France. Our limits will not allow us to enter into a more minute detail of his cruelty, dissimulation, and more recent robberies; they are fresh in the memory of all; as well as his boasting about the reception he would give the British troops, who have already given him a lesson; though we cannot help regretting that the unexpected occurrences should have permitted him to carry away such an addition to his former property, which, including his lands in Poland, is said to amount to near 20,000*l.* per annum.

He is still in the vigour of life, but most vulgar and uncouth in his appearance; his face is seamed with scars, and his manners are boorish, rude, and obtrusive; he is ignorant of all learning except the mere rudiments, but he has always been reckoned remarkable for his quickness of judgment and decision, and certainly his conduct since the landing of our troops in Portugal does not contradict the general opinion. His skill in negotiation has been even superior to his tactics in the field, and he has conquered with the pen those whom he could not touch with the sword.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-EIGHT.

PROJECTED INVASION OF SPAIN BY BONAPARTE.

To the cause of Spain are irrevocably attached the destinies of Europe. On the successful resistance or subjugation of her inhabitants depend as incontrovertibly our own preponderance and security. Let us then consider with all the candour, impartiality, and judgment, which this great question so imperiously requires, the means she possesses of obtaining ultimate success, and how we can most efficaciously assist her. This disquisition acquires additional interest from the late official declaration of the enemy;—an enemy till now in the habit of executing his menace;—whose dreadful fiat, with few exceptions, has been attended with almost instantaneous effect; and whose irrevocable adherence to his purpose Italy, Germany, Spain, and Portugal unfortunately attest. Let us consider the man, his genius, his resources, his crimes, and his inflexible will! Let us then contrast the united efforts of Great Britain and Spain; the sacredness of the cause, the calamities and degradation that await them in case of discomfiture;—and having done so, let us examine what cause for apprehension, or motives for encouragement we have. In the annals of history there is, perhaps, not one question which outweighs the present in importance. There never has been one, whose interests were so comprehensive, and its consequences so decisive. Under this impression we ought to enter on the examination; and whilst we treat it with that seriousness and temper, which the magnitude and awfulness of the subject demand, we will communicate our suggestions with freedom, and propose measures, which appear to us conducive to the exigency of the times. The crisis is awful! Every individual, who feels the faculty and the will, should contribute his mite to the general fund. Every talent will be thus brought into circulation, and the result of this general interest and participation will be, that the energy of the community will be wound up to that pitch, which, as long as it lasts, renders their efforts superior to occurrences, and forms a new and glorious era in their annals.

Doubts and apprehensions, discreditable to the public, have been manifested in consequence of the enunciation made in the official journal of the Tyrant, "That not a village in Spain would be in a state of insurrection, nor an English soldier on the Continent before the close of the year." These fears were magnified by the account of the numerous armies which were hastening to the Pyrenees, in order to support this menace. Some from levity and some from ignorance, others, to give a proof of their foresight, and a few worthless individuals, we are afraid, from a desire to depreciate the efforts of their country, and to extol those of the enemy, have contributed to promote the alarm. Three months ago this anxiety would have been justifiable; when an army of a hundred thousand French veterans was in possession of Madrid and the principal cities and fortresses of Spain; when scarce a corps was organised in that country to resist that tremendous force; when the very man, who had overrun and subjugated Europe, in the course of three years, was on the frontiers: Under those circumstances apprehensions would have been excusable and even just. But after the Spaniards have done every thing to command our esteem and veneration; after they have given unequivocal marks of their resolution to bury themselves under the ruins of their country, sooner than submit to ignominy; after they have rendered, by the extirpation of their invaders, the seizure of the fleet, their bold and just delineation of the perfidy and atrocity of the enemy, every idea of compromise impossible, and submission itself unavailing;—after having armed a considerable part of their male population, and put in requisition the whole mass of talents and virtue in their country;—after having done acts of heroism, manifested a degree of perseverance and patience, and given a sublime example of patriotism, unequalled in modern times, and almost without a parallel in the most vaunted ages of Greece and Rome;—after such proofs of magnanimity, we did not expect that an insolent declaration from the Tyrant whom they discomfitted, and whose brother, and whose partisans and soldiers they chaced from their capital, would be sufficient to depress a British public. What renders this discouragement the more unpardonable and criminal, are the victories of Vimiera and Roleia. Though our generals have not known to avail themselves of these brilliant advantages, our soldiers are still the same, and are ready to engage the enemy on Spanish ground. New Expeditions are fitting out, some have already sailed to augment their force; and the whole regular army of the United Kingdom is under orders for the same destination. With such vigour on our part, and incontestable resolution on that of the Spaniards, we would entertain no fear of ultimate success, were the enemy at liberty to send his whole army beyond the Pyrenees. The character of this war is different, as we have frequently observed, from every other he has been engaged in. He may be successful in the commencement. He may conduct his brother once more to Madrid. He may commit the most unheard of outrages in several of the provinces, erase their cities to the very foundation, and exterminate a considerable part of the population; but we will hazard in like manner a counter-prophecy, "That at the close of this year not an armed partisan of the "Bonapartes will be in Madrid." We hazard this prophecy, because we entertain a very high opinion of the energy and capacity of the present Cabinet, as favourable an opinion of Spanish prowess, and the most sanguine hopes from the nature of the contest.

We have left out of consideration the rest of the continent. We will give as much credit to the declaration relative to Austria as Bonaparte himself could wish. We will believe his solemn assurance of the acquiescence of Russia in his system of usurpation and plunder; we will suppose that every Cabinet on the Continent consists of fools or knaves, we will allow that every particle of virtue, that every spark of liberty, that every national sentiment, from the Neva to the Bay of Naples, are extinct. We will attempt to forget his former declarations previous to the Austrian and Prussian Wars: we will acknowledge the arrival of two Swedish Cabinet Messengers in Paris, the submission, acquiescence and debasement of Italians, Austrians, Prussians, Poles, Danes, Russians and even of the magnanimous Gustavus. After all these concessions, supposing all these statements were true, we should be far from believing the cause of the Spaniards desperate;—We should still indulge the opinion that they would finally succeed in spite of the subterfuges, treachery and power of their daring antagonist.

But convinced as we are that this declaration was made to deceive Great Britain, delude his vassal States, and impose on Austria; that it was made without wisdom and foresight, as a miserable shift for the moment, we then perceive the extent of his embarrassment and the inefficacy of his means. His armies are in motion; but he is uncertain how to employ them. He apprehends Austria; he distrusts the Confederacy of the Rhine, and is wholly aware of the magnitude of the danger that threatens him in the South. A war between him and Austria is unavoidable; and it is by no means impolitic on the part of the latter to defer the contest until a considerable part of his army is withdrawn from Germany. That he foresees this event we may safely conclude from his whining appeal to the promise he extracted from the Emperor Francis, during their conferences at the Mill in Moravia; and that he fears it in the present juncture, we may as safely assert from the reluctant indifference he manifests on the occasion. He will do every thing in his power to avoid a rupture with that power. But if he has already discovered that Austria will not be deceived by his intrigues, or intimidated by his menaces, he will act in the same manner as he had done in the two last wars; he will order a considerable part of the force he destines for the invasion of that country, to march back to the Rhine, in order to throw the odium of hostilities on that power. None of our readers has forgotten the embarkation of his army in Holland and at Boulogne, under the pretext of invading this country, after he had received certain information of the intentions of the Courts of Vienna, St. Petersburg and London. He practised a similar manœuvre a few weeks before the battle of Jena: he likewise ordered some corps to pass the Rhine; and solemnly assured Europe, that the tranquillity of the Continent should not be interrupted, and that his disputes with the Cabinet of Berlin would be amicably adjusted. He gave this formal assurance, after he had projected the downfall of that unhappy government. He is unfortunately justified in entertaining this contemptible opinion of men. Their weakness, their credulity, their fatal inaction, their temporising character, have established his pre-eminence. He thinks he may still impose on Austria by the same stale trick he had so successfully practised on other occasions: but a better genius, we would hope, inspires the Councils of that country. It would suppose a degree of political profligacy or imbecility in the Archduke Charles and the Members of the Imperial Cabinet, which we are far from ascribing to them, to imagine they give credit to the Tyrant's assertions. After the experience of the past, could they be guilty of such gross stupidity, so far from being in a capacity to regulate the concerns of a powerful empire, they would not have talents sufficient to direct the management of a small farm. This we repeat again is not our opinion. On the contrary, we are inclined to entertain the most sanguine expectations from their future exertions.

We have made this digression relative to Austria, in order to invalidate the official falsehoods of the Moniteur. We have not time nor room to advert to the unavoidable discontent which exists in Holland, Brabant, along the Rhine, Westphalia, Hanover, Prussia, Switzerland, and Italy. To deny that the people wish an alleviation of their present misery, that they wait with anxiety for a revolution in their affairs, would betray a base opinion of the human heart, a prostitution of sentiment, and a decided ignorance of national feeling. They must be dissatisfied—they have suffered the severest outrages—so many families have been reduced to ruin—the means of all have been so much curtailed—their national feelings have been so grossly and wantonly insulted—they see a swarm of rapacious foreigners indulging in the wildest luxury and excesses; accumulating immense fortunes, whilst they themselves, their wives and children are tortured with hunger and disease. To think that those unfortunate wretches would not seize with avidity an opportunity of breaking their chains, and exterminating the greedy adventurers, who are preying on their vitals and consuming the fruits of their industry, is repulsive to feeling and contradicted by experience.

Such is, according to human probability, the real situation of the Continent. We will not insult the good sense of our readers by employing a chain of ingenious reasoning to refute the palpable falsehoods of Bonaparte. They are so notorious, so shameless, so extravagant, that they would tend to excite ridicule; were it possible to indulge in risibility, in adverting to the conduct of that dangerous individual. Though we have endeavoured to weaken any discouraging impression the public may have received from his declaration; we should regret that any relaxation should take place in our exertions. The man, who has solemnly pledged himself to Europe to subjugate Spain, has frequently baffled calculation, and executed with facility what was considered improbable and even impossible. He is active, abstemious, enterprising, and vigilant. No indulgence distracts him from the pursuit of his object. No pleasure relaxes his exertions; and no sense of justice or humanity makes him scrupulous as to the means he employs. All are lawful, if they only conduce to his success. And when we reflect on his ambition, genius, the resources of the vast empire he despotically governs, his military talents, his former success, the number and discipline of his armies, the skill of his generals, the activity of his agents, and the terror of his name, there is reason to hope that all the virtues, talents, and resources of a free and opulent community, will be lavishly employed to counteract his project of subjugation.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

NARRATIVE OF EVENTS IN SPAIN.

PARIS, SEPT. 8.—The Senate assembled on the 5th, under the Presidency of his Serene Highness the Prince Arch Chancellor; the Prince Arch Treasurer, the Prince Vice Grand Elector, and the Prince Vice Constable assisted at the sittings.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs and of War communicated the following reports:—

"There are in Spain a very considerable number of enlightened individuals who think freely, and are anxious to see their country governed by a Constitution which should guarantee the rights of the nation.

"That kingdom also contains a number of persons, whose wishes accorded with the different scenes of the French Revolution.

"The third part of the territory is in the possession of the secular Clergy. The Monks, almost all ignorant, but superstitious, exercise the most powerful influence over the lower orders of the people, who are in a state of much greater ignorance in Spain than in any country; and which, under such a Government, have during a century made progress only in superstition and idleness.

"The events which occurred at the Escurial and at Aranjuez, made a great turnout upon the respect due to the throne; the convocation of a Junta at Bayonne to deliberate upon the fundamental principles of a Constitution; the extraordinary and unforeseen events of the 2d of May, at Madrid—all these circumstances contributed to set the passions in motion, and to carry hope and fear respectively to the highest excess.

"The English faction could not fail to convert this situation of affairs to their own advantage. This faction had been all along very active and very powerful in the sea ports, and its influence was continually felt in Madrid. It had by the general circumstances of the Continent acquired great influence, as well as by the sacrifices which the state of the Spanish commerce demanded. Every artifice was thus resorted to, to excite a general disposition to throw off the alliance with France, and to form a connection with England; and this secret inclination had a very considerable influence upon the events at Aranjuez, and those which followed them.

Then after giving a very prolix and detailed account of the military occurrences, in which The Moniteur, however, does not advert to the seizure of the Fleet at Cadiz, or the situation of Junot, and after having very gravely asserted that the French arms were constantly victorious; except in the single instance of Dupont, who was guilty of imprudence, he proceeds—

"The King left Madrid on the 1st of August, and the whole army went into cooler cantonments.

"On the 22d, the King was at Burgos, and parties sent out to the distance of from fifteen to twenty miles, could procure no intelligence of the enemy.

"Every intelligent person sees with regret, that England has obtained the melancholy advantage of exciting among the Spaniards a civil war, of which the issue is not doubtful. But what influence can the rational and enlightened opinion of Europe have upon the ignorant multitude, when led away by fanaticism, popular prejudices, and foreign corruption?

"Such is a correct abstract of the events of the campaign in Spain. There has been no battle, not a single action in which the courage of our troops was not displayed to advantage."

Digitized by Google

"Had General Dupont kept his troops united in a body, he would, without much difficulty, have dispersed the insurgents, their army having consisted only of three divisions, scarcely forming a total of 20,000 men.

"The bodies of insurgents scarcely deserve to be mentioned as this war. They defended themselves behind a wall or a house, but could not maintain themselves in the open fields; and a single squadron of cavalry, or a battalion of infantry, is sufficient to put many thousands of them to the rout.

"All that the English Papers have published, respecting the affairs of Spain, is unfounded and false. England knows well the part she is acting on this occasion. She also knows well what she is to expect from all her efforts. Her only object is to involve Spain in confusion, that she may thereby make herself mistress of such of her possessions as best suit her purposes."

REPORT OF THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS, TO HIS IMPERIAL AND ROYAL MAJESTY.

"Sire, Paris, Sept. 1.

"I have the honour to propose to your Majesty to communicate to the Senate the two Treaties which have placed the Crown of Spain in your hands, and the constitution which under your auspices, and enlightened by your advice, the Junta assembled at Bayonne, after free and mature deliberation, have adopted for the glory of the Spanish name and the prosperity of that kingdom and its colonies.

"If in the arrangements made by your Majesty the security of France has been your principal care, the interest of Spain herself has however been dear, and in uniting the two states by the most intimate alliance; the prosperity and the glory of both were equally the objects proposed. The troubles which have manifested themselves have particularly excited the solicitude of your Majesty in deprecating their progress, in foreseeing their sad consequences, in hoping to prevent them by persuasive means, and by measures of wise and humane policy. Your Majesty interfered as a mediator in the midst of the divided Spaniards, shewing them on one side the anarchy which threatened them, and on the other England ready to profit by their divisions, and to make use of them to suit her convenience, and pointing out to them the way by which they might be saved from this double danger, by a constitution wise, provident, proper to provide, all of which they stood in need, and in which liberal ideas intermixed themselves with these ancient institutions which Spain wished to be preserved.

"The expectations of your Majesty have been deceived. Individual interests, foreign intrigues, and the influences of foreign corruption have prevailed. Why is it so easy to lead nations to their ruin by letting loose their passions? In a former report, I have made your Majesty acquainted with the influence which the English were acquiring in Spain, the numerous party that they had formed, the friends whom they had acquired in the commercial towns, by holding out to them the prospect of a revival of their trade; I had pointed them out to you as authors of the sedition which overturned the Throne of Charles IV. and the favourers of the popular disorders which arose at that epoch. They had burst through that salutary restraint which keeps the people in submission, by operating upon their interests: The populace of Spain having shaken off the yoke of authority aspired at governing. English gold, the intrigues of the agents of the Inquisition, who were afraid of losing their authority, the influence of the numerous tribe of Monks in Spain, who dreaded a reform, have in this critical moment occasioned the insurrection of several Spanish provinces, in which the voice of the more prudent class has been either mistaken or stifled, of whom not a few have fallen victims to their courageous opposition to popular tumults, and a dreadful anarchy has been seen to diffuse itself over the greatest part of Spain. Will your Majesty permit England to be able to say "Spain is one of my provinces, my flag driven from the Baltic, the North Sea, the Levant, and even from the shores of Persia, rules in the ports of France?"

"No, never Sire!—To prevent so much shame and misfortune, two millions of brave men are ready to scale the Pyrenees, and the English will be chased from the Peninsula.

"If the French fight for the liberty of the seas, they must, to conquer, begin by wresting Spain from the influence of the tyrants of the ocean.

"If they combat for peace, they cannot obtain it until they have chased from Spain the enemies of peace.

"If your Majesty, embracing the future as well as the present, aspires to the noble object of leaving after you your Empire calm, tranquil, and surrounded by powerful friends, you must begin by securing its influence in Spain.

"Lastly, if honour is the first sentiment, as well as the first of object, of Frenchmen, your Majesty must promptly inflict vengeance for the outrages committed against the French name, and the atrocities to which so great a number of our countrymen have fallen victims. Frenchmen established in Spain for more than twenty years, exercising in peace their useful industry, and almost regarding Spain as their country, have been massacred. Every where French property has been seized. The Consular Agents of your Majesty have experienced a treatment which would not have been suffered even in the most barbarous countries. What estimation, what consideration will the French name enjoy in Europe, if, in a country so near to us, atrocities so infamous and so public remain unpunished. Reparation ought to be had for them—but a reparation consonant to Frenchmen by victory.

"It is no small advantage, the probability of at length meeting the English, of fighting them man to man, of making them also feel the evils of war—of a war, of the dangers of which they are ignorant, having only caused it by their gold. The English will be beaten, destroyed, dispersed, or at least they will make haste to fly, as they did at Toulon, at the Helder, at Dunkirk, in Sweden, and every where where the French armies have been able to find them; but their expulsion from Spain will be the ruin of their cause. This last check will exhaust their means, annihilating at the same time their last hopes, and peace will become more probable.

"The wishes of all Europe will in this contest be with France.

"France and Russia make common cause against England.

"Denmark supports with honour a contest which she did not provoke.

"Sweden, betrayed and abandoned by the ally to whom an insane Cabinet has sacrificed her, has already lost her most important provinces, and is hastening to that ruin which is the inevitable effect of alliance and friendship with England.

"Such will be the fate of the insurgents in Spain. When the contest becomes serious the English will abandon Spain, after making them the sad bequest of a civil war—of a war for foreign interests, and for anarchy, the most cruel of scourges. It will be for the wisdom and beneficence of your Majesty to repair the evils of which they will be the cause.

"The Court of Vienna has constantly testified to your Majesty the most amicable intentions: indignant at the policy of England, she has recalled her Minister from London; sent back the English Minister who was at Vienna; shut her ports against England; and placed herself in a state of hostility with that power. She has added to these measures an interdict in her ports against the admission of vessels, which, under a neutral flag, are only the carriers of English produce and merchandize. Your Majesty has cultivated this favourable disposition; has testified to the Court of Vienna friendship and confidence; and has several times intimated to her, that France takes a real interest in her prosperity. Latterly, however, this power has carried its armaments beyond measure—its military force is out of all proportion to its population and finances. Your Ministers, Sire, only wish to remark this in order that your Majesty may perceive the necessity of augmenting your force for the purpose of still preserving the relative superiority which exists between the power and the population of the two empires.

"A new revolution has broken out at Constantinople, Sultan Mustapha has been deposed.

"The Americans, a people who involve their fortune, their prosperity, and almost their existence in commerce, have given the example of a great and courageous sacrifice. They have interdicted, by a general embargo, all commerce and all navigation, rather than shamefully submit to that tribute which the English impose on the navigation of all nations.

"Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland, are peaceable, and wait only for a maritime peace to exert all their industry.

"That peace is the wish of the world, but England opposes it; and England is the enemy of the world.

"The French nation, all Europe knows the efforts, made by your Majesty to obtain peace; they know that your enterprizes are the immediate result of the ill success of the attempts which you have made to obtain it.

"The devotion of the French people is without bounds; and it is more especially under circumstances which are so essentially connected with their honour and its security, that their sentiments will be evinced, and that they will shew themselves worthy of reaping that harvest of glory and of honour which your Majesty has prepared for them.

"I am, with respect, &c."

MESSAGE OF THE EMPEROR AND KING NAPOLEON TO THE SENATE.

"Senators—My Minister for Foreign Affairs will lay before you the different treaties relative to Spain, and the constitutions agreed to by the Spanish Junta. My War Minister will acquaint you with the wants and the situation of my armies in the different parts of the world.

"I am determined to carry on the war with Spain with the utmost activity, and destroy the armies which England has disembarked in that country. The future security of my subjects, the prosperity of commerce, and a maritime peace must alike depend on these important operations.

"My alliance with the Emperor of Russia extinguishes every hope which England can entertain from her projects. I have no doubts respecting the peace of the Continent, but I neither will nor ought to rely upon the false calculations and the errors of other Courts, and since my neighbours increase their armies, it is a duty incumbent on me to increase mine.

"The Empire of Constantinople is struggling with the most violent convulsions; Sultan Selim, the best Emperor the Ottomans have had for a length of time, has just fallen by the hands of his own nephews. This catastrophe has deeply affected me. I impose fresh sacrifices on my people, confident of their support; they are necessary, in order to secure them from heavier sacrifices, and to lead them to the grand result of a general peace, which ought also to be considered as the moment of repose.

"Frenchmen, my projects have but one object in view—your happiness and the permanent well-being of your children; and if I know you right, you will hasten to comply with this new call, rendered necessary by the interests of the country. You have so often assured me of your affection, I will behold the sincerity of your sentiments in the alacrity with which you will second projects that are so intimately connected with your dearest interests, with the honour of the Empire, and with my glory. Given at the Imperial Palace of St. Cloud, this 4th Sept. 1808.

(Signed) "Napoleon."

REPORT OF THE WAR MINISTER TO HIS MAJESTY, EMPEROR AND KING.

Sire—I have the honour of laying before your Majesty the state and situation of your Majesty's armies in Poland, in Prussia, and in Silesia, in Denmark, in Dalmatia, in Albania, in Italy, Naples, and in Spain. I annex to it that of your Majesty's armies of reserve, at Boulogne, on the coasts of the Rhine, and in the interior. Your Majesty will perceive that France never before possessed more numerous or better appointed armies, and that they were never better kept up or better provisioned.

"Notwithstanding, however, the different events which have taken place in Spain, have occasioned a pretty considerable loss, in consequence of an operation as inconceivable as it is painful, of the division under General Dupont, your Majesty has notified the resolution you have taken of assembling more than two hundred thousand men, beyond the Pyrenees, without, however, weakening either the armies in Germany, or that of Dalmatia. For the attainment of this end, a levy of eighty thousand men appears to be indispensible. Your Majesty can only take these eighty thousand from the four classes of the conscription of the years 1806, 1807, 1808, and 1809.

"It is ascertained by the registers kept in my office, that independently of the men who have married within these four years, the conscription for these years might furnish six hundred thousand. In taking from that number a levy of eighty thousand men, your Majesty will have called out only one conscript out of seven, and the vacancies in the armies will be filled up with soldiers of 21, 22, and 23 years of age; that is, with men fit and prepared to undergo the fatigues of war.

"Nor as it escaped your Majesty's foresight, that such an augmentation of force would necessarily involve an increase of expence of several millions in the War Department. It is not your Majesty's wish that I should detain your attention with that object in this report; your Finance Minister has taken upon him to make good that charge, without in anywise increasing the taxes established by the last law.

"It is true, Sire, that the custom observed of late years, might, to a certain degree, induce a part of your subjects to consider themselves as released from the duty of the conscription from the moment, that upon the total mass, they had furnished the contingent required for the year; and under this point of view, what I propose to your Majesty, might appear to require from your subjects a sacrifice; but, Sire, there is no one but knows, that by the words of the law, your Majesty would be authorized to call to your standard, the whole of the conscription, not only of the last four years, but even of the antecedent years; and even were there question of a real sacrifice what sacrifice is it that your Majesty has not a right to expect from the love of your subjects? Who among us is ignorant that your Majesty wholly sacrifices yourself for the happiness of France, and that upon the speedy accomplishment of his high designs, the repose of the world, the future safety, and the re-establishment of a maritime peace, without which France can never enjoy calm and tranquillity.

"In proposing to your Majesty to declare, that henceforth no retrospective call shall take place on an antecedent conscription, I only participate, Sire, your paternal wishes.

"I think it expedient, at the same time, to propose to your Majesty to order out the conscription of the year 1810, and to determine the amount of it, from the present instant, at 80,000 men, to furnish the means, as occasion may require, of forming camps of reserve, and of protecting the coast in the spring time. This conscription would be raised only under the apprehension of a war with other powers, nor would it be called before the month of January next.

"Sire, it is a misfortune inseparable from the present state of Europe, that when one power exceeds the amount of the forces proportioned to its population, the other powers cannot dispense with encreasing theirs in the same proportion.

"England, independent of the immense number of her seamen, has on foot an army of more than 200,000 men; nor is she occupied in every session of her Parliament with any thing so much as with the increase of her land forces. The armies of Austria have been considerably encreased. France, although she has armies more numerous than all the other Powers, has, notwithstanding, fewer men under arms than any of them, compared with her population.

"Your Minister for Foreign Affairs assures me that a strict alliance subsisted between your Majesty and Russia. The armaments of Austria have often excited my solicitude. The same Minister assured me, that the best understanding was kept up with Austria, and that her levies should only be considered either as precautions, or as the effect of apprehensions, which are forcibly impressed on every Court, by the numerous Agents which England continues in pay on the Continent.

"But if it does not belong to the business of my department to dive into the views and interests of states, and explore the tortuitous labyrinth of politics, it is at least my duty to neglect nothig to make your Majesty's armies maintain, at all points, that just superiority which they ought to possess. The Armies of Albania and Dalmatia, of Denmark, and of the Elbe, will not allow of any diminution, under the circumstances of the moment.

"What I have to propose to your Majesty will give the army of Spain 200,000 men, without weakening the other armies; so that, notwithstanding the augmentation of our force beyond the Pyrenees, when the conscription of 1810 shall be called out, your Majesty will have increased your armies of Germany, of the North, and of Italy, by more than 80,000 men.

"And when, in order to escape the crisis into which she has been drawn by a false as well as an angry policy, the English Government, exerting every where its activity, does not hesitate to combine with the resources it draws from its inexhaustible finances and its formidable fleets, the arts of intrigue, of corruption and imposture, would it be at all extraordinary that the immence population of France should hold out the spectacle of a million of armed men ready to punish England and all those whom she may seduce; and present every where the same huge mass of force, to protect with the same shield the honour and security of France.

"What other result, Sire, is there to be expected from armies so numerous, and a position so formidable, but the speedy re-establishment of the tranquillity of Spain, that of a maritime peace, and of that general tranquillity, the object of your Majesty's incessant wishes? Much blood will have been spared, because a great number of men will have been ready to shed it. A durable happiness prepared by the combinations of your powerful genius, will be the effect, Sire, of the new proofs of affection and attachment which your people will afford you, and of the noble aspect of that nation, which your Majesty has pointed to posterity under the name of the Great Nation.

"War Minister, and, under this denomination, the organ of the French soldiers, allow me, Sire, to be the interpreter of their sentiments for you. Your Majesty shall always find us ready to sacrifice our lives for your glory, which is inseparable from the national glory, to which you have so powerfully added, and for the important interests of the country.

"I am, with respect, &c."

REVOLUTION IN TURKEY.

VIENNA, AUG. 24.—Between the 18th and 29th of July, Constantinople was the scene of remarkable events.

On the 18th of July, the Aga of the Janissaries arrived in the evening with 15,000 men, at Daud Pacha, where he formed an encampment.

On the 19th, in the morning, the Grand Seignior Mustapha IV. attended by his court, went out to meet the Sanghiaki-Sherif, or holy standard of the Prophet. He met that ensign of the supreme dignity of a Kalif between Ingirly Koi and Daud Pacha; and the instant he saw it, he alighted from his horse, momentarily prostrated himself on the ground' and then pressed the standard against his forehead. The Grand Vizier immediately after introduced to the Sultan, the two subordinate commanders, Berem Pacha and the celebrated Pacha of Rudschuck, Mustapha Bairactar. After conversing some time with them, he rode back to the Seraglio, where he held a Rikial, or Privy Council. He then set out once more to receive the standard of the Empire, which had, during this interval, arrived at the Porte, and which he deposited in the Kirkai Sherif Odassi, the apartment appropriated to it in the interior of the Seraglio. On the same day a severe action was fought off the mouth of the Dardanelles between an English frigate and several Turkish gunboats: the result was decidedly disadvantageous to the latter.

On the 19th, in the evening, the Aga of the Janissaries died suddenly in his harem, and was succeeded in his Office by Seimen Baschi. The same day, Mustapha Bairactar sent off a body of 1000 horse to the relief of Kentengi Oglu Aga, who formerly attacked the famous Kavaghi Oglu, and who was at that time besieged by the Tabiales in Fanaraki, one of the castles of the Dardanelles; however, this happened too late, as this small party having been overpowered the preceding night, was obliged to take refuge in the adjacent woods, and afterwards to retreat along the famous aqueduct of the Emperor Justinian to Birgos. Here they again rejoined the army of Mustapha Bairacter. The Tabiales, being struck with terror, submitted on the following day, and entered, partly on board the fleet, and partly into the service of Mustapha.

On the 21st, Mustapha Bairactar, at the head of 1500 chosen cavalry, made a formal visit to the Grand Vizier. The latter mounted his horse, while Mustapha and his numerous cavalcade waited for him. They then proceeded to be present at an Assembly of State, held at the Palace of the Grand Seignor, when Mufti Al Allah Effendi was displaced, and Arbzade Arif Bey was apointed in his place. On the following day, both the Kadileskers, and several Officers of the Janissaries were also removed, as was also Muhib Effendi, and Ul Ulema (President of the Conferences with Foreign Ministers); and the whole of these Officers were banished to Cyprus, Brussa, and Kutania. Notwithstanding these proceedings, all these changes appeared to be too late, as a friend of Bairactar's, viz; Kaliang Oglu, advanced from the Asiatic side with 5000 Natolian foot and 9000 cavalry, to Scutary, where he formed a camp. The Grand Seignor the day before, had a view of Mustapha Bairactar's force from a balcony, and on the 22nd, accompanied by several Officers of state, he went to attend morning prayers with Mustapha in the Great Mosque, near the new barracks, close by the entrance of Pera. On the five following days public tranquillity remained, in a great measure, undisturbed.

On the 28th of July, the designs of Mustapha Bairactar were pretty well unveiled. After the Sultan had, by his own Hatti-sherif, appointed him Generalissimo of the Sublime Porte, he had the audacity to surround the palace of the Grand Vizier; he demanded of him the Great Seal of the Empire; after which; he sent the Vizier a state prisoner, under a strong escort of cavalry, to the camp near Daud Pacha. Immediately after this, the Grand Seignor sent two black eunuchs and eight trusty Moors, with the silken bowstring, to his uncle, the deposed Sultan Selim. His body was actually exposed in the Great Court of the Seraglio; still the object of opposing the plans of Mustapha's dependents did not succeed; and in the evening at five, the cannon from the Seraglio, Tophane, and the fleet, announced a change in the Government, and in the room of Mustapha IV. his young brother Mahomed II. the last branch of the race of Osman, was proclaimed. He was born on the 20th of June, 1785. The new Sultan transmitted the Seal of the Empire to Mustapha Bairactar, and delivered the Moors beforementioned, for punishment, into the hands of the Bostang Pacha, or Captain of the Guard. Nothing more remarkable has hitherto occurred in consequence of this revolution, and the public peace seems to be perfectly restored.

FRANKFORT, AUG. 27.—We learn from Suabia, that the camp near Augsburgh will be pitched about half a league from that city. A body of troops is also collecting at Rastadt. They were at first about 2000 in number, but are now increased to 4000. They are ordered to be in readiness to march by the 14th of next month.

Should the Princes of the League of the Rhine call out the whole of their quotas, their combined force will consist of 118,000 men. Of the original members of this League, the King of Bavaria brings into the field, 30,000 men; the King of Wirtemburgh, 12,000; the grand Prince of Baden, 8000; the Grand Duke of Berg, 4000; the Duke of Hesse, 4000; and the Duke of Nassau, with the remaining Princes, 4000. Of the states that have joined the League, Saxony furnishes 20,000; Westphalia, 25,000; Wurtsburgh, 2000; Saxe Weimar, 800; Saxe Gotha, 1100; Saxe Meiningen, 800; Saxe Cobourg, 400; Saxe Heldburghausen, 200; Anhalt, 800; Schwartzburgh, 650; Waldeck, 400; Reusz, 450; Lippe, 650; Mecklenburgh Schwerin, 1900; Mecklenburgh Strelitz, 400.

DRESDEN, AUG. 27.—On the 25th, 4000 French infantry passed through this city, and yesterday 6000: four thousand more took up their quarters here for the night, and marched off at five o'clock this morning. In all, there have passed through this place 24,600 infantry, and 7,500 cavalry. Each of the soldiers was treated by the city with a refreshment of beef and bread, besides beer and brandy. The officers had a covered table, and an allowance of wine. All the above troops are proceeding by forced marches in waggons. They require daily two thousand waggons and eight thousand horses. It is said that the fifteen thousand of our troops under orders to take the field, will join this army.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF SPAIN.

The Junta of Seville have published a Proclamation, in which, after shewing the absurdity and danger of disputing about the succession to the Crown, in the event of the demise of Ferdinand VII. and his brothers, but shewing also that the renunciation of Charles IV. in favour of Joseph Bonaparte, gave him no claim to the Crown of Spain, they take into consideration, whether a Supreme Government, which may unite the sovereign authority of all the Provinces, till the restitution of Ferdinand the Seventh, be necessary? The Junta declare decisively that it is.—They then discuss the question, whether the Cortes should be assembled and be convoked by the old Council of Castile? The old Council of Castile never convoked the Cortes.—Ought it then to possess an authority which it never did possess; after having violated the fundamental laws, and afforded every facility to the enemy to usurp the Sovereignty? The convocation of the Cortes is the peculiar and exclusive privilege of the King. —The King being absent, could not exercise the privilege; the Provinces would not submit to any other authority, would not unite, and there would be no Cortes.—The Junta, therefore, declare against convoking the Cortes.—The kingdom found itself suddenly without a King and a Government.—The People therefore legally resumed the power of appointing a Government—a truth openly avowed by various Juntas.—The people created these Juntas, and the legitimate power therefore is deposited with them. The Junta of Seville then recommended that each of these Juntas should select from their own Members two Deputies to form the Supreme Government.—The Supreme Government to elect a President, who should only continue in office a limited time, a fortnight, a month, or any other time deemed most agreeable. Either Cuidad Real, or Almagro, in La Mancha, is recommended as the most convenient City for the seat of Government.—The Junta conclude as follows:

"It remains only that we speak of this Supreme Junta of Seville, upon which point we shall not say much. Certain persons, either ignorant or malevolent, have endeavoured to spread the persuasion that we affected a superiority over the other provinces. Any such thought has been far from us, although the general good of the nation has been our guide, and as it were the soul of all our determinations. We possessed the only foundery for cannon in the kingdom, and arms and ammunition in a certain degree of abundance. Various Captain-Generals acknowledge us from the commencement, and veteran troops were more numerous in our province than in any other parts; and thus we formed an army in a shorter time, and have harrassed the enemy, who have surrendered prisoners of war, with their General, Dupont, and have capitulated for the divisions of Generals Vedel and Gobert, who are to be conducted to France, amounting altogether, to 17,000 men, so that there does not remain a single French soldier in arms in the Andalusias;—a victory most glorious and singular, which has been effected without the effusion of much Spanish blood, in which it appears we stand alone.

"With all this, we repeat that we neither affect nor desire any superiority. Whatever we have done, we owed to our country: it was an indispensible obligation upon us. Our only object is, that Spain may preserve its integrity and independence, for our Lord and King Ferdinand VII. and for that object we joyfully sacrifice our lives. May God, who has so clearly and marvellously shewn his protection of Spain, grant a safe return to its King Ferdinand VII. and then with the Supreme Government, he will determine what may be his royal will, either commanding an union of the Cortes, or by such other means as his prudence may suggest, and will facilitate the reform of abuses and the general happiness of the kingdom, securing it upon such foundations as are firm, and subject to no change."

VALENCIA, AUG. 19.—The Austrian and Russian Ambassadors in Madrid carry on their diplomatic correspondence with their Court, through the medium of the Supreme Junta of this place. From hence the dispatches are sent to Trieste, and from that place to Vienna and Petersburgh; this arrangement seems to warrant a hope that the two Cabinets will not hesitate to join in the most vigorous measures, to strike down the Tyrant whose satellites already declare that they intend to march from Spain to Austria, and from thence to Russia; so that according to the plan and system of Napoleon, there is not to remain in Europe one single Crowned Head of the antient Royal Families.

MADRID, AUG. 24.—Yesterday arrived his Excellency Don Francisco Xavier Castanos, with the vanguard of his army. It is impossible to form an idea of the enthusiasm manifested by the people on this occasion; each vying with the other to express their admiration, gratitude, and joy.

LEON, AUG. 25.—Yesterday orders were given to all the divisions of Gallicia, to assemble in this city, on the 1st September, and for the whole army to march the following day for Burgos; the French are in number from 35 to 40,000 men, the army of Gallicia about 40,000, and that of Asturias will amount to 30,000. It is to be observed that the day of the attack, of which day we are ignorant, though the 7th day of September is named, the greater part of our armies will join, in order to attack the French in different points, and to surround them. The army of Spain, which will enter into action in conjunction with our allies, will amount to 70,000 men, consequently we expect that not a single Frenchman will escape out of Spain.

GIJON, SEPT. 8.—A Gentleman has just arrived from Santander, with an account of a victory gained by Palafox over a body of French troops, near Pampeluna, who had 5000 killed, and 1000 made prisoners. I am not certain as to the date, but think it was on the 19th. It is said, that had Palafox known General Blake was so nigh, he would have entered Pampeluna.

PROVINCIALS.

DREADFUL CATASTROPHE.—A boat-race for two silver cups, given by J. Templar, Esq. of Stover, near Teignmouth, which were to be sailed for on Tuesday last, induced the Rev. Mr. Buller, of Saltash, and Mr. Baker, of Plymouth, to become candidates for the first prize. Their two beautiful pleasure-boats, from 10 to 15 tons burthen, accordingly started from this harbour on Monday morning. In Mr. Buller's boat were—Mr. Josias Thomson, of Plymouth; Mr. John Foster, of Saltash; his apprentice; and Mr. Buller's boy.—Mr. Baker's boat followed. They had proceeded as far as the Bolt Head, when they were overtaken by a most tremendous squall, accompanied with heavy rain, which lasted nearly half an hour. At this time Mr. Buller's boat was near two miles a-head, and from the thickness of the storm, could not be discerned; but on its subsiding, being still invisible, Mr. Baker concluded she had borne away for Saltcombe, as the wind continued to blow hard, with a prodigious swell. After keeping the same course for half an hour, Mr. Baker determined to bear away also, and on nearing the shore, saw something like crab-pot marks, but did not particularly regard them, until a shriek was heard to proceed from thence, when Mr. Buller was seen with his head above water, supported by a topmast spar, which fortunately was in the boat when she went down. Every exertion was now used in saving Mr. B. who was almost gone, having been in that situation an hour and an half. On being carefully drawn on board, every means were used to renew that life (twice apparently gone), which was at last effected. During this time, Mr. Forster's apprentice, and Mr. Buller's boy were perceived at a little distance, holding by the ends of an oar; and, on picking up the latter, the other being quite exhausted, loosed his hold and sank to the bottom. Every eye was now strained in looking out for Mr. Thomson and Mr. Foster, but without success; and after beating about for a considerable time, they regretfully left the melancholy scene, and arrived at Saltcombe. Mr. Buller, when recovered, said they had shipped a sea; and that Mr. Foster was in the little boat a-stern, casting off the painter, when another sea filled her, and she went down by her stern. Mr. B. recollects Mr. Thomson swimming upright, but a little under water, for some time after she sunk; he has left a widow, with five children, and a numerous circle of acquaintance to lament his loss. Mr. Foster was unmarried, but a respectable and worthy character.

COURT MARTIAL.—At a General Court Martial held at Weeley, on the 8th of July last, and continued by adjournment to the 3d of August following, on Capt. John George Hallilay, of the 10th regiment of foot, for bringing different charges against some officers of the same regiment, and talking disrespectfully of them, particularly of Col. Newman, the commanding officer, the prisoner was found guilty of part of the charges, and the sentence of the Court was, that he should be suspended from rank and pay for the space of three months. His Majesty has been pleased to confirm the sentence of the Court, but from various considerations of the conduct of the prosecutor Lieut.-Col. Newman, he has commanded that it should be signified to Lieut.-Col. Newman, that he does not consider him to be a fit person to command the 2d battalion of the 10th regiment, and that he will be immediately removed from it; and as it appears the officers who composed the mess of the 2d battalion of the 10th regiment did not behave in a becoming manner towards Capt. Hallilay, his Majesty has been pleased to order that it should be intimated to those officers, that their promotion should for the present be suspended. His Majesty has been also pleased to signify, that he does not consider Captain Hallilay a proper person to remain longer in the 10th regiment, and that he will be immediately removed from it.

A NEW COMET.—About a quarter past eight o'clock, on the night of Sunday the 4th instant, a comet was seen to the north of the city of York, at a great height in the heavens, darting with velocity in a descending direction from N. to S. E. The apparent length of its train or tail might be one foot, of a brightish streaming yellow. The head was very vivid, and seemed the size of a star of the first magnitude. Its duration while observed (the commencement of it not being seen) was one or two seconds, and became lost to the sight behind a cloud, when far above the horizon.

A poor weaver, who had a wife and several small children, and resides at Bolton-le-Moor, has lately come to an estate of upwards of 4000l. a-year. He has obtained it from a very wealthy uncle, who had not seen him for a great number of years. It appears that the uncle did not forget his poor relation while living; for he wrote a number of letters to the nephew in question, which did not come to hand, and it is suspected they were intercepted by a designing servant. The uncle, however, left a will, bequeathing the estate to his nephew, the poor weaver, provided he claimed it within six months after his death; and, in case of his failing to claim it within that time, the estate to go to the servant, who is suspected of having intercepted the letters. The will, being of a novel nature, became the subject of conversation; and so it happened, that two travellers at an inn in Bolton, were conversing upon the subject at the time the poor weaver was in the house, and within hearing of their conversation; and he knowing that he had a rich uncle, although he knew not where to find him, soon learned that the deceased person was his uncle, and had left him the estate; he, in consequence, communicated the circumstance to some friends, who undertook to see into the business, and he proved to be just within the time limited in the will to put in his claim.

EXTRAORDINARY WAGER.—It has been for some time announced, that the new machine for travelling without horses, being impelled entirely by steam, was matched to run twenty-four hours against any horse in the kingdom. This bet, so novel in the sporting world, will be decided on Wednesday and Thursday next. The machine is to start at two o'clock on Wednesday, on its ground in the fields, near Russel-Square, to demonstrate the extent of its speed, and continuance. It is calculated that the machine, though weighing eight tons, will travel 240 miles, at least, within the time limited. Very large sums are depending on the issue.

RARA AVIS.—A very singular bird of the Black-bird species, has been lately caught by Mr. James Colburn, of Otley, saddler, on the Pool road. Its feathers are a pure white; its legs and beak a beautiful yellow; and its eyes an elegant light red.

LONDON GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 16.

Downing-street, Sept. 16, 1808.

A Dispatch, of which the following is a Copy, was received yesterday evening from Lieut.-Gen. Sir Hew Dalrymple, commanding his Majesty's troops in Portugal, addressed to Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and brought by Captain Dalrymple, Military Secretary to Sir Hew Dalrymple.

My Lord, Head-quarters, Cintra, Sept. 3, 1808.

I have the honour to inform your Lordship, that I landed in Portugal, and took the command of the army, on Monday, the 23d of August, the next day after the battle of Vimiera, and where the enemy sustained a signal defeat; where the valour and discipline of British troops, and the talents of British officers, were eminently displayed.

A few hours after my arrival, General Kellermann came in with a flag of truce from the French General in Chief, in order to propose an agreement for a cessation of hostilities, for the purpose of concluding a convention for the evacuation of Portugal by the French troops. The inclosed contains the several articles at first agreed upon and signed by Sir Arthur Wellesley and General Kellermann; but as this was done with a reference to the British Admiral, who, when the agreement was communicated to him, objected to the seventh article, which had for its object the disposal of the Russian fleet in the Tagus, it was finally concluded, that Lieut.-Col. Murray, Quarter-Master-General to the British Army, and General Kellermann, should proceed to the discussion of the remaining articles, and finally to conclude a convention for the evacuation of Portugal, subject to the ratification of the French General in Chief, and the British Commanders by sea and land.

After considerable discussion and repeated reference to me, which rendered it necessary for me to avail myself of the limited period latterly prescribed for the suspension of hostilities, in order to move the army forwards, and to place the several columns upon the routes by which they were to advance, the convention was signed, and the ratification exchanged the 30th of last month.

That no time might be lost in obtaining anchorage for the transports and other shipping which had for some days been exposed to great peril on this dangerous coast, and to insure the communication between the army and the victuallers, which was cut off by the badness of the weather and the surf upon the shore, I sent orders to the Buffs and 42d Regiments, which were on board of transports with Sir Charles Cotton's fleet, to land and take possession of the Forts on the Tagus whenever the Admiral thought it proper to do so. This was accordingly carried into execution yesterday morning, when the Forts of Cascais, St. Julien's, and Bugio were evacuated by the French troops, and taken possession of by ours.

As I landed in Portugal entirely unacquainted with the actual state of the French army, and many circumstances of a local and incidental nature, which doubtless had great weight in deciding the question; my own opinion in favour of the expediency of expelling the French army from Portugal by means of the Convention the late defeat had induced the French General in Chief to solicit, instead of doing so by a continuation of hostilities, was principally founded on the great importance of time, which the season of the year rendered peculiarly valuable, and which the enemy could easily have consumed in the protracted defence of the strong places they occupied, had terms of Convention been refused them.

When the suspension of Arms was agreed upon, the army under the command of Sir John Moore had not arrived, and doubts were even entertained whether so large a body of men could be landed on an open and a dangerous beach; and that being effected, whether the supply of so large an army with provisions from the ships could be provided for, under all the disadvantages to which the shipping were exposed. During the Negociation, the former difficulty was overcome by the activity, zeal, and intelligence of Captain Malcolm of the Donegal, and the officers and men under his orders, but the possibility of the latter seems to have been at an end, nearly at the moment it was no longer necessary.

Captain Dalrymple, of the 18th Dragoons, my Military Secretary, will have the honour of delivering to your Lordship this dispatch. He is fully informed of whatever has been done under my orders, relative to the service on which I have been employed, and can give any explanation thereupon that may be required.

I have the honour to be, &c.

SUSPENSION of ARMS agreed upon between Lieut.-Gen. Sir Aurthur Wellesley, K. B. on the one part, and the General of Division Kellermann, Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, Commander of the Order of the Iron Crown, and Grand Cross of the Order of the Lion of Bavaria, on the other part, each having Powers from the respective Generals of the French and English Armies.

Head-Quarters of the English Army, Aug. 22, 1808.

ART. I.—There shall be, from this date, a suspension of arms between the armies of his Britannic Majesty and his Imperial and Royal Majesty, Napoleon I. for the purpose of negociating a Convention for the evacuation of Portugal by the French army.

II.—The Generals in Chief of the two armies, and the Commander in Chief of the British Fleet at the entrance of the Tagus, will appoint a day to assemble on such part of the coast as shall be judged convenient, to negociate and conclude the said Convention.

III.—The River of Sirandre shall form the line of demarcation to be established between the two armies; Torres Vedras shall not be occupied by either.

IV.—The General in Chief of the English army undertakes to conclude the Portuguese armies in this suspension of arms, and for them the line of demarcation shall be established from Leira to Thomar.

V.—It is agreed provisionally that the French army shall not, in any case, be considered as prisoners of war; that all the individuals who compose it shall be transported to France with their arms and baggage, and the whole of their private property, from which nothing shall be excepted.

DEFINITIVE CONVENTION FOR THE EVACUATION OF PORTUGAL BY THE FRENCH ARMY.

The Generals commanding in Chief the British and French armies in Portugal, having determined to negociate and conclude a treaty for the evacuation of Portugal by the French troops, on the basis of the agreement entered into on the 22d inst. for a suspension of hostilities, have appointed the undermentioned officers to negociate the same in their names, viz.—On the part of the General in Chief of the British Army, Lieut.-Colonel Murray, Quarter-Master-General, and on the part of the General in Chief of the French Army, Monsieur Kellermann, General of Division, to whom they have given authority to negociate and conclude a convention to that effect, subject to their ratification respectively, and to that of the Admiral commanding the British Fleet at the entrance of the Tagus.

These two Officers, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed upon the Articles which follow:—

ART. I.—All the places and forts in the kingdom of Portugal, occupied by the French troops, shall be delivered up to the British army in the state in which they are at the period of the signature of the present convention.

II.—The French troops shall evacuate Portugal with their arms and baggage; they shall not be considered as prisoners of war, and on their arrival in France, they shall be at liberty to serve.

III.—The English Government shall furnish the means of conveyance for the French army, which shall be disembarked in any of the ports of France between Rochefort and L'Orient inclusively.

IV.—The French army shall carry with it all its artillery of French calibre, with the horses belonging to it, and the tumbrils, supplied with sixty rounds per gun. All other artillery, arms and ammunition, as also the military and naval arsenals, shall be given up to the British Army and Navy, in the state in which they may be at the period of the ratification of the convention.

V. The French army shall carry with it all its equipments, and all that is comprehended under the name of property of the army; that is to say, its military chest, and carriages attached to the Field Commissariat and Field Officers, or shall be allowed to dispose of such part of the same on its account as the Commander in Chief may judge it unnecessary to embark. In like manner all individuals of the army shall be at liberty to dispose of their private property of every description, with full security hereafter for the purchasers.

VI.—The cavalry are to embark their horses, as also the Generals and other Officers of all ranks. It is, however, fully understood that the means of conveyance for horses at the disposal of the British Commanders are very limited; some additional conveyance may be procured at the port of Lisbon; the number of horses to be embarked by the troops shall not exceed six hundred, and the number embarked by the staff shall not exceed two hundred. At all events, every facility will be given to the French army to dispose of the horses belonging to it, which cannot be embarked.

VII.—In order to facilitate the embarkation, it shall take place in three divisions, the last of which will be principally composed of the garrisons of the places, of the cavalry, the artillery, the sick, and the equipment of the army. The first division shall embark within seven days of the date of the ratification, or sooner, if possible.

VIII.—The garrison of Elvas, and its forts, and of Peniche and Palmela will be embarked at Lisbon. That of Almaida at Oporto, or the nearest harbour. They will be accompanied on their march by the British Commissaries, charged with providing for their subsistence and accommodation.

IX.—All the sick and wounded who cannot be embarked with the troops are entrusted to the British army. They are to be taken care of whilst they remain in this country at the expence of the British Government, under the condition of the same being reimbursed by France when the final evacuation is effected. The English Government will provide for their return to France, which shall take place by detachments of about one hundred and fifty or two hundred men at a time. A sufficient number of French Medical Officers shall be left behind to attend them.

X.—As soon as the vessels employed to carry the army to France, shall have disembarked it in the harbours specified, or in any other of the ports of France to which stress of weather may force them, every facility shall be given them to return to England without delay, and security against capture until their arrival in a friendly port.

XI.—The French army shall be concentrated in Lisbon, and within a distance of about two leagues from it. The English army will approach within three leagues of the Capital, and will be so placed as to leave about one league between the two armies.

XII.—The Forts of St. Julien, the Bugio and Cascais, shall be occupied by the British troops on the ratification of the Convention. Lisbon and its Citadel, together with the forts and batteries as far as the Lazaretto or Trafuria on one side, and Fort St. Joseph on the other, inclusively, shall be given up on the embarkation of the second division, as shall also the harbour and all armed vessels in it of every description, with their rigging, sails, stores, and ammunition. The fortresses of Elvas, Almaida, Peniche and Palmela, shall be given up as soon as the British troops can arrive to occupy them. In the mean time the General in Chief of the British army will give notice of the present Convention to the garrisons of those places, as also to the troops before them, in order to put a stop to all further hostilities.

XIII.—Commissaries shall be named on both sides, to regulate and accelerate the execution of the arrangements agreed upon.

XIV.—Should there arise doubts as to the meaning of any article, it will be explained favourably to the French army.

XV.—From the date of the ratification of the present Convention, all arrears of contributions, requisitions, or claims whatever, of the French Government, against subjects of Portugal, or any other individuals residing in this country, founded on the occupation of Portugal by the French troops in the month of December 1807, which may not have been paid up, are cancelled, and all sequestrations laid upon their property, moveable or immoveable, are removed, and the free disposal of the same is restored to the proper owners.

XVI. All subjects of France, or of Powers in friendship or alliance with France, domiciliated in Portugal, or accidentally in this country shall be protected. Their property of every kind, moveable and immoveable, shall be respected, and they shall be at liberty either to accompany the French army, or to remain in Portugal. In either case their property is guaranteed to them, with the liberty of retaining or of disposing of it, and passing the produce of the sale thereof into France, or any other country where they may fix their residence, the space of one year being allowed them for that purpose.

It is fully understood that the shipping is excepted from this arrangement, only, however, in so far as regards leaving the port, and that none of the stipulations above-mentioned can be made the pretext of any commercial speculation.

XVII.—No native of Portugal shall be rendered accountable for his political conduct during the period of the occupation of this country by the French army; and all those who have continued in the exercise of their employments, or who have accepted situations under the French Government, are placed under the protection of the British Commanders, they shall sustain no injury in their persons or property, it not having been at their option to be obedient, or not to the French Government; they are also at liberty to avail themselves of the stipulations of the 16th article.

XVIII.—The Spanish troops detained on board ship in the Port of Lisbon, shall be given up to the Commander in Chief of the British Army, who engages to obtain of the Spaniards to restore such French subjects, either military or civil, as may have been detained in Spain, without being taken in battle, or in consequence of military operations, but on occasion of the occurrences of the 29th of last May, and the days immediately following.

XIX.—There shall be an immediate exchange established for all ranks of Prisoners made in Portugal, since the commencement of the present hostilities.

XX.—Hostages of the rank of Field Officers shall be mutually furnished on the part of the British Army and Navy, and on that of the French Army for the reciprocal guarantee of the present Convention. The Officer of the British Army shall be restored on the completion of the Articles which concern the Army; and the Officer of the Navy on the disembarkation of the French troops in their own country. The like is to take place on the part of the French Army.

XXI.—It shall be allowed to the General in Chief of the French Army, to send an Officer to France with intelligence of the present Convention. A vessel will be furnished by the British Admiral to convey him to Bourdeaux or Rochefort.

XXII.—The British Admiral will be invited to accommodate his Excellency the Commander in Chief and the other principal Officers of the French Army, on board of ships of war.

Done and concluded at Lisbon, this 30th day of August, 1808.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES TO THE CONVENTION OF THE 30TH OF AUGUST, 1808.

Art. I.—The individuals in the civil employment of the army made prisoners, either by the British troops, or by the Portuguese in any part of Portugal, will be restored, as is customary, without exchange.

II.—The French Army shall be subsisted from its own magazines up to the day of embarkation; the garrisons up to the day of the evacuation of the fortresses.

The remainder of the magazines shall be delivered over in the usual form to the British Government, which charges itself with the subsistence of the men and horses of the army, from the above-mentioned periods till their arrival in France, under the condition of their being reimbursed by the French Government for the excess of the expence beyond the estimation to be made by both parties, of the value of the magazines delivered up to the British Army.

The provisions on board the ships of war, in possession of the French Army, will be taken on account by the British Government, in like manner with the magazines in the fortresses.

III.—The General commanding the British troops will take the necessary measures for re-establishing the free circulation of the means of subsistence between the country and the capital.

Done and concluded at Lisbon, this 30th day of Aug. 1808.

Admiralty Office, Sept. 16, 1808.

Captain Halsted, First Captain to the Squadron, under the Command of Adm. Sir C. Cotton, Bart. Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Ships and Vessels on the Coast of Portugal, arrived yesterday at this Office with Dispatches from the Admiral to the Hon. William Wellesley Pole, of which the following are Copies:—

Sir, Hibernia, off the Tagus, Sept. 2, 1808.

Inclosed herewith, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, is a Copy of a Convention*, entered into by Lieutenant-Colonel Murray and General Kellermann, for the evacuation of Portugal by the French army; such Convention having been ratified by Lieutenant-General Sir Hew Dalrymple, myself, and the French Commander in Chief. British troops, consisting of the 3d and 42d regiments, were on the 2d instant landed, to occupy the forts of Cascais, St. Antonio, St. Julien, and the Bugio, and no time shall be lost to embark the French troops, agreeably to the said Convention.

Captain Halsted, First Captain of this ship, and Captain of the Fleet, who is the bearer of dispatches to their Lordships respecting the Russian squadron in the Tagus, is in full possession of my confidence, and will be able to explain to their Lordships the motives inducing me to ratify the Convention in question, as well as give any further information that may be thought necessary. I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) C. Cotton.

Hon. W. Wellesley Pole, &c. &c. &c.

* A copy of the Convention inclosed in the Letter from Sir Hew Dalrymple, Sir, Hibernia, off the Tagus, 4th Sept. 1808.

Herewith I have the honour to enclose to you, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, a Copy of a Convention entered into by me, with Vice-Admiral Seniavin, commanding the Russian fleet in the Tagus, by which it will appear to their Lordships that such fleet has been surrendered to me, to be held by his Majesty as a deposit, until six months after the conclusion of a Peace between Russia and England.

I have charged Captain Halsted, First Captain of the Hibernia, and Captain of the Fleet, with the delivery of this dispatch to their Lordships; he was sent by me to negociate the Convention with Vice-Admiral Seniavin, and will be able to explain every particular.

To Captain Halsted I feel greatly indebted for his able advice and assistance upon all points of service; his zeal and diligence have been exemplary, and entitle him to my highest commendation.

Rear-Admiral Tyler has been directed to superintend the first division of the Russian Fleet, which I purpose ordering under his protection immediately to Spithead; to him (since with me) I have been indebted for every assistance, and to the Captains, Officers, and Crews, of those ships, that have been employed throughout a tediously protracted blockade, (by whom every exertion has been made with a degree of cheerfulness doing them infinite honour), I feel extremely grateful, and deem it my duty to offer every possible testimony of my approbation in their favour.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) C. Cotton.

Hon. W. W. Pole, &c. &c. &c.

Articles of a Convention entered into between Vice-Admiral Seniavin, Knight of the Order of St. Alexander, and other Russian Orders, and Admiral Sir Charles Cotton, Baronet, for the Surrender of the Russian Fleet, now anchored in the River Tagus.

Art. I.—The ships of war of the Emperor of Russia, now in the Tagus, as specified in the annexed list, shall be delivered up to Admiral Sir Charles Cotton, immediately, with all their stores as they now are; to be sent to England, and there held as a deposit by his Britannic Majesty, to be restored to his Imperial Majesty, within six months after the conclusion of a Peace between his Britannic Majesty and his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias.

II.—Vice-Admiral Seniavin, with the Officers, Sailors, and Marines, under his command, to return to Russia, without any condition or stipulation respecting their future services; to be conveyed there in men of war, or proper vessels, at the expence of his Britannic Majesty.

Done and concluded on board the ship Twerday in the Tagus, and on board His Britannic Majesty's ship Hibernia, off the Mouth of that River, the 3d day of September, 1808.

TO OUR READERS.

We are obliged to omit a very interesting Miscellany, in consequence of the length and importance of the Political subjects that have reached us during the last week; and we have been induced to omit the London Markets to insert more important and tempory information.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

London,

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

We have the mortification to lay before our Readers the degrading Convention signed between Junot and our Commanders. We will not discuss a single article where all are equally censurable. In going through the vast field of the possible, we cannot find an excuse, even a miserable palliation, for this ignominious transaction. Had the Commander in Chief, instead of siguing this Convention, returned home with a few thousands of our army, after having lost the rest under the walls of Lisbon, in unsuccessful, but honourable efforts, to compel the French to an unconditional surrender, we would have thanked him for his confidence in British magnanimity and resources;—had he in the smoking ruins of that capital, torn from the plunderers their booty and their arms, and put them to the sword, as a peace-offering to the myriads of victims immolated to their frenzy, crimes, and ambition, while he regretted the action, we would have defended [illegible]. Had they even, in violation of all the laws of nations, been guilty of the atrocity of disregarding the engagements they had solemnly made, and massacred after [illegible] the French army, we would have received [illegible] with less horror than we did the intelligence of [illegible] tion. But when we see an army of 32,000 men, [illegible] by Generals who had as great reputation as any in the service, after half their number had gained a complete victory over the combined force of the enemy, in a pitched battle, reduced to sign a convention with the enemy, in which every article is favourable to the latter, in which they are permitted to carry off their plunder, their arms, their artillery, secure impunity to the traitors who had espoused their cause, require hostages for the fulfilment of the condition, insist on the liberty of serving again, wherever their master should employ them, we would not expect that such a stigma on our arms should have been proclaimed, like the victories of NELSON and ABERCROMBY, with the firing of the Tower and Park guns! But the popular feeling better announced the national character. Whatever judgment Europe, or the future historian, may pass on the transaction, they will say that it was not pusillanimity on the part of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, or indifference to the interest and honour of their country, which justified the necessity of it. No! had the feelings of the public been consulted, it would have been proclaimed through the streets of the metropolis with muffled drums, the firing of minute guns, and our bells sounding a funeral dirge, as the interment of our national honour. Our ancestors frequently indulged in the pride of comparing our character, institutions, and manners, with that community of heroes and statesmen who conquered the universe, could they have foreseen that their descendants would have submitted to the present degradation, in the very peninsula, where a Roman Consul, for having signed a much less dishonourable capitulation, was delivered up to the Numantines, naked, and with a halter round his neck, by the order of the Senate, they would have been more cautious in indulging this effusion of self-love. The Roman Senate, as may be expected from that council of statesmen, refused to sanction the ill conduct, incapacity, and cowardice of their General, and sent him back like a fugitive slave, to atone, by his punishment, for their violation of a compact, so opposite to their policy and martial spirit. We would willingly analyse this capitulation of 32,000 British soldiers to 14,000 discomfitted Frenchmen, were it for no other purpose, than, by stimulating the public indignation, to prevent the possibility of a future General violating the national honour; but where every article is equally reprehensible and impolitic, we would strain our language, and not find words sufficiently strong to mark our disapprobation and disgust. The only motive of consolation we feel, in the midst of the universal gloom is, that Government will not, and cannot, ratify the Convention. It is not without precedent. Every Government has given an example of that kind; and it is far better to be guilty of injustice, than of infamy. The effects of the former may be palliated by the imperious necessity of the measure, but the consequences of the latter are indelible: they leave an impression which will contribute more to national relaxation, than a series of defeats by sea and land could possibly effect. In a portentious crisis energy alone can save a community; and, we hope, there is no man so unfeeling as to deny that the present moment is awful. We frequently had occasion to congratulate the public on the vigorous measures of the present Ministry. They produced consequences so beneficial, that the most sanguine would have scarce expected in the arduous situation we had been placed in after the Peace of Tilsit. We acknowledge, however, that if the French army be permitted to return home in the manner stipulated in the Convention, we consider the arrival of our troops in Portugal as one of the greatest calamities which could have befallen the common cause. Had our army remained encamped on our shores, they would have kept the enemy in anxiety, and compelled them to keep a considerable force on the opposite coast. The brave CASTANOS with his Andalusians, after having compelled DUPONT to surrender, would have speedily liberated Portugal from her oppressors. He would never have consented that JUNOT should quit the country with all the honours of war, and the plundered effects of the unfortunate inhabitants. We have not a doubt on our mind that this would have taken place without a material inconvenience to the operations of the Spanish Patriots. That enterprising and generous people would have acquired new laurels, new reputation, and new confidence, had the liberation of Portugal been left to them. They would have kept JUNOT and his army prisoners in their country, and thus diminished the numbers of their opponents. But what will now be the consequence, if Government is guilty of the unpardonable weakness to ratify the impolitic conduct of our Generals? The moment they are landed at Bourdeaux or Rochelle, they will be sent off in forced marches to swell the immense mass which is moving towards the Pyrenees.—They will act on more favourable ground, and under more auspicious circumstances, against that very country which we have enabled them to quit, after having placed in security the fruits of their rapacity. Whatever way we view this transaction, the more cause we feel for regret and astonishment. We love our Country and Government too much to repress our feelings. The national honour and interest outweigh every individual consideration. Were the majority of our countrymen even of a different opinion from us, were the Ministry to approve of the transaction; were the vague assertions of Sir H. DALRYMPLE supported even by more cogent reasons, we would not cease to raise our voice against a measure, which even the destruction of half our army in Portugal would not justify. This loss, though painful, would have been easily retrieved. A calamity, even of that nature, so far from depressing the courage of the public, would only encourage them to proportionate efforts. Are there no means of rescuing our national character from the disgraceful effects of this Convention? Are the public sufficiently apprised of the fatal consequences it will have on the people of Spain, on the several nations of Europe? What confidence will they repose in our future exertions? The more we reflect on the subject, the more we are confounded and revolted.

Our former conjectures relative to the conduct which BONAPARTE would observe towards Spain, are confirmed by the Official Documents communicated to the Senate; and which are given in another part of our Paper. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, instead of attempting to palliate or excuse the treachery of his infamous Master towards the Spanish people and government, discloses with the most unparalleled effrontery, that motives of convenience and rapacity occasioned this unexampled act of atrocity. The Tyrant affected to speak the language of moderation and justice, as long as he imagined so despicable an artifice would serve to impose on the people he had so wantonly outraged. But as soon as he perceived that his villainy was unsuccessful, and his discomfiture notorious, he hopes by the boldness and inflexibility of his intentions, relative to the subjugation of that country, to cover the disgrace he has already suffered. His declarations are perfectly consistent with the whole tenour of his public conduct. The same disrespect for laws and treaties; the same ungovernable arrogance; the same licentious pretensions to universal empire; the same tissue of falsehood and impudence are visible in the present Official Documents, as have distinguished his preceding ones. We never doubted that he would abandon his nefarious projects on Spain, but were apprehensive that he would attempt to conceal them. He may have made this direct avowal from policy or from pride, it will not be less advantageous to the cause of humanity. He has exaggerated his resources and announced his intentions. We are consequently prepared for the conflict. Oh, let us make up by our subsequent conduct and activity, for the unpardonable fault we have committed in Portugal. The means of the man are great; we feel the full extent of the danger; but we are convinced we have the means of resisting it; and when we consider how closely our security is connected with the independence of Spain, we hope no remissness will be visible in our co-operation. These important documents remove at the same time every doubt about the anxiety and jealousy he feels relative to Austria. In order to intimidate that Power he makes, through the organ of his War Minister, a pompous and extravagant display of his armies. But this vaunting, this irrascibility, and this affected depreciation, would but ill conceal from a judicious observer his present embarrassments. Two hundred thousand men are going to scale the Pyrenees---where are they? Will he withdraw his whole army from Germany? but he acknowledges himself the impossibility, under existing circumstances, of weakening the corps he has there. This is a tacit acknowledgment of the apprehensions he entertains of insurrections breaking out in other countries. He has ordered the whole Contingency of the Rhine to march into France, if we can give any credit to the German and French Papers. He dares not employ them in Spain, for he must be convinced the greater part would desert to the Allies. He employs them, therefore, to suppress the effects of popular discontent in Brabant, Holland, Switzerland and France; or, more probably, to keep them as hostages to answer for the submission of the Princes of Germany. He also affects to boast of the friendship subsisting between him and Russia. We are strongly inclined to believe the contrary; and we really conclude, from this very publicity, that he entertains very strong doubts of the sentiments of that Court. It would be madness to suppose that Austria would assume her present menacing attitude, were she not secure of the acquiescence of Russia. The armies of the latter are in motion in Poland. The most active correspondence exists between the Cabinets of Vienna and Petersburgh; and why should we not draw a conclusion, supported by policy and feeling, that if Russia takes any part in the contest, she will adopt that which is so congenial to her honour and real interest?

A Packet has arrived from New York. The latest intelligence from thence is of the date of the 6th ult. The embargo, at that period, was rigidly enforced, and it was understood, that it was the determination of the Goverment not to remove it as long as the causes which occasioned it should exist. This, however, is a measure which does not entirely depend on the disposition of Mr. Jefferson and his friends. The other branches of the Legislature have fortunately some weight in the decision of a question of such immense importance to their country and themselves.

A Row-Boat has arrived at Guernsey from St. Maloes, with four American seamen, who state, that Bonaparte has arrested all the Americans in France. This account, which has been received by a Gentleman in the city, was read at Batson's Coffee-house yesterday morning.

If any thing will open the eyes of the Americans, and increase their detestation of Mr. Jefferson, it is this circumstance, if it be true. They begin to deprecate strongly the impolicy of the embargo, and to be sensible to its future consequences. They now apprehend that the late occurrences in Spain, opening to our traders and colonists the ports of South America, will prove the impuissance of their enmity, and secure us the exclusive advantages of that commerce. If honour has no influence on their decisions, it is probable interest may. We would wish, on their own account, they might soon recover from their infatuation.

One of those sanguinary revolutions, which are so common in the Ottoman Empire, has taken place at Constantinople. There is unfortunately reason to suppose that French intrigue has produced the new catastrophe. The Divan seemed to be convinced of the dangerous influence which the French exercised in Turkey; and therefore wished to renew their former intercourse with this country. The agents of the Corsican, in order to counteract a disposition so hostile to French preponderance, probably encouraged and excited the march of Mustapha Bairactar, who was the principal actor in this tragedy. How infamous that government and its agents must be, who afford by their conduct a justifiable excuse for attributing to them every atrocity.

BRILLIANT ACTION OF SIR SAMUEL HOOD IN THE BALTIC.

We have the happiness to announce, that in the Baltic we have commenced our naval campaign against Russia with great brilliancy.—Lieutenant Thompson arrived yesterday evening at the Admiralty with dispatches, stating that Sir Samuel Hood had attacked the Russian Fleet of Nine Sail of the Line, with only Two Sail of British ships, and after a very severe action, succeeded in cutting off one ship, which was driven ashore, captured, and burnt. The Russians lost 221 men killed and wounded; we have only lost ten men killed, and one officer wounded. The Centaur is said to have captured the enemy's ship by boarding. The Russian ship was so much shattered, that had our people succeeded in getting her off the shore, it was believed she must have sunk; it was therefore determined to destroy her. The Centaur also got a-ground in the action. The Swedish fleet, being very much to leeward, had no opportunity of sharing in the action. The Russian fleet took shelter in Port Baltic, in the Gulph of Finland, where they are now blockaded. When the officer left Sir S. Hood, Sir J. Saumerez, with four sail of the line, the Victory, Goliah, Africa, and Mars, was in sight. It was hoped that we should be able to force the Russians to quit their shelter, or compel them to surrender. As soon, however, as the Russian Admiral got into the port, he began to erect works upon an island commanding the entrance into the harbour, and which it would be necessary to occupy before any attack could be made upon his squadron. Lieutenant Thompson has been received with great distinction by his Swedish Majesty, to whose head-quarters he had been dispatched previous to his setting out with the dispatches of which he was the bearer. Before he left Sweden measures had been taken to convey a sufficient number of troops to reduce the island, when the Russian fleet will be attacked, and no doubt captured. Our force is seven sail of the line, the Swedish ten.

It would be no matter of surprise were Bonaparte to detain the vessels we should send to transport Junot and his army to France. We mention this circumstance, in order that the necessary precautions may be taken to prevent this new atrocity. The whole conduct of the Russian justifies this surmise; and we think this very circumstance would excuse our Government, in the opinion of every rational man, if it refused on that very ground, to ratify the Convention.

It is already confidently reported, in the military circles, that an inquiry will be immediately ordered into the circumstances that led to the Convention with Junot. His Majesty's Ministers, and his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, are said to concur in the propriety of this proceeding. Sir A. Wellesley, it is said, arrived in town on Thursday, and report connects him very nearly with the institution of the inquiry. Other reports say, that the Convention has been submitted to the Attorney and Solicitor General, for their opinion as to its validity.

The Marquis de Romana is arrived in London. He came from the Baltic in the Calypso schooner.

THE COURT.

Wednesday his Majesty arrived in town from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Cambridge, and Kent. At twelve o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee. The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:

General Sir William Meadows, on his being appointed Governor of Hull. Mr. Thomas De Gray, on being appointed his Majesty's Chaplain.

His Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Thursday the dispatches were finally closed at the East India House, and delivered to the Pursers of the under-mentioned ships:—

Devaynes, Capt. Normand—Bombay direct.—Ocean, Capt. M'Taggart; Sir Stephen Lushington. Capt. J. Hay—Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.—Union, Capt. Simpson; General Stuart, Captain Jameson; Tottenham, Capt. Hughes; Asia, Captain Tremenheere; Walthamstow, Capt. Jones—Madras and Bengal.

Thursday a Court of Directors was also held, when Captain Larkins was sworn into the command of the ship Warren Hastings, consigned to Bengal and China.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. VI.

"It was the fashion in England, for every one, who would be thought religious, to throw as much sanctity as possible into his face, and, in particular, to abstain from all appearances of mirth and pleasantry, which were looked upon as the marks of a carnal mind." Spectator.

REV. HUGH WORTHINGTON,

MINISTER OF SALTERS' HALL.

EVERY one is obnoxious to partiality. The present writer does not ostentatiously claim exemption from so general an imputation: he also is partial——to talents, to integrity, and to exertion. If, while estimating the clerical character of Hugh Worthington, I should rank him high in the scale of pulpit excellence, let this opinion be attributed to its legitimate source, not to undue predilection in favour of an individual.

I know, indeed, little of the private history of this Gentleman; except that he was regularly trained, under the inspection of his father, who was an eminent Dissenting Minister, for the exalted profession in which he has long distinguished himself. Mr. Worthington has been married, but is now a widower. Having no children, he, like the present Bishop of London, seems to place all his hopes in the abilities of one of his nephews. Genius however, though sometimes hereditary, is not transferable. When Elijah ascends, the mantle will not devolve to Elisha!

So early as the age of twenty-two, if I rightly remember, Mr. Worthington was ordained Minister of the Congregation meeting at Salters' Hall. This is one of the principal Dissenting Meetings in London; and his being chosen, by the members of that place, at so young a period of life, sufficiently evidences the estimation in which his talents and character were then held.

The duties of the Dissenting Clergyman are comprehensive and arduous. He generally combines the offices of priest and preacher; his prayers are entirely extemporaneous, and originate purely in himself; and he has to read and expound, as well as to teach. He commonly discharges at once, and without intermission or relief, the services of the altar and the desk and the pulpit. He ought therefore to possess qualifications of no ordinary description. If he would competently acquit himself, if he is "a workman who need not to be ashamed," he must be able, conscientious, intelligent, fervent, indefatigable; "fearing God," seriously and deeply solicitous for the success of his instructions, "hating covetousness, and eschewing evil." His individual welfare depends on the integrity of his conduct, and the energy of his exertions.

It is in Prayer, in his nobly affecting and awfully animated addresses to the Deity, that Mr. Worthington eminently surpasses his contemporaries in divinity. Whether I consider the suitable solemnity of his manner, his scrupulous selection of words, always appropriate, and simple but full of energy; whether I consider the devotional magnificence of his ideas, or the unaffected, and almost unbounded, liberality of his sentiments, I feel perplexed between my admiration of the man and my profound veneration for the character that he sustains. This praise may sound loftily, but it is not the language of exaggeration.

He is not less happy in his Scriptural Elucidations. It is his custom, during the earlier part of Divine Service, to read the chapter from which his text is to be named, commenting, as he goes along, on doubtful or difficult passages. The practice is most laudable, and is productive of incalculable benefits. Those whose attention would hardly be attracted by merely hearing a portion of the Bible commonly read to them, and who, unhappily, form no inconsiderable number among professors of religion, find their curiosity excited by the comments of the reader, and their minds become gradually rivetted to his wishes. His auditors are, if one may here be permitted the expression, allured into seriousness.

I am now to speak of Mr. Worthington with reference to his Preaching.

His manner of preaching is such as I could wish to see generally pursued. It is not peculiar to Mr. Worthington, but it is a style in which he peculiarly excels. Partly prepared, and partly spontaneous, his Discourses have all the regularity of studied compositions, with all the fluency of extemporary eloquence. Why should a preacher habitually disdain the admonitory reminiscence of notes; or, why should he, on the other hand, be doomed never to raise his eyes from the cushion on which his manuscript reposes? If our clergy must read their sermons, why, at least, do they not read them more becomingly?—Let them avow their impotency, if indeed they are unable to remedy it; take up their sermons boldly in their hands, and read them distinctly and openly. How painful is it to see a public speaker, in one of the most august situations he can occupy, nearly as motionless as a statue, and almost muttering, instead of inculcating, the most important precepts ever delivered to mankind!

Such is not Worthington. He reasons, illustrates, exhorts, consoles, animates. While he informs the minds and convinces the understandings, he subdues the hearts of his hearers; while he elevates and sublimes their conceptions, he conciliates their affections, and commands their esteem. What is affirmed of a celebrated orator, may be said, in his felicitous moments, of this preacher: his intellect is all feeling—his feeling is all intellect. They are not among the circumstances which least enhance the effect of his discourses, the primitive simplicity of his personal appearance and the manly intelligence of his countenance. Plainness, indeed, forms his most becoming ornament; it is, if I may so define it, a dissenting attribute; and it adds to the energy, by contributing to the dignity, of his manner. What ought particularly to be noticed, in the character of Mr. Worthington, is the temper of his piety. Had the 'Spectator' lived in our age, he would have distinguished him from the "saints with sorrowful countenances;" from the multitude of those whose "superstitious fears and groundless scruples cut them off from all the pleasures of conversation, and all social entertainments, as if mirth was made for reprobates, and chearfulness of heart denied those who are the only persons that have a proper title to it." His is the religion of gratitude; of thanksgiving, as well as supplication. Never does he omit, in the emphatic words of inspiration, to "thank God for all his benefits!" Chearfulness is not levity; and it certainly appears more desirable to render religion inviting, than intimidating. Mr. Worthington has, notwithstanding, been censured on this very account. Much depends, in disquisitions of this kind, on individual opinion, or, more truly, on physical feelings; but, were it my province to enter the lists on this occasion, perhaps the dogmas of the melancholics might be successfully combatted.

Mr. Worthington, however, has his faults. As a preacher, his emphases are sometimes overstrained, his pauses, though generally judicious, are frequently too protracted, and he is apt to sink, now and then, the concluding words of his sentences.

He is also a Dissenter. I do not mention this as any thing criminal in him; since he dissents from principle, and since he is bound to maintain, to the utmost of his ability, dissenting principles. His general liberality of thinking has already excited my poor encomium, and his political loyalty I think unimpeachable; but I have wished, that he could be more tolerant towards the hierarchy of this country.

Enquiries into the heart, it has been well observed, are not for man. Mr. Worthington is broadly accused of heterodoxy. Whether he be Socinian, or Arian, or Unitarian—he is not strictly Trinitarian—I shall not presume to determine. I have already remarked, that he is a thorough-bred Dissenter from our Established Church; but he is an honourable adversary, and one whom I should exult to number among its most illustrious supporters.

Other objections might be started. These, however, attach rather to the body of which he is a member, than to any individual member of that body. Onesimus.

Chapter Coffee-house, Pater-Noster-row.

 Amicus has come to hand; and his favours will not be neglected. Though the FOUNDLING CHAPEL is postponed, till a more "convenient season," its Ministers will undergo no trivial scrutiny.—W. K.; E. of R. has also been received.

Of the communication of the latter Correspondent, Onesimus has reason to be rather proud. He will certainly attend to the very sensible and pertinent remarks conveyed in it; and has only to add, that, while he sedulously labours to "disrobe ignorant pretenders and needy fools," his anxiety to deserve "the approbation of every friend of the British Nation and the British Throne," will, at the same time, compel him not to wink at the errors, or countenance the abuses, even of the Established Church of England! Let this hint suffice.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Fired with the monstrous dullness of the Haymarket Theatre, we witnessed on Monday last the opening of Covent-Garden, with as much joy as the polar savage feels, when his wintry darkness is dispelled by the rays of the long absent sun. The contrast was the more striking, as nearly the whole constellation of talent which Covent-Garden can boast, suddenly burst upon us, and the feeble glimmerings of a Colman's muse gave way to the wild, but dazzling splendour of Shakespear's genius.

The public curiosity having been highly excited by the early appearance of Mrs. Siddons in Lady Macbeth, this season, an overflowing house greeted her with three distinct peals of applause. She seemed much agitated with her reception, and the tremulous accents of her voice whilst reading Macbeth's letter, bespoke her secret feelings more powerfully than words. Her aspect is not changed; her powers are undiminished. It seems as though time respected the finest living monument of genius and nature that ever existed, and allowed her to triumph over the ravages of years. Her delineation of an "unsexed" woman, ambitious, guilty, and unrepenting, appears horribly just to the eye of imagination: for notwithstanding the corruption of our age, we cannot form any idea of such a character from viewing its reality. Mrs. Siddons certainly is greater at certain moments than others; but this seeming inequality proceeds from her close attention to nature, which rises and sinks with the ebb and flow of passions and circumstances.

The inequality we perceive in Mr. Kemble's acting, springs from a different source. It is not merely the impulse of nature which he obeys; he is continually led by the wish of appearing what he certainly is, a great actor; but what would be still plainer, did he not so visibly exert himself to impress the conviction of it on our minds. Conscious that we are always powerfully struck by what is uncommon, he generally aims at effect in particular passages. He will sometimes rehearse half a scene in a low monotone, and with such a cold barrenness of action, as almost to freeze the very soul of passion, in order to astonish us by a sudden burst rendered more sublime by comparison. It is thus that, during nearly the whole of the First Act of Macbeth, except one or two speeches in the scene with the witches, his soliloquy, and part of his second interview with his Lady, he spoke so low, that neither the boxes, nor even the pit, could scarcely hear a word he said. In the Second Act he completely redeemed his former inactivity—not to say negligence. In his address to the imaginary dagger, the fixedness of his look eyeing vacant air—the mixture of astonishment and terror, so forcibly expressed by his features—and the appropriate intonation of his voice, could not be surpassed. It is at such a moment that his genius unfolds itself in all its splendour; it is then we are compelled to forget, in the admiration of the present, the imperfections which we had noticed before. His sudden return to truth and reason, at "there's no such thing," was not only natural, but by his art rendered affecting. And in the ensuing scene, the plaintive eagerness with which he exclaims—"But wherefore could I not pronounce Amen?" &c, painted faithfully the novelty of the sensations which a noble soul experiences after committing a first crime; when remorse begins to sting, and the culprit still thunderstruck by the greatness of his guilt, is unable to define his own feelings. During the whole course of the Tragedy, Mr. Kemble's delineation of Macbeth was a chequered scene of light imperfections, wilful and artful negligences, and sublime beauties.

Mr. Charles Kemble played with judgment and fire. He has greatly improved in his pronunciation of late, for he now can say thee for thy, &c. &c. with as much ease and propriety as his brother. The parts of the Witches were acted by Messrs. Emery, Simmons, and Blanchard, with their usual excellence, and Mr. Bellamy was not an unworthy substitute for Johnston in Hecate.

On Friday night Mrs. Siddons performed the part of Isabella. The manner in which she acted it, disappointed, if such an expression may be used, the anxious fears of the public, who fancied her age would unfit her for the character. Her matronly appearance was not unsuitable to that of a widow, who, from the time she had lost her husband, may be supposed to have passed the threshold of youth; and the faint traces which years have left on her features without impairing their beauty, seemed the touches of grief, not the injuries of age. Her supplications in the first act, the courageous resignation with which she meets the reproaches of the incensed Baldwin, and which visibly springs not from a want of feeling, but from the excess of her love for her son, could not have been surpassed by herself in her youngest days. Her astonishment, fear, and joy mixed with sorrow, when she thinks the stranger who brings her the ring is not her husband, whose reported death had caused her to wed another, unfolded on her countenance, and in her gestures, all the secret springs of the passions when moved by the hand of nature. Her madness was a sublime picture of the fragility of the human mind, and never can be excelled on any stage. —Mr. Kemble was not as great in Biron, as in many characters in which we have seen him. His voice seemed exhausted, or rather he chose not to exert its powers. The best part of his performance was his death, which he acted in a truly affecting and tragic manner. Mr. Charles Kemble, and Mr. Braham, displayed more judgment than genius in the characters of Carlos and Villeroy.

Drury-Lane Theatre opened last night with the Honey Moon and Rosina. We must postpone our observations until the ensuing week.

DIED.

On Wednesday morning last, at his seat, at Hagley, near Birmingham, aged eighty-four years, William Henry Lyttleton, Lord Lyttleton, Baron Frankley in Worcestershire.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTY-NINE.

THE CONVENTION.

We are once more reduced to the mortifying, but imperious, necessity of resuming our strictures on the Convention signed by our Commanders in Portugal. The task is painful, but indispensable. It is far from our character, and perfectly repugnant to our feelings, to swell the tide of popular indignation, or to irritate the public feelings to unnecessary acrimony, against men, on whose innocence or criminality the laws of their country must speedily decide. Such severity would not be justice; it would be the most wanton and unwarrantable barbarity. But the present subject is of so alarming a nature; affording so dangerous a precedent; involving so many and complicated interests; implicating so strongly the whole army in the infamous transaction, and so degrading to the national character, that we would deserve to be branded as traitors and cowards towards our country, Europe and posterity, if motives of personal consideration, if fear of consequences, or principles of false and dangerous humanity, encouraged us to be silent and neutral. When we reflect on the circumstances which preceded this dishonourable compromise; on the object of the Expedition; the triumphant malignity of the enemy; the confusion of our allies, and the stigma offered to our national character, we indignantly demand if those individuals be Englishmen:—if there was no treachery in the transaction;—if we are to consign it among those acts which occasioned the destruction of the Austrian army at Ulm, and the surrender of Madgeburg? It is in vain that we are called on by justice, by reason, by humanity, to wait for a more satisfactory explanation of the circumstances:—our feelings supersede the operations of our understanding; and when the fact is so base, so glaringly criminal, we are afraid of suspending our judgments, for fear of sinking in our esteem, and betraying coolness and apathy, when our friends, and every one we meet, call down vengeance and imprecations on the vile betrayers of our country's honour.

Such is the predicament we are placed in. We are afraid to excuse, almost to investigate, from an apprehension we should, in a certain measure, participate in the atrocity and baseness of the act. When our passions begin to swell; when our feelings begin to enounce themselves only by execrations, we endeavour to banish the subject from our minds, and wish to defer the examination, till familiarity has blunted the acuteness of our sensations, weakened the horror of the action, and perhaps reconciled us to its infamy. Such is the tranquillity we, as well as the mass of our countrymen, may one day attain. A repetition of this business, another Buenos Ayres, and another Portugal Convention, with a Capitulation or two in Spain and Italy, may break down the inflexible pride of our national integrity. Then our Whitelockes, our Dalrymples, our Burrards, our Wellesleys, will find a people adapted to their character and wishes, equally indifferent to infamy and honour, to victory or defeat, and ranking them as high in their estimation, and perhaps higher in their consideration, than Lord Nelson. Pardon us, shade of a hero and patriot! The loathsome association of such characters with your immortal name, was wrung from our wounded feelings. We know how you would have acted had you been stationed before the Tagus; and were the arm, which was so often wielded in the service of your country, capable of signing such a Convention, you would, like another Scævola, have made it expiate in the flames the ignominy of the service.

Shall we analyse this Convention? Shall we examine it article for article? Shall we begin with No. 1, 2, 3, 4? Shall we find courage to go through the abominable catalogue? The second is infamous, the third is equally so, and the fourth, we believe, is unparalleled. The fifth is a connivance on our part, a treacherous sanction of the plunder of the unfortunate Portuguese. We furnish the robbers with ships to carry home the pilfered effects of our Allies. Has there been another example in the annals of history of such meanness? Those very ruffians, the sworn enemies of our name, our country, our liberty, our institutions and prosperity; who plundered the Portuguese of their property; who made their provinces a scene of devastation, rape, and murder, from no other motives but because they were our friends; who forced their Sovereign, on the same account, to abandon his throne and country, are permitted by Dalrymple, Burrard, and Wellesley, not only to carry off, but are assisted with the means of conveying away the property of the very people, who became victims to their attachment to us. In the long catalogue of human vices and atrocities, if a parallel example of baseness can be pointed out, we will become the panegyrists of their conduct. The sixth and seventh articles are a mean, paltry, despicable acquiescence in the arrogant pretensions of the enemy. They are worded so obsequiously; they evince so much politeness, that it is visible, that the fellows, who signed it, felt a kind of awe and terror in the presence of this psuedo Duke. "It is, however, fully understood that "the means of conveyance for horses, at the disposal of "the British Commanders are very limited; some additional conveyance may be procured at the port of Lisbon; "at all events every facility will be given to the French "army to dispose of the horses belonging to it, &c." Where is our vaunted pride? What is become of that republican haughtiness we are accused of? Every line in those two articles resembles more the nauseous complaisance of an old, drivelling court-retainer, than the simple, energetic language of a soldier. So much anxiety is manifested to provide for the wants, and anticipate the necessities of Junot and his rascally followers; so much complacency; so much honied sweetness, that we grow sick on reading it. Shame on your feelings and your politeness! We wish you had in your composition more English bluntness and inflexibility. The eighth and ninth are in the same style as the preceding. The tenth, which stipulates the safe return of our ships, after having conveyed the French home, has been adverted to in our last Number, and we were happy to see that several Papers copied our observation. We should be far from being surprised, on the contrary, we foresee that Bonaparte will find some pretext for detaining the transports which will convey the third and last division of his troops. Even the very stipulation conveys a proof that such an event was apprehended by our Commanders; and they had still the infamy to sign it. Now comes the fourteenth. "Should there arise doubts "as to the meaning of any article, it will be explained "favourably to the French army." We will not make a single comment on this article. There it is staring us in the face; while our cheeks glow with indignation, and our eyes swell with tears of rage. We will leave to our Readers to explain and comment on it as they please. Never shall we defile our pages with another word on this worthless concession. No. 17. "No native of Portugal shall be "rendered accountable for his political conduct, during the "period of the occupation of this country by the French "army." A complete act of grace, a bill of indemnity in favour of the traitors, who had sold their country and betrayed their Sovereign. What right had our officers to screen those criminals from the justice of their offended country. If motives of humanity induced them to do so, in order to prevent the sanguinary effects of popular resentment, why had they the imbecility to consent that acknowledged traitors should remain in the country. What security is there for the public tranquillity, when such a swarm of disaffected individuals, together with the French domiciliated in Portugal, are at large, and at full liberty to intrigue? Did they reflect what responsibility, invective, and future reproach they exposed themselves to, in consequence of this article? Not a Frenchman, not a Portuguese of this kind, that will happen to fall a sacrifice to private vengeance or public animosity, but his death will be imputed to our connivance or instigation. We recollect what a cry of disapprobation was uttered when Napper Tandy was liberated on the recommendation of Otto; and very justly. We will now ask if our conduct in Portugal has not been equally weak, degrading, and far more impolitic.

It is impossible we can submit to the painful drudgery of going through the remaining Articles. Sincerely do we regret that we are condemned to the mortifying duty of being forced to register our national dishonour. This precedent is of the most dangerous tendency; it is the second which has been afforded in the short space of one year. How far they may accumulate. How far the evil has already spread we shudder to examine. When a man, like Sir Arthur Wellesley, who stood so high in the esteem of the army and nation, has given cause to accuse him of misconduct, lukewarmness, folly, and to suspect him of something; which we even feel a horror in supposing. Good Heavens! Where was his spirit, his sense of honour, and the remembrance of his past services? We wished him so well! We entertained such sanguine expectations from his talents and patriotism! We sincerely congratulated our country that so promising an officer was sent to command the expedition: the victory of Vimiera justified our hopes; and this very man, who was already in possession of so much popularity, who had still more before him, had the imbecility, or the infatuation, or the .... (what expression shall we use?) to submit to the pretended orders of an old woman, who, forsooth, absolutely forced him to sign a Convention the most dishonourable on the records of our army. That of poor General Whitelocke was a trifle in comparison. If he knew what pain the proofs, the irresistible, the glaring proofs of his baseness have caused us in common with the mass of our countrymen, if there were only a particle of the soldier or citizen in his character, he would, in the very first engagement, obliterate for ever the acute sense of his dishonour. Sincerely and warmly do we pity him; and regret the honours he has lost, and the reputation he has forfeited. Only twenty days ago there was not a native of the country who was not proud to recognise in him a fellow-citizen; who did not make him the object of his panegyrick; and painful, mortifying change! There is not one of our lowest artisans who does not at present look down with some degree of contempt on the hero of Vimiera.

We will not press this distressing subject further. Willingly would we abandon it for ever; but the interests of our country, the crisis we are placed in, the fortunes of seventeen millions of inhabitants, our reputation, our independance, the fate of the universe, extinguish in our bosoms any latent consideration for an individual. Any relaxation of justice in the present instance would be, perhaps, the death-warrant of our national independence. Circumstances of this kind, trivial as they may appear in the eyes of the multitude, are the surest symptoms of the decline of empires. And should our country have the misfortune to fall in the present contest, the future historian will, infallibly, pronounce that the Convention of Portugal was a sure prognostic of our fate.

We have declined till now animadverting on the conduct of Sir Hew Dalrymple, or of Sir Harry Burrard. We have not done it from lenity; but from motives of the most sovereign contempt. Indignation we cannot feel against two such miserable individuals: their conduct, their callous insensibility have secured them against our enmity. They have dug the gulph of infamy—if they have not the virtue of a Roman, let them have the courage; perhaps a voluntary plunge may close it up for ever. The country seemed to have a fatal presentiment of disgrace, as soon as it heard of the nomination of the former. Whoever has proposed that unfortunate man, if he be not as callous as his protégé, must bewail, with tears of blood, the use he makes of his power and influence. We are afraid there is much to investigate.

Some persons may be perhaps inclined to think these strictures too severe. If they knew our real sentiments on the subject:—If they were acquainted with the efforts we are obliged to make in order to restrain our indignation; if they only saw the affair in the light we do; they would be astonished at the calmness of our style, and the lenity of our strictures. Woe to the people, who remain insensible to national dishonour! Woe to the statesmen who, from motives of interest or favour, foster so dangerous a relaxation of national morality! With what horror do we read of similar circumstances, when they occur in other countries. How did we reprobate the conduct of Mack! What execrations did we bestow on the traitors who delivered up the Prussian fortresses! But we wait until a court-martial had pronounced them guilty! Alas! the weakness of the Prussian cabinet, the encouragement they gave to cowards and blockheads, and mistaken principles of humanity, to which the overthrow of the monarchy should be attributed.

We will now say a few words as to the policy or justice of ratifying this Convention. We are afraid our observations on this head will find very few supporters; and we communicate them therefore with reluctance. We do not even believe that there are three public characters in this country who would have the audacity to adopt the very measure we would propose. The fear of responsibility, the danger of compromising their reputation, the apparent boldness of the suggestion would prevent them from adopting it. Certain it is, however, the morality of the measure out of the question, that an act of energy would place us, under the present circumstances, in the judgment of our neighbours, in a much more advantageous light, than the most conscientious execution of the Convention would do. There is no man will deny; but several cases may happen, when a government is perfectly justified in refusing to ratify the acts of its ministers or generals. We will suppose, for example, that Junot had insisted that our army should quit Portugal, and not serve again during the remainder of the war; and that our commanders had agreed to this article, is there any man in this country would advise our government to ratify it? Not one; and why? Because the article is so absurd, that the persons who agreed to it, must either have been madmen, or traitors. Therefore, if a government has, on any occasion, a right to refuse its ratification, from the suspicion of the incompetency or treachery of its agents, every objection to the nonfulfilment of the present Convention is done away. We therefore strongly give it as our opinion, that the highest policy, as well as the soundest morality, would induce our government to refuse its ratification.—When we consider the service we would render by that means to the Spanish people, we would hope no man in this country would have the arrogance to maintain that such conduct is criminal. We all coincide in acknowledging that the aggression against Spain is the most flagitious, the most unprovoked, that ever was made by one state on another; and will, nevertheless, in consequence of the imbecillity of a Dalrymple, send 15,000 Frenchmen to co-operate in this villainous attack. How it could possibly enter into the head or heart of an honest man to hesitate on such an occasion, is inexplicable to us. We are convinced, therefore, that it would not only be expedient, but dictated by the sublimest virtue, if we did every thing in our power to counteract the designs of a villain against the repose and independence of ten millions of our fellow-creatures. If this be not done, the country is as much implicated as the commanders.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 8.—It is positively stated that Marshal Lannes is to have the command in Spain.

The Moniteur of this day contains the following article under the head of Berlin, the 26th ult.:—

A Prussian Assessor, named Koppe, was informed against as an intriguer. Marshal Soult has had the good fortune of getting him arrested and conveyed to Spandau: and having also got possession of his papers, he found among them the original of the following letter. We think it ought to be made public, as an instance of the causes of the rise and fall of States. This letter clearly displays the dispositions of the Prussian Ministers, and particularly those of the Minister Stein, who has long held that office, and who still seems to be exclusively charged with the conduct of public affairs. We cannot but pity the King of Prussia for having in his service such awkward, but mischievously inclined Ministers.

KONINGSBERG, AUG. 15.

By the official dispatch which Mr. Koppe will deliver to your illustrious Highness, you will be informed of all that relates to the affairs of the French. I shall merely venture to make a few remarks respecting our situation in general.

According to the advice of Count G. L. W. repeated orders have been given to Prince G. to conclude a treaty of alliance, including a stipulation for a corps of auxiliaries, and to make application for a diminution of the contribution, or a delay in the period of payment. It is desirable that the Prince should maintain a prudent degree of reserve and distance, should the Emperor set off to execute any new enterprizes. If his Majesty, at the present crisis, when we may be useful to him, does not listen to our propositions, he will thereby demonstrate that he designs our total destruction, and we must then be prepared for the worst.

The public discontent increases daily in Germany. It must be kept up, and we must endeavour to work upon the minds of the people. I wish much that some correspondence could be established in Westphalia and Hessia, and that provision could be made for settling, in certain cases, a correspondence with some well-disposed persons, who might subsequently enter into reciprocal engagements with each other. If your illustrious Highness can give me any information respecting this point, you may, in that case, send back to me M. Koppe, or transmit it by some other confidential person.

The affairs of Spain make a strong impression, and clearly demonstrate what we must have long foreseen. It would be very useful to circulate this intelligence in the most prudent manner.

A war with Austria is looked upon as unavoidable. This contest will decide the fate of Europe and ours of course. What does your Highness think will be the result of it? Some such plans as were in agitation in the spring of 1807 should now be revived. Where is M. Von Meuring at present?

Count Von Vinc* will speedily pay you a visit, and remain with you some time. The Elector runs a great risk, under the present circumstances, both his person and his possessions being in their power. He ought, however, to place the one or the other in a state of security; but I am much afraid that he will fall a victim to his irresolution and covetousness.

M. Jacobi is not yet arrived, but he is daily expected. His voyage has been tedious and difficult.

It has been at length determined, that Ancillon shall be tutor to the Hereditary Prince. The execution of this purpose will, however, require some further time; but one step has been taken, and that is a great deal in our present state of our indecision. I am glad that your spouse has renounced her first intention. The Prince must have derived great advantage from the conversation of a lady so accomplished, and who has learnt so much in the school of experience and misfortune.

The finances of the House must be in a very bad condition, for I am not yet paid the 13,000 guilders which it owed me, for an estate which I sold some years ago; I should be very glad to have this sum paid to me, for in these times my possessions do not increase, and I must regulate myself according to my income. I understand that some of your friends have left Holstein.

General Blucher falls off sadly; it has been necessary to send Colonel Bulow to Colber, to support him. I am, &c.

(Signed) Stein.

The address was—To his Illustrious Highness the Prince of Saijn Wittengenstein, at Dobberon.

Yesterday a considerable detachment of the grenadiers of the Imperial Life-Guards set off for Strasburgh: 200 hackney coaches were pressed to convey them as far as Gnie, which is four leagues from this city, where the necessary vehicles were in readiness to transport them farther. The troops on their march for Spain are forwarded on their route in waggons, each district they pass through being obliged to furnish a certain number of carriages and horses.

A journey which it is supposed his Majesty will shortly undertake, is the subject of much conversation in this capital. It is rumoured that his Majesty intends to repair to Weimar, and that the Russian Emperor is also expected there.

It is reported that General St. Cyr goes to take the command of a corps of the army in Spain. General Vandamme will succeed him in the command of the army stationed on the coast of the Channel.

It is stated in some of our Journals, that General Romana has, from want of provisions, been obliged to put into Gottenburgh.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, AUG. 27.—According to letters from Constantinople, of the 31st ult. Mustapha Bairactar has declared that "the Porte has enemies; that she must carry on a war; and that all the military preparations must be conducted with redoubled activity."

Digitized by Google

PRESBURGH, AUG. 26.—The Archduke Palatine and the Archduke Primate arrived here on the 24th from Buda, and after a very short stay, set off for Luxemburg, but are expected to return to-morrow. Their Imperial Majesties will arrive here on the 2nd of September, and her Majesty will be crowned Queen of Hungary on the 7th.

BANKS OF THE DANUBE, AUG. 30.—The States of Stirin, Carniola, and Carinthia, have undertaken to provide regimentals for those sub-officers and privates of the Militia who can ill afford that expence. Franz Shenkl, Captain of the Militia in the district of Morburg, has voluntarily offered, in the name of his company, to extend their services, if necessary, beyond the frontiers.

VALLEY OF EHRENBRECTSTEIN, SEPT. 8.—The French troops coming from Saxony and Prussia arrived at Frankfort and Mentz in such numbers, that Marshal Kellermann gave orders that a column of about 15,000 should pass the Rhine farther down the river. The column alluded to arrived here on Saturday last, but scarcely had a few hundreds passed to the other side of the Rhine, when orders suddenly came for them to halt. The whole of this army is now quartered here and in the adjoining villages, and to-morrow we expect three more regiments of cavalry, and a regiment of horse artillery to arrive in our environs by way of Montabauer. We learn, that the cause of this halt is, that owing to the rapidity of the forced marches, sufficient preparations have not yet been made for the supply of the troops in their further progress.

We learn from Cassel that they are at work day and night in the Arsenals there. The Conscripts also are most diligently trained to the use of arms, so that a part of the Westphalian army, into which a considerable number of the Electoral Infantry and Cavalry have enlisted, will speedily be ready to take the field.

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, SEPT. 10.—It is reported from Stockholm that negotiations were began about delivering up the Russian Fleet. The following are extracts of letters from an officer on board the Victory, off Rogerswick:

"SEPT. 6, 1808.—The Russian Fleet are dismantling in Rogerswick: they have made their position very strong, by erecting batteries at Baltic Port, and East Roye, but they are warped so close to the shore that I think a gale of wind will go near to destroy them. We annoy and harass the enemy on all opportunities; and yesterday, on throwing shells, blew up a powder magazine with a very great explosion.—They are, I believe, very much alarmed and panic-struck, and I hope we shall be able to compel them to good terms.

"SEPT. 10.—Things remain nearly in the same state as when I last wrote. The Russians are moored as close as possible to the shore. I think the first N.W. gale must completely do them up. They have their yards and topmasts struck, and have amazingly fortified both sides of the entrance of the harbour.

"A list of the ships in company; and I understand the Orion is on her way to join us:—

"Victory, Centaur, Mars, Goliath, Implacable, Salcette, Ariel, Cruizer, Magnet, Æolus, Alert, Rose, Thunderer; Swan and Baltic, Cutters."

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

ASTORGA, AUG. 27.—On the 11th inst. arrived here Colonel Doyle, commissioned by the British Government to conduct to this country Spanish prisoners, 3000 in number, who have been incorporated with our army. The same Officer has also brought with him complete uniforms, muskets, ammunition, tumbrils, shirts, and stockings for 10,000 men, with 200,000lbs. of cheese, all of which articles are already on their way to the army. A million of piastres has also arrived in Corunna, and an equal sum at Gijon, with 30,000 muskets, and the necessary ammunition.

SALAMANCA, AUG. 29.—Colonel Doyle arrived yesterday in this city, accompanied by our beloved Duke del Infantado, and this day they set out together for Alvandel Formes, where Gen. Cuesta has established his head-quarters.

GIBRALTAR, AUG. 18.—Yesterday, at ten o'clock in the morning, landed in this place his Royal Highness the second son of the King of the Two Sicilies, and also his Serene Highness the Duke of Orleans. These illustrious guests arrived here from Malta, on board of his Majesty's ship Tonant. They were received by the garrison with a royal salute.

CADIZ, AUG. 10.—Gen. Dupont would now be one of the most opulent Generals of the French nation, had he remained at liberty. The enormous sum of 60,000 pinstres in silver, 8000 ounces of gold, a large quantity of plate, and other valuables, stolen in the town of Cordova and other places, have been taken from him here, and lodged in the treasury of this city. The people were of opinion that a prisoner of war had no occasion for so much wealth.

CARTHAGENA, AUG. 20.—On the 18th arrived at this port from Mahon, the Spanish squadron, composed of the following ships: Regna, Luisa, S. Pebla, Guerrero, Asta, and S. Rennon, commanded by Don Juan Joseph Martinez, Brigadier of the Royal Navy; the ship S. Francisco de Packa entered this port a few days before.

MADRID, AUG. 31.—Baron Strogonoff, Ambassador from Russia to our Court, set out yesterday for Lisbon. It is not certainly known what is the object of his journey, but it is supposed to have some relation to the Russian squadron lying there. Every thing here is perfectly tranquil. The recruits are continually exercising, especially those who are immediately to set out for the army. Afterwards we shall have leisure to train those who are to remain here in garrison.

We every day receive accounts from different parts of the kingdom, some of these are mere reports, which require to be confirmed. One of the most probable of these reports is, that the French army in Portugal has been defeated, and has surrendered, with General Junot; but we have received no official intelligence of this.

MADRID, SEPT. 3.—The troops who compose the Division of General Llamar left us yesterday; they seem to direct their march to Seria. This day we expect General Copigd, with his troops, who were in Toledo, and are to march from hence next Thursday, with the Division of Gen. Lapina. The two latter Divisions consist of 17,000 men, and the first of 6000.

The army of Arragon which marched from Saragossa in pursuit of the French, and pushed on as far as Tudela, has been obliged to make a tretrograde movement to Burga, because the army which marched from Burgos to attack the above corps on the right bank of the Ebro, amounted to 18,000 men.

SEPT. 7.—Joseph Napoleon and the French head-quarters are in the city of Lograno. The French marched by Tudela to Arragon; but after having advanced a few leagues, they on a sudden made a retrograde movement, which is generally attributed to intelligence they received of the movements of our armies.

VALLADOLID, AUG. 21.—The Marquis de Castelar, who is to command the Castilian army, is expected here. Don Cuesta goes to Madrid, having been elected a Member of the Central Junta; Don Castanos is directing his march by Somasierra and some of his troops are this day expected at Aranda.

RIVADEO, SEPT. 4.—Yesterday arrived in this port, unacquainted with our present war with France, a French brig from Cayenne, richly laden with cocoa, sugar, cloves, cotton, and other colonial produce. She was 45 days on her passage, and brings intelligence, that a few days before her departure, a French sloop arrived in Cayenne, announcing that Joseph Bonaparte had ascended the Spanish throne by virtue of the resignation of the Bourbons.—The above French brig has been declared a good prize, and the officers and crew are prisoners of war.

GIJON, SEPT. 15.—Letters from Oviedo state, the French, after collecting the chief part of their force from Navarre and Biscay, to the amount of 30,000 men, had suddenly made an irruption into Arragon, with the view of getting possession of Saragossa; when they were within seven leagues of the city, they received such intelligence as induced them to retreat, and their head-quarters are now at Mirandaer Ebro, in Navarre. Pallafox had fallen back to Burjo, hearing that the enemy had advanced with a force greatly superior. A letter from Madrid states, that 70,000 Spaniards were on their march to Saragossa. It is probable, on the receipt of this intelligence, the French fell back. Blake is supposed to be by this time at Burgos: the last accounts left him at Reynosa. Castanos has resigned the command of the Castilian army, and is succeeded by the Marquis of Castelar. The former is chosen Deputy to the central Junta at Madrid for the Province of Old Castile.

MANRESA, AUG. 19.—We learn from Reus, of date the 13th inst. that on the day preceding, two English ships, three-deckers, had arrived there, and had landed 1800 men, and a considerable quantity of artillery, and declaring at the same time that more would soon arrive.

CARTHAGENA, AUG. 20.—Yesterday a merchant vessel arrived here in eight days from Palermo, the Captain of which asserts, that the French are precipitately evacuating Naples, the whole kingdom being in a state of insurrection against the French, in consequence of having learned with certainty the occurrences in Spain, and the victories gained by the Spaniards. He adds, that when he came away, the English were embarking in all the vessels in that port, troops, arms, ammunition, and provisions for Naples.

Vich, Aug. 18.—The city of Gerona has suffered a second time a blockade of more than twenty days, but the result has been as fortunate, or more so, as the former, since the enemy abandoned precipitately the field of battle, leaving behind them a great quantity of artillery, muskets, and ammunition. They divided themselves into two columns, one of which took the direction to Figueras, and the other to Barcelona. In the night between the 13th and 14th they threw into the city more than 400 bombs and grenades, which did great damage to several edifices, particularly to the church of the Capuchins, that of the Dominicans, and the house of the Conde de Solterra, where the Junta holds its sittings.

IRELAND.

Dublin, Sept. 17.—Thursday, the Solicitor-General left Tralee, for this town, attended by two dragoons. Before his departure, we understand that he and the Honourable Judge Day (both of whom met there in their private capacities), had a conference respecting the melancholy state of that country, through which disaffection is every day extending. These persons, as we are informed, agreed to represent to Government the great necessity that exists of very considerably augmenting the military force of the said county.

Limerick, Sept. 13.—On Saturday last, a most shocking murder was perpetrated on the lands of Ballihahill, near Shanagolden, in this county: some proctors and farmers met on that day to ascertain the value of tythes they had taken on several farms in that neighbourhood, and at the hour of twelve o'clock were attacked by a number of men in arms, dressed with shirts and head-bands to conceal their faces; they were commanded by a man in coloured clothes, who daringly, without any concealment, seemed to direct all their proceedings—they first ordered Mr. Grady and his valuators to quit the lands immediately; notwithstanding their quickly doing so, this fellow ordered his party to fire and pursue, but providentially knowing the country well, they eluded their sanguinary pursuers, who frequently took short cuts, and fired to prevent their escape. The second party were not so fortunate; they were attacked in the same manner; one unfortunate man was first wounded by a ball in the arm, which scarcely took effect, when a second shot perforated his neck and got out at his mouth, of which he instantly expired, and with him another ill-fated valuator, whom they also shot through the body. Not satisfied with effecting their bloody purpose, their infamous leader directed each of the party as reserved their fire to discharge their pieces on the bodies of these unfortunate victims. P. Griffin, Esq. of Shanagolden, humanely sent a car and men to take the bodies in charge, and had them interred: they were riddled in a most horrid way from the many shots they received. Mr. Lindsay, of Tarbert, happened to ride by at the time this atrocious scene was performing, and has declared before the Coroner, that these villains were about 18 in number, and filed off into one of the adjacent fields after the murder, where they performed the manuel exercise with military precision.

Tralee, Sept. 13.—Tuesday night last, the Hon. and Rev. Frederick Mullens, and Sir W. Godfrey, Bart. accompanied by a party of the Milltown yeomanry, proceeded to the Cross of Coolbane, in consequence of having received information that there was to have been a meeting of White Boys there on that night, and apprehended a man of the name of James Kelly, of Lismarsimane, in the parish of Killorglin; who on his apprehension acknowledged that he had been sworn in as a White Boy, by a Capt. Culvane; that he attended their meetings for some nights previous, and that Capt. Culvane lived at Tubrid, at the top of Meanus. On receiving this information, the party proceeded to Culvane's, whom they succeeded in apprehending, but Kelly expressed the greatest reluctance in being confronted with him, adding, that if it was discovered that he gave any information against Culvane, he would not be left a cow or horse before morning. Kelly was fully committed by a warrant from the Rev. W. Godfrey.

The harvest is nearly closed throughout Ireland; the weather, for the last fortnight, has proved usually fine, and the grain, which is abundant, has been secured in fine order.

SCOTLAND.

On Saturday, the 17th inst. about half past eight o'clock in the evening, a smart shock of an earthquake was felt at Cumnock, near Ayr, and the neighbouring places. At Lendhills it was so distinct and violent, that the inhabitants were very much alarmed. A loud rumbling noise was heard resembling thunder, and the shock appeared to strike upwards from a great depth in the earth: several persons were nearly thrown down, and great numbers of people left their houses in the utmost consternation. In the course of about fifty minutes after the first shock, no less than thirty different lesser noises were heard: the progress of the first seemed to be towards the North-west, but afterwards more to the Eastward, during which no damage whatsoever was done.

Remarkable Occurrence.—Mr. Adam French, wine merchant, Leith, being shooting upon the lands of Colonel Colebrooke, in the parish of Crawfordjohn, and county of Lanark, his pointer dog having stopped short, and making a remarkable noise, attracted his attention, and going up to the spot, was astonished to see a large adder in the act of swallowing a lark; being half erected in the air he fired at it, and after blowing its head entirely off, it measured no less than 35 inches in length.

PROVINCIALS.

The sale of Lord Porchester's Merino Ryland flock took place on Tuesday last near Dulverton, and though but few purchasers attended, they went off at the following high prices—

50 Full-mouthed Merino Ryland Ewes, in five lots fetched	£150 0 0
55 Four tooth ditto	166 17 0
60 Merino Ryland Shearling Ewes	179 16 0
9 Merino Rams, of the pure blood	15 0 0

The purchasers were Mr. Acland, Col. Chichester, Mr. Herbert, Hicks, Anderson, Gooding, Coffin, and Rapson. A few very old cast-off Merino Ewes, of the pure blood, fetched from 6l. to 7l. each.—Lord Porchester exhibited twenty beautiful Ewes from his pure Merino flock, most fine valuable specimens of the improvement in those sheep. Mr. Lendhill was offered 400 guineas for the twenty, or 50 guineas for one, which he rejected, not intending to sell.

Hop-picking has commenced pretty generally in the neighbourhood of Maidstone.—The appearance of them is superior to any thing seen for many years past. Many pieces are laid at nine bags per acre, in the neighbourhood of Barming, Farley, Peckham, and Hunton.

A cucumber, produced in the open air, without any artificial heat, was gathered at Ovingham, on Saturday se'nnight, 16 inches in length, and 9 in girth.

There is now growing in the garden of Mr. J. B. Wyles, at Chesterton, a peach of uncommon dimensions. Its circumference, when measured parallel to the plane of the wall, is 10½ inches; in a transverse direction, it is somewhat less. Its weight, of course, has not yet been ascertained. Upon the same tree there are several others of great size and beauty, but which, by their proximity to the one above described, have not obtained their full share of notice.

A most atrocious act of barbarity was practised near Swindon, on Friday se'nnight. Some recruits, on their march from Ireland to the Isle of Wight, attacked the post-boy going from Swindon to Marlborough, without the least provocation. They commenced by beating his horse with their sticks, and then fell on the boy. One held his horse, while others attacked the boy about the head, shoulders, and loins, and did not desist until they had knocked him off his horse, and left him almost lifeless. Some persons passing some time after, found him in that state, and took him back to Swindon. One of the Magistrates immediately went to Marlborough, and had the men examined; when the Serjeant who accompanied the Recruits stated, that the men had been guilty of similar violence at several places. The poor post-boy is so ill, that little hopes are entertained of his recovery. The men are all now in custody.

A pony started from the Plough, Cheltenham, on Wednesday se'nnight, to go to the Bell Inn, Gloucester, a distance of nine miles and three-quarters, in half an hour, which it accomplished in 45 seconds within the time, carrying Mr. Kingston, a Gentleman riding 13½ stone. Considerable bets were depending 2 guineas to 5 were betted against the pony at starting.

Early on Friday se'nnight, the gaol in Carlisle was broke open, and five felons made their escape. It seems that they, during the night, sawed off their irons by means of knives which they had secured into something resembling saws.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Letter from Rear Admiral Sir S. Hood, to Sir J. Saumarez.

Centaur, off Rogerswick, Aug. 27, 1808.

Sir,—It is with pleasure I acquaint you, the Russian squadron, under the comand of Vice-Admiral Hanickoff, after being chaced thirty-four hours by his Swedish Majesty's squadron, under Rear-Admiral Naukhoff, accompanied by this ship, and the Implacable, under my orders, have been forced to take shelter in the Port of Rogerswick, with the loss of one ship of seventy-four guns. I shall have great satisfaction in detailing to you the services of the Captains, Officers, Seamen, and Marines, under my command; and have also to state, that in no instance have I seen more energy displayed than by his Swedish Majesty's squadron, which although from the inferiority of their sailing were prevented from getting into the action, Rear-Admiral Naukhoff and the Captains under his command, from their perseverance and judicious conduct, were enabled to give confidence to his Majesty's ships; and could we have forced the enemy to a general action, the whole of their squadron must have fallen to the superior bravery of the united force of our respective Sovereign's in so just and honourable a cause.

My letter of the 25th will have acquainted you of the Russian squadron having appeared off Oro Road on the 23d. The arrangements for quitting that anchorage, after his Swedish Majesty's ships from Jungfur Sound had joined Rear-Admiral Nauckhoff, were completed on the evening of the 24th. Early the next morning the whole force put to sea; soon after the Russian fleet was discovered off Hango Udd, the wind at N. E. Not a moment was lost in giving pursuit, and every sail pressed by his Swedish Majesty's squadron. From the superior sailing of the Centaur and Implacable they were soon in advance; that at the close of the evening the enemy were not far off, and noticed in the greatest disorder, apparently to avoid a general battle. In the morning of the 26th, about five o'clock, the Implacable was enabled to bring the leewardmost of the enemy's line of battle ships to close action, in a most brave and gallant manner and so decided and judicious was this manœuvre executed, that the Russian Admiral, who bore up with the whole of his force, could not prevent that marked superiority of discipline and seamanship being eminently distinguished. Although the enemy's ship fought with the greatest bravery, she was silenced in about twenty minutes; and only the near approach of the enemy's whole fleet could have prevented her then falling, her colours and pendant being both down; but I was obliged to make the signal for the Implacable to close me. Capt. Martin's letter stating the brave and gallant conduct of Lieutenant Baldwin, his other officers and men, I send herewith; and it would be needless for me to add more to you on their meritorious conduct. If words of mine could enhance the merit of this brave, worthy, and excellent officer, Captain Martin, I could do it with the utmost heartfelt gratification, and the high esteem I have for him as an officer and a friend, no language can sufficiently express.

The Russian Admiral having sent a frigate to tow the disabled ship, again hauled his wind, and the Implacable being ready to make sail, I immediately gave chace, and soon obliged the frigate to cast off her tow, when the Russian Admiral was again under the necessity to support her by several of his line of battle ships bearing down, and I had every prospect of this bringing on a general action, to avoid which he availed himself of a favourable slant of wind, and entered the port of Rogerswick.

The line of battle ship engaged by the Implacable having fallen to leeward grounded on a shoal just at the entrance of the port, there being then some swell, I had a hope she must have been destroyed, but the wind moderating towards the evening, she appeared to ride at her anchor, and exertions made to repair her damage. At sunset, finding the swell abated, and boats sent from the Russian fleet to tow her into port, I directed Captain Webley to stand in and endeavour to cut her off; this was executed in a manner that must ever reflect the highest honour on Captain Webley, the officers and ships company of the Centaur, for their valour and perseverance in the support of my orders. The boats had made a considerable progress, and the enemy's ship was [illegible] the port when we had the good fortune to lay her on board; her bowsprit taking the Centaur's fore-rigging, she [illegible] along with her bow grazing the muzzles of our guns, which was the full signal for their discharge, and the ene[illegible] were drove in by this raking fire; when the bowsprit [illegible] mizen riggings, I ordered it to be lashed; this was [illegible] in a most steady manner by the exertions of Captain [illegible] Lieut. Lawless, Mr. Strode the Master, and other [illegible] under a very heavy fire from the enemy's musketry, by which, I am sorry to add, Lieut. Lawless is severely wounded. The ship being six fathoms water, I had a hope I should have been able to have towed her out in that position, but an anchor had been let go from her, unknown to us, which made it impossible to effect it; at this period much valour was displayed on both sides, and several attempts made to board her by her bowsprit, but nothing could withstand the cool and determined fire of the Marines under Captain Bayley and the other Officers, as well as the fire from our stern-chase guns, that in less than half an hour she was obliged to surrender. On this occasion I again received the greatest aid from Captain Martin, who anchored his ship in a position to heave the Centaur off; after she and the prize had grounded, which was fortunately effected at the moment two of the enemy's ships were seen under sail, standing towards us, but retreated as they saw the ships extricated from this difficulty.

The prize proved to be the Sewolod, of 74 guns, Captain Roodneff; she had so much water in her, and being fast on shore, after taken out the prisoners and wounded men, I was obliged to give orders for her being burnt, which service was completely effected under the direction of Lieutenant Biddulph, of this ship, by seven o'clock in the morning.—I cannot speak too highly of the brave and gallant conduct of Captain Webley, and every Officer and man under his command; and I beg leave to recommend to you, for the notice of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, Lieutenant Lawless, for his exertions and gallant conduct, and who has severely suffered on this occasion; and I also must beg leave to recommend Lieutenant William Case, the senior Officer of this ship.

Herewith you will receive a list of the killed and wounded on board this ship and the Implacable, and from every information that it was possible to collect, that of the enemy's ship captured.

I have the honour to be, &c. Sam. Hood.

Sir James Saumarez, Bart. and K. B. Vice-Admiral of the Blue, &c.

P. S. I send herewith a list of the Swedish and Russian squadrons.

His Majesty's ship Implacable, off Packerort Light-House, Aug. 26, 1808.

Sir,—The action this morning between the Implacable and the rear ship of the Russian line was so immediately under your own observation, that it would be superfluous to trouble you with any statement upon that point; but in transmitting a list of killed and wounded, I trust I may be allowed the opportunity to express my thankfulness to the officers and ship's company of the Implacable for their eager and active exertions to close with the enemy, and the truly noble and splendid conduct which they displayed during the engagement; but it is my duty to acknowledge, in a more particular manner, the great assistance I derived from Mr. Baldwin, the first lieutenant, and Mr. Moore, the master; and if the fact of our opponent being completely silenced, and his colours (both ensign and pendant) down, when the approach of the whole Russian fleet occasioned your recalling me, can tend to make the affair worthy of being distinguished by any mark of approval from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, it is impossible their patronage can be bestowed upon a more thoroughly deserving Officer than Mr. Baldwin.—I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) T. B. Martin.

To Sir Samuel Hood, K. B. Rear-Admiral of the White, &c.

A return of the Men killed and wounded on board his Majesty's ship Centaur, August 26, 1808.

Killed.—Peter Jackson, landman; Hendrick Brass, private of marines; James Hawksford, ditto.

Wounded.—Officers.—Mr. Paul Lawless, first lieutenant, severely; Mr. Morton, boatswain, badly on the thigh and breast.

Petty Officer.—John Robinson (1), yeoman of the sheets, slightly on the back and arm.

Seamen.—Thomas Moxey, quarter-gunner; John Bowden, captain of the forecastle; Joseph Daniels, Richard Strongram, John Kenny, Thomas M'Donald, Adam Bossey, John Conway, John Jefferies, Timothy O'Brien, Thomas Burk, Michael Carnavy, Richard Williams, John Hudson, Edward Fletcher, and James Smith—ordinaries.

Marines.—John Shores, William M'Kendrick, John Gambleton, Samuel Leach, Benjamin Gilbert, Duncan M'Donald, James Gaynor, and William M'Cormick—privates.

Total—3 killed and 27 wounded.

In Sir J. Saumarez's Dispatch, inclosing the above, he says: "Too much praise cannot be bestowed on Rear-Adm. Sir S. Hood, for the gallantry he displayed with the two ships under his orders, in his pursuit of the enemy's fleet, when the bad sailing of the squadron of his Majesty's Ally prevented their coming up with them, and bringing on a general action. The brave and highly meritorious exertions of Captain Martin and Capt. Webley, with the officers and men under their orders, entitle them to the highest commendation in my power to bestow, and excited the amazement and admiration of the gallant Swedes, who witnessed their heroic bravery and perseverance. The present position of the Russian fleet within the batteries at the entrance of the harbour, leave but slender hopes of their being attacked with any probability of success. Admiral Nauckhoff has requested a body of land forces to be sent from Finland, with a view of taking possession of the Island of East Ragd, which would effectually command the harbour; but as the enemy have been occupied in placing it in the best state of defence, it is very doubtful if a descent upon the Island could be effected. I beg to assure their Lordships, that every endeavour will be practised with the force under my orders, jointly with the Swedish squadron, that can tend to the further defeat of the enemy. I propose to detach a small squadron, under the command of Capt. Martin, to Cronstadt; and I shall order the Africa to repair to her station off the Malmo Channel, calling off Carlscrona, for the convoy appointed to sail from that port for England.

I am, &c. &c. J. Saumarez.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Wells, Commander in Chief of his Majesty's ships and vessels at the Nore to the Hon. W. W. Pole, dated on board the Namur, the 17th inst.

Sir,—The inclosed letter from Captain Cathcart, Commander of his Majesty's late sloop Seagull, came to my hands by post this day. It is possible my Lords Commissioners may already have received an account of this very gallant defence by some other channel; but as I think the action, though unfortunate, does honour to the naval service and the country, I cannot refuse myself the pleasure of the communication, lest by any accident such gallantry should not be made public.—I have the honour to be, &c. Thomas Wells, Vice-Admiral.

Christiansand, June 20, 1808.

Sir,—I beg leave to acquaint you, that in his Majesty's sloop Seagull, under my command, yesterday, at two P. M. the Naze of Norway bearing W. N. W. seven or eight leagues, I discovered a brig in shore running to the Eastward, and immediately made all sail in chace of her; at half-past four came within gun-shot, and hoisted our colours, which she answered by hoisting Danish colours and opening her fire on the starboard side. At this time it became nearly calm from a fresh breeze we had at W. S. W. and obliged us to get our sweeps out in order to get between her and the shore. Active got within musket-shot of the enemy and commenced action; having now most of our sweeps shot away and great part of the rigging. Twenty minutes past five we discovered several gun-boats coming towards us, which had been concealed behind the rocks; and it being a perfect calm, they had every advantage they could wish in placing them. They took their position on each quarter, taking us every shot, whilst the brig had the same advantage on the larboard bow. At half-past six, five of our carronades were dismounted on the larboard side (the only side we could bring to bear on the enemy), and several of the officers and crew killed and wounded. Every method was used to get the Seagull round, so as to bring the starboard guns to bear, but without effect; our sweeps being all shot away, the gun-boats hulling us every shot they fired, five feet water in the hold, and all our sails and rigging cut to pieces. At half-past seven, from the sinking state of the ship, also the great slaughter made by the gun-boats, I considered it an indispensable duty for the preservation of the surviving officers and crew, to order the colours to be hauled down. I have the satisfaction to acquaint you, there was scarcely sufficient time to remove the wounded out of the Seagull, before she sunk. The force opposed to her was the Danish brig of war Lougen, mounting 20 guns, eighteen long 18-pounders, and two long 6-pounders, nine gun-boats, most of them carrying two 24 pounders, and from 50 to 70 men each. The action was fought close to the mouth of the harbour of Christiansand.

I cannot speak in terms adequate to the deserts of every officer and man under my command, on this trying occasion. I received that support from Mr. Hatton, the First Lieutenant, I had every reason to expect, from his general good conduct; and the officers and crew have my warmest thanks for their cool and steady behaviour; and I consider it a duty I owe them, to add, that never was more British valour displayed than on this occasion, although opposed to so very superior a force. The enemy must have suffered very considerably, but I have not been able to ascertain to what extent. Several of the Danes perished on board the Seagull, so precipitately did she go down. I herewith send you a list of the killed and wounded on board the said sloop.

I have the honour to be, &c.

BATTLE OF VIMIERA.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY commanding the feigned Retreat of MAJOR-GENERAL FERGUSON'S BRIGADE, by which the French Artillery was taken, and their whole Army routed and beaten, will be delineated by a MASTERLY ENGRAVING from an Eminent Artist, under the Inspection of MAJOR CAMPBELL, who brought to England the Dispatches relative to the victories in Portugal. This subject is rendered interesting by the Military Propriety of its Representation and the correctness of the Portraits, and will be worthy of preservation as an official document illustrative of the principal event in the late memorable Victory over the French in Portugal.

SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY'S PLAN OF ATTACK ON THE FRENCH TROOPS,

On the 21st ult. transmitted by a GENERAL OFFICER, beautifully engraven:—Accurate PORTRAITS of SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY and GENERAL JUNOT, exquisitely engraved from the Original Paintings, will accompany the above. These will be given in the TWENTY-SEVENTH NUMBER of LE BEAU MONDE, OR LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE, on the 1st of October, 1808; to which will be added a whole-length PORTRAIT of Mr. YOUNG, as Hamlet.—Price 2s. 6d.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Weare truly sorry that several of our Subscribers in the North should have been disappointed of receiving The National Register of Sunday last. The Papers were forwarded on Sunday morning by the accustomed conveyance. We apprehend that the person who was entrusted with the Papers, carried them beyond their destination, and on the discovery of his carelessness, neglected to take immediate measures to forward the parcels.—The necessary precautions are taken to prevent a recurrence of a similar unpardonable mistake. We entreat our Subscribers to attribute the disappointment to unforeseen accident—and not to wilful omission. We have received some complaints of other Papers having been sent to our Subscribers instead of The National Register. The error must be attributed to the persons who forward the Paper, whose names and addresses must be familiar to the complainants. To prevent such abuses, we would recommend to our Subscribers not to pay for Papers that are thus imposed upon them; and by forwarding their address to the Office of this Paper, other Newsmen shall be appointed, who will be more regular and circumspect.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The intelligence received during the course of the week, from several parts of the Continent, has been by no means so important as we had reason to expect. The reports made by the Ministers of War and Foreign Affairs to the Senate, and the letter of BONAPARTE to the same corps, spoke so decidedly of the vast preparations, and of the unabated will, to place a BONAPARTE on the Spanish throne; they contained, at the same time, so many insinuations relative to Austria, evinced so much rancour, jealousy, and dissatisfaction at the independence, energy, and military preparations of that power,—that there was reason to suppose that the next mails from Holland would have brought us some account of actual hostilities having broke out in the South of Germany. However, no such event has occurred; and all this bluster and bullying have been no more, as we insinuated in our last, than mere puffing, in order to impose on the Parisians, delude and terrify the vassal states, and excite apprehensions and dissatisfaction in the Austrian provinces.

His present conduct is so diametrically opposite to that daring and flagitious policy, which marked his former career, that some great and insurmountable difficulties must have started up, to occasion such a deviation from his usual activity and decision. What can account for this relaxation in his measures, and this uncertainty in his councils? A declaration, similar to that lately made in the Senate, was formerly the immediate harbinger of fresh and victory. Why does he then renounce a system, which was attended with uniform success? A man of his characteristic penetration would not so easily relax, for the purpose of experiment, from that decided and energetic policy, which gave him so much advantage over the wavering, irresolute councils of his enemies. We cannot extricate ourselves out of the difficulty and embarrassment, by imputing this spiritless, vacillating conduct of the Tyrant to the absence or disgrace of TALLEYRAND; for he enjoys the full benefit of the experience, resources, and genius of that vaunted statesman. He is with him in Paris; possesses his confidence; and exercises his usual influence. We cannot, therefore, employ TALLEYRAND as a Deus ex machina, to solve our doubt. Nor can we, with greater propriety or better success, impute to him conscientious scruples relative to the past, and projects of reformation for the future. Unfortunately for mankind, he is not subject to qualms of this nature; and when he abandons a project, he does not do it from any tenderness for the sufferings of millions, any respect for the sentiments of his cotemporaries, or anxiety about the atrocity or profligacy of the means; he renounces it from no other motive, but because it is not in his power to execute it.

Such is undoubtedly the man, and such are the principles which the whole tenour of his unprincipled and remorseless conduct justifies us to impute to him. Therefore, if he does not attack Austria at present, he declines the contest from apprehension of the consequences. Are the preparations of Austria so vast, so commanding, as to effect this extraordinary revolution in the politics of the Continent? Has the Cabinet of Vienna suddenly roused from its former indolence and remissness, to a sense of its late degradation, and so the resolution to wipe it away by future energy? This may be the case; we would willingly believe that its preparations are commensurate to the danger of its situation; and that the Archduke Charles is assisted by the patriotic and intelligent part of the inhabitants of the Austrian provinces, in introducing economy and a better policy into the imperial councils. In taking all these circumstances into the most candid consideration we do not find, we must confess, a full and satisfactory explanation of the change in BONAPARTE'S conduct. The more we examine it, the more reason we have to believe, that our observations relative to their main springs and influences were just; and that it is the inadequacy of his resources, military and pecuniary, which induces him to compromise with Austria.

BONAPARTE is at the same time aware of the difficulty common to every usurper, with insufficient means to sanction his usurpation, by substituting a regular Government to the anarchy and violence of the revolution. He cannot violate his own regulations in finance and property, without undermining and even overthrowing the very prop upon which his power rests. He does not dare to have recourse to the revolutionary means of forced loans, &c. nor impose too burdensome taxes. He has also little or nothing to expect from his vassals: Their own means are totally insufficient for the extraordinary exertions they are obliged to make. Holland is exhausted. The South and North of Germany have been totally ruined; and in the present crisis of his fortunes, he will be rather cautious of not driving the unfortunate victims of his treachery and ambition to absolute despair. This is undoubtedly the principal source of his difficulties. If we now cast our eyes over the chart of Europe, and look out for a single province, to which he has not given cause of detestation for the past, jealousy for the present, and fear for the future, we shall find reason to conclude, that there is not a single town in Germany, Holland, Brabant, Switzerland, and Italy, which does not anxiously wait for the moment of deliverance and vengeance. Let the inhabitants be ever so insensible, so immoral, so degraded;—let them be as indifferent about their former independence as a people, the fate of their Sovereigns, and the honour of their country, as such corruption of principle and profligacy of heart, would induce us to suppose;—allowing all this in its fullest extent, will any man be mad enough to suppose, that they are callous to their own losses and the ruin of their families. The greater the egotism of a people or of an individual, the more poignantly they feel any diminution in their means of enjoyment and gratification. Nobody will assert that we advance too much in imputing these sentiments to the people of the Continent. From such men, therefore, BONAPARTE has neither co-operation nor assistance to expect.

We were obliged to take this view of things, in order to be better able to appreciate the present state of Spain. Every day, it is manifest, that the resources of the Spanish Patriots augment. The tranquillity they enjoy in most of the Provinces, enables them to make, without hurry or confusion, the arrangements necessary for their defence. Their armies are increasing in numbers, discipline, and confidence. The several Juntas display dignity, patriotism, and great abilities in the measures they propose, and the resolutions they adopt. A central Government will give more energy to their operations. Every moment the fears of jealousy and disunion disappear; and the nation can, with wisdom and unanimity, employ all its resources in support of its independence, and to discomfit the projects of the enemy. They have now no hostile army in their rear to apprehend, and they can collect their united force for the purpose of annoying or overwhelming such of the French as are in their country. Our Readers will see, from the last accounts, that three armies, under the command of BLAKE, PALAFOX and the Marquis de CASTRANOS, who has succeeded General CASTAÑOS, amounting to 80,000 men, were on the point of uniting near Burgos. The French force in Biscay, Navarre and Old Castile, is computed at 40,000. A general engagement was expected between the two armies; and when we reflect on the courage, former success, present confidence and superior numbers of the Spaniards, we entertain the most sanguine expectations, the result will be as honourable for them, as it will be destructive to the enemy. Every account from that country justifies this confidence on our part. Repeated attempts made by a part of the French garrison of Barcelona to obtain possession of Gerona, were rendered fruitless by the heroism of its inhabitants; and they were pursued with a very great loss to the gates of Barcelona. A considerable part of our army in Portugal, to the amount, it is said, of 18,000 men, under the command of Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY, is reported to have marched towards Spain. This timely assistance, joined to the other reinforcements we are sending, must remove every apprehension which the menaces of the Tyrant may have occasioned. The situation of Italy increases his embarrassment and danger. All the Neapolitan provinces, as we expected, are in insurrection; and the last account from Palermo state, that the most active preparations were making there for the embarkation of our army under the command of Sir JOHN STUART, for the purpose of uniting the inhabitants. The expedition, under the command of Sir DAVID BAIRD, is for the same destination; and when we reflect on the outrage offered to the Pope, to the inveterate animosity the Italians always felt against the French, and the inefficacy of their means to defend Italy, we may be certain the spirit of insurrection is not confined to Naples, and that it will break out in other parts of the Peninsula, with a force equal to the injuries they have sustained.

RUSSIAN FLEET IN THE BALTIC.

A Mail from Gottenburgh arrived yesterday. It has not been found practicable, we understand, to attack the Russian squadron in Port Baltic, the Russians having fortified both sides of the harbour; but they appear to be in great consternation and confusion, have struck yards and topmasts, and moored so close to the shore, that a strong north-west wind would, it was apprehended, drive them on shore.

A private Letter from Gottenburgh states, that our Admirals obtained some fire-ships from the Swedes, and sent them into the port where the Russian ships were lying, which set fire to some magazines; the Russian Admiral offered to dismantle his ships until a peace, which our Admiral refused.

In addition to the accounts brought by the Gottenburgh Mail of yesterday, we have the pleasure of communicating the arrival of dispatches at the Admiralty from Sir JAMES SAUMAREZ. They announce the important fact, that in consequence of a successful cannonade and bombardment of the fortifications thrown up by the Russian fleet in Rogerswick or Port Baltic, which terminated in the destruction of the principal works and batteries, the Russian Admiral had sent out a flag of truce, offering to give up all his ships, on condition of their being restored at the definitive conclusion of peace. The offer was rejected, and we rejoice to learn that their unconditional capture is inevitable. How very different are our affairs conducted in the Baltic and the Tagus!

UNEXPECTED CHANGE IN PORTUGAL.

We have the satisfaction to announce the arrival in town of two Portuguese Messengers, who were on Friday landed at Bristol. They are charged with the pleasing office of communicating the determination of the Provisional Government and the people of Portugal not to accede to the disgraceful Convention of Cintra. Such was the indignation, we understand, of the people of Lisbon, on hearing the Articles of the Treaty, that they rose against their plunderers and oppressors, and massacred eight hundred of JUNOT's troops. It was not without a very great effusion of blood, that the insurrection was suppressed. It is this moment confidently reported, that Sir C. CRADOCK had signified to JUNOT his total disapproval of the Convention, and his decided resolution to oppose that part of it which related to the Russian fleet in the Tagus.

Sir William Scott, the chief English Civilian, is going to Portugal. We know not that he has any public mission, and his friends say, that he is merely taking a trip for pleasure. A visit to Portugal, where so much depends upon a construction of the Law of Nations, [illegible] learned person, who has spent a great part of his life, either in discussing, or administering that law, does, however, lead us to hope, that some enquiries are on foot relative to the general validity of the late lamentable Convention.

It is said, that orders have been dispatched by Government for the immediate recall of Sir Hew Dalrymple and Sir Harry Burrard. The army in that country will then be placed under the command of Sir J. Moore. Sir Arthur Wellesley, it is said, has marched with 18,000 men to the support of the Spanish Patriots.

The following Extract of a Letter, received by a respectable House in Liverpool, from their Correspondent in Jamaica, will doubtless be read with great satisfaction :—

" Kingston, 31*st July*, 1808.

" Ten days ago an express vessel arrived here in 22 days from Cadiz, with dispatches to this Government, and accounts of the revolution in Spain, which have already opened an intercourse between this Island and all the neighbouring Spanish Colonies of Cuba and the Main, for which immense purchases have already been made here in dry goods, for Vera Crûz, Carthagena, the Caraccas and Cuba, and which will open a very large vent for the manufactures of Manchester, in which the demand for these Colonies principally consists, viz. printed cottons, coloured velverets of all kinds, British muslins, platillas, cotton stockings, hats, &c.

" The influx of Spanish traders to this port, has, within these few days, been so great as to have drained the market."

THE COURT.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, His Majesty arrived from Windsor at the Queen's Palace, where he was received by the Dukes of York, Kent, and Cumberland. At two o'clock, His Majesty held a Private Levee, when the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty :—

Viscount Chetwynd ; and Captain Halsted, on his arrival from the Tagus.

His Majesty, afterwards, held a Privy Council, when the Judge Advocate laid before His Majesty the proceedings of several Courts Martial.

CITY.

AUCTION MART.

We have seldom been more gratified with a public exhibition, than we were on Tuesday, at the laying the first stone of the Auction Mart.

The Lord Mayor, attended by the Sheriffs and several Aldermen, the Directors, and a numerous company of Proprietors, assembled at the London Tavern, and proceeded from thence, about three o'clock, in the following order :—

Four Streetmen, to clear the way—Band of Music—Banner of the City of London—100 Labourers and Artificers, with various tools and implements—Eight Bricklayers—Foreman Bricklayer—Eight Masons—The First Stone, on which was inscribed " Auction Mart," drawn by four horses—Eight Masons—Foreman Mason—Eight Carpenters—ForemanCarpenter—The Foreman and the Clerk of the Works—The Builder, Alexander Copland, Esq.—The Architect, Mr. John Walters—The Model of the intended Building, borne on the shoulders of Artificers—City Marshal, on horseback,—The Proprietors—The Secretary—The Twelve Directors—The Lord Mayor—Aldermen—Sheriffs—Constables.

When the procession arrived on the ground, it was greeted with the acclamations of the surrounding multitude, and subsequently by an assemblage of several hundred ladies, for whose accommodation seats had been prepared on the scite of the building. Mr. Shuttleworth, the projector, next advanced, and deposited coins of every description that had been issued during the present reign, with medals of distinguished Senators, and Naval and Military heroes. The Lord Mayor was now presented with the silver trowel, and, at the same moment, the stone, weighing three tons, was slowly lowered, the band striking up " God save the King." After the ceremony was concluded, the ladies partook of a cold collation, and the rest of the company proceeded to dine at the London Tavern, where every delicacy of the season was provided. The Lord Mayor, in the Chair, was supported to the right and left by the County and City Members, the Aldermen and the Directors.

A Court of Aldermen was summoned to meet at Guildhall on Tuesday; but a sufficient number of Aldermen not attending to constitute a Court, the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be raised two assizes, or 4d. in the peck loaf, which took place on Thursday. The quartern loaf wheaten is now sold for 1s. 2½d. and household 1s. 1d.

Wednesday, the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and other City Officers, went in state to Christ Church, Newgate-street, where an Annual Sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Gilly. After which they heard two of the oldest scholars of that excellent seminary deliver orations, the one in Latin by Mr. T. Dell, and the other in English by Mr. J. Gilly.

Thursday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, which was numerously attended. Several petitions and reports were presented to the Court and read, and referred to Committees to carry into execution. After which, Mr. Waithman gave notice of the following motion, which he intended to move at the next Court :—

" That an humble and dutiful Address and Petition be presented to his Majesty, expressing their grief and astonishment at the extraordinary and disgraceful Convention lately entered into by the Commanders of his Majesty's Forces in Portugal, and the Commander of the French Army at Lisbon, praying his Majesty to institute such an enquiry into this dishonourable and unprecedented transaction, as will lead to the discovery and punishment of those, by whose misconduct and incapacity the cause of this Country and its Allies have been so shamefully sacrificed."

A General Court of Proprietors was held on Thursday at the Bank of England. The Governor read a recommendation of the Court of Directors, that the half year's dividend should be five per cent. the same as for the last half year. Agreed to, after a few observations from Mr. Jackson.

THE THEATRE.

DRURY LANE.

On Tuesday last a young lady made her debut at this Theatre in the character of Ophelia. The bills informed us she had never appeared on any stage, and her agitation and timidity proved that for once they had told the truth. She possesses a very handsome countenance, and the modesty of her looks, predisposed every heart in her favour. The exertions she made to conquer her fears were encouraged by the redoubled plaudits of a kind audience, and at last successful. She spoke all her speeches with feeling and judgment, and in her mad scenes the plaintiveness of her tones, and the sweetness with which she sang her wild ditties, and the unaffected simplicity of her acting, were truly delightful. Her voice is very pleasing though not very powerful, and her taste seems correct. Her gestures were now and then rendered stiff and awkward, evidently by the fearful anxiety of her mind. But we have no doubt that the gratifying reception with which she has met, not a single voice having been raised against her, will enable her, when she next appears, to triumph entirely over apprehension, and display her powers to the greatest advantages. Elliston during the two first acts was less spirited than usual, and seized every opportunity of spoiling the harmony of the metre by shortening " that " is" into one syllable, and lengthening monosyllables into two. In the concluding acts his fire rekindled itself, and in the last scene he attacked the King with so much impetuosity and fury that he hurled poor Mr. Powell headlong down from his throne upon the steps that led to it. Mrs. Powell is grown thinner, but looked better than we ever saw her. Mr. Putnam raised the part of Laertes above its usual insignificance. This actor possesses talents which he might improve with application and study so as to fill higher characters in the Drama than he at present does.

On Thursday, Mr. Scriven, from the Theatre Royal Edinburgh, made also his debut on the boards of Drury Lane, in the part of Hodge, in the Opera of Love in a Village. Unlike the lady whom we have already mentioned, and persuaded that " Audaces Fortuna juvat," he determined to carry the night by impudence. With a brazen countenance he met the first glance of the public, astonished them by the ease and consciousness of success which he displayed and actually imposed upon their judgment. Though far inferior to our best comic performers at this moment, he is also endowed with talents which are capable of great improvement. Being probably accustomed to play in a smaller house, he evidently fancied that the size of Drury Lane required louder vociferations and an increased vehemence of action. But here his judgment partly forsook him : for though sounds weakened by extension might be lost in the mag-middle of the house, he, being the permanent focus of vision, could not experience the same fate, and the smallest motion of his features would be as clearly descried as their useless contortions. Mr. Scriven's countenance is not bad, but, like Munden's, it is become so moveable, through his indulging in constant grimace, or caricature, that, like a barometer in an April morn, it continually varies, expressing all the passions in a rapid succession. His voice, which now and then imitates Emery's rustic simplicity of tone, generally bursts with a vulgar degree of loudness at the beginning of a sentence, like Grimaldi's in the few words which he introduces in pantomimes, and then sinks away in an abrupt and unpleasant manner. Thus in his songs the two first words of every line were always bawled out, and formed a striking but tiresome contrast with the conclusion of it. Mr. Scriven ought to listen to Hamlet's instructions to the players, and he would then saw the air less furiously with his arms, scratch his head less frequently, and dance, skip about the stage and make faces more moderately. Such as he is, he was well received, and as he possesses some humour, great ease, and much spirit, and his faults proceed from overacting his part, instead of being unable to come up to it, he has only to prune off a few luxuriances to meet with our, as he has done with the public, approbation.

Miss Lyon sang delightfully. The improvements of this young, handsome, and pleasing actress, in taste, extent of voice, and execution, become every day more striking. Mr. Dowton was inimitable in his scene with her in the garden; and in that with Johnstone in which his embarrassment, mixed with anger, at his neighbour's intrusion, melts at last into returning good humour, gave us more satisfaction than any piece of comic acting that we had witnessed for a long time. Mrs. Sparks did not disgrace Mrs. Pope's old character, and Mrs. Bland and Mrs. Mathews proved that the soul of harmony was not confined to the former lady, but could also inspire their tongue.

Last night Mrs. Jordan made her first appearance this season, as usual, in The Country Girl. Her shape has somewhat improved, for she has lost both in size and weight; and on this account, as Ladies are generally fond of acting in opposition to the opinion of others, though she continues to wear the breeches, she has chosen them wider than formerly. Her spirit is not damped by years; Nature, and even YOUTHFUL Nature, still finds a faithful representative in her; and her ease and airy lightness still impose on our sight, and make us forget the woman of fifty in The Country Girl.

The Opera House, in the Haymarket, is to be opened, tomorrow, and the first performances of the Covent Garden Company there, are to be the Tragedy of Douglas, and the opera of Rosina. Thus the public will not be long deprived of the benefit which they have been accustomed to receive from the exercise of the high talents Covent Garden Theatre possessed in every department of the Drama. We trust, however, that the Proprietors, whose loss has been so great, and who, in entering on this arrangement, must incur a very heavy expence, will be amply repaid for the zeal with which they consult the gratification of the Public; but there are circumstances connected with the King's Theatre, which we are afraid may tend to obstruct that reward which is justly due to their exertions. The most material of those circumstances, perhaps, is the state of property, which exists in the Boxes. We believe there are not less than 60 Boxes, which are private property, each of which can contain six persons, and to which the owners have the right of introducing that number every night the House is open. There are also two hundred Silver Tickets, to which an equal right of admission is attached. If the persons possessing this description of property exercise their rights, the receipts of the house must of necessity be so small, that, even with a crowded audience, the expences of the performance will not be paid.

In consequence of the severe loss sustained by the proprietors of Covent-Garden, it is reported that they intend to raise the price of admission. We will not pretend how far this will be conducive to their advantage; but if a case ever existed, when such an augmentation was excusable, it is the present. The great expences that will be occasioned by the purchase of new scenery and decorations, must be severely felt by the proprietors in their present situation. We are by no means sorry they make this appeal to the generosity and liberality of the public. A Morning Paper, as remarkable for its overweening interference and dictatorial tone, as its illiberal hostility to some of the Members of that Theatre, has laid hold on this circumstance, to make some observations on the salaries received by Mr. Kemble and Mrs. Siddons. We really see no cause, on the present occasion, for this unmerited attack on two such distinguished Performers, whose talents do as much honour to their country, as their private life is respectable. There is something truly unbecoming and repulsive to see the Press made the channel for the gratification of private malice, and the persecution of superior merit.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. VII.

In language plain,
And plain in manner; decent, solemn, chaste,
And natural in gesture; much impressed
Himself, as conscious of his awful charge,
And anxious mainly that the flock he feeds
May feel it too; affectionate in look,
And tender in address, as well becomes
A messenger of grace to guilty men.——Cowper.

REV. WILLIAM PARSONS,

OF LEEDS, IN YORKSHIRE.

OF those practices implicitly adopted in compliance with the opinion of the multitude, there is none more conspicuously predominant than what is called "going out of town." During certain weeks, if not months, this metropolis seems deserted by its leading inhabitants. Talk of the fanaticism of the vulgar, it is nothing when compared with the frenzy of fashion! This extends even to the pulpit.—"The Rev. John Moore and Sidney Smith, where are they?" "In the country, I believe, Sir." "The Rev. Mr. Haslewood, does he preach here to-day?" "No; he is, at present, out of town." What of the Rev. Rowland Hill, and of ——; and of ——? why, these also disdain now to sojourn in the smoke and stir of London. Thus great men absent themselves as they please, while inferior mortals are compelled to submit to the terrible privation.

Evangelical teachers, it must however be confessed, manage this matter infinitely better than the established clergy. While the latter act as if they admitted, that

"all Shepherds are alike
"To wandering Sheep, resolv'd to follow none;"

and while these, accordingly, leave the discharge of their pastoral duties to anybody or nobody; the former, on the contrary, evince something like suitable respect for the feelings of their flocks. If Mr. Hill is in Gloucestershire, or in Dublin, Mr. Jay is in Blackfriars Road: while Mr. Jones occupies its pulpit, Spa-Fields Chapel is not abandoned; nor can Tottenham-Court reasonably lament the absence of Mr. Hyatt, when it is Mr. Parsons who officiates in his stead. So essential is the distinction between supplying and substitution.

Tottenham-Court-Road Chapel, and the Tabernacle of Moorfields,—what recollections do these sanctuaries excite, what reflections do they provoke! No longer wanderers in the wilderness of this world, religious Itinerants are become regular Theologians; they have arrived in the promised land, flowing, comparatively at least, with milk and honey! George Whitfield declaimed in fields, John Wesley discoursed in barns, and both appealed to the outcasts of civilised society; but their successors lean on comfortable cushions, and address themselves to ambitious audiences, in commodious, sometimes elegant, conventicles. All seems metamorphosed. Nothing is wanting, to complete the change, but decent deaneries, proud prebendaries, and magnificent mitres!

These observations are natural, and, when impartially considered, they will be found perfectly excusable. It has long been customary to complain of religious establishments, as incompatible with the primitive simplicity of christianity, without remarking the natural course of human institutions. Nothing among men is long stationary; it is either retrograde, or progressive. Just as reasonably might we require the present followers of Whitfield and Wesley to demolish their numerous chapels, and assemble in fields, or on commons, or in barns, as to demand of the Church of England the relinquishment of those advantages with which time and circumstances have invested her.—Either way the proposal would be preposterous. If it is unbecoming churchmen to wage petty warfare against methodism, it therefore peculiarly behoves methodists not lastily to condemn the constitution of the national church. This topic may hereafter call for amplification; it has many bearings; it is of considerable moment, as applying to the case between sectaries and the establishment; but it has not, as far as I know, experienced particular attention,—it certainly has not undergone serious and deep investigation.

The Rev. WILLIAM PARSONS, of whom I am now to give some account, was educated in Yorkshire, and has long been Minister of a Meeting at Leeds, where his preaching is respectably, and very numerously, attended. His literary attainments are highly creditable. He was one of those who successively edited the works of Watts, and of Doddridge; and he has constantly contributed to the pages of the Evangelical Magazine. He is now temporarily in London.

Mr. Parsons was always classed among those who, in the religious world, stand distinguished as Gospel Ministers. His views of the christian system, however, have become evidently matured; an improvement that he owes, I believe, to personal sufferings. He may truly exclaim, with the royal penitent, "it is good for me that I have been afflicted!" Those therefore who differ from him on particular points, will, if they feel rightly on such subjects, dissent from him with diffidence; and, while they endeavour fairly to estimate his exertions, they must unequivocally respect his integrity.

The errors of extemporary sermonising, I have formerly had occasion to notice; but, perhaps, there exists not a finer exemplification of its advantages than in the preacher who is under consideration. His personal appearance is highly respectable and interesting, his manner is varied and impressive, his voice equable and full, his enunciation distinct, and his action emphatic. His illustrations are useful, because they are familiar; his exhortations are appropriate, as well as forcible; and he particularly excels in one of the most essential, but too much neglected, qualifications of the christian teacher—the important business of applying every thing to the hearts of hearers. There are few preachers who, like Mr. Parsons, may be said to command the pulpit.

Modern pulpits are not favourable to eloquence. They are almost uniformly constructed without sounding-boards, which had something imposing; and they are generally too circumscribed in their circumferance. While the person of the preacher is thus divested of considerable adventitious dignity, his action, if he disdains to be ridiculous, is fettered down to mere mechanical movements. Tottenham-Court pulpit, however, is tolerably roomy; a convenience of which Mr. Parsons, who is really oratorical, fully avails himself, with the best possible effect.

Every thing is susceptible of extremes. Much as I find to commend in Mr. Parsons, both as to his matter and manner, I can also perceive his defects, which strike more forcibly as contrasted with his excellences. He turns too completely round in his pulpit, and too frequently; while he is praying, he accustoms himself to a disagreeable inclination, or shaking, of his head; and his action is not always perfectly chaste. He deals too much in amplification. His divisions are too numerous, and he passes too long between them. As his matter would gain strength by condensation, so his method would acquire efficiency by simplification. His language, though on the whole commendable, has many inelegancies, and is sometimes chargeable with vulgarisms. He seems addicted to the pathetic, in which he does not excel.

His doctrines are strongly evangelical. I am far from wishing to see a race of pulpit moralists, I would, to the utmost of my ability, discourage the preaching of mere essay-sermons; but, I think, there is now cause enough to remonstrate against the opposite extreme in divinity. "Shew me thy works by thy faith," and not "Shew me thy faith by thy works," is becoming too much the test of religious experience. Let us, however, rather adopt the lines so much valued, in his dying days, by the late Rev. Mr. Knight; exclaiming, with him,—

> It is enough, that I believe
> Heaven's brighter than I can conceive;
> And he that makes it all his care
> To serve God here, shall see him there!

Let gospel ministers, when they inculcate the vital doctrines of grace, constantly advert to those who, after professing "faith and a good conscience, having put away" the latter, "concerning faith have made a shipwreck!" While men are exhorted, as christians, to live careless of the concerns of time and confident of the consolations of eternity, let them be warned to use the advantages of both so as not to abuse them;—to "Do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God."

ONESIMUS.

 What does a Querist aim at? If he be serious, the enquiry is scarcely worth instituting; if he designed to be ironical, his laugh has been joined in by those who have seen his letter.

Another Correspondent thinks it inaccurate to have described Mr. Worthington as an "adversary" to the Church of England. What, however, did ONESIMUS say?—Why, that he [Mr. W.] was "an honourable adversary;" and then he expresses no mean wish, that he could have met him within the pale of the Establishment. Mr. W. be it again observed, is thoroughly a Dissenter, and, as such, he must stand opposed to our National Church. Well, then: let him be called an opponent, instead of adversary. The thing is not worth serious altercation.

ONESIMUS, his readers may rest assured, is bigotted towards no denomination of the religious world. He is not without his private opinions, and, perhaps, prejudices; but these have never prevented him from perceiving the perfections of those with whom he differs in persuasion, or blinded him to the faults of those with whom he otherwise happens to coincide. His aim is truth, his admiration is for merit and ability, and his strictures are intended to promote the best interests of society. Time must determine the effects of his exertions.

THE LATE DREADFUL FIRE.

The destruction of Covent Garden Theatre by fire is, we are sorry to state, to be added to the number of conflagrations of edifices dedicated to dramatic representations, which have occurred in the course of the last twenty-five years. About four o'clock on Tuesday morning, this extensive building was discovered to be in flames; and so fierce and rapid was the fire, that no exertion could stop its course. Within less than three hours after its commencement, the whole of the interior of the Theatre was destroyed: nearly the whole of the scenery, wardrobe, musical and dramatic libraries, and properties of all kinds, were a heap of smoking ruins. All the books and papers relative to the concerns of the Theatre, as well as the produce of the preceding night's performance, were preserved. A considerable number of engines promptly attended, but there was a shameful want of water for some time. It was upwards of an hour before some of the engines could be supplied. They afterwards played with the utmost possible effect for upwards of an hour, when the roof of the Theatre fell in with a dreadful crash, and thus announced the destruction of the interior of this elegant building. The fire raged with most violence on the upper end of Bow-street. In Hart-street the flames communicated to the houses on the opposite side of the street from the Theatre, and four of them caught fire at the same moment; but by the great activity of the people and firemen, they suffered little more damage than a severe scorching. Great apprehensions were entertained for the safety of Drury-lane Theatre, as the flakes of fire were carried on by the wind with force and in great quantities in that direction. A great number of people mounted the roof, ready in case of actual fire, to open the large cistern of water provided there. They also stopped the windows with wet cloths, to prevent the entrance of the flames, and thus secured the Theatre. All the people in the neighbourhood took a similar precaution, and were employed with their servants in picking up the flakes of fire as they fell upon the roofs or in the yards. The Theatre is totally consumed, and on the Hart-street side, not even the walls are standing. The Ship Tavern, and part of Mr. Brandon's, the box-keeper's, office, are all that remain at that angle.

The most painful part of this dreadful event remains to be described. At an early stage of the fire, a party of firemen broke open the great door under the Piazza, on the western side, and having introduced an engine into the passages in the interior, they directed it towards the galleries, where the fire appeared to burn most fiercely, when, melancholy to relate, part of the building fell in, and buried them, with several others who had rushed in along with them, in the ruins. It was a considerable time before the rubbish, which now blocked up the door, could be cleared away. When it was effected, a miserable spectacle presented itself. The mangled bodies of dead and dying appearing through the rubbish, or discovered in each advance to remove it. It is generally believed that there are not short of forty wounded. A party of ruffians, taking advantage of the general consternation and distress, began to plunder; but eight of them were apprehended and lodged in Covent Garden watch-house. A gang of pickpockets also committed great depredations.

Respecting the cause of the fire little has transpired. According to some accounts, it first broke out in one of the Scene-rooms, adjacent to Hart-street, and from thence instantly communicated to the stage. Others represent it as having originated in the shilling gallery, where there had been much riot and confusion the preceding night.

The value of the property saved is very inconsiderable. About forty or fifty pieces of painted trumpery were seen lying on the pavement under the Piazzas, and consisted of the stars and banners of the mock Spanish and Peruvian processions which had amused the town with mimic show a few hours only before this real, this awful, tragedy commenced. In melancholy contrast to objects like these, porters were employed, bearing out, one after another, the mutilated remains of the ill-fated individuals who fell sacrifices to the destructive element, in the assiduous discharge of their duty.

The St. James's, St. Clement's, Bloomsbury, St. Andrew's, and other Volunteer Corps, speedily attended; likewise several spirited young men, as constables, who prevented depredations from being committed on the effects of the sufferers. These towards the middle of the day were relieved by strong detachments from the Life and Foot Guards.

CORONER'S INQUESTS.

Wednesday, A. Gell, Esq. Coroner for Middlesex, held an Inquest at the Britannia Wine Vaults, under the Piazza, Covent Garden, on a view of twelve bodies dug out of the ruins of Covent Garden Theatre. After the Jury had been sworn, they proceeded to York-street, Covent Garden, to examine the body of R. Davis, which lay at the house of a tradesman. They then went to the Bone-house of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, where the other bodies had been carried.

The bodies exhibited a shocking spectacle; many were burnt black, others had their flesh scorched off, and one appeared in a situation too horrid to describe.

The first witness examined was Wm. Addicott, one of the stage-carpenters of the Theatre.—He stated that he left the Theatre, about half past 11 o'clock and went home. About four o'clock on Tuesday morning, Mr. Carnichael, a baker, rung at his bell and informed him that the Theatre was on fire. He immediately got up and hastened to the Theatre, which he found in a compleat blaze. Shortly after several engines arrived, and but few persons were collected on the spot. It was found impracticable to work the engine belonging to the Theatre at first. The Treasury door and the Piazza door were broke open, and one of the Phœnix fire engines was run up the passage, just within side the Pizza door, where there was a large reservoir of water; upwards of twelve persons were working the engine, and just beyond them, further up the passage, were several of the firemen; seeing that the room called the Apollo room, and the inside of the audience part of the Theatre was on fire, and likely to fall in, the witness advised the men of their danger, observing, they must inevitably be burnt, as the fire was rapidly approaching the Garden.—Upon which the fireman told the Witness "to mind his own business." To avoid the danger the Witness instantly left the place and went round to the Bow-street door; from what he had since understood, the fire, as it was supposed, began about the centre of the house. He afterwards was told several men had been killed by the falling of the timbers, which happened shortly after he quitted the Piazza door. This Witness stated, that there was a watchman regularly appointed to watch the interior of the Theatre, but when the alarm was first given, the people could not make him hear, and it was imagined he must have fallen asleep; he however afterwards escaped.

William Darby, one of the firemen in the employ of the Eagle Insurance Office, was present when the unfortunate persons were taken out of the fire. When he first arrived at the Theatre, the engine worked at Bow-street side of the House. This was about six o'clock.—Afterwards, on coming round to the Piazza side, he heard the crash of a wall falling, this was near eight o'clock; he immediately ran up to the door, which leads to the boxes; the outer great doors were half closed; he assisted in clearing away the heavy wood which had fallen on the engine, and buried both it and the persons working it in burning ruins. Water from buckets was thrown upon the ruins; they then set about digging for the dead bodies, and half an hour elapsed before they could get at them; the first they drew out was a man in his shirt; in another quarter, however, they succeeded in getting out two more bodies, and then drew out the engine, when they saw Kilby the fireman, laying alongside the engine, and then one after another drew out, in the whole, nine dead bodies, when the Witness, from fatigue, was obliged to quit the place. He understood that some more were afterwards taken out.

Here one of the Jurymen related, that he had witnessed the shocking spectacle which occurred when the cieling fell in. One man, dreadfully scorched, made his way from under the ruins, shaking his head with agony, and at the instant he appeared covered with fire, one of the firemen emptied a bucket of water over him, to alleviate his torment. Another unfortunate sufferer rushed out with his arm nearly burnt off, and impelled by pain, he rubbed the flesh from the bones, which appeared quite bare. These men were conveyed to the Hospital; one of them was a fireman who died on Tuesday evening.

A Gentleman on the Jury, at this part of the investigation, said a report had gone abroad of a quantity of gunpowder having exploded where the lives where lost; he thought this circumstance ought to be the subject of enquiry, because, if the report was unfounded, it was necessary the Proprietors of the Theatre should be released from the charge of imprudently keeping a quantity of gunpowder in a dangerous situation. The Coroner remarked, that it was not the business of the inquest to enquire into every flying report; the Jury met to discover how the deceased persons came by their death. The stage-carpenter, Addicott, was however again called to speak to the question.

Addicott stated, that the story of the explosion of gunpowder was unfounded. More than one pound of gunpowder had seldom been kept in the Theatre, and none had been put in that part of the house where the men were killed. Witness could say positively that there was not three pounds of powder in the house when the fire happened, and the place for keeping it was in that part of the house next Hart-street. The room over the passage from the Piazza, called the Apollo room was in flames when the men first went in with the engine. Witness saw it burning, and when the cieling of this room fell in, the floor instantly gave way and buried the firemen and others underneath in the ruins. The party wall did not fall until some time after the men were killed. In answer to a question, whether the report that several persons belonging to the Theatre were missing, and supposed to have suffered in the fire, was true, witness said such a report was not correct. He did not know that any person belonging to the house had been killed. He described the damage done in Bow-street to be very extensive. He saw the portico fall, and the walls, but did not hear that any person had been hurt in consequence. The fire had destroyed several houses from the entrance to the Pitt in Bow-street, viz. the Strugglers' Coffee-house, kept by Mr. Dunn; Johnson's, fruiterer; Super's, carpenter; Mr. M'Kinlay's, bookbinder, and other houses in Bow-street. With respect to the cause of the fire, he could give no information. The Theatre had been examined by a watchman, who was employed to go round every night. When the alarm of fire prevailed, the people without knocked several times before they could make the watchman hear, and witness supposed he was asleep; he did not, however, take upon him to say that the watchman was negligent. Three pistols had been fired in Pizarro; one of them was discharged across the stage, and the others in a direction which could not do any injury. He did not, therefore, conceive that the fire could have been occasioned by that circumstance. The Coroner observed, the Proprietors of the Theatre were the proper persons to enquire whether the fire had been occasioned by the negligence of their servants; the Jury had no concern in that question. From the evidence, there could not be any doubt that the unfortunate persons who had suffered had come by their death in consequence of the falling of that part of the Theatre called the Apollo room, and if the Jury should be of that opinion they would return their verdict accidental death.

The Jury, upon the whole of the evidence, returned a verdict, that the following persons, viz.—R. Cadger, J. Holmes, . Hunt, W. Jones, J. Evans, J. Crabb, T. Mead, W. Wrigglesworth, J. Kirby, Thomas James, —Rushton, and another name unknown, in all twelve persons, were killed "Accidentally by the falling of the Apollo-room, at Covent Garden Theatre."

An Inquest was on Wednesday evening held upon the bodies f John Sayers and John Beaumont, of the Phœnix Office, the atter of whom died on Wednesday morning; and Robert lewett, a glazier, belonging to the Theatre. These three odies were at Bartholomew's Hospital.—Inquests were also eld at the other hospitals and places to which the other dead odies were carried. The evidence was the same as that adduced before the Coroner of Westminster. The three men beonging to the Phœnix, who were sent to St. Thomas's Hospital, are in a fair way of recovery.

Of the mangled persons sent to the Hospitals, the following xpired in the course of the day: Richard Bird, coachmaker; ohn Sayers, Engineer of the Phœnix engine; Mr. Harris, ptician, a young man, about 20, and a member of the Bloomsury Volunteer Corps; and Mr. James, an Attorney; he had nly arrived in town, from Wales, about a week ago, and odged at the house of Mr. Watkins, tailor, York-street, ovent-garden. Amongst those in a dangerous sate at the hositals, are Peter Fish, fireman of the Phœnix office. A man ought into the Piazza Coffee-house, with his arm burnt, was such agony, that, mad with pain, he tore the flesh down to e wrist. He was sent to Bartholomew's Hospital in a most eplorable state.

The Coroners for London and Middlesex have sat on 17 odies, killed at the late fire, viz.—twelve at Covent Garden, ree at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and two at the Middlesex Hospital. Two persons are now in a dangerous state at t. Bartholomew's, and one at the Middlesex Hospital, amounting in all to twenty. Others have been carried to their houses, at it is not yet known exactly how many lives have been lost.

The men of the Phœnix Office were the principal sufferers. In their arrival with their engine at the great door under the Piazza, they were met by Mr. Kemble, who had arrived at a early hour; they were humanely apprized by him, though really interested in the success of their exertions, of the great anger of entering at that door. He told them that the rooms f the Shakspeare, immediately adjoining, were used as a arehouse to the Theatre, and were filled with powder, oil, nd other very inflammable matter, and entreated them not to un any risk. These brave and bold fellows answered—"Where anger is, there is our duty!" and rushed forward. Mr. onston, a comedian of inferior order, rushed in along with hem, and shared their fate.

Notwithstanding the number of unfortunate persons, whose odies were discovered and dug from the ruins on the morning of he fire, and those who were extricated alive, but have since ied, it is to be feared the total extent of the casualities have ot yet been even nearly ascertained; and many bodies are still upposed to remain buried under the ruins, for the extrication f which, at the instance of the friends of the persons missing, a umber of labourers are constantly employed.

Friday, the mutilated remains, or, indeed, rather the skeleons, of two unfortunate persons were dug from the ruins, and aken to Covent Garden bone-house to be owned; but the iserable change they have undergone has so far destroyed all estige of former likeness, that it is almost impossible they can e recognized by their friends.

The money in the Treasury, as well as all the documents especting the Theatre, were preserved by the alacrity of Mr. Hughes, whose infirmities were wholly lost in his zeal to save he property. He loaded a trusty female servant with the money in two bags, and sent her, without any dress but her etticoat, to Mr. Boyce, a tax-gatherer, in York-street. On er arrival at Mr. Boyce's, however, and knocking at the oor, the servant seeing such a figure at such an hour, refused dmittance, supposing her a mad woman. The poor woman, hus excluded, and fearing to inform the passengers of the reasure, sat down upon the bags at the steps of the door, and here remained until the return of Mr. Hughes, who had oriinally escorted her to the door.

One of the greatest losses, in respect to property, occasioned y the fatal event at Covent Garden Theatre, because it is of n irreparable nature, is that of the manuscript music. There ere original scores of Handel, Arne, and other celebrated omposers, that were never printed, and of which there are no opies extant. Those of Handel, in particular, were composed for the Theatre in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and came as heir-looms to the Proprietors of the original patent.

Handel's celebrated organ, supposed to be worth 1000 guineas, and which that celebrated composer gave by his will to Covent Garden Theatre, and was only heard in the Oratories, is completely destroyed.

Among other losses, the Society which held their meetings at the top of the Theatre, called the Beef-steak Club, which has existed for many years, have lost their old stock of wines, worth at least 1500*l.* besides their sideboard and table implements. In the Saloon a loss has been sustained to the amount of 200*l.* expended in wines, liquors, and refreshments, for the frequenters of the Theatre, not a single article of which was either saved or insured. All the performers have shared in the calamity; and, according to the usage of the Theatre, their salaries cease until their performances can be resumed. By this catastrophe upwards of 200 other persons, with their families, consisting of artificers, door-keepers, and other inferior servants, employed about the Theatre, are thrown out of bread. The event may therefore be said to have spread distress through the neighbourhood, and consigned many industrious families to actual want. We are happy to find that a subscription for the relief of the sufferers has been opened by Mr. Wright, and other respectable Bankers.

Nothing has yet been discovered that will account for the origin of the dreadful fire which has produced the destruction of Covent Garden Theatre; but one circumstance ought to be mentioned, as it may afford some clue to inquiry. It was observed by the performers in the Little Green-room, during the whole of the evening, that a remarkable degree of heat prevailed, insomuch that many of them were actually obliged to quit the place. This peculiar heat was obviously not the effect of any unusual concourse of people in the room, and therefore the cause of it requires investigation.

Respecting the insurance of the Theatre, we are enabled to state, that as to the Theatre itself there is an insurance of 25,000*l.* in the Sun Office, one of 15,000*l.* in the Phœnix, and two of 5000*l.* each in the Royal Union and Exchange: besides these, there is an insurance in the Phœnix of 8,000*l.* on the Shakspeare Tavern, and the theatrical property therein deposited. These different sums make a total of 58,000*l.* It is, likewise, calculated that, independent of the saving of the books, &c. &c. and other matters, the proportion of savings from the Shakspeare premises amounts to near one-half of the 8000*l.* thereon insured.

It appears from the best of information that can be obtained, that the Proprietors of Covent Garden Theatre must be losers to the amount of 70 or 80,000 pounds.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY.

TO THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE CANNING, &c. &c.

Sir,

THE grief, astonishment, and indignation manifested by the public, when the Convention of Cintra was known, afford unequivocal proofs that the folly or baseness of the transaction is not to be sought in the national character, but rests solely on the persons who had the infamy to sign it. This is our consolation at this unexpected disappointment and disgrace; and if we feel a degree of distress, bordering on despondency, in consequence of the unfavourable impression it will produce in Spain, at the effect it may have to discourage Austria, and to rivet the chains of the rest of the continent; our pain is mitigated by the reflection, that the account of the horror it excited among every description of Englishmen, will save the nation from an imputation of blame, and confine to the worthless authors the reproaches and execrations of mankind. This important circumstance cannot have escaped your penetration and judgment; and it must afford you, in common with every honest and enlightened member of the cabinet, a degree of pleasure proportionate to the mortification it occasioned, that this loud expression of popular disapprobation will tend to weaken the pernicious effects of this ignominious compromise. Some injudicious persons, friends to the parties implicated, have the imprudence to speak of severity and injustice; and in their officiousness to screen a relative, are perfectly indifferent to the honour or interests of their country. They appear to be ignorant that the very circumstance, of which they so overweeningly complain, holds out the only chance of impunity to the accused; and had the public been silent and indifferent, government would have been compelled to sacrifice the commanders, in order to save the national honour. There was no alternative left; and the honest, unadulterated feelings of a British public have saved us, in the present dilemma, from one of those sanguinary scenes, which despotic governments are forced to resort to, in case of disaster or disgrace.

However, Sir, we are far from insinuating, that men, who were callous enough to dishonour, as far as lay in their power, both the army and country, should return back with triumphant security, and, in the enjoyment of affluence and rank, laugh at the insulted feelings of their fellow-citizens. The country has its eyes invariably fixed upon you; and from your integrity, and the preponderance of your talents, it expects that the influence of a powerful family will not be suffered to set the whole community at defiance. This disgraceful transaction, mortifying as it must be to your feelings, has placed you in the most honourable light, in which a statesman or patriot can appear: whilst every tongue loaded the persons implicated with execrations, the sentiment was as unanimous that you would never consent that they should escape without the forms of a trial. We are far from imagining this confidence in your patriotism and honour ill-placed; on the contrary, we looked ardently forward from the very beginning to an effective interference on your part.

Whatever event has taken place latterly in Portugal to modify the disgraceful tendency of the Convention, the principle remains blameable, and calls for the strictest investigation. If a returning sense of shame, the indignant remonstrances of our plundered allies, and the murmurs of our brave army, have prevented a full execution of the articles as far as they regarded the property of the Portuguese, it is nevertheless indispensably necessary to convince Europe that the British nation and government are not insensible to the misconduct of their officers. This deference to the feelings of mankind, in the present unprecedented crisis, when the sublimest examples of zeal and rectitude are almost insufficient to ward off the danger which menaces us in common with other States, will be expected from a nation which is the last support of freedom and right. It is not the escape of fifteen or twenty thousand Frenchmen, or the return of the Russian sailors that we complain of; but it is the danger of the example, and the fatal sanction it may give to national and military relaxation. No half measures, no partial investigation will be sufficient to ward off this evil; but if a recurrence of the dangerous precedent is to be avoided, a severe, but salutary, example must be given, and the fortunes of Europe not be endangered from a respect for persons, or mistaken notions of humanity.

When an individual suffers through the negligence or treachery of another, whilst we commiserate his distress, we cannot avoid mingling with our pity, some indignation at his credulity, and some disgust at his want of discernment. But when a community, consisting of seventeen millions, whose prosperity happens, at the same time, to be indissolubly connected with that of a large portion of the human race, is exposed to disaster or disgrace by the incompetency of one or two individuals, we feel, together with the former sensations, something like humiliation, that the happiness of so many should depend on causes so comparatively trivial. This reflection is undoubtedly the most discouraging check to individual exertion and to national self-love. We begin to be sensible of the weakness and inefficacy of the best civil institutions and political arrangements. Every wish to employ our resources to their full extent is restrained by the consideration, how insignificant a circumstance may frustrate the best-concerted project.—A plausible pretext is thus afforded to the suggestions of egotism and ease.—Individuals grow selfish and indifferent; and the community sinks at last into weakness and inaction.

This was the secret of the vigilance and anxiety manifested by ancient Governments in the choice of their servants; and even the slightest mistake, in conformity to these principles, was punished with unrelenting severity. These inexorable Patriots could not comprehend how incompetency could be a plea for dishonour. They pardoned a defeat; they even thanked the defeated General for his confidence in himself and his fellow-citizens; but the slightest concession to the enemy, the most trivial sacrifice of the national honour was punished with death. With such sentiments every community is invincible; and had Sir Hew Dalrymple and Sir Arthur Wellesley lost the whole of the English army in Portugal, half the horror would not have been felt, nor the consequences been so disastrous as we have cause to apprehend from this unpardonable Convention.

These are the motives, Sir, which induce us to continue these distressing reflections. It is not the present moment, portentous as it is, which terrifies us; but it is for the future we tremble. Examples may accumulate; and the traitor and coward will find hereafter a justification for his conduct, in the example of a distinguished officer. When we reflect on the immense stake we have at present on the Continent, which the slightest mistake, or want of honour, might deprive us of for ever;—when we consider at the same time the abilities and vigilance of the enemy, we cannot avoid recommending measures of precaution proportionate to the exigency. Who stood so high in the esteem of the army and public, as Sir Arthur Wellesley? and nevertheless he allowed himself to be imposed on, to use even the language of his defenders, in the most notorious and scandalous manner we have ever read of in modern times. We will not here go through the nauseous recapitulation of proofs; they are unfortunately too flagrant; and whether he acted in obedience to the orders of another, or from self-suggestion, his Convention of Cintra will be long cited as one of the most unaccountable and indefensible acts in our history.

Let us now, Sir, direct your attention to the impression it will produce on the Continent, to the dissatisfaction, we are afraid, contempt, it may excite in the breasts of the Spaniards, and to the misrepresentations and invectives it will furnish the enemy. The more we reflect on it, the more we feel abashed and dejected. The efforts of the patriotic and enlightened all over Europe, who would have held out to their countrymen the support they might expect from us, will be counteracted by this disastrous event. They will have no longer to combat the hacknied reproach of our involving the Continent in confusion and misery, for our exclusive advantage; they will be assailed with cries about the imbecility of our Generals, and the inutility of our assistance. Good heavens, Sir, when we take into consideration the favourable aspect of European politics, prior to this event, and the advantages that might have followed the battle of Vimiera, had the unconditional surrender of Junot and his army been insisted on; we are then fully aware of the disgrace we have suffered, and the favourable opportunity we have lost, perhaps, for ever.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 13.—Yesterday the Emperor and King received the Senate at the Palace of St. Cloud, when the following Address, voted in the Sitting of the 8th, was presented to his Majesty:—

SIRE,—The Senate have listened with the liveliest emotions to the Message of your Imperial and Royal Majesty.

They have also received with a profound and respectful gratitude the communication which your Majesty has been pleased to make respecting the affairs of Spain, the Constitution accepted by the Junta, and the Report presented to your Majesty on the state of your armies in the several quarters of the globe.

They have unanimously adopted the Senatus Consultum which your Imperial and Royal Majesty has proposed, and One Hundred and Sixty Thousand brave men shall participate in the immortal fame of your numerous and formidable legions.

You believe in the Peace of the Continent, Sire, but you will not suffer yourself to depend upon the errors and perverse calculations of Foreign Courts. Your Majesty desires to defend solemn and voluntarily concluded treaties—to maintain a Constitution freely discussed, adopted, and sworn to, by a National Junta—to suppress a barbarous anarchy, which now covers Spain with blood and mourning, and threatens our frontiers—to rescue the true Spaniards from a shameful yoke by which they are oppressed—to restore to them the happiness of being governed by a brother of your Majesty—to annihilate the English troops, who unite their arms with the daggers of the banditti—to avenge the French blood, so basely shed—to put out of all doubt the security of France, and the peace of our posterity—to fortify and complete the work of Louis XIV.—to accomplish the wish of the most illustrious of your predecessors, and particularly of him who was by France most beloved—to extend your great power, in order to diminish the miseries of war, and to compel the Enemy of the Continent to a general Peace, which is the sole object of all your measures, and the only epoch for the repose and prosperity of our country.

The will of the French people is, therefore, Sire, the same as that of your Majesty.

The War with Spain is politic, just, and necessary.

The French, who are penetrated with affection for the Hero whom they admire—who display so much enthusiasm whenever they have the good fortune to behold you, will answer the call of your Majesty with zeal, and nothing shall shake the determination of the Senate and the People to support your Majesty in every undertaking which you may judge necessary for the great interests of the Empire.

May it therefore please your Majesty to accept this new tribute of our respect, our attachment, and our fidelity.

SENATUS CONSULTUM.

The Senatus Consultum referred to in the above Address, and which is in conformity with the Minister of War's Report, is of the following tenor:—

Art. I. There are placed at the disposal of the Government 80,000 Conscripts, who are inscribed in the classes for 1806, 1807, 1808, 1809; 20,000 for each year.

II. These 80,000 Conscripts may be immediately placed in active service.

III. The Conscripts of the year 1806, 1807, and 1808, who were married before the publication of this decree, shall not be drawn for the above 80,000.

IV. The Conscripts of the years 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, who have answered to their Conscription, and are not under orders for distribution in the army, shall be now freed from service; and from these classes no new levy shall be made.

V. Eighty thousand Conscripts from the classes of the year 1810, are also placed at the disposal of the Government.

VI. These Conscripts shall be allotted to the formation of corps for the defence of the coast, but shall not be called out before the 1st of January next, unless before that period some other Power shall be in a state of war with France. In this case they may be immediately called into actual service.

VII. The present Senatus Consultum shall be transmitted by a message to the Emperor and King.

In the Sitting of the Senate on the 10th of this month, the Senator Count Lacepede, in the name of the Committee appointed to report on the object of the Senatus Consultum, &c. made a report, which he introduced by a long speech, in the conclusion he thus expressed himself:

"The 80,000 brave men, who march to fulfil the voice of their country, have already reached those years, in which it is unnecessary for them to prepare themselves for the fatigues of war.

"What, when compared with the means of France, are those of such Governments, as, spending in one year the revenues of several years, and wasting their most precious capitals, scarcely pay those soldiers raised with difficulty by the country, with an imaginary coinage, the ideal value of which decreases every day, while the welfare of the State, the riches of private individuals, and, what is still worse, the good faith of all, are dragged into an abyss."

All the great roads leading from Mentz to the interior of France are at present covered with troops, from the grand army, on their march towards Spain. As these troops follow each other so rapidly that they would incommode each other, if they all took the same road, their march is directed in various columns. The first goes by Triers and Luxemberg, across the thunderstruck; the second marches by Keyserslautern to Metz and Verdun; the third goes by Tuckheim, Newstadt, Saarburg, Luneville, Nancy, &c. These columns go direct to Bourdeaux and Bayonne. The fourth follows the course of the Rhine, and passes through Worms, Spiers, Strasburg, Colmar, Besancon, and will pass through Lijon to Perpignan. The columns which come through Wesel take the route of Belgium.

A letter from Vittoria, of the 1st of September, contains the following:—"The 59th regiment of the line entered St. Sebastian on the 28th of August. It is also understood that 3000 men have come to Bayonne, and that the passage of troops out of all parts of France is incessant. Never were seen greater preparations than have now been collected of military stores, provisions, clothing, &c. The Emperor has ordered to be in readiness 10,000 waggons, a la Marlborough, for the conveyance of a sufficient quantity of provisions for the support of an army of 200,000 men during three months. Marshal Ney is at Bayonne.

The latest intelligence from Bayonne is of the 10th of September. According to accounts which have been received there from Spain, the corps of the army are in the same positions. The division of the left wing, under Marshal Moncey, has its head-quarters at Logrono and Viana; its advanced posts have had several skirmishes with the Spaniards, who, as much as possible avoided fighting, and dispersed as soon as attacked. Marshal Bessieres, who has the command of the right wing, continues in the same positions, which extend as far as Burgos.

Bayonne assumes more and more a military aspect. A camp for 3000 men has been pitched on the Glacis, and it may be so enlarged as to contain 8000 troops; the inhabitants are to be relieved from providing quarters. In the mean time the Mayor of Bayonne has required the inhabitants, by Proclamation, to receive with kindness the brave men, who have never ceased to conquer. The Mayor will be obliged for some time to increase the lodgings; the proprietors of great houses shall accommodate the Chiefs of the army, and the absent must take care that their houses are not shut up. "Let us," says the Mayor "with all our means, contribute to the accomplishment of the great designs of our illustrious Emperor, who has declared to his people, that before the end of the present year not a village in Spain shall be in a state of insurrection. We shall be the first," he adds, "to enjoy the advantages arising from the restoration of order in that extensive country."

On the 10th instant, a numerous corps of troops arrived at Metz, on their route for Spain. At the entrance of the city a costly triumphal arch was erected. The troops were entertained; in the evening the city was illuminated, and the theatre was opened gratis.

The King of Naples arrived at Rome on the 3d inst. at five in the morning. General Miollis, with his staff, went to receive his Majesty, and the whole garrison was under arms.

SEPT. 16.—The Journal de l'Empire of this day gives the present position of the French army in Spain, in an article from Vittoria, dated the 6th September. The principal corps of the army, where his Majesty is, holds the two banks of the Ebro, and all the defiles of the mountains of Biscay, the head-quarters at Miranda. The corps of Marshal Bessieres extends from Pancorbo to Burgos, which last city is held by the light cavalry of General Lasalle. The head-quarters of Bessieres are placed at Santa Maria. Defiles in the mountains have been explored, which were hitherto unknown, and which will very much promote the farther operations of the army. All the troops await with impatience the signal for the combat, and burn with desire to meet the English.

A great number of troops come here daily, who go to strengthen the Army of Spain. Marshal Jourdan is arrived at his head-quarters, and Marshal Ney is expected to-morrow or the day after. The Ministers and Members of the Junta of Bayonne are at Miranda with the King, as well as at Vittoria.

SEPT. 18.—The Moniteur of yesterday has notified, that the Meeting of the Legislative Body is to take place on the 25th of October, and not on the 28th, as formerly directed.

On the 16th, a Council of State was holden at St. Cloud, at which the Emperor was present. On the day before his Majesty was at Versailles, where he reviewed the 3d Regiment of Dragoons, on their march to Spain.

Letters from Tours state, that a column of the grand army is speedily to pass through that department, and that its passage will occupy twelve days, in the proportion of about 2000 men a day. In the like manner, 17,000 men of the same army are expected to pass through Nancy between the 14th and the 22d.—Preparations are also made for the passage of a vast number of troops, both infantry and cavalry, at Doyn. A Portuguese regiment of cavalry, about a week ago, marched through Lyons towards Grai. A part of the French troops in the kingdom of Italy have received orders to break up, and to proceed through France to Spain. Two divisions of Italian troops are also expected in France; but these, it is said, are not to serve against the Spaniards. Most of the Polish troops which have been taken into French pay, and which amount to about 8000 men, have already passed through Mentz.

It is said that early next month the Emperor will leave this capital for Saxony. The Dutch Papers already report, that the Emperor of Russia is to be accompanied on his journey by the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Weimar, in whose capital he is soon expected to arrive.

The Journal de l'Empire has published a particular account of the joyful manner in which the King of the two Sicilies was received on his entrance into Naples, on the 6th instant. The same Paper gives the following intelligence from Spain, in a letter dated Vittoria, September 8:—"The Duke de Frias is appointed Envoy from his Catholic Majesty to the Emperor of the French. The appointment for the Embassy to Vienna is completed, but is not yet made public. Don Banito Pardo de Figuera, who was appointed Envoy to Petersburgh by Ferdinand VII. is continued in that character by his Majesty, and new credentials have been transmitted to him."

His Catholic Majesty arrived on the 31st at Calahorra, where, as is stated in the Gazette de France, he was received with the most lively demonstrations of joy. The enemy, who have left Tudela, are pursued in their flight.

SEPT. 19.—The Moniteur of this day says, that yesterday, being Sunday, during the mass which was celebrated at the Palace of St. Cloud, the oath was administered to M. Fontanes, in his capacity of Grand Master of the Imperial University, by the Prince Arch Chancellor of the Empire, in presence of the Emperor, and upon the Holy Gospels. The formula of the oath is as follows:—

"Sire!—I swear in the presence of God, and of your Majesty, to fulfil all the duties which are imposed upon me; and, in virtue of the office which your Majesty has entrusted to me, to devote myself to nothing else but to promote the attachment of the citizens to their Religion, to their Prince, to their Country, and to their Ancestors, by all the means which are in my power; to cherish the progress of the sciences, of useful studies, and of good morals; and, as testimonies to the glory of your dynasty, to perpetuate the happiness of children, and the repose of fathers of families."

It is thought that the departure of his Majesty the Emperor and King for Germany is very near at hand, for his Excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs will set out this evening, while his highness the Prince of Benevento will take his departure to-morrow.

General Oudinot, Commander of the Grenadiers of the Grand Army, has already passed through Metz in the greatest haste for Germany. We are assured that this General is appointed Governor of the City of Erfurth.

Gen. Sebastiani goes to take the command of a division of the Army of Spain. A regiment of the troops of the Duke of Nassau, 1700 strong, reached Orleans the 14th inst. where it was reviewed the same day by Field-Marshal the Duke of Dantzic. On the 17th, this regiment set out on its march to Chateauroux. Other troops of the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine are very shortly expected in that city.

BILBOA, SEPT. 1.—On the 26th, 27th, and 28th of August, was held here a general and extraordinary Junta of the Province of Biscay, and under the Presidency (by appointment of his Catholic Majesty) of his Excellency Don Joseph Domingo de Massaredo, Captain-General of the Navy, Minister for Maritime Affairs, &c.

At the opening of the first Sitting, and after their full powers had been delivered in by the Deputies from 113 Communities, which have the right of deputation to the General Assembly, in which to the number of 108 were present, the following speech was delivered by the President:—

"Biscayans!—The unfortunate occurrences which have induced the King to give orders for assembling the Deputies of these provinces, must, doubtless, be disagreeable to you, chiefly on account of the evils suffered by many of your countrymen. But you have the testimony of your own consciences, and the happiness of seeing that this province has had no share in the insurrection, which has been excited only in the City of Bilboa, by worthless persons of no weight, enemies, as well of your province, as of the public tranquillity, and who led astray the common people, as is generally the case for the purpose of fettering the General Congress, and substituting a cruel anarchy in its place.

"It is not unknown to you, Inhabitants of Biscay, that these disturbances, and those which the whole kingdom yet suffers, have arisen from the errors into which the general feelings have been led away, and by giving more weight to individual passions than to reason and the common good; and these have risen to such a height, that the sighs of widows, the lamentations of children, the miseries of misguided families, and general desolation, are counted as nothing. Heaven grant that the mischiefs which our native country has already suffered be not followed by new disasters; for only by weighing well the dangers which threaten, can it avoid them.

"There is no longer any uncertainty. The Emperor Napoleon cannot possibly depart from the resolution which he has taken. The great Powers of the Continent have acknowledged Joseph Napoleon as King of Spain, and have sent to their Ministers new credentials. Dreadful armies approach for the purpose of effectuating the undertaking.

"Biscayans! his Majesty has ordered me to assemble you, 1st. To know from yourselves what share you have had in the insurrection excited in the city of Bilboa; whether you approved of, or abhorred it.—2d. To assure you, in case you disapprove of it, that his Majesty has consigned to oblivion the mistakes and errors of the insurgents, and that he will punish only the heads and beginners of the insurrection, with regard to whom the law must take its course, for the purpose of preventing them in future from disturbing your repose and prosperity. 3d. In order to make known to you his beneficent designs, and to place before you, and make you acquainted with his wishes for all that may contribute to the prosperity of the country.

"You will deliberate on each of those subjects in succession, and in the order in which they shall be submitted to you.

"There shall be named a Committee of three intelligent persons, to whom it shall be given in charge, to submit to his Majesty all that may contribute to the accomplishment of the plans which his Majesty has formed for your advantage; for the King, knowing how much my soul has been plunged in grief by the news of the disturbances which have laid waste this country, has ordered me immediately, and in respect of the affection which I bear towards you, to make known to you the feelings by which his paternal goodness is animated in your favour. I trust that I shall have the satisfaction of carrying to the foot of his Majesty's throne, not only the homage of your fidelity and gratitude, but also the assurance that these reign, and shall ever reign, in your hearts. This is for his Majesty the richest glory of his throne."

Upon the delivery of this Address, the Members of the Junta solemnly assured the President that the Commons of the Province had no share in the insurrection which had taken place; that they themselves disapproved of and detested it, declaring at the same time their feelings of affection and loyalty to his Majesty, &c. The President having received these declarations, communicated to the Junta the regulations adopted by his Majesty for enabling the province to enjoy the advantages ensured by the Constitution to the whole kingdom, together with special favours tending to promote the manufactures and commerce of Biscay, all which were received by the Junta with the greatest thankfulness.

At the close of the Sitting of the following day, the President standing up, asked, the Members of the Junta, whether, in all that had been submitted to their deliberation, every thing had not marked the proofs of paternal goodness on the part of his Majesty, and of the arrangements which he will make for the prosperity of the country? they replied with acclamations of applause. He then asked them, whether they lovingly, truly, and obediently took the oath to King Joseph Napoleon? They replied, that they took this oath to Joseph Napoleon, their Lord and King.

In the Sitting of the 28th of August, his Excellency communicated to the Junta a circular letter of summons to all the parish-priests of the province. His Majesty wished that they should assemble in the Consistorial House, in order that his Excellency may make known to them his just and beneficent designs for the advantage of the priesthood, and the confidence which his Majesty places in the zeal of the Clergy, and particularly in that of the parish priests, whose religious instructions are the best means of repairing the mistakes of the people.

The Junta have taken the necessary measures for summoning and assembling the order of the Clergy as speedily as possible.

The President closed the Assembly with a Speech, in which he declared his satisfaction with the transactions of the Junta.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE PAPERS.

OPORTO, AUG. 31.—We have infinite pleasure in communicating to the public the following intelligence from the English and Portuguese armies:—

Copy of a Letter from General Sir Arthur Wellesley, to the most Excellent and Reverend the Bishop, President, and Governor.

"Camp at Ramahal, Aug. 24.

"May it please your Excellency—I have the honour to inform your Excellency, that the army under my command defeated General Laborde's division on the 17th instant, and on the 21st instant the whole of the French army united, under the command of General Junot, at Vimiera. The loss of the enemy in those actions was very considerable. Last night he sent General Kellerman to confer with General Sir H. Dalrymple, who concluded an agreement with the said General for a suspension of hostilities, until the conclusion of a Convention for the total evacuation of Portugal by the French troops. This agreement contains nothing remarkable, with the exception of a provision for securing the neutrality of the port of Lisbon and the Russian squadron. Permit me to congratulate your Excellency on the approaching conclusion of the misfortunes which have so much afflicted your country, and to the recovery of which your Excellency's zeal and solicitude have so much contributed. I have the honour to be, with the highest consideration and respect, your Excellency's most humble and obedient Servant,

"Arthur Wellesley."

The following Protest is stated to have been made by Bernardin Freire de Andrade, General of the Portuguese troops:—

I protest, in general, on account of this Treaty being totally void of that deference due to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, of the Government that represents him; on account of what may be hostile in it to the Sovereign authority and independence of this Government, and for all that may be against the honour, safety, and interests of the nation; and, in particular, I protest against what is stipulated in the following Articles:

Articles I. IV. and XII.—Because these Articles determine the surrender of Portuguese fortified places, stores, and ships to the English forces, without solemnly declaring that this surrender is momentary, and that it is intended they should be immediately restored to the Prince Regent of Portugal, or the Government that may represent him, to whom they belong, and in whose aid the English forces came as auxiliaries.

Art. XVI.—Because it permits the residence in Portugal of the individuals mentioned in it.

Art. XVII.—Because it attempts to tie down the Government of this kingdom, not to bring to justice and condign punishment those persons who have been notoriously and scandalously disloyal to the Prince and their Country, by joining and serving the French party; and, even if the protection of the English army should be allowed to screen them from the punishment they have deserved, still it should not prevent their expulsion, whereby this country would no longer have to fear being again betrayed by the same men.

First of the additional Articles.—This Article can by no means bind the Government of the kingdom, as no reciprocal conditions are stipulated.

I protest finally, on account of the want of attention to the safety of the inhabitants of the capital and its environs, nothing having been stipulated in their favour to insure their not being still vexed and oppressed by the French during their stay—not even an equivalent for what is established by Art. XVI. and XVII. in favour of the French and their followers.

And to these heads I limit my protest, in order not to make too long a list, passing over other objects of less importance, such as the concession of 600 horses, which was made without considering that they almost all belong to Portugal, and thus cannot be considered as the property of the French; that of the magazines of the army, filled at the expence of the country, and consequently only belonging by fact, not by right, to the unjust occupants of the country.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

SARAGOSSA, AUG. 27.—On the morning of the 20th, the Proclamation of our beloved Monarch, Ferdinand, as King, was made with the accustomed formalities.

On the 25th was celebrated with the greatest pomp (the Captain-General presiding), military honours for the illustrious defenders of the city and country, who had fallen in the late siege, whose heroism was the theme of a funeral oration by Father Bogiero, preacher to his Majesty.

A Council of Health has been established in this city, to provide against the effects of putrefaction, arising from the many French corpses, which were left in the buildings and streets of the city.

Our army remains on the frontiers of Navarre, and is prepared to combine its operations with those of the Austrian, Gallician, Castilian, and Andalusian armies. We have no doubt of a favourable result from these combinations, aided by the English, and supported by the enthusiasm with which the whole nation multiplies its means of defending its glory and liberty.

MADRID, SEPT. 7.—There were at Tudela 6000 of our troops, and 16,000 armed peasantry, when the Arragonese Commanders received advice from the Chief Alcade of Soria, that 20,000 French were advancing under the command of General Moncey, to enter the kingdom of Arragon. It therefore became necessary that our troops should retreat to Saragossa, where, according to the letters from that place, every preparation was made for sustaining a second siege. The gate of Santa Engracia was the only point which excited any degree of apprehension, as it was in ruins; but the utmost exertions were making to place both it and Monte Torrero in a state of defence. The advanced guard of the Arragonese was within three leagues of Saragossa; that of the French was at Gallur, seven leagues from the city. We were under some apprehensions for that celebrated bulwark of heroism, when at one o'clock yesterday M. Butron, Aide-de-Camp to General Palafox, arrived here with intelligence, that the French had retreated to Tudela. He further states, that the people of Saragossa entertain no alarm, should the enemy return with double their former force.

In consequence of the advices from Arragon, a Council of General Officers was held here; and in order to protect that kingdom, it was determined to send off a courier extraordinary, with orders to General Blake to take an advantageous position; but that skilful officer anticipated the necessity of the intended movement, and before the express reached him, he had already posted his army on the spot fixed on by the Council of War—a circumstance which has forwarded the system of operations, and given general satisfaction.

CADIZ, AUG. 30.—Yesterday arrived here a vessel from Monte Video, in eighty days, to procure a supply of arms to be employed against the Court of Brazil, the Prince of that country having summoned Monte Video, and the whole of that district, to surrender to the Portuguese arms. Not only was the bearer of the summons put under arrest, but his master was given to understand that his summons would be answered by 17,000 warriors.

CARRION DE LOS CONDES, SEPT. 4.—The whole of the Gallician army is concentrated in this place. It marches off at four in the afternoon, and will continue its route the whole night, in order to come up with the enemy. It is imagined that this operation is taken in concert with the armies of the other provinces, and that all of them were to be in motion at midnight.

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL.

LETTER FROM HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF SWEDEN TO THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

Honour and humanity enjoin me to make the most forcible remonstrances to your Imperial Majesty, against the numberless cruelties and the injustice committed by the Russian troops in Swedish Finland. These proceedings are too well known and confirmed to require from me any proof of their reality, for the blood of the ill-fated victims still cries aloud for vengeance against the abettors of such enormities. Let not your Imperial Majesty's heart be insensible to the representations which I find myself compelled to make to you in the name of my faithful subjects in Finland. But what is the object of this war, as unjust as it is unnatural? It is not I suppose to excite the strongest aversion for the Russian name. Is it criminal in my subjects in Finland, not to have suffered themselves to be seduced from their allegiance, by promises as false as the principles on which they are founded? Does it become a Sovereign to make loyalty a crime? I conjure your Imperial Majesty to put a stop to the calamities and horrors of a war, which cannot fail to bring down on your own Person, and your Government, the curses of Divine Providence. Half of my dominions in Finland are already delivered by my brave Finnish troops. Your Majesty's fleet is shut up in Baltic Port, without the hope of ever getting out, any otherwise than as a conquest. Your flotilla of gallies has recently sustained a very severe defeat, and my troops are this moment landing in Finland, to reinforce those who will point out to them the road to honour and glory.

Given at my Head-quarters, Sept. 7, 1808.

(Signed) GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

GOTTENBURGH, SEPT. 19.—Admiral Saumarez, in conjunction with Admiral Nauckhoff, have proposed to the Russians to declare hostilities against Baltic Port, on condition of one-half of the fleet being given up to the combined fleet, and the former would then allow the rest of the Russians to return quietly to Cronstadt. The Russian Admiral replied, that he would sooner burn the whole of the fleet than surrender any part thereof; but that he thought he could venture to enter into an agreement to dismantle the ships in Baltic Port, on condition of a promise from the combined fleet to cease hostilities. This proposal of Nauckhoff's was however equally rejected; and, on the departure of the courier from the fleet, one fire-ship was ready to be sent in, and several more were preparing. Sir J. Saumarez was employing for this purpose a sloop of war, and some other of his small craft.

Mr. Edward Thornton, his Britannic Majesty's Minister, left Stockholm yesterday, the 14th of September, to join Admiral Saumarez, and perhaps in eight or ten days we may have more news of an interesting nature.

KONINGSBERG, SEPT. 13.—The Emperor of Russia and the Grand Duke Constantine, are expected here this week, on their way to Erfurth, to meet Bonaparte! This remarkable event gives rise to much conjecture; but all agree in condemning the conduct of the Emperor. There is still great movements amongst the troops in Germany. There has been some skirmishing between the Swedes and Norwegians; the former have taken three pieces of cannon and forty or fifty prisoners.

PROVINCIALS.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The harvest has now been fully secured in almost every part of the kingdom, and nothing scarcely remains out, except a few beans in the more northern districts, which will soon be housed. In threshing out, the oats and barleys turn out very favourably, in most of the northern counties; but the heats in some places are found rather light, and not to yield so well, having been affected with the mildew, which did not fully show itself before they were cut. A great breadth of land has this year been prepared for wheat, in different parts of the Island, and even in the southern counties much of this grain is already put into the ground in the most favourable circumstances. The advantage of early sowing in three districts, begin now to be better understood. The potatoe crops are now beginning to be taken up in most places, and from their appearances would seem to turn out well in all those parts in the north, where they are much grown. In the south they will probably not be so favourable in their produce. From the great abundance of grass in the meadows and pasture lands, both store and fattening stock must be carried on well, and the prices of the latter be kept somewhat down. The late refreshing showers have likewise brought forward the turnips of all kinds, more favourably than was expected. The weather has continued so fine, that all sorts of farm labour has gone on with much dispatch, during the whole of the month.

The harvest in the North of Scotland, we are happy to say, has been one of the earliest ever remembered, and the crops have been unusually heavy and abundant. The productive power of the soil in the highest situations has been astonishingly improved by the judicious use of lime, which exists in the mountains in great quantities.

A HINT TO FARMERS.—As the weather has become extremely favourable for taking up potatoes, it is most earnestly requested that every exertion should be made to secure a crop of such essential consequence to the subsistence of the country.

WEYMOUTH, SEPT. 26.—Last Wednesday, five genteel-looking men came to this town, and repaired to the George Public-house, where they ordered a dinner; two of them went out and hired a pleasure-boat for the afternoon's amusement, and as they spoke good English, were not suspected. After dinner they proceeded to sea and sailed round the Bay. After being out an hour, they discovered them to be French Officers, confined the man and boy in the boat, and bore away for the French coast; it came on a calm; they in consequence took the small boat that was astern, with which they rowed away and gave up the yacht. The next morning they were taken in with by the Prosperity cutter, of Alderney, about half channel over, the Captain of which secured the boat and prisoners, and gave them over to the charge of Captain Wilkinson, of the Greyhound Revenue cutter, who landed them here on Thursday morning. It appeared they had broken their parole, at Wincanton, and one of the Officers confessed his having been there three or four times to reconnoitre the harbour previous to the attempt being made of escaping with his comrades. A few evenings after another boat was taken out of the harbour by one of two Frenchmen who had escaped from Odiham; he had got a few leagues from Portland, when the Daring gun-brig arrested his progress and towed the boat back into Portland Roads. Her Commander was taken and secured by the vigilance and activity of Mr. Robillard, a Gentleman of this town, who fell in with him on the road between this place and Chickwell. There appears to be some want of precaution at the places of these Officers parole, as well as in this town and harbour, and it is to be hoped that proper centinels will be fixed on the Pier, as is the case at Guernsey, and not to suffer any boat in the night to pass without strict examination.

On Saturday se'nnight, the Beeston packet, Captain Jewitt, on her passage from Hull for Gainsborough, struck on Whitton Sands, in the Humber, and almost instantly upset. Mrs. Jewitt, and two young children, by the shock, were thrown into the river, and all must have inevitably have perished, had it not been for the prompt assistance rendered by her husband, and three men who put off from a brig (as also some people belonging to the Whitgift Packet), which fortunately happened to be near them at the time. Mrs. Jewitt had only a short time previous to the accident, put another young child (a twin) in the cabin bed, which unhappily perished, as there was no a possibility of extricating it, the cabin immediately filling with water.

A most melancholy accident happened at a coal-pit, near Kimbleworth, Cumberland, belonging to Messrs. Walker, by the explosion of sulphureous matter common in pits, called the fire-damp, which unfortunately killed four persons, viz. George Hague, Thomas Hague, John Jervis, and William Firth; the two former were father and son, and what added to the distress of the scene was, they were found locked in each other's arms—a striking instance of parental and filial affection in the agonies of death.

Means of cleansing Houses, &c. of Rats and Mice.—A plant, which grows in abundance in every field, the dog's tongue, the cynoglossum officinale of Linnæus, has been found by M. Boreux to possess a very valuable quality. If gathered at the period when the sap is in its full vigour, bruised with a hammer, and laid in a house, barn, granary, or any place frequented by rats and mice, those destructive animals immediately shift their quarters. The success of this method, M. Boreux says, is equally speedy and infallible.

On Sunday se'nnight, a female child, who had strayed from its parents eight days before, from the lodge leading into Ditcham Woods, in the parish of Charlton, in Hampshire, in search of some companions who was gone to look for nuts, was found dead, with one of his eyes picked out, about seven fields from its home. The poor little creature was about two years and a half old; and having lost its way, worn out with anxiety and the want of food, it laid itself down on a fern cock and died! It must have been exposed to the dreadful storm of thunder and lightning on Monday se'nnight.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

CAPTURE OF A FORT IN SPAIN, BY LORD COCHRANE, FROM THE FRENCH.

Admiralty Office, Sept. 27, 1808.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Collingwood, Commander in Chief of his Majesty's ships and vessels in the Mediterranean, to the Hon. W. W. Pole, dated on board the Ocean, at Gibraltar, Aug. 17, 1808.

Sir,—I inclose, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the copy of a letter I have received from Lord Cochrane, Captain of his Majesty's ship the Imperieuse, giving an account of the surrender of the Castle of Mongat (a fort on the coast of Catalonia, in possession of the French), to his Majesty's ship under his command, which his Lordship had subsequently destroyed, after having delivered the principal part of the military stores to the Spanish Militia.

I have great pleasure in transmitting this information to their Lordships, as it points out one of the many instances in which his Majesty's ships on the Eastern Coast of Spain have rendered effectual aid to the Patriot Spaniards, in resisting and driving the enemy out of their country, and of the zeal and indefatigable industry with which Captain Lord Cochrane engages in that service.

Captain Otway of the Montague, landed at Rosas Bay a party of Marines in aid of the Spanish Peasantry, to oppose a French force which was approaching to attack that fortress on the 23d ult. and obliged the enemy to retire.

I am, &c.

Collingwood.

His Majesty's ship Imperieuse, off Mongat, July 31.

My Lord—The Castle of Mongat, an important post, completely commanding a pass in the road from Barcelona to Gerona, which the French are now besieging, and the only one between those towns occupied by the enemy, surrendered this morning to his Majesty's ship under my command. The Spanish Militia behaved admirably, in carrying an out-post on a neighbouring hill. Lieut. Hone, with the marines, took possession of the Castle, which, by means of powder, is now levelled with the ground. The rocks there are blown down into the road, which in many other places is rendered impassable to artillery without a very heavy loss of men, if they determine to repair them.

I inclose to your Lordship a list of the prisoners and of the material part of military stores; all that could be of use to the Spanish Militia have been delivered to them.

I have the Honour to be, &c.

Right Hon. Lord Collingwood, Commander in Chief, &c. Cochrane.

1 Captain, 1 Lieutenant, 2 Serjeants, 8 Corporals (7 wounded) 5 Gunners (2 killed), and 54 Soldiers.—Total 71.

5 Cannon, 80 Muskets, 80 Bayonets, 80 Cartouches, 500 Cannon Balls, 13 Barrels of Powder, and Cartridges, &c.

Grafton-street, Dublin, 21st Sept. 1808.

Sir,—The following is the Copy of a Letter I have just now transmitted to Sir Joseph Banks, for the information of his Majesty, the facts stated therein are incontrovertible; I give it you for the information of your numerous and respectable Readers.

Henry James Washington.

RIGHT HON. SIR JOSEPH BANKS,

Sir,—Every loyal Englishman views the mutiny that Major Johnston and his Officers have effected in New South Wales, with an eye of detestation. This infernal plot has been in agitation from the moment the Military Officers, or in other words the Military Hunters, stationed in that Colony, discovered Governor Bligh's fixed determination to abolish monopoly, and put a final period to that degrading system of traffic, for which the whole of those Officers have been so justly celebrated, since the year 1794, with the exception of Colonel Paterson and Captain John Piper. The efforts that were made by Governor King, to suppress the insolence of Major Johnston, and the Officers under his command, involved that Governor into difficulties almost tantamount to those which have befallen that gallant veteran Governor Bligh. The incendiaries that have buoyed up Major Johnston to the commission of this crime, are John M'Arthur and William Minchin, Adj. in the New South Wales Corps; the succession of quarrels the former is famous for, with Governors Hunter, King, Colonel Paterson, and Bligh, need no recapitulation; the latter has been repeatedly tried by General Courts Martial. I refer you to General Grose for his character; ask that General what confidence can be placed in his integrity.—The unfortunate Officers Atkins, Palmer, Gore, and Campbell, were the only men that made a stand in defence of Gov. Bligh's authority and person; they have shared his fate, and if they escape assassination, they will prove the atrocity of this revolution, and shew what necessity there is to remove Mr. M'Arthur and the New South Wales Regiment from that Colony. Perhaps, Sir Joseph, you are unacquainted with the particular circumstances of this wanton act of rebellion, the following is a correct detail. January the 28th last, Major Johnston ordered the drum to beat to arms; the consequence was, the regiment assembled, and a mob of about 200 convicts; Major Johnston then placed himself at their head, and marched to the Government-house, where he called aloud for the Governor to surrender. The Governor, alarmed for his personal safety, concealed himself; the Major then ordered a body of soldiers to rush into the house, and by force of arms to bring the Governor to him; after searching some time, the Governor was forced from his retirement, and treated by the soldiers and mob in a most cruel and insulting manner. Major Johnston, with rude ungentlemanlike language, demanded the Governor's sword, and after leaving the Governor in close arrest, marched off his victorious bandittis in triumph: the prison door was then thrown open, and Mr. M'Arthur liberated. This refractory gentleman was confined for contempt of Court, and refusing to pay a fine. The soldiers and mob then placed him in a chair, and carried him about the town in a disorderly triumphant manner. The bellman was then ordered to assemble the inhabitants, in order to subscribe money to defray the expences of two Delegates, Messrs. Charles Grimes and Adjutant William Minchin, to proceed to England, to impeach the Governor.

The self-created Governor Johnston then proceeded to liberate the delinquents that were in confinement, and by his proclamation, to make null and void the acts of the Courts of Judicature, and the evening was ushered in with a blaze of illuminations and bonfires, and a disgraceful scene of drunkenness and excess unprecedented.

Offended justice calls aloud for the insurgents to be brought to the bar, without delay, so that his Majesty's Colony may be freed from anarchy, and their fate be a lesson in future times.

BATTLE OF VIMIERA.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY commanding the feigned Retreat of MAJOR-GEN. FERGUSON'S BRIGADE, by which the French Artillery was taken, and their whole Army routed and beaten, is delineated by a MASTERLY ENGRAVING from an Eminent Artist, under the Inspection of MAJOR CAMPBELL, who brought to England the Dispatches relative to the victories in Portugal. This subject is rendered interesting by the Military Propriety of its Representation and the correctness of the Portraits, and will be worthy of preservation as an official document illustrative of the principal event in the late memorable Victory over the French in Portugal.

SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY'S PLAN OF ATTACK ON THE FRENCH TROOPS,

On the 21st u't. transmitted by a GENERAL OFFICER:—Accurate PORTRAITS of SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY and GENERAL JUNOT, exquisitely engraved from the Original Paintings—the latter is the only authentic Likeness of JUNOT. All these Embellishments are given in the TWENTY-SEVENTH NUMBER of LE BEAU MONDE, OR LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE, which is this Day published; to which is added a whole-length PORTRAIT of Mr. YOUNG, as Hamlet.—Price 2s. 6d. The Plate of Costumes are DISCARDED from the Magazine, to make room for more substantial Improvements.

Among the ORIGINAL CONTENTS of No. 27, the Proprietors have to announce the Lives of Sir Arthur Wellesley and General Junot, ably and professionally written, and interspersed with Curious Anecdotes, relating to the late Victories in Portugal; a free Critical Examination of the current number of The Edinburgh Review; judicious Advice to Actors; Observations on Tragedy among the Romans; severe Strictures on the Literary Fund; interesting Bon-Ton Correspondence; the Anti-Satirist, No. 1; *Union of Saints; or, the Rev. POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Paris Papers to the 20th, and Dutch Papers to the 26th, have arrived. The former contain the substance of a speech made by BONAPARTE to his troops on the parade on the 19th. After reminding them of the victories they had gained in Italy and Germany, and their uniform success during so many years of service; he tells them their toils are not over: that they must now traverse the Pyrenees, to take a terrible vengeance on the Spaniards, on account of their rebellion, and on the English for having polluted the Spanish soil by their presence. He is said to have spoken with the greatest vehemence and indignation; to have employed his wonted strain of invective and depreciation against our Government and Army; and concluded by saying, that the Imperial Eagles must be restored to the lustre they had so long displayed. Sincerely do we regret that it is not in our power to give the Tyrant's harangue in form as well as in substance. It would be a curious and interesting specimen of the disappointment which corrodes his heart, and of the passions which agitate his soul even to frenzy, on account of the successful resistance of a patriotic people. In consequence of the Moniteur giving only the substance, we conclude that BONAPARTE had just received the intelligence of the discomfiture of his vile soldiery in Portugal; and that this grating account occasioned this violent explosion of his irritated feelings. Much are we, however, and the Spaniards, together with the rest of mankind, indebted to him for this candid acknowledgment of his infamous intentions. Ambitious, unrelenting, active, and inexorable as the ruffian is, it is fortunate for the human race, that the vast resources of his mind are counteracted by the ungovernable violence of his passions. Were it not for this irritability, and could his dissimulation, which, on common occasions, is sufficiently profound, keep pace with the versatility of his mind, and the atrocity of his heart, he would be the most dangerous man for the repose and independence of nations that we know of in history. Every poison has its antidote; and he has this uncontroulable, irritable pride, which weakens the pernicious tendency of his daring projects. As he is, he is a character deserving of all the vigilance, energy, foresight, and precaution, which it is in our power to employ against him. He has given his word to take a signal vengeance on Spain, and it is not necessary to recal his treatment of the KINGS of NAPLES and PRUSSIA, of the PRINCE REGENT of PORTUGAL, the ELECTOR of HESSE CASSEL, the DUKE of BRUNSWICK, and of the PRINCE of ORANGE, to remind us that he is in the habit of keeping such promises. He has a Senate of vassals, obsequious, yielding, unprincipled, and unfeeling, such as he himself could have wished to call them from the worst and basest of mankind. From this vile remnant of the most worthless individuals of the several factions which figured during the Revolution, he has no resistance to apprehend. This callous indifference to the interests of their country and the sufferings of Europe, the same renunciation of self-will and degradation of moral feelings, are as prevalent among the higher Officers of the army, the Magistrates, the Prefects, as in the Senate. They are all submissive instruments of his wildest ambition, as long as it is in his power to gratify their rapacity, or favour their self-love. It is therefore no matter of astonishment if such fellows sanction a decree, which tears 80,000 young conscripts from their homes and usual occupations, and 80,000 more, and, if required, double and treble that number, to form with their lacerated carcasses a way for an obscure Corsican to the throne of Spain. Despicable, unthinking, and volatile people! How dearly, and deservedly do you now pay the forfeit of the crimes you so wantonly committed during the course of your sanguinary Revolution. From such wretches, bold only in pillage and atrocity, but the crouching slaves of every villain who knew them sufficiently to keep the iron scourge over their backs, it would be madness to expect that they could one day awake to a sense of their degradation and misery. Whenever their Tyrant summons them to scale the Pyrenees, and to carry sword and fire into the habitations of their unoffending neighbours, they will implicitly obey him. It is not the injustice of the aggression they will object to; it is the steel of the Spaniards they will apprehend, should they evince any reluctance on the occasion. On that side we foresee no difficulties, no opposition to the fulfilment of the Usurper's menaces of vengeance and subjugation. If they are to be baffled; if they are to be turned to the confusion and destruction of the Tyrant himself; the means are to be sought in the people of this country, in the energy of our Government, and in the intrepidity of our soldiers. If we have judgment and courage to employ these means to their full extent; if we entrust them to men, not chosen on account of their alliance with this or that particular family, but for their merit, loyalty and services, we have it in our power to oppose an insurmountable barrier to the progress of the enemy beyond the Pyrenees. Let this be effected before we form new projects: We can now, in the present humbled state of the European marine, laugh at the invasion of our shores, and consequently employ our whole regular force in Spain. This is the important and favourable ground to fight on, if we expect a result commensurate to the greatness of our means. We are afraid a very mistaken and ruinous policy may be adopted by sending part of our forces to the western coast of Naples, and another to the Adriatic. If the Italians have courage to shake off the yoke of their oppressors, they will do it without our assistance; it is then time to fly to their aid; but let us not uselessly waste an army of 30,000 men in the Mediterranean, to watch their moment of insurrection. For that purpose the army under Sir JOHN STUART is more than sufficient. Spain is the ground where we should have, if possible, an army of 80,000 men before the first of November. This great force will give an importance to our operations and a respectability to our alliance. It is perfectly indifferent where we beat the French, if we can only do it. The great object of our exertions and our policy is to tear from him a part of his present conquests; to prove thus to Europe the greatness of our resources and the fallacy of his invincibility. It would be perfectly equal if that can be done in Spain or in Naples, with this essential difference; that in the former country we are certain of finding a people, who have the will and the courage to co-operate with us. Sincerely do we wish that this were the intention of his Majesty's Ministers. We have been long deceived in our expectations of Austrian, Russian, and Prussian co-operations. Let us begin at last to look to ourselves and to reckon upon our own energy. If the former unite in the noble undertaking their assistance will be acceptable; but we should calculate, as if we had as little to expect from them as from the man in the moon. This is the true secret of national, as well as individual greatness. Good heavens! when we take our resources, our opulence, the magic effects of our institutions, and the acknowledged bravery of the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland, into consideration, we cannot conceive how pusillanimity could creep into our Councils. If there were a Statesman in this country who could only look beyond the twelve-month, and use the great lever of the press to advantage, he could call forth energies, which would fix our destiny for centuries. Let no half-measures be adopted; let our full strength only be put out; and a result will be produced, which it would be considered as extravagance to pretend to at present. Spain, we repeat it once more, is the theatre on which we can display our means to greatest advantage. The people of that country, animated with the same ardent love of freedom—and the same abhorrence of the common enemy, promise us a greater certainty of active, loyal co-operation, than any other people we know of on the Continent; and if our exertions be proportionate to our resources, moral and physical; if our Statesmen have a particle of the genius of a CHATHAM, a day will burst upon us, not inferior in splendour to those when MARLBOROUGH, our EDWARD and HENRY planted our triumphant standards on the Seine, the Loire, and the Scheld.

The last Dutch Papers speak with confidence of an interview between the Emperors ALEXANDER and NAPOLEON at Erfurth, in Upper Saxony; and the latter was daily expected to quit Paris for that purpose. This rumour, however, but ill coincides with the harangue on the parade, in which the Corsican informs his guards that they must hold themselves in readiness to traverse the Pyrenees. To speculate to any certainty on this matter, would be no easy task, when we reflect on the errors and perverse calculations of the Cabinets of the Continent. If the event, however, takes place, which it is impossible for us to give credit to, ALEXANDER is one of the weakest and most unreflecting mortals that exist. Had he the baseness or folly to consent to this degrading step about five months ago, he would have never returned to his capital; but the events in Spain have cooled the impetuosity of the Corsican; and when we reflect on the unprincipled character of the Grand Duke CONSTANTINE, and what a worthy accomplice he would be of BONAPARTE, we have reason to suspect some treachery in the business. Poor deluded Monarch! How deeply is he fallen! What an instructive contrast does he afford, when set in opposition with the brother-in-law he so scandalously endeavours to plunder! The one, with the scanty resources of the poorest Kingdom in Europe, by his perseverance and courage in defiance of the calculations of the Continent, maintains the independence of his country against the united efforts of Russia, Denmark, and France; whilst the descendant of PETER the Great, and the heir of his immense possessions, is as degraded a vassal of BONAPARTE as the most insignificant Member of the Confederacy of the Rhine. Perhaps the shock he may receive, in consequence of the capture of his two fleets in the Tagus and the Baltic, may open his eyes to the ruinous tendency of the present war. Sincerely is the unfortunate Monarch to be pitied, and still more so the people, whose interests he so unworthily sacrifices to the views of a Foreign Usurper.

INTERESTING DISPATCHES FROM LISBON.

THE FRENCH NOT PERMITTED TO CARRY OFF THEIR PLUNDER.

Dispatches were on Thursday received by Government, from our Naval and Military Commanders at Lisbon, dated the 18th instant. We understand that the embarkation of the first division of the French troops, consisting of about 7000 men, had taken place, agreeably to the terms of the Convention, and that some British regiments then occupied the Citadel of Lisbon. Great disputes had taken place with respect to the meaning of that article of the Convention which regards property. General Junot insisted that he had a right to carry off whatever had been in his power while he commanded at Lisbon; whilst the British General contended, that he was not to carry away any species of plunder whatever. General Beresford and Lord Proby, on the one part, and General Kellermann on the other, had been appointed to superintend the execution of the Convention; and a Committee was at the same time appointed for the purpose of ascertaining every particular article of plunder, and restoring it to the rightful owners.

On the 10th, the Generals appointed to superintend the execution of the Convention, in order to satisfy the minds of the Portuguese upon the subject of the property, issued the following

PROCLAMATION,

BY THE BRITISH AND FRENCH COMMISSIONERS, FOR BRINGING CARRIED INTO EFFECT THE CONVENTION, AGREED UPON BETWEEN THE RESPECTIVE COMMANDERS IN CHIEF:—

"For the fulfilment of the stipulations made in the Convention agreed upon for the evacuation of Portugal by the French

Army. That property of every kind confiscated, or seized, from the subjects, or other persons residing in Portugal, whether of the Royal Palace, Royal and Public Libraries, and Museums, and from Individuals that are still existing in Portugal, should be restored:—We, the Commissioners for seeing carried into execution the said Treaty, as his Excellency the Commander of the French army has already notified to his army, think it also right to make public the same for the information of all concerned, and for facilitating the restitution, or the receiving back such property, we have judged expedient to appoint a Committee of three persons, viz. Lieutenant-Col. Trant, O. St. Antonio Rodrigues de Oleveira, and Mr. Dubliur, Commissaire des Guerres, to meet at No. 8, Cargo de Loretto, who are appointed to receive, enquire into, and judge of all reclamations on this head, and whose orders for the restitution of property, to whomsoever addressed, are to be obeyed. And it is directed that keepers shall have charge of sequestrated or seized property in every house to which it may have been removed, to assure the conservation of objects or moveables transported from royal or public houses, to others, for the use or convenience of such General, Administrator, or other subject of the French army. These keepers will mark the description of all meubles with the name of the owners, and be accountable for whatever is therein, and they will be delivered only on legal proof of ownership, to the possessors of such articles as above described, who will transmit to this Committee a return of what each may have in his possession of the property designated. And all persons may with safety apply to this Tribunal. We think it necessary also to make known to whom it may concern, that any purchase made of articles taken from the public arsenals or stores since the 30th of August, or whatever shall, on trial, be proved to have been illegally sold or disposed of at any time, even previous to the 30th of August, shall be null and void, the articles seized and the persons purchasing subject to what the law may further direct. The Committee assembled to receive reclamations, and facilitate the restitution of property, hold its sittings at the house of St. Antonio Rodrigues de Oliveira, No. 8, Cargo de Loretto.

"Lisbon, 10th Sept. 1808."

The following private letters are important:

"Camp at Casse, near Lisbon, Sept. 10.

"Of the result of our campaign in Portugal you have been already of course informed. But I must acquaint you with a good thing which happened yesterday. Junot had allowed his Generals and Officers to plunder Lisbon—in consequence of this permission, the Bishop's Palace, the Public Offices, and the Churches, were exposed to the most open and barefaced pillage, after the Convention had been signed with the British Commander. The Magistrates of Lisbon and the principal persons preferred a complaint to the Commander in Chief of the British forces. About eight thousand French had already embarked, but Junot was still in Lisbon.—The British Commander instantly sent an order to him to cause every thing to be restored that had been taken from the Portuguese previously to the capitulation and down to yesterday.—How astonished the French were, who thought they should carry off every thing quietly, I leave you to judge—Junot and his Generals and Officers are in the greatest rage, but it will avail them nothing. A Military Committee has been appointed, to which all the property plundered, whether Portuguese or English, is to be delivered. The amount will, it is said, be immense—some say a million or two sterling."

"Lisbon, Sept. 11, 1808.—Nothing can surpass the indignation and surprise of the inhabitants at seeing the unaccountable posture of things in the Tagus, where the English, the Portuguese, the French, the Spanish, and the Russian flags are all seen flying together! Sir Charles Cotton, when he came over the bar, placed his fleet about two miles below Belem fort. The French ships and the Russian fleet are anchored about a mile above the fort. The Spanish prisoners who were released from the hulks, are encamped on the southern side of the river. The ill-blood that has been produced by seeing the first detachment of the French carry on board their plunder with them, has produced many murders. Officers, either French or English, are careful of walking alone, or venturing out at night. Several of the French have been dispatched, and it requires the utmost vigilance to prevent insurrection. There is a report that the French will not be able to carry with them any part of their captures. They are now trying to convert into articles that will stand water. They have been actually buying from the English Officers English horses at 100 guineas a piece, to carry with them. It is said that the French to be carried away will amount to near 25,000 souls, and transports for all this body must be found. There is a rumour that they have committed great depredations since the Convention was signed—but I cannot discover this to be the case. The clamour and the fury of the people however is at the height."

Several private letters state, that Junot had demanded tonnage for 21,000 men, of which number 10,000 horse. Our brave army, as might naturally be expected, was by no means satisfied with the Convention; and these distinguished heroes could not help regretting that such inadequate justice had been done to their splendid victories.

It was on the 14th that our troops entered Lisbon. On the following day, Rear-Admiral Tyler, with the Barfleur, Conqueror, Alfred, Donegal, Hercule, Elizabeth, and Ruby sailed from Lisbon with the whole of the Russian fleet for Spithead, except one ship, which was left in the Tagus to undergo some repairs. The following letter gives some particulars:—

"Portsmouth, Sept. 29.—Arrived the Podargus, 18, Captain Hellard, from Lisbon; she brings information that the Convention made by Sir Hew Dalrymple was carried into effect. The first division of Junot's army were embarked, and laying at anchor outside of the Castle (Belem) ready to sail. The Barfleur 98, Rear-Admiral Tyler, Capt. M'Leod; Conqueror, 74, Capt. Fellowes; Alfred, 74, Capt. Bligh; Donegal, 80, Capt. Malcolm; Hercule, 74, Hon. Capt. Colville; Elizabeth, 74, Hon. Capt. Curzon; and Ruby, 64, Captain Draper, sailed from the Tagus on the 12th instant, in charge of the Russian fleet for England, having only one of them three.—The British troops were in possession of Lisbon two days before the Podargus sailed, which was on the 13th."

We have received a private letter from Lisbon, which states, that the publication of the Proclamation signed by Generals Beresford and Kellermann, has created the utmost discontent in the French army. General Junot in particular was perfectly enraged at the loss of his plunder, and has issued a formal protest against the interpretation which General Kellermann has put on the Convention. On the other hand, Kellermann contends that the interpretation was correct, but says he did not intend that the Proclamation should be published, as it will ruin him in the estimation of the French Army.

It appears certain, that Marshal Lannes has gone to meet his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, in order to receive his Majesty on the confines of his Empire, and conduct him to Erfurth, where the two Emperors of France and Russia are to have a meeting. All the Princes composing the Confederation of the Rhine are, it is said, making great preparations to set out to Erfurth, whose, it is supposed, his Majesty the Emperor of the French will spend some days. Already 500 men of the French Imperial Guards arrived at Mentz on the 14th ult: having been forwarded in carriages.

Last Wednesday the Swedish Ambassador introduced Lieut.-Colonel Gyllenskold to his Majesty. This distinguished Officer, who is his Swedish Majesty's First Adjutant of the Navy, was the bearer of the flag taken by Admiral Hood from the Russian ship Sevolod, of 74. He also delivered to his Majesty a letter written by the King of Sweden, with which his Majesty seemed highly pleased. We understand it contained, among other things, a request that his Majesty would grant permission to his brave Officers to receive such tokens of the esteem of that Monarch as he felt himself bound to offer them.

The Cork Expedition, under the command of Sir David Baird, together with the troops which are to meet him at Falmouth, is, we believe, decidedly destined for Italy; the great part of the army now in Portugal goes to Spain, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore. A Commissary was sent to Corunna, about a fortnight ago, to make the necessary provisions for from thirty to forty thousand infantry, and five or six thousand cavalry. This is certainly one of the most important, and at the same time one of the most delicate, commands that ever was entrusted to an officer.

The following regiments are under orders for immediate embarkation :—The 7th Hussars (Lord Paget's); the 10th, or Prince's Own; the 11th and 12th Light Dragoons; the 15th Hussars; and the 16th Light Dragoons.

The transports with the troops from the Downs have arrived at Falmouth, where it is hoped they have, before this, been joined by the Expedition from Cork.

The Order of Government to the Transport Office, respecting the conveyance of the French prisoners in Portugal, mentions their number to be 24,800 men.

His Royal Highness the Duke of York was summoned to attend the consultation of Ministers, upon the question of recalling Sir Hew Dalrymple. Upon being informed of the subject of discussion, it is said, his Royal Highness politely declined to interfere. He had a respect, he said, for the private character of that Officer; but as he had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with his appointment to the command in Portugal, a measure of which he knew nothing until it had actually taken place, he could not now meddle in the business.

Generals Dalrymple and Whitelocke were for some time closely connected as Governor and Deputy Governor of Guernsey.

The dispatch of Sir Hew Dalrymple, which accompanied the Convention, gives a reference to the bearer, Captain Dalrymple, for explanations. It is said that when Captain Dalrymple was called in by the Cabinet Council, to give those explanations, he burst into tears, and retired after some ineffectual attempts to force himself to speak.

Sir Hew Dalrymple is shortly expected from Portugal. Sir H. Burrard takes the command of the army, pro tempore. The Duke of York is expected to take the command of the forces in that country.

By the Cuckoo schooner, which has arrived at Plymouth from Gijon, letters have been received from Madrid of the 9th; from Valladolid of the 13th, and from Gijon of the 16th ult. It appears that the Spanish armies are rapidly concentrating themselves, for the purpose of driving the French from the strong positions they occupy behind the Ebro. According to the last accounts, General Blake had reached his position at Reynosa, and was going to occupy Biscay and Guipuscoa, assisted by the Asturian army. General Cuesta was marching to support his right. General Castanos had left Madrid with his cavalry, and was going to Burgos; his infantry were advancing to Sorreia. General Llamas was marching to join General Palafox. The French under Moncey had attempted to surprize General Palafox at Tudela, but he effected his retreat to Saragossa, upon which the French changed their route, and directed their march towards General Blake.

Lieutenant-Colonel Rainy, of the 1st battalion of the 60th regiment of foot, has been lately tried by a Court-Martial at Kingston, Jamaica, on several charges of misconduct in respect to regimental business, and sentenced to be cashiered.

Wednesday, a Court of Directors was held at the India House, when Capt. Tweedale was sworn into the command of the ship Perseverance, consigned to Madras and China.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

The Lord Mayor has appointed an especial Court of Common Council to be held at the Guildhall, at twelve o'clock on Tuesday next, to consider of an Address to his Majesty, for an inquiry into the cause of the late disgraceful Convention in Portugal.

Among the articles saved from the effects of the fire which destroyed Covent-Garden Theatre, not the least remarkable is the Cap of Liberty, which used to be suspended over the Head of the Chairman of the Beef-steak Club. This curious relic, which was presented to the Club by the celebrated John Wilkes, was dug out of the ruins yesterday sennight, without having received the slightest injury. A very large gridiron, belonging to the Club, and which is nearly a century old, has also been recovered.

Friday afternoon four waggons loaded with dollars, set out from the Bank to Portsmouth, to be shipped for Spain; they were escorted by a party of the Life Guards.

Some years since Mrs. Jordan was playing at Margate Theatre, with a new performer, an Irishman, and when he was to have kissed her, she turned her head so as to present her ear. "Och, by Jasus, then," exclaimed the Hibernian, "I'll be d—mn'd if I kiss you at all—if you won't let me play my part as a man should—you may do it all yourself." And with this he walked off amidst a roar of laughter.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived in town from Windsor, at the Queen's Palace, where he was received by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Kent, Cambridge, and Cumberland.

At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty :—

The Earl of Portarlington, on his promotion to be Lieutenant-Colonel of the 10th Regiment of Foot; Sir Robert Barlow, on his appointment to be Commissary of Chatham; Colonel Lieut. Britto, of the Portuguese Royal Navy; Capt.-Lieut. Pinto, of the Portuguese Royal Navy; Mr. Mariens, Commissary; Captain Schomberg, Commissary of the Royal Navy; and Sir Francis Heartwell, on his appointment to be Deputy Commissioner of the Navy; the Marquis de la Romana; Gen. Adrian Facombe; Colonel Josef O'Donnell; Admiral Apodaca; Capt. de la Lorenzo; Viscount Materosa; Captain Chambers; Count Belcimo, &c. &c.

His Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers.

FEMALE FASHIONS FOR THE PRESENT MONTH.

The unfavourable weather which has marked some part of the last month, has called forth somewhat earlier than usual the silk pelisse, which, with those of shawl muslin, lined with sarsenet of agreeably contrasted shades, are very well adapted as a shelter from the chills of autumn. These pelisses are usually worn with turbans, or small French poke bonnets, formed of the same material; as also with bonnets of straw, of the complete cottage form, with bands and tufts of folded sarsenet, or silk handkerchiefs of orange and green, or purple and amber shot. Black French chips of the jockey form, with a small bunch of variegated chinaster in front, display much novelty and animation. Gipsy hats are still seen in the morning ramble, or in the stroll on the sea-beach; but they give place, in point of novelty and comfort, to the palm bonnet, of figured sarsenet, which is edged with a deep lace, and formed so as totally to obscure the countenance, except quite in front. In full dress, coloured crape over white satin, or white with painted borders in fruit, or embroidered in autumnal flowers, are very much esteemed. The Polonese vest, and Turkish robe, are remarkable for grace and elegance in this species of costume.—The former is a revived habit, and is particularly calculated to display to advantage a tall and graceful figure. The Turkish robe differs little from what has been often exhibited, except that the sleeves (which are large and full) now meet, in the true Eastern style, the bend of the arm in front, and hanging long, are sloped to a point considerably below the elbow behind; it is also confined with a broad Turkish girdle, fastened in front with three clasps of gold, silver, or jewellery. These robes are chiefly composed of crape, tissue, imperial gauze, or muslin, and variously bordered in gold, silver, chenille, or coloured silks. Dresses of coloured gossamer net, worn over white sarsenet or satin, have a sort of silvery rainbow-lustre, and are remarkable for delicacy and beauty.

The face hoods and tippets are an exceedingly elegant article, and so unique in themselves, that they never can become offensively general. The Pilgrim's hat and mantle, comprising much simplicity and novelty, and when formed of velvet, or Georgian cloth, must be found a very appropriate, and will doubtless become a very fashionable winter article. The Brazilian calf, and emigrée cloak, with the Minerva helmet, are ornaments of considerable elegance; but are best adapted to the carriage costume.

CITY AFFAIRS.

Tuesday, the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised half an assize, or 1d. in the Peck Loaf:—the Quartern Loaf Wheaten, 14½d. and Household, 13½d.

THE NEW SHERIFFS.

Wednesday, according to annual custom, the Sheriffs Elect of London and Middlesex, Mr. Alderman Smith, and Mr. Alderman Hunter, proceeded in full state to Guildhall, to be sworn to the faithful discharge of the important duties of their high office.

The equipages of these gentlemen exhibited on this occasion are very elegant. Their liveries are nearly the same, blue and scarlet, profusely ornamented with very rich gold lace.

Mr. Alderman Smith's carriage is of a deep Maroon colour, tastefully embellished with wreaths of flowers in relief, and the panels surmounted with rich festoons of gold chain. On the body of the carriage the Arms of the City of London, of the Ironmonger's Company, and of the Alderman's family, are painted with equal taste and judgment, and in a superb border to the whole are introduced the arms of Great Britain and Spain with the appropriate crests, military trophies, and other elegant and emblematical devices. On the top of the carriage are gilt crests of the City of London, and the worthy Alderman; and the upper part of the body being compleatly glazed, discover, an elegant lining, with rich yellow silk curtains, very handsomely trimmed, and tastefully festooned, exhibiting a tout-ensemble at once grand and magnificent.

Mr. Alderman Hunter's carriage, equally chaste and magnificent, combines with the splendid elegance of grandeur, the purity of correct taste; the paintings are the work of the choicest masters of the art. The body is of a bright yellow, studded with gold stars, and covered with a rich net work of gold. On an elegant scroll of deep Maroon colour, are painted in relief the Arms of the City of London, of the Merchant Taylors Company, and of the Hunter family. The whole surmounted with a beautiful border of the same colour, with the scroll, on which are painted in relief the Arms of the City of London, encircled with branches of oak, and an elegant emblematical device, representing the full length figure of a British Sailor, waving the Union Flag over the Arms of Great Britain and Spain, illustrative of the happy union in which the two nations are now engaged. The harness of each carriage is of corresponding elegance, very richly gilt.

Friday the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Body Corporate of the City of London, took water at Blackfriars-bridge in their barges, and proceeded with Messrs. Smith and Hunter, the new Sheriffs, to Westminster. The barges were decorated with flags, and the aquatic scene was highly interesting. The civic party landed at Old Palace Yard at two o'clock, and having formed in procession with the city pageantry, walked to the Court of Exchequer, where the Sheriffs were presented to the Cursitor Baron.

The Recorder, J. Sylvester, Esq. made an appropriate speech upon the occasion. He described the new Sheriffs to be perfectly qualified for their important situation. Their commercial pursuits enabled them to protect the rights and privileges of the citizens, and their well known loyalty would prove a polar star to direct them in preserving the principles of the constitution. He also extolled the conduct of the late Sheriffs, and mentioned the vote of thanks to them on a recent occasion. After some preliminary business, the Sheriffs performed the ancient ceremony of cleaving the billet and of counting the hob-nails. The procession then returned by water to Blackfriars; after which the Lord Mayor, &c. dined with the Sheriffs at the London Tavern.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.

Thursday, after an appropriate Sermon preached by the Lord Mayor's Chaplain, a Common Hall was held, for the Election of a Lord Mayor for the ensuing year, when the names of the Aldermen next in rotation were respectively put up, viz. Charles Flower and Thomas Smith, Esqrs.; Sir Matthew Bloxam, Knt. George Scholey, William Domville, and Christopher Smith, Esqrs.; and it appearing that Charles Flower and Thomas Smith, Esqrs. had the majority, they were returned accordingly to the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen then sitting, for their choice of one of them to be Lord Mayor, which upon scrutiny, fell upon Mr. Alderman Flower, who was accordingly declared duly elected.

On being invested with the Chain, in the usual form, the Lord Mayor Elect came forward and addressed the Livery nearly in the following words:—

"GENTLEMEN OF THE LIVERY,—Permit me to return you my most grateful thanks for the very great honour you have this day conferred upon me by electing me Chief Magistrate of the first city in the world.

"Be assured, Gentlemen, my first object shall be to protect the rights and previleges of my fellow-citizens; and I have no doubt that, by a steady attention, and with the assistance of my brethren the Aldermen, I shall be enabled to discharge the duties of the office to your satisfaction. I am well aware of the great necessity there is, in this arduous undertaking, of punctuality and diligence in my attendence, and zeal and impartiality in the exercise of its various duties. You may rest assured, Gentlemen, of my devotion to its service, and of my full determination to promote the welfare and preserve the tranquillity of this Metropolis; and if in the course of the year I should have the good fortune of announcing to you the joyful tidings of a glorious and honourable peace, I shall be highly gratified, but, rather than have it on any other terms, I am ready to spill my last drop of blood in defence of my beloved Sovereign and our glorious Constitution.

Mr. Quin, in a neat speech, proposed a Vote of Thanks to the late Sheriffs, for their constant attendance to their duty while in office, and their constant attendance to the prisoners who had been under their care. The motion was seconded by Mr. Marriott, and carried unanimously. Mr. Waithman moved for its publication in all the Newspapers, which was carried, and the Hall was closed.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. VIII.

Ah! how unlike was he to city priest,
With 'kerchief white and smartly powder'd hair,
Who does the ears of simpering ladies feast,
And minces ev'ry word with nicest care,
And brings from theatre each phrase genteel,
Till nymphs delighted, him, so sweet, declare
The prettiest Preacher, who at once can steal
Their hearts, and wake both mortal love and holy zeal!

Dr. Biblaze's Poems.

REV. JAMES MOORE, LL.B.

EXPERIENCE, amongst all its disadvantages, instructs us to limit our expectations; and I am, therefore, not sanguine enough to hope that any strictures of mine will effect all the good they are designed to accomplish. The managers of the FOUNDLING CHAPEL seem inaccessible to remonstrance, and indifferent to reproof. They, I fear, are incorrigible. Women are still electrified by their system of singing; and men, who cannot be supposed insensible to the melody of anthems, listen to it in astonishment, and even elevate their children, as if it were to see a punch or a cascade, to contemplate the wondrous feats of "two practiced singers." While any respectable portion of the public continues to countenance this deviation from every thing that is decent in religious worship, the voice of an individual, however forcibly raised against it, is heard in vain.

I have before described this chapel as one of our SUNDAY THEATRES. Having considered the music of the place, it will doubtless be expected that I am, if the simile may be allowed, to give some account of the principal actors. Most critics begin with the stage, I have pursued a different practice, but it is not, I trust, too late for me to escape from the orchestra.

The Rev. James Moore, one of the Evening Preachers at the Foundling Chapel, was originally entered of Magdalen College, Cambridge. He is now alternate Morning Minister at Bedford and Portman Chapels, Lecturer of St. Clement Danes, and an Evening Preacher at Margaret Chapel, near Cavendish Square. His celebrity entitles him to notice, and his station exposes him to criticism.

Anecdotes are rumoured concerning this gentleman, to which I must attach little credit; and some particulars are related of him, on which I could feel no pleasure in expatiating. His career has, however, been rather irregular. Owing to an eccentricity common to youth, he was attracted by the charms of theatrical entertainments, and, at an early period of life, quitting his College, he joined the Norwich Company, with which he continued about three years. Whether, as his enemies affirm, Mr. Moore really purposed to take up the histrionic profession, is not for me to judge. As a candidate for clerical honours, his conduct appears to have been in this instance seriously reprehensible. He experienced much difficulty in returning to those sacred pursuits which he seemed to have abandoned; and, what is infinitely to be regretted, doubts have since been entertained, however groundlessly, even of his sincerity. Let him sedulously efface all impressions unfavourable to his own character, and injurious to the great cause in which he is now engaged. Purity of life, soundness of doctrine, and energy of exertion, furnish the best defence that christian teachers can oppose to the accusations of their adversaries. It is not enough if the minister of religion stands chargeable with no positive improprieties. He must not content himself with negative holiness. He must rise above even the imagination of evil imputations. He must not only be unimpeached, but unsuspected; not only guiltless, but spotless.

Mr. Moore, I believe, is indebted for much of his publicity to the Rev. Mr. Haslewood, a gentleman at whom I lately glanced. Mr. Haslewood, indeed, is of importance in this metropolis. He is commonly of importance, as one of those who trade in chapels; and, considered as the earliest and most efficient friend of Mr. Moore, he demands mention in this place. The traffic in chapels, to which I have incidentally adverted, is carried on to such an extent as to have become one of the most lucrative branches of commerce. There is now as much of religious as of mercantile speculation. Churchmen and methodists are almost equally competitors in the market of piety. Each of the parties erect, or purchase, religious edifices; but, actuated by motives as prudential as praiseworthy, they both contrive, while consulting the good of souls, to have constantly reference to "those things which are necessary as well for the body as the soul." Wise in their generation, while they manage the affairs relating to another world, they have respect to the chief concern of the world in which they at present exist.

Placed in situations propitious to the display of his talents, Mr. Moore was soon ranked among the fashionable divines of the age. He had also the fortune to attract the Committee of the Foundling, who, anxious to secure what they considered to be a superior acquisition to their chapel, engaged with Mr. Moore, under circumstances manifesting the most uncommon liberality on their part, as an alternate Evening Preacher. I do not say their selection was infelicitous; but I will assert, that the object of it is in the possession only of factitious popularity.

Mr. Moore has committed to the world "A Sermon preached, on Tuesday, January 3, 1804, at the Presentation of Colours, by the Countess of Harrington, as representative of Her Majesty, to the Queen's Royal Regiment of Volunteers," &c. &c. The author, it appears, was Honorary Chaplain to this Volunteer Regiment, which circumstance, most unfortunately for his literary reputation, compelled the Corps to do him the honour of requesting him to print what he had preached. If any judgment is to be formed of his abilities, from this address, for I cannot dignify it with the title of sermon, to his countrymen, Mr. Moore has nothing to apprehend from criticism——but its neglect. . . . . .

Public speakers often owe so much of their success to their manner, that the matter of their discourses remains wholly uninvestigated. This inattention, however, especially as it affects the pulpit, is most devoutly to be deprecated. While such solicitude is constantly shewn as to the delivery of sermons, let us not always forget the materials of which they happen to be composed.

Mr. Moore is a polite preacher. His style is florid and diffuse, his voice accurately regulated, his person rather prepossessing, his dress calculated to display his personal graces, and his action studied. He is throughout artificial. He enters the pulpit with all imaginable decorum; when he prays, he turns up his eyes just far enough to allow them to descend with occasional gracefulness; when he preaches, he theatrically endeavours to suit the action to the word, and, sometimes, the word to the action. He, however, has his awkwardnesses. Eager to be animated, he has the appearance of prancing round in his pulpit; and he addresses himself too much to the galleries. He scarcely notices the audience beneath him. Such is Mr. Moore——theatric in his tones and gesticulation, superficial in his attainments, and, of course, ineffectual as to the higher purposes of divinity.

England does not want frivolous preachers; and the times, the awfully eventful times in which we live, require divines of far different characters! When "judgments" the most calamitous "are abroad in the earth," if the people are to "learn righteousness," it must be from the lips of those who "minister in holy things." Alas! who are, what are, too many of those who still serve at our altars! How few pastors will be able to render up faithful account to the great "Shepherd of Souls;" each severally exclaiming, with almost unutterable transport, in that last and dreadful day,——"Lo! here am I, and those whom thou hast given me!" Let us not trifle with the sacerdotal office. It is a terrible trust, an everlasting responsibility, which preachers assume and incur. Either they are the most honourable, or they are the most deplorable, of men. If they are not the objects of our highest veneration, they must become the subjects of our most perfect detestation. The priesthood, I fear, is regarded too much as a profession only. Professional in some respects it certainly may be termed; but he who goes to a pulpit as to a desk, to a church as to a counter, or who enters into orders as he would into the army, such a one, whosoever he is, would do well to interrogate and examine himself thoroughly. Should this course of reflection seem severe, let it be remembered that circumstances demand severity.

ONESIMUS.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Tuesday last a fashionable play, entitled The Mysterious Bride, exactly suited to the present taste, and supported by the kindness of the Managers, and a judicious audience, during three representations last season, was acted before one of those unfashionable and tasteless assemblies of REASONABLE beings, who find no wit in Mr. Dibdin's puns, no probability in Mr. Reynold's plots, no interest in Mr. Hook's melodramas, and no novelty in Mr. Kelly's music. The consequences were such as might be expected, hissing loud and long. The author, Mr. Skeffington, of fashionable celebrity, who never thought (grounding his opinion on the experience of the past) that so many sensible people should meet together in a play-house, had in a frolicsome humour seized his painting brushes, and applying them to paper traced a hasty sketch, and fancied he had depicted men and manners with more than Shakespearian accuracy. This sketch was admired by our wise managers, badly performed by our most indifferent actors, Raymond, De Camp, and the charming Mrs. H. Siddons excepted, and on Tuesday last, hissed most heroically by all the men of sense, perhaps, which this metropolis contains. We say heroically, for there is something bold in daring to oppose folly, in such an age as ours, when it is grown a giant, which none but adventurous knight-errants can assail, with seldom any chance of conquering. The plot of this play is wild and extravagant, evidently taken from some bad imitation of Mrs. Ratcliff's romances, or pillaged from the French. The language possesses neither strength nor elegance: humour and wit, if present, were so disguised that the quickest eye could not trace them out, and the interest, which ought to have consisted in the mystery, was by its developement in the beginning of the first act, totally annihilated.

However undeserving of public applause we conceive Mr. Skeffington's play to have been, we must own that the treatment which it experienced from some of the performers was shameful, and calculated to obliterate its merits if it had any.——Mrs. Harlowe, conscious perhaps that she was misplaced in a fine lady's part, and desirous to give more dignity to her delivery, resolved to imitate a preacher at a Quakers' meeting, and left a solemn pause between every syllable she pronounced, as thus: "What-can-de—lay his re—turn," which rendered her most serious speeches ludicrous. Mr. H. Siddons's pauses were of a different nature: they generally occurred when his conductor had finished what he had to say, and lasted till the loud voice of the prompter recalled his wandering memory. Mr. Putnam's, though not quite so frequent, proved more fatal, for his last continued so long, that it outlived the patience of the audience, who by a tremendous discharge of hisses and offs, drowned the assisting accents of the prompter, and compelled the curtain to fall.

In a few minutes Mr. Russell made his appearance to speak the epilogue. But neither his usual grin of unmeaning satisfaction, nor the display of his white teeth could pacify the audience. His countenance, at last, and we really believe for the first time on the stage, assumed a serious appearance, and an expression very different from coxcombical vanity. After some fruitless endeavours to be heard, he wisely retired in compliance to the reiterated commands of an irritated public.

A Magician, yclept Elliston, armed with more power, and commanding more spirits than Prospero in his enchanted Island, no sooner came forward to speak the prologue to The Three and the Deuce, than the mighty storm of discontent instantly subsided. During the course of this excellent afterpiece, in which he continued to prove himself far superior to all the comedians on all our country and London stages, the most perfect good humour reigned throughout the assembly, and loud bursts of applause and laughter alone disturbed the peace of the evening.

We rejoice to see that the spark of taste and judicious severity which flashed forth on Tuesday last among the audience that crowded Drury Lane, was not a fleeting gleam of light extinguished as soon as perceived. It blazed anew with increased splendour on Thursday night, in the same house, when The Fortune Teller, a musical After-piece, was acted for the first time. Should it continue to display itself so appropriately, we may hope that in a short time managers will prefer real sense, genuine wit, morality, and interest, to the nonsense in the plays which they bring forward, and that the reproach of degeneracy will then be hurled against our stage, only by ill-founded dissatisfaction, and disappointed imbecility.

The plot of the Fortune Teller is uninteresting and improbable. A young lady of fortune falls in love with a soldier, wins his affections under the garb of a person little above him in the scale of rank, and thus disguised, hires a lodging in his father's cottage, where his sister also lives, and which is situated on her own estate, 'till then left to the care of an ambitious and unjust steward. There, learning that her soldier is coming with his regiment in the neighbourhood, she disguises herself as a fortune teller, meets him on his way, and tells him that he is born to be rich; mentions the name of Emma, under which he had known her, as that of his future wife, and leaves him in astonishment. She then writes to her steward that she intends to repair to her country seat that same evening. He gives directions to his son (a country booby whom he had sent in vain to London to quicken his wit), to put on his new suit of clothes, and exert all his faculties to please her, and try to obtain her hand. Instead of obeying his father's injunctions, the young man gets drunk, seeks the soldier's sister in her own cottage, and, whilst running after her to kiss her, is locked up in a room by her cunning. The lady reaches her mansion; the steward looks in vain for his son, and sets out to seek him at night, with a servant. They hear him breaking a door, and meeting him, lead him home still intoxicated. The soldier returns, and, with his sister, repairs to the lady of the manor, to complain of the steward's son's behaviour. There they find the latter in a new suit of clothes, cursing the tightness of his boots, and trying to recover from the embarrassment in which his introduction to his lady had plunged him. The soldier knows his Emma, who, we suppose, declares her intention of marrying him, for the hissings which we had long expected, at last burst forth with ten-fold loudness. The repeated cries of off! off! thundered incessantly till the curtain dropped, and the unabated tumult prevented us from hearing whether it had been announced a second time for representation.

The only claim which this after piece laid to public approbation, was its music. Some of the songs were very pretty, but could boast little novelty. Three of them brought French tunes to our remembrance too powerfully not to convince us we had heard them in their native land, and that they had been slily imported here by Mr. Reeve. Mrs. Mountain sang delightfully, as well as Mrs. Bland. Mr. Bannister, Mr. Mathews, Wewitzer, and Penley, exerted all their abilities in support of this after-piece; but to the honour of the public be it said, that the display of so much talent, however brilliant, did not dazzle their eyes, and blind them to the imperfections of the piece. The author, whoever he be, cannot lay his condemnation to the charge of the performers. Had his plot been novel, the incidents interesting, the language, if not elegant, at least good, he might have experienced a different fate. In the present case, it is the rider who could not keep his seat through his total ignorance of horsemanship, and not his beast that fell through stubbornness or restiveness.

KING'S THEATRE.

Last Monday evening, the Covent-garden Company made their appearance at this Theatre. The house was filled rather than crowded; and although the boxes had been dismantled of their drapery, so as in a great measure to connect the company in each circle, the house did not, and perhaps from the very nakedness consequent upon this disrobing what was never intended to be disrobed, assume that brilliancy which it might have been expected to display. The performances were ushered in by the tune of 'God save the King', which was played while the whole audience stood; and immediately after this, the curtain rose, when in came Mr. Kemble in a Court-dress, and made an introductory speech, of which the following is the substance:—

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

"I know not how to express the very sincere feelings with which I stand before you upon the present occasion; and I am equally ignorant how to thank you for the very flattering marks of your favour, with which I am now, and have long been, honoured. I feel I shall not be able to state, in the collected manner I could wish, the object for which I at present stand before you; and I beg you to impute that failure to any other cause, than a want of respect to those whom I have the honour of addressing.

"Ladies and Gentlemen—Immediately after the late destruction of the Theatre Royal in Covent-garden, I trust the Proprietors paid that humane attention to its workmen and dependents to which they were justly entitled: and I also trust they have lost no time in preparing to resume their share of contribution to the amusements of this Metropolis, by engaging and fitting up for your reception the house in which we are now assembled. We have, however, to ask great indulgences at your hands: and we must be forgiven if we do not represent the productions of our Poets with all those illusions of scenery, habits, and decorations, which the Proprietors formerly spared no expence to provide, and no occasion to bring forward. In the Theatre of the Italian Opera, to which we have been compelled to have recourse, we are naturally not so well provided to give life to the works of our native Poets; and we must make large drafts upon your indulgence. Permit me, however, to state, that we shall make daily progress in bettering our present provision, and shall immediately set about to erect a new Theatre, such as we think will be worthy of the Metropolis where it is situated, and in which we hope to be able to receive you by next September."

The performance followed, and only proved how unfit so large a Theatre is for the representation of any thing worth hearing.

FAILURE IN THE CITY.

Wednesday one of the greatest failures that has occurred for some time took place at the Stock-Exchange. Messrs. Walsh and Nesbitt declared themselves unable to answer the demands on them. They were the Contractors for the two last Lotteries, for the City Lottery, and were bidders also for the Lottery that was contracted for the other day. The property involved in their failure is immense.

Thursday, Mr. Capel and Mr. Wilson, two gentlemen of great respectability, at the Stock Exchange, waited, at the request of the creditors, on Messrs. Walsh and Nesbitt, at Clapton, when the latter gentleman made a thorough confession of the state of their affairs. Their creditors are chiefly persons in the Stock Exchange, to the amount of more than 200,000*l.* The assets to pay these debts consist chiefly in the houses which fell to the lot of the City Tickets; some few thousand pounds owing by two Noble Lords; 10,000*l.* in the Chamber of the City of London, which was left as a deposit on the third City Lottery, but which is now relinquished; a few thousand pounds owing by persons for Tickets; their own two houses at Clapton, valued at 20,000*l.* and a seat in a certain House, estimated at 3000*l.* amounting in the whole to about 150,000*l.* If the City Houses, valued at 102,000*l.* shall fetch the sum they are estimated at. They also confessed, that about 80 or 70,000*l.* of the Subscribers to the Lottery's money had been expended in what is known by the name of Gobbling Tickets in the late Lottery. What brought these Gentlemen in a stoppage at this time, is apprehended to be their having lost the 4th Lottery, and their having the remaining City-Lottery, Exchequer-bills for which they had at this time to complete. They endeavoured to give it up, but the City tied them to their contract.

ENGLISH PRISONERS IN FRANCE

Through some Gentlemen who have just arrived from France, the most affecting accounts have been received of the state of our countrymen, who are prisoners in that country. At Bische, Valenciennes, Arras, Cambray, Verdun, and Sarre Louis, which are the principal depots, there are no less than 8000 English prisoners, who are treated in a manner not only unworthy of the character of a civilized nation, but inconsistent with the feelings which humanity generally preserves even in a savage state. The pay of the seamen, who compose nearly the whole of these prisoners, has been recently reduced from three half pence to three farthings per day, which is a sum obviously inadequate to furnish them with any subsistence fit for the food of man. But the Agents of the Government seem indifferent to the fate of those unhappy beings, or rather perhaps anxious to consign them to the grave. With this view they are confined in subterraneous cells and other noxious places, where, particularly at Bische, Arras, and Sarre Louis, they are daily dying. The treatment of the Officers is somewhat less inhuman. They are divided into classes of ten each, and the whole of each class is rendered responsible for the conduct of each of its members. Thus if one misbehaves or exceeds his parole, the other nine are imprisoned, and can only expect relief or mitigation of rigour through the medium of bribery. This is very well understood, and the terms universally known. An Officer who is imprisoned with several others in a house incapable of affording tolerable accommodation, is told without disguise, that for a louis and a half he may obtain his removal to another house, where the prisoners are less numerous and the accommodation better, and that for another louis he may recover his liberty to walk at large within the boundaries. These bribes go into the pockets of military officers, who have the command of these depots, and who can discriminate with as much accuracy as a London watchman what description of persons are good subjects to be mulcted. Such of the detenues as are known to possess good property or connexions in England are furnished with every thing for which they can afford to pay, or can hold out the prospect of security. But those who are poor are involved in the utmost wretchedness.

The Cæsar, of 84 guns, and the Malta, of 80 guns, have arrived at Plymouth from the Mediterranean. They sailed from [illegible] on the 10th. They left of the former place ten sail of the line. A rumour had reached the squadron, that one of the ships at Toulon had mutinied, which seemed somewhat probable, as one of the squadron was observed to have been warped up the harbour and dismantled.

PORTSMOUTH, SEPT. 30.—The Triton brings word that the India fleet, outward-bound, sailed from the Cape on the 25th June, having taken in troops there. There were four sail of outward-bound Indiamen at St. Helena when they touched; no transports at the Cape when they sailed: the Flora, Clark, was at Algoa Bay, loading wood for the Cape.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A shocking accident happened on Wednesday to Mr. Bilton, a Mealman, at Stowe, near Colebrook, whilst he was returning home from London. Mr. Bilton had purchased a very fine horse at a sale, which turned out to be restive, and in going along Piccadilly the animal took fright at the sounding of a horn; the rider chastising him, he reared, fell over, and killed Mr. B. on the spot, by a fracture on his head. The animal was so stunned, that he lay as dead for some time.

Thursday night between eight and nine o'clock a fire broke out in the workshop of Mr. Burbery, cabinet-maker, in George-street, North Audley-street. The flames in a short time extended to the forge and work place of Mr. Thrupp, a smith, whose premises were adjoining to the former. A vast quantity of mahogany, satin and other valuable wood were destroyed; Mr. Burbery's, and another dwelling-house sustained partial injury.

Friday morning, between five and six o'clock, a fire broke out in the back part of a house situated in Castle-street, Long-acre, and adjoining the top of little St. Martin's-lane. In a few minutes after the bursting forth of the flames, six houses were discovered to be on fire, and no effort whatever could save the furniture they contained, or even the walls, from total destruction. Happily, however, no lives have been lost; the inhabitants made their escape soon after the alarm was given; but many of them have not only lost their furniture, but even had not time to dress themselves before the violence of the flames compelled them to seek their own personal safety. The fire is supposed to have originated in a back apartment of a house in Castle-street, where a sick person resided; and if the wind had been in any other direction, great part of Long-acre must have fallen a sacrifice to the flames, as several extensive coach-manufactories closely adjoin the scene of devastation.

A few days ago, as a fine girl, about nine years old, the only child of Mrs. Jones, of the Rose and Crown, St. Martin's-lane, was crossing the street, she was rode over by a gentleman on horseback, who was riding at full speed; she received so violent a contusion on the head, that no hopes are entertained of her recovery. The Gentleman's name has not as yet been discovered.

Robert Bell and George Ralph Cornett, two sea-faring men, were charged at Bow-street with behaving in a riotous manner in the Coffee-room, at the King's Theatre. Donaldson, a Constable, who attends the Theatre, stated, that near the conclusion of the performance he found the Prisoners in the Coffee-room, adjoining the Boxes, behaving in a very riotous manner, and insulting many persons, which caused a general cry of "Turn them out!" Witness interfered to preserve the peace, when Bell assaulted him, and gave him a violent blow on the face, which cut it, and caused a great effusion of blood. Witness, however, with the assistance of Limbrick, another Officer, secured the Prisoners. Mr Brandon also gave evidence to the Prisoners' violent conduct, who, in excuse, said they were intoxicated at the time. They were ordered to find bail, to answer the complaint of the Constable, and for the riot.

DIED.

Professor Porson.—This Gentleman, who was one of the greatest scholars in Europe, and particularly in knowledge of the Greek language, died on Sunday last, at the London Institution, of which he was Librarian. Unhappily his prudence was not correspondent with his talents, and a devotion to the bottle had gradually been preparing that state of health which was expected to put a period to his life long ago. He was social and entertaining in private life; nor was there the pride of the scholar observable in his general intercourse with society. It is much to be regretted, that his great talents and profound attainments should thus have destroyed, in the meridian of life, a man who might otherwise have been the luminary of literature and science.

At Brighton, the Countess of Shipbrook, relict of Francis, Earl of Shipbrook.

On Sunday last, at Warwick, in her 85th year, Mrs Dorothy Mordaunt, the mother of Sir James Mordaunt, Bart. and aunt to the present Representative for Warwick.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-ONE.

FOREIGN POLITICS.—THE ARMY.

We will not be accused of laying claims to an extraordinary share of political foresight, in asserting that the short space of twelve months will decide, whether this country shall maintain that preponderance among nations, which its extraordinary opulence, its local advantages, but, above all, its institutions entitle it to claim; or descend rapidly from that height it now pre-eminently stands on. There are, we believe, few in the habit of reflecting on such subjects, who will pretend to deny this assertion. If this be taken as an incontrovertible fact, how much cause for awful reflection does it afford on one side, and how many motives for exultation on the other? If the short period, which is to fix the destinies of England, perhaps, for ever, occasion some degree of perturbation, when we take our incalculable resources into contemplation, all the occurrences of our time, unauspicious and unprecedented as they may seem, ought to have no other result than to contribute to national security and aggrandisement. This is no over-sanguine or extravagant speculation; for it requires only a few preliminary observations to be convinced that these events, if prudently managed, will produce this decisive effect. We are placed unalterably in this portentous situation; and much are we indebted to that superintending Power, who regulates the destinies of Nations, that such is our state. Communities, like individuals, are subject to plethoric diseases; and the extraordinary exertions, we are reduced to the necessity of making, will dissipate the enervating humours of overgrown luxury and riches. Our unlimited commerce, with its concomitant vices, would have rendered the country a huge, bloated, and unwieldy mass; and every principle of life and action become morbid and stagnant. The electric shock of the Revolution has effectually roused us out of this lethargic indulgence, and caused a more rapid and sounder circulation through the arteries of the State.

If our danger be great, our means of resisting and overcoming it are still more considerable. If the enemy we have to contend with be active, persevering, bold, perfidious, comprehensive in crime and intellect, we have resources of a physical and moral nature, if we have judgment to employ them, which place us beyond the influence of contingencies. It is laid down as an axiom by Philosophers and Statesmen, that the energies of a people are proportionate to the freedom they enjoy: Let us take the instructive hint; and by strictly adhering to the political precepts of a free Government, we will be able to display the same miraculous efforts, which liberal institutions have generated in every age and country. We do not mean to insinuate on this occasion the necessity of introducing any innovation in the laws we already possess; but let impartiality in the choice of Officers and Magistrates; veneration for merit and virtue, and a generous disregard to the exclusive pretensions of birth and fortune, be conspicuous in our subsequent conduct and arrangements. This is the secret of greatness and independence; and it was the observance of the foregoing precepts, which raised the Romans, from their original state of shepherds and outlaws, to that pre-eminence they had so deservedly acquired.

Our Armies have now reached the place of their destination. They have already given unequivocal proofs of their distinguished bravery and discipline; and their success at Roleia and Vimiera is a sufficient security that their future exploits will be equal to their reputation and the hopes of their country. Great are our expectations from the effects of their intrepidity and patriotism; and, with triumphant pride, we anticipate the moment, when, at the foot of the Pyrenees, they will add to the laurels they have already acquired. The ground is propitious and ominous of victory. What glorious recollections will it excite! What splendid memorials of British heroism did it formerly display.—Peterborough!—The very name of that illustrious citizen and soldier is sufficient to ward off a calamity which the country seems to apprehend: And if the present Ministers, from some of whom we are justified to expect much, have the courage to insist that the fate of our Army shall not depend on the temerity or folly of an incompetent individual, whose name recalls only defeat and disgrace, they will render their Administration as sacred to Englishmen, as that which placed a Churchill and a Peterborough at the head of our Forces. Let them make only a similar choice, the country has not certainly degenerated in genius and virtue; and our intrepid warriors will tear from the claws of the Corsican Eagle the prey it has so perfidiously acquired. Sincerely do we hope, they will not try, from complacency or weakness, a dangerous experiment. The responsibility, in case of disaster, will fall heavily on their heads. The execrations of their country, cries of vengeance on the part of the relatives of our sacrificed soldiers, the lamentations of eleven millions of Spaniards, the overthrow of the Austrian dynasty, the total subjugation of Europe, are not to be hazarded inadvertently and with impunity. These are motives sufficiently powerful to inspire with a sense of duty the most worthless and basest of men, how much more so the friends and disciples of the greatest of our Statesmen! But let us drop this subject for a moment, and resume one more congenial to our feelings and wishes.

It is a matter of serious and pressing consideration to determine, if our army should form one great body, or be divided into several corps, and act on several points. This is a momentous question, and deserves the closest investigation. The sentiment seems to be universally prevalent, that the latter mode of operation would be more advisable. The principal argument in support of this opinion appears to be, that by detaching a considerable part of our force to the coast of Calabria, or to the Adriatic, we should divide the attention of the French, and perhaps place the legitimate Sovereign on the throne of Naples. The latter circumstance would undoubtedly be a most desirable object; but considerable doubts may be entertained whether our sending twenty thousand men to Calabria would produce such a result. The Neapolitans may be disposed to insurrection in favour of their exiled Monarch; but when we reflect on the dishonourable compromise which the greater part of the Nobility entered into with their oppressors, there is reason to apprehend that the former, so far from contributing to such an event, would make every effort to counteract it. The French, however, will be obliged to keep an army of forty to fifty thousand men in Italy, the greater part of which they will employ in the south, to maintain the tranquillity of that peninsula. With such a formidable force in the country we doubt very much if the Natives will have the courage to make any exertions in favour of their independence. If that be the case we should keep to no purpose 30,000 men in Sicily. But should our whole army, on the contrary, be collected in Spain, amounting, we will suppose, to about 60,000, the enemy would be either compelled to withdraw the greatest part of his force from Italy, and thus endanger the loss of that important possession; or be unable to oppose an effectual resistance to the united strength of Great Britain and Spain beyond the Pyrenees. This subject requires the maturest reflection. The principal object of this war should be to weaken on the Continent the opinion of French invincibility;—should we have the fortune to triumph over the enemy, and, in conjunction with our Allies, expel them from Navarre, overwhelmed with shame and disgrace, this effect is immediately produced. It is then we can reckon on insurrections in Italy and other countries; and then would be the time to fly to their assistance. This plan of operations has manifest and decisive advantages; for whilst it distracts the attention of the enemy, and compels them to withdraw a considerable part of their force from Germany, it gives Austria a chance of prosecuting the war with vigour and success, and affords Italy some prospect of salvation.

But all these reflections are as problematical, as they are momentous, until it be decided who is to conduct the operations of our army. It is unnecessary to recur to history to be convinced that the talents and the reputation of the Commander decide the events of a campaign; the experience of our own time confirm, but too painfully, the justice of the observation. Whilst the affairs of Europe are approaching every day nearer and nearer to a crisis, which decides our fate in common with that of other Nations, we dare not proceed beyond gentle insinuations and delicate insinuations, relative to the appointment to the chief command. If there be any man in this country, who does not discover in such conduct a well-founded cause for alarm and anxiety, though we may be astonished at his resolution, we cannot avoid entertaining a very suspicious opinion of his heart and his understanding. Every thing that is sacred to man, is in danger, and, in the distress and perturbation of such a state, we are as anxious about trifling considerations, as if we existed in times of the profoundest security. What has occasioned this futility and relaxation in the national character? Are we fully aware of the danger that menaces us? Do we sufficiently appreciate the genius and the perfidy of the enemy? Would to Heaven! that no fatal experience might teach us the extent of his resources, and the destructive tendency of his projects. Every day furnishes a new proof of his versatility, dissimulation and insatiable ambition; and we look to the consolidation of his power and his indefatigable pursuit of new acquisitions, with an indifference, which does not do much honour to our judgment and foresight. Englishmen! the modern Philip is more ambitious, more profligate, and a more inveterate enemy of our freedom and country, than is imagined. His resources are as various, as his designs are flagitious. This moment to conciliate Russia, and render her subservient to his will, he orders his agents to circulate the report of an insurrection in Petersburg, and the arrestation of Alexander. The gross fabrication is immediately transmitted to this country, in order that the unwarrantable observations of our journalists may confirm the infatuation and dependence of that ill-fated Monarch.

Against such an individual more than ordinary precaution is necessary. But all our energy and foresight will be useless if the direction of our affairs be confided to incompetent persons. If every particle of individual virtue and public spirit be not extinct; if we set any value on the privileges we have acquired by the glorious exertions of our forefathers, we will jealously and conscientiously examine the merits of the man, to whom our fortunes and those of our Allies are to be intrusted. We repeat it again and again, who is to command the formidable army we have sent to the Continent? We feel no antipathy or prejudice against any of the candidates, we will particularise no one; but we have a right, in common with the rest of our countrymen, to insist strenuously that the merits of the officer, to whom this important command will be confided, be strictly investigated.

There is something peculiarly vile and repulsive in the base insinuations, which some hireling writers throw out against the men, who have the courage and the honesty to expose themselves to calumny, and, perhaps, to danger, to prevent the dishonour of the army and country. But what is the country, or its interests to men, who, in opposition to their conviction and conscience, have the infamy to bestow the titles of factious and disaffected on those, who resist an appointment, which they secretly disapprove of themselves? Do they reflect on the injury they do the community by thus calumniating the zeal and courage of a few honest men? Are they so callous, so dead to every generous feeling, as not to know that their sycophancy and want of principle may contribute to the destruction or captivity of our whole regular army? Is it possible that they can be so profligate or so stupidly ignorant as to term faction the united disapprobation of the people and army, and even of the most enlightened members of the Ministry; whilst, according to the same jesuitical logic, only a few infallible and truly disinterested retainers at the Horse Guards, and one or two Morning Papers, afford exclusive proofs of patriotism and loyalty. We know to estimate the professions and civism of those arch-patriots: and should they have the misfortune to triumph over the feelings and good sense of their country, they will, sooner or later, have cause to bewail the mischief they contributed to occasion.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, SEPT. 20.—The grand army now on its march for Spain, will, it is confidently asserted, be commanded by the Emperor in person. His Excellency Marshal Massena will, it is said, have the command of a seperate army, consisting of 80,000 men.

At the last parade on the 11th inst. when the advanced guard of the grand army was present, his Majesty ordered the troops to be formed in close columns, and the officers being assembled, he spoke as follows:—

"Soldiers, after having triumphed on the banks of the Danube and the Vistula, you have passed through Germany by forced marches. I shall now order you to march through France without allowing you a moment's rest.

"Soldiers, I have occasion for you. The hideous presence of the Leopard contaminates the continent of Spain and Portugal. Let your aspect terrify and drive him from thence. Let us carry our conquering eagles even to the pillars of Hercules. There also we have an injury to avenge.

"Soldiers, you have exceeded the fame of all modern warriors. You have placed yourselves upon a level with the Roman legions, who in one campaign were conquerors on the Rhine, the Euphrates, in Illyria, and on the Tagus.

"A durable peace, and permanent prosperity, shall be the fruits of your exertions. A true Frenchman can never enjoy any rest till the sea is open and free.

"Soldiers, all that you have already achieved, and what still remains to be done, will be for the happiness of the French people and my glory, and shall be for ever imprinted in my heart."

PROHIBITION AGAINST THE INTRODUCTION OF COLONIAL PRODUCE.

Extract from the Minutes of the Office of the Secretary of State. Palace of St. Cloud, Sept. 6, 1808.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine.

On the Report of our Minister of Finance, our Council of State having been heard, we have decreed, and do decree, as follows:—

Article I. The introduction of all Colonial Produce coming from Holland and Spain into France is prohibited until further orders.

Art. II. All vessels freighted with such articles, which shall enter the Elbe, the Weser, or the Jade, shall be seized and confiscated.

Art. III. The present Decree is not to contravene that of the 9th of June, by which we reserved to ourselves the right to allow the importation of cotton wool, under certain circumstances.

Art. IV. Our Minister of Finance is charged with the execution of the present decree. (Signed) NAPOLEON.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

MADRID, SEPT. 17.—To-day arrived here the division of General Reding, which, it is said, is on its march for Somosierra, to join the army of Old Castile. The General will go to Grenada to organise the 20,000 men who have been enrolled there, and are now cloathed and equipped. These, we are assured, will embark at Malaga for Catalonia, where it appears they have not more than 5000 regular troops, the miquelets not being such; and that principality, besides, is deficient in cavalry. The divisions of the Seignor Coupigni have marched for Arragon.

The horses and remaining effects of those who went away with Joseph Napoleon, and other persons devoted to the French, have been seized on by order of the Government.

MADRID, SEPT. 21.—The Deputies who are to form the Central Junta of Government for the appointment of a Regent of the Kingdom, are already assembled, we are informed, at Aranjuez, where they are to open their sittings on the 24th. It is reasonably conjectured that it will be composed of the following personages, viz.

His Eminence Cardinal de Bourbon, Archbishop of Toledo, Regent. (3)

His Excellency Don Francisco de Saavedra. (3)

His Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos. (4)

His Excellency Don Gaspar de Jovellanos. (5)

The appointment of his Eminence to be the head of the kingdom is intended to prevent every kind of embarrassing etiquette or misunderstanding, and to evince that a Bourbon still remains in Spain.

No. 1. His Eminence is the son of the late Infante Don Louis, uncle to Charles IV. who, in the reign of the late Charles III. his brother, married a private Lady, of a distinguished family, Dina Maria de Vallabriga y Drummond, (related on the maternal side to the unfortunate family of Stuart,) by whom his Royal Highness had the Cardinal and two Daughters; one of these the infamous Godoy contrived by his intrigues to espouse.

No. 2. The oldest and best Statesman of Spain, but now unfortunately very old. The Count was favourite Minister to Charles III. but on account of his integrity, shamefully disgraced and cruelly persecuted by Godoy, notwithstanding the solemn promise extorted on his death-bed by that Monarch from his son, of never dispensing with the services of Florida-Blanca.

No. 3. Some years back Minister of State, afterwards disgraced by Godoy.

No. 4. Late Minister of State, and who has acquired immortal honour by his loyalty and patriotism in resisting every temptation, despising every threat, and evincing a typical firmness before Napoleon, notwithstanding being married to a niece of Godoy.—To him the maxim of your Poet may be justly applied—

"An honest man's the noblest work of God."

No. 5. Some years back Minister of Justice and Favour, a very enlightened Statesman, disgraced and cruelly persecuted by Godoy.

Of these Personages it may be truly observed, "they are an honourable and great set of men, and for once is certainly justified the universal popular saying—"Vox Populi Vox Dei."

"SEPT. 22.—An Officer of our army has communicated to us the following estimate of the position and numbers of the French troops in Spain on the 24th of last month, from a statement which a French Officer left behind him, in one of the precipitate retreats of the enemy.—Total of the troops, 39,120 men, including 6000 cavalry. In Pampeluna, 1200 infantry and 800 cavalry. In Burgos, 400 cavalry and some light troops. The rest of the forces were cantoned in the Rioja. The line of the enemy's army extended from Cleatruenigo to Miranda de Ebro. The head-quarters of the Spanish army, commanded by General Blake, were, on the 18th instant at Quintanilla; those of the combined armies of Arragon and Valencia, at Soa; and those of General Llamas, at Agreda. The army of Castille has put itself in motion, directing its march towards Aranda and Burgos de Osma. Deserters who have come in to General Blake, say, the greatest confusion and discontent prevail in the enemy's army, and that deserters would be very numerous, particularly from the foreign troops, if they did not fear to be ill-treated by the peasants. Many of the French soldiers have also deserted, and endeavoured to regain their own country, disheartened and in despair."—Diario de la Corunna, Oct. 1.

SEPT. 27.—General Cuesta is named Commander in Chief of the army of Arragon and Castile, at the request of Gen. Palafox. Major-General Lord William Bentinck arrived here the day before yesterday.

REYNOSA, SEPT. 2.—We have received intelligence that the fourth division of our army, under the command of the Marquis of Portazgo, had entered Bilboa, after a strongly contested action of three hours against 2000 French, of whom a number were killed, and the rest escaped to Vittoria. On our side we had some wounded. We have taken the greater part of the baggage of Mazarredo, who was with that division of the French, and made his escape with them.

SAN SEBASTIAN, SEPT. 5.—The day before yesterday a Spaniard arrived here, who left Paris nine days ago; they say there are no other troops in that city than the Guards of Honour, which he saw reviewed by Napoleon, and that in his whole passage from that capital to Bayonne he did not meet with more than 7 or 800 men; yet the French Papers, lying, as usual, say that 200,000 men, conveyed in 10,000 carriages, are on their way to Spain.

CORUNNA, OCT 1.—Burgos was evacuated on the 22d ult. by the French, after spiking their artillery, and destroying their powder. The next operation will be against St. Sebastian. From the situation of affairs, a great battle must soon take place, unless the French retire altogether.

Reinforcements are pouring in upon Blake's army every day. To-morrow we expect 30,000 troops, part of which are English; and some from Portugal are on their way to join him. The Archbishop of Toledo (Don Louis de Bourbon, nephew to Charles IV. and cousin to Ferdinand) will, it is thought be elected Regent of the Kingdom. The Conde de Florida Blanca, who has been chosen President ad interim, is a man greatly attached to the English. The Spanish troops under the Marquis de la Romana arrived off this harbour last night, and have been ordered for Santander and Bilbon.

VALENCIA, SEPT. 6.—We are assured, by a letter from Estremadura, that there has been found concealed at Badajoz, a great quantity of bars of gold, which were at the disposal of Noriega, Agent and Treasurer-General of Don Manuel Godoy. We believe this to be a small part of the immense rapine, which, in the space of eighteen years, he had plundered from the nation.

OVIEDO, SEPT. 15.—The Deputies from all the Provinces to the Central Junta, are arrived at Madrid, where, according to the commendation of the Conde de Florida Blanca, the Saloon of the Ambassadors in the Royal Palace is preparing for their reception, as the most proper place for holding the Sessions. This Assembly, considered in any point of view, will be the most respectable and august that Spain has ever seen. The Supreme Authority is concentrated in one point, and the whole nation will hear with pleasure the voice of their Deputies, and obey their orders. Far from us be dissention, the love of interest, honours, or commands; for the love of our country requires still greater sacrifices. Silent be those vain declaimers on patriotism; who have had no other object but to satisfy their own ambition. Silent the writers of so many insipid papers, and silent the malevolent; who endeavour to enfeeble the energy of the people. Our enemies are still in Spain, and new legions of Vandals threaten to inundate it. The first duty of the Supreme Junta is to organise and maintain the armies, and the obligation of all good Spaniards to serve their country in whatever station or office they may be called to fill. Let us then sacrifice our passions, and give to the whole world a proof, that whatever glory we may claim from conquering our enemies, we claim a still greater from subduing ourselves. But if any body or individual, considering its or his interest as distinct from that of the whole nation, shall dare to foment discord or disobedience, and directly or indirectly oppose the intimate union of Spain, let him be brought to judgment without delay, let him die ignominiously, and his ashes be deemed unworthy of Spanish ground.

MANRESA, AUG. 29.—It is known here for certain, that the Austrian Consul in Carthagena has received orders to collect all the manifestoes and proclamations issued in this country, and all the reports of our victories, and authentic accounts of the treacherous conduct of Napoleon, hitherto published. The object of this order is to compare the above collection with the intelligence communicated by Napoleon to the Court of Vienna, that his brother Joseph has been crowned King of Spain, and unanimously acknowledged as such by the Spanish Nation.

STATEMENT OF THE FORCE OF THE SPANISH PATRIOTS.

GENERAL BLAKE'S ARMY.—36,000 infantry; 10,000 Asturians expected shortly to join; three companies of artillery.

GENERAL CASTANOS.—70,000 infantry, and 22,000 cavalry.

GENERAL FLAMA.—16,000 Valencians and Murcians.

GENERAL CUESTA.—8,000 infantry, and 1,500 cavalry.

PALAFOX's Army and the Spaniards from the North not included; besides a considerable force expected from Biscay.

SWEDEN.

KONIGSBERG, SEPT. 16.—On Sunday or Monday next, the Emperor Alexander, with his brother Constantine, and their mutual friend Caulincourt, are expected here on their way to Erfurth, where they are to have a meeting with Napoleon. Constantine, it is said, goes thither with a very ill-will, but the Emperor insisted on it. All our politicians are at a loss to conjecture the result of the interview, which may indeed be very important; but, at the same time, it appears extremely singular, that at a moment when the French party in Russia is said to be tottering, the chief support of it should quit the country, and this at the desire of Bonaparte, who is most concerned. The diplomatic affairs of the French at St. Petersburgh, will, in the mean time, be managed by the Chevalier de Bray, an emigrant, who is Bavarian Minister at the Russian Court, and a great intriguer, which he gave proof of when Minister at Berlin. The Emperor of Austria has also received, through Dufoe, who was sent to Vienna for that purpose, an invitation to be of the party; but it is thought he will decline, as it is said, through the influence of the Empress, who is represented as very big spirited.

WEST INDIES.

BARBADOES, AUG. 19.—At Cumana, the Spaniards were heyhill measure rejoiced at the prospect afforded by the Revolution, of promoting the interests and extending the commerce of the South American colonies, as well as of breaking the foreign yoke under which their Parent State had nearly sunk; and a Spanish Officer arrived at Trinidad from thence states, that the French Brig Serpent, charged with the dispatches from Bayonne respecting the cession of these colonies, had only arrived two hours previous to the Acasta frigate, dispatched by Sir Alexander Cochrane, in consequence of the advices from Cadiz. He says the British Officer (Captain Beaver) instantly presented himself before the Supreme Court of Audience then sitting in deliberation on Bonaparte's dispatches, and was received with a general acclamation of applause by them, to the discomfiture and chagrin of the French Officers who were present, urging a compliance to the mandate of their Master; that one of these Officers, using some intemperate threat, so exasperated an Aide-de-Camp of the Spanish Commandant, that he drew his sabre and cut him down in the presence of the whole Council; and that such was the general indignation against the Frenchmen there, that had it not been for the interference of the British Officers, they would all have been sacrificed. To this account the Trinidad Gazette of the 30th ult. furnishes us with the following:—

"By a launch which arrived yesterday evening from Barcelona, we learn that a French national brig (no doubt one of the expresses mentioned in Lord Collingwood's dispatches) had arrived at La Guira, with a number of Officers on board, civil and military, bearing orders from Bonaparte, sanctioned by the King, his prisoner, to supersede the present administration of Government, and to establish the reign of the new dynasty in that Province. The dispatches had been forwarded to Caracas; but the Chiefs of that Province, men of sound judgment and approved fidelity, having been previously put in possession of the Bando of the Supreme Junta of Seville, dated 25th May (which had been forwarded by this Government), weighing well in the scale of prudence the dangers of precipitation in a matter of so much importance to the State, had called a General Assembly of the Heads of Departments, to deliberate on the steps to be taken in so difficult an emergency. The Council had accordingly assembled, and were sitting when the Acasta's dispatches arrived to confirm their opinion in the resistance which it seems it was their determination to oppose to the attempts of the Usurper. They were read with acclamations by the Council—the cries of "Viva el Rey, viva nuestro Catholico Monarca, Fernando Septimo, y su augusto padre el Rey de la Gran Bretana," resounded in the Casa Capitular, and were soon re-echoed by the whole city—and the imperious Officers of his Imperial Majesty were committed to durance vile, in the Casemattes of La Guira, and his Imperial brig made prize of and sent to Porto Cavello.

"The colours of the two nations were soon displayed on the forts at La Guira, under a general salute of all the heavy artillery. The Acasta, at anchor in the road, repeated the signals and tokens of alliance and festivity, and the Officers who landed were received and treated with the greatest marks of respect and attention."

STATE PAPER.

PORTUGAL.

PROCLAMATION BY HIS EXCELLENCY LIEUT.-GENERAL SIR HEW DALRYMPLE, COMMANDING THE BRITISH FORCES IN PORTUGAL, TO THE PORTUGUESE NATION.

The success with which it has pleased Almighty God to bless the British Arms, has brought about the moment when it becomes my duty to address the faithful and loyal inhabitants of this Country. I seize the opportunity with eagerness, in order to tranquilize the minds of the timid, to repress the designs of the disaffected (if any such remain), and to assure the nation at large, that the efforts of the British force under my command have no other object in view than to insure the prosperity of the inhabitants of Portugal, by the restoration of that Government which has so long and so gloriously presided over them, and the return of which will be welcomed, no doubt, by the united voice of a loyal people.

The presence of an hostile army, in possession of the capital, and master of the principal resources of the kingdom, had in a manner deprived the estimable and loyal subjects of Portugal of the means of liberating their country. Patriotic efforts, however, were made in spite of these disadvantages, and the national spirit was manifested in a manner at once most decided and most honourable.

The efforts which were made by several provinces of the kingdom opened the road for the restoration of the Monarchy.

Notwithstanding, however, the energy displayed by these Provinces in arraying and bringing forward an armed force for the liberation of the capital, the aid of the ancient and faithful Ally of Portugal was necessary to bring the contest to a successful and speedy issue. The warm interest which his Britannic Majesty felt for his Ally, and the energy which has ever marked the British character, soon brought a powerful force to the shores of Portugal.

That part of the Portuguese army which local circumstances permitted, united itself with the British, whilst the remainder effected a powerful diversion. Measures were taken in concert for the defeat of the common enemy. The steps of that force have been marked by victory, and the expulsion of the enemy has opened the way to the restoration of the Portuguese Monarchy, the most gratifying duty which could be imposed by his Sovereign on a British Commander.

No views of national interest or aggrandizement can be traced in the liberal policy of Britain; but, true to the principles of honour and good faith, that have ever directed her conduct, she sees, in the events now passing in Portugal, only the happy means of re-establishing order, and restoring to the Sovereign and the people their just right.

In the execution of these views as Commander of the British Forces, I shall best fulfil the intentions of the King my Master, and most effectually secure the interests of Portugal, by placing in the exercise of authority, that body to which his Royal Highness the Prince Regent thought fit to delegate the Sovereign Power, when he withdrew the Royal dignity from the insults of an implacable enemy, and preserved the Sovereignty of his dominions beyond the Atlantic.

One respectable Nobleman, a member of the body thus left in power by his Royal Highness, has unfortunately been removed from his country, by the authority or arts of its enemy, by which at this critical period it is deprived of his services, whilst some of the members, having appeared to unite themselves with the French interest, have rendered their re-establishment in the Government at this moment impossible.

Therefore the distinguished persons undermentioned, the remaining Members of the Regency appointed by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and who have incurred no such disability, are called upon to repair to Lisbon to take upon themselves the functions of the Government, until such time as the will of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent shall be more fully known, viz.—

The Count De Castro Marim, Mestoiro Mor of the Kingdom, and Member of the Councils of his Royal Highness.

Dom Francisco Xavier de Noronha, Member of the Councils of his Royal Highness, and Grao Cruz da Ordem de Sant-Lago, President of the Board of Conscience, and Lieutenant-General in the Royal Armies.

Francisco de Cunha e Menenes, Member of the Councils of his Royal Highness, and Lieutenant-General in the Royal Armies.

Joao Antonio Salter de Mendonça, Desembargador do Paço, and Procurador of the Crown.

Dom Miguel Pereira Forjaz Coutinho, Member of the Councils of his Royal Highness, and Brigadier in the Royal Armies.

To this Government the inferior Jurisdictions and Tribunals, the Constituted and Legal Authorities of the Kingdom, and all persons of every description are required to pay all deference and submission.

As Commander of the British forces, I shall hold it to be my first and most urgent duty to maintain the authority of the Government thus established, to insure the tranquillity and subsistence of the capital, and to encourage the re establishment of the former prosperity of the kingdom.

When these objects are attained, and the attainment of them can only be delayed by intrigue or disaffection, the interference of a military force will cease to be necessary, but until these ends are accomplished, the most vigorous and decided measures will be taken for maintaining the peace and good order of the country, and all offences against the tranquillity of any part of the Kingdom, will be proceeded against with the utmost severity.

Given at the Head-quarters of the British Army at Prayas, this 18th day of September, 1808.

(Signed) Hew Dalrymple,
Lieut.-General and Commander of the British Forces in Portugal.

IRELAND.

Tralee, Sept. 27.—Thursday night Major Ponsonby, accompanied by a party of the 7th Dragoon Guards and Yeomanry, scoured the country about Listowel, in search of White Boys. We understand, however, that this design was frustrated by some miscreants, who, shortly after the departure of the military from Listowel, placed a fire on the top of an old castle in that town, which from its elevated situation, could not fail of being observed at the distance of several miles around, (the plan, no doubt, having been previously concerted by the White Boys in case of any sudden attack) and the whole country was soon after completely illuminated by fires on every adjacent hill. This artifice, we are sorry to say, had the desired effect, for although Major Ponsonby and his party remained out during the night, they were unable to apprehend any of the banditti who disturb that neighbourhood.

Limerick, Sept. 27.—The house of Mr. Gerald Fitz Gibbon, at Kilmore, in the county of Limerick, was after much resistance broken into, at an early hour, on the morning of Monday se'ennight, by upwards of twenty villains, who after attempting his life by repeated wounds inflicted with guns and other weapons, and tendering an oath, took from him a pistol, the only arms in his possession.

On Thursday night at eleven o'clock, the house in which William Kelly, herdsman to Dennis O'Brien, Esq. on the lands of Newcastle, near the city of Limerick, was attacked by nine fellows armed with muskets, who took him from his bed, and most unmercifully flogged and Beat him; they then gave notice if he did not quit the employment of Mr. O'Brien, to prepare his coffin, as they would pay him another visit, when his life would be the forfeit.

PROVINCIALS.

Cheviot Breed of Sheep.—In the beginning of last month there was a meeting held, near Jedburgh, of the Society for the Improvements of the Cheviot Breed of Sheep, in regard to fleece and carcase, Sir John Sinclair in the chair, to whose long attention to this breed their improvement is considerably indebted; Sir George Douglas, Bart. Colonel Rutherford, M. P. Mr. Morton, Mr. Culley, &c. attended upon the occasion. It appeared that the wool had doubled its value by the Society's exertions. The quantity of coarse wool is much diminished, and the fine proportionably increased. The improvements of the carcase was proportionably conspicuous, and the shape of the sheep in every respect altered for the better. In regard to the tendency to fatten, it appears from experiments with the sheep bred by the Society, and fed by Mr. Thomas Smith of Woodhall, that they have been killed at one year and a half old weighing upwards of 21 lb. per quarter, and at 5½ years at from 25 to 28lb. per quarter. Bearded wheat has also been found to answer uncommonly well in this neighbourhood, and more especially seems less liable than any other sort of wheat to the mildew.

There is at present in Lancashire a very pretty faced young woman, of the name of Byfield, who was born without legs or arms. She is, as it may be termed, in the possession of a man who says that he bought her in an infant state from her parents. He supports himself, his wife and children, by the exhibition of the extraordinary powers of this wonderful little creature, at Fairs and Market places. She writes a fine hand, holding her pen between the stump of her arm and her cheek; she works tambour in the same manner, and draws most excellent miniatures. She was considered to be such a prodigy, that the Earl of Morton mentioned her extraordinary ability, labouring under such natural deficiency as she did, to the King. His Majesty could hardly credit the fact, until he saw the likeness of the Noble Earl, which was performed in the most correct style by this phenomenon. His Majesty then promised to give her his patronage, if she should be brought to London. Lord Morton employed the son of an eminent artist, and a confidential female to go down to Manchester, where she then was, to make proposals to that effect to her. With the most delicate sense of honour, however, she declared that she owed every comfort she possessed to the man who brought her up: that it would be the ruin of him and his family if she were to leave him, and therefore she would not separate from him upon any terms that could be offered her.

Curious Invention in Clock-making.—Mr. Grouch, watch-maker, at Paris, has obtained a patent for a discovery which may become of general utility. He has invented a pendulum which has no weight, and which has entirely the form of a ball: the dial is transparent, and by the means of a reflecting lamp, and a current of air, shows the hour at a great distance. In consequence of a peculiar contrivance, neither the hands, the pivot on which they turn, nor the balance, cast any shadow. A considerable degree of light may be given to it; which if necessary, may be diminished to the simple gleam of a rushlight, thus forming a most convenient appendage to the chambers of the sick; will also prove very advantageous to all classes of society, as it may be adapted to public clocks; and while it renders the hour distinguishable at every moment of the night, will, at the same time, prove an excellent reverberating lamp.

An unmarried female, at Denham, in Suffolk, last week delivered herself of a child, and immediately after cut off its head and arms, and also the legs and thighs at the hips and joints! She rose, however, in the morning, and attempted to perform her domestic work as usual; but being obliged to relinquish it, went to bed and expired the same afternoon. Previous to her dissolution, she confessed the murder, and acquitted her master, who was nearly 70 years old, and had cohabited with her, of any participation in the crime.

Last week a melancholy accident happened at Wample, near Bootle, to Mr. Walter's, the owner of a limekiln, that had been burning for some days; whilst attempting to walk across it the chalk gave way beneath, when he instantly sunk down and, notwithstanding one of his sons, who accompanied him, ran and alarmed some of the workmen, before they were able to reach the place to render him any assistance, he was burnt to death.

An occurrence of a very singular and interesting nature took place at Aberdeen on Thursday last:—A boy, about four years of age, fell over the quay into the harbour, at high water; a carpenter, who was at work on board a vessel close by the place hearing the alarm, immediately pulled out his watch, which he left upon deck and running to the bow of the vessel, the child being under water, he jumped overboard, and brought him up from the bottom. It is easier to imagine than describe his feelings, when on bringing him to the surface, he found him to be his own son!

His Majesty's sloop Beagle, at Sea, Oct. 3.

SIR,—I beg leave to acquaint you, that, from the violence of the gale yesterday I was compelled to stand over on the English coast from my station off Boulogne; and at 11 P. M. the Beagle fell in with and captured, after a chace of three hours, Le Hazard French privateer, of 14 guns and 59 men, commanded by Joseph Marie le Long, the South Foreland then bearing N. E. by E. about for leagues. One of their men received a mortal wound. It appears she sailed from Dieppe yesterday morning; and, in the early part of the night, captured the two light colliers named in the margin *; the master and mate of the latter was on board the lugger. My pursuit of the captured vessels was fruitless, from our being many leagues to leeward, and five hours had elapsed since their falling into the hands of the enemy. I have the honour to be, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Castle-street, Leicester-square, Oct. 7, 1808.

SIR,—Having recently arrived in this country from New South Wales, it was only this day that a friend showed me a letter which appeared in your paper of Sunday the 2d instant, addressed to Sir Joseph Banks.

However reluctant I may be to obtrude any observations of mine to public notice, respecting the late transactions in that distant colony, yet I think it my duty, as the son of a much injured and persecuted father, to transmit you a copy of my answer, trusting you will have the candour to give it insertion.

EDWARD M'ARTHUR.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR JOSEPH BANKS,

SIR,—A most extraordinary letter appeared in The National Register of Sunday the 2d inst. under the signature of Henry James Washington, addressed to you, and intended, as the writer says, to be submitted for the information of his Majesty. Of Mr. Washington I know nothing more than this letter tells me; but I think too highly, Sir, of your wisdom and discretion to suppose for a moment that you are likely, as one of his Majesty's Privy Council, to commit yourself, upon a great public question, which must at no distant period be regularly laid before the proper Tribunal. Such a proceeding, improper under any circumstances, would be unjustifiable indeed, when founded upon no other evidence than the assertion of an individual, who does not even state himself to have been present at the transactions in question, and whose statement, if not intentionally untrue, can be made only on ex parte information.—A statement, which to my certain knowledge is in many points utterly false, and a palpable mis-representation of facts, even where it assumes the semblance of truth.

The injustice of attending to such suggestions would be yet more inexcusable, when it is considered that the private characters of many individuals, most of them bearing his Majesty's commission, are therein most grossly attacked, whilst they are at the distance of many thousand miles on the public service, and have in consequence no opportunity of defending themselves.

It is not my intention to enter into any discussion relative to the proceedings of the Officers and others concerned in the arrest of Governor Bligh. On this subject facts will speak for themselves, when they come to be investigated. My concern is of a more private nature, and though a youth, I should deem myself an unworthy son of a much honoured father, if I could see his name traduced in a public paper as an incendiary, without saying what I know to be true, namely, that Mr. Washington's insinuation is an atrocious calumny.

If Mr. M'Arthur has at any time differed in opinion with the Governors in New South Wales, I have no hesitation in asserting, that upon a strict investigation of every such difference, it will be found that the welfare of the colony, and the honour and prosperity of his Majesty's Government, have invariably influenced his conduct. Surely, therefore, upon an event in which he is no otherwise a party than from having suffered much personal injury and violent persecution under Governor Bligh's government, while pursuing the same clear and honourable line of conduct, the assertions of an individual, actuated from motives which are at present beyond detection, must fail in biassing an impartial public.

The official discussions of the late transactions in New South Wales will in due time place them before the public; until then men of discernment will do well to suspend their judgment, and above all to receive with distrust those endeavours to prepossess their minds through the medium of the press, which are in general the indications of a weak cause.

EDWARD M'ARTHUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

SIR,—In your Number of Sunday and Monday last, you inserted a Letter, addressed to Sir Joseph Banks, purporting to have been received from Dublin, and bearing the signature of Henry James Washington. That the name subscribed to it is a fictitious one, there is every reason to believe; and also, that these plausible appearances of authenticity it insidiously assumes have only been adopted in order to give to the calumnies it would propagate a greater degree of currency and credibility. When liberal and dispassionate minds coolly consider the harsh, unmeasured terms in which it animadverts on an event which has lately taken place in the Government of New South Wales, they will easily perceive, that at bottom they are prompted by conscious guilt, intended only to prejudice the public opinion against one party concerned in that transaction; and thus unfairly to prejudge the merits of the case. Surely no good cause can ever require to be defended by such means. It is, moreover, the obvious intention of the letter, by personal provocation, and direct attacks on our character, maliciously to entrap us into a newspaper altercation, and a premature discussion of the facts; upon the evidence of which, the event to which we have alluded must be ultimately judged.

A statement of these facts is now, we believe, before the Privy Council; and, however indignant we must feel at the slanderous interpretations which the writer of the letter endeavours to put upon our conduct, we know too well the respect that is due to that high tribunal, to allow ourselves to be instigated by such provocations to an unreasonable, and, as we deem it, an unwarrantable disclosure of the matter, that is to form the grounds of their judgment and final decision. In justice, however, to ourselves, in justice to the characters of the absent officers whom this H. J. Washington would thus indiscriminately defame, we think it our duty to take the earliest occasion of assuring the public, that the assertions of that writer are most gross and scandalous misrepresentations, and directly contrary to the truth.—We trust, Sir, that having given admission into your Register such serious charges against our conduct, you will likewise admit our protest against their falsehood—that the poison and the antidote may circulate through the same channel.

Time will no doubt soon disclose the real complexion of this transaction, and the true tendency of the motives of those who are now so anxious to discolour it.

We are, Sir, your obedient Servants,

C. GRIMES.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Spanish Papers have been received on Friday night, to the 2d inst. The intelligence they bring is highly interesting. They confirm, at the same time, the opinion we long entertained, of the unblushing effrontery, and of the little credit which ought to be attached to the official statements of the Moniteur. This worthy organ of the most worthless Tyrant, published an account of a decisive victory obtained by the Ex-Jacobin DUHESME, over the Spanish Patriots in Catalonia, assisted by the English. The French, however, were completely defeated, and forced to retreat to Barcelona; where they are preparing to sustain a siege: and, under the pretext of defraying the expences, compel the unfortunate inhabitants to pay the heaviest contributions. It is impossible to repeat it too often, that the accounts in the Foreign Papers, under the controul of the Usurper, should be received with the utmost caution and distrust. This system of falsification is a leading principle in the policy of that detestable Government; and when we reflect how much difficulty we have of receiving information from the greatest part of the Continent, through any other medium than that of those very Journals, this caution will be the more necessary. The Spanish Papers mention, at the same time, the arrival of the Spanish troops under the command of the brave Marquis de la ROMANA; which immediately received orders to proceed to Bilboa. It is stated likewise, that General CUESTA has been appointed Commander in Chief of Arragon, on the recommendation, and in the place of General PALAFOX, who has been elected Member of the Central Junta. The French have been again forced to retreat from Burgos; and a division of the army of General BLAKE has driven the enemy from Bilboa, after a severe engagement, in which the latter sustained a very considerable loss.

These are the principal articles in the last Papers of a people, in whose welfare and independence we are so closely interested;—of a people, who had first formed the magnanimous resolution, whilst the rest of Europe lay prostrate, in despondent resignation at the feet of a remorseless Ruffian—to defy the utmost extent of his vengeance and his power—to punish the instruments of his perfidy—to paint his crimes and usurpation in a language which only a keen sense of injury, the most unbounded love of their country, and uncontaminated moral principles, were capable of inspiring. This generous effusion of patriotism burst out spontaneously, and without concert, in every Province, when each was totally unacquainted with the determination of the others; and whilst an inimical army of 120,000 men, conducted by officers of acknowledged audacity and skill occupied Madrid, the principal fortresses, and the passes into their country. A nation capable of such a resolution, after having been abandoned and betrayed by their Sovereign, his Ministers, and, as they then imagined, by the first men in the kingdom for rank and fortune, are undoubtedly no ordinary people. All the efforts they have made as yet in the sacred cause, in which they are engaged, have been successful. Their triumphs have produced no false security; and no relaxation is visible in the measures they adopted for the accomplishment of the great work they have undertaken. From the very beginning it was no difficult matter to pronounce decidedly on their final success. The enlightened and patriotic citizens, who directed the popular insurrection, by the bold resolution they formed of excluding for ever the possibility of compromise or conciliation, gave as unequivocal proofs of their talents, as of their courage and sincerity. It is entirely out of the question, without these reflections, to entertain a competent idea of their means, moral and physical, to dissipate the gathering storm. The man who, for twelve years, has employed the most extraordinary abilities to no other purpose, than for the misery and the degradation of the rest of mankind, appears to be sensible of the resistance he has to expect. Notwithstanding his vaunted myriads, he is under the necessity, in this crisis of his fortunes, of flying from the scene of action, and trying, by means of intrigue, to withdraw a considerable part of his army from Germany. His means of carrying into execution his project of extermination in the south, are inadequate, and even trifling, unless he can prevail, through the interference of ALEXANDER, on the Austrian Cabinet to employ its immense armaments in some ill-fated partition of the Ottoman Empire. This is the great project of the wary tyrant; and the object of his journey to Upper Saxony. Should the Emperor FRANCIS have the infatuation to be present at this ill-boding congress, the project of partition will be agreed to; the Austrian army, which could have saved, perhaps, the liberty of Europe, will be employed an extravagant attack on this political windmill, and BONAPARTE be able to withdraw the greater part of his forces from the Austrian frontiers. Then, and then alone, will his 200,000 miscreants scale the Pyrenees, and carry fire, murder, and devastation into the habitations and fields of an innocent people. More he can never employ for the accomplishment of his abominable design, should even the Austrian Ministry have the folly or the villainy to subscribe to a plan of partition, which will have no other consequence than to hurl their Monarch from his throne. To Erfurth, therefore, the attention of mankind should be directed at present. In this city the salvation or slavery of Europe will be decided. It is unnecessary to employ any glow of language to impress our Readers with the important consequences that must result from the conferences at this terrestrial Pandemonium. Every thing which the most refined art, or the most consummate villainy, can suggest, will be put in practice, in order to gain or intimidate Austria into an acquiescence in the plans of the Arch fiend. If that power, however, has the virtue to contemn his menaces and his promises, which we are strongly inclined to believe—for she has always acted an honourable, though an unfortunate, part—hostilities will commence immediately in Germany. For both events—partition or war—the tyrant is prepared. Whilst his guards are hastening in one direction to Saxony; his negociators, TALLEYRAND, MARET, and DUROC, are proceeding thither in another. Should he be defeated in the war of diplomacy, there is reason to imagine that he will command himself the armies, which are to act against Austria. His propitious month of October, in which he triumphed at Ulm and Jena, affords him a favourable season for commencing his operations. Should the war break out, and he entertained any suspicions of repugnance on the part of his Imperial guests, to co-operate with him against Austria, he will not be deficient in finding a pretext to keep them as hostages in his camp. Profound and dangerous are the projects of this versatile and unprincipled individual. If it be not too presumptuous to sound the intricate depth of his atrocious heart, we would conclude that Spain is the great object of his alarm and anxiety. He must first gain the connivance of Russia and Austria, or attempt to annihilate the latter, before he dares lead his armies against that community of Patriots. He has already fled from their frontiers, like a trembling fugitive. We should, however, be prepared for the event of his throwing Austria a soporific cake, and lulling her asleep, however grating that reflection may be. Let us pause here for a moment, and reflect on the consequences. The first question which arises on such an occasion, are Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal able to resist his undivided force?—There never was a more important one: On its solution, perhaps, depends the independence of our own country and of Europe. Before we give any opinion of our own, our Readers will, however, agree with us, that all the energies of the three countries will be, at least, required for this purpose. We would consider it an insult to the good sense and feelings of the public, to draw incessantly their attention to the activity and resources of the enemy;—his unparalleled success, the vast empire he governs, and his unsated rapacity, impress us with too fatal a conviction of their extent. Forced to make this acknowledgment, we are fully aware of the foresight of the present Administration in sending so large a force to the Continent. And if it be true, that they have it in contemplation not to leave a single man of our regular army in Great Britain, but to send the whole to the same destination, we congratulate our country that the management of its affairs is placed in such able hands. But it may be objected, that a single blunder, or a single breach of honour, may deprive us of that army for ever;—that another WELLESLEY may sign a dishonorable Convention; that another more consummate blockhead than DALRYMPLE, blast the fairest hopes of the country, by his imbecillity and want of feeling. Without attempting to anticipate events, however disgraceful and revolting the example already given may be, we risk nothing in advancing, that no future officer will have the insolence to slight the opinion of a British public. The City of London has come forward on this, as on every patriotic occasion, and given a praise-worthy example to the rest of the nation, how to express their disapprobation and their horror of the infamous transaction. Other cities and counties are calling similar meetings; and as long as this spirit and sense of honour animate the breasts of Englishmen, we entertain no doubt about the success of our Army, and the independence of our Allies. Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY is now arrived, and Sir HEW DALRYMPLE is daily expected. The public insist on an investigation; the army expect it; the persons implicated, if every principle of honour be not extinct in their bosoms, must require it themselves; and, without wishing to raise to a greater height the public indignation, we are anxious to see a trial take place, in order to remove this opprobrium from the national character.

Rear-Admiral Tyler, with his Fleet, and seven Russian Sail of the Line, arrived at Portsmouth on Friday from the Tagus. It is stated in a letter from Portsmouth, which we have seen, that the Russian Ships, upon entering the harbour hoisted their colours; but our Portsmouth Correspondent does not mention the circumstance.

The next intelligence from the North cannot fail of being highly important. Little doubt can be entertained that propositions have been made for the surrender of either the whole or a part of the Russian fleet, at Port Baltic—a circumstance which obviously betrays a consciousness of danger on the part of the Admiral commanding it. The fact also of both Count Tchichukoff, the Russian Minister of Marine, and Mr. Thornton, the British Envoy at the Court of Stockholm, having repaired to Rogerswick, gives considerable support to the rumour of a pending negociation. Nothing short of the evacuation of Finland, and the conclusion of an immediate peace with Sweden, ought to be listened to on our part, as the terms on which we will agree to a cessation of hostilities; perhaps also we ought to insist upon the dissolution of the connection with France, and a renewal of the ties of amity with this Country, as an indispensable condition of our sparing and restoring more than one half of the Russian navy, which we trust is now in our power.

Some intelligence, through a circuitous channel, has been received from America. The inhabitants of the United States appear to differ totally from the Government, with respect to the efficacy of the embargo. They begin to discover that a measure, which they were taught to believe would in the course of a few months compel England to retract her Orders in Council, and France to rescind her prohibitory Decrees, has not had the smallest effect upon either; that they respectively adhere to the principles they at first adopted, and that there is little chance the "self-denying ordinance" of the American Government will be attended with the effect expected. The people are sick of the embargo. It has ruined the shipping and commercial interests, and the agriculturist has the produce of his labours rotting upon his hands. The notable expedient of converting the American sailors into husbandmen is found not to answer. The farmer will not be at the expence of growing an article for which he is not yet sure of a market; and the people are consequently thrown out of employment. It is natural, therefore, that the various classes of Americans, who are the victims of Mr. Jefferson's speculations, should be loud in their clamours against his hazardous and mistaken policy. We accordingly find that the merchants of Boston have agreed to petition the Executive Government, praying for the immediate suspension, and the repeal as soon as possible, of the Embargo. A circular letter, containing an account of their proceedings, and recommending similar exertions, was sent to the other commercial cities and towns in the Union.

A Charleston Paper, dated August 27, was received yesterday. It states, that the general discontent against the Embargo was increased so much, that it was supposed that a separation between the Northern and the Eastern States not unlikely to be the result.

Dutch Papers to the 1st instant have reached town: they are uncommonly barren of intelligence. Bonaparte was at Mentz on the 24th, and intended to set out the next day for Franckfort; but no account whatever is given of the journey of the Emperor of Russia.

According to advices received lately from Holland, the Emperor of the French has adopted a new expedient for increasing his military force. He is said to have concluded subsidiary Treaties with most of the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine, by which they are to furnish a given number of men for the French Army at a specific price. The number of these mercenaries is to be proportionate to the confederate contingent of the State; but in the cases of the Grand Duke of Baden and the Prince Primate, it exceeds that amount. The troops levied to complete the confederate quotas are to be transferred to the French service, and the deficiencies thus occasioned are to be made up by fresh conscriptions. These troops are to wear the French uniform, and to be armed, exercised, and paid in the same manner as French soldiers. It has been stipulated, however, that they are not to serve out of Europe, and are for the present to be employed in the interior of France. The Baden Regiments have already undertaken garrison duty at Strasburgh. It is calculated that he will add 100,000 men to his army by the measure.

A Moniteur is said to have been received with Junot's official account of the battle of Vimiera: he says, he attacked the English, who were strongly entrenched, but his advanced corps drove them back: he lost 150 men. But judging afterwards how much more useful, in the present circumstances of Spain, his army would be in that country, it occurred to him to propose terms, for evacuating Portugal to the English, which, upon consideration, he trusts his Majesty will think are as honourable as they are advantageous.

It appears by the Barbadoes Papers, that the French Islands in the West Indies are not so badly supplied with provisions as it has been supposed. They have obtained considerable supplies by the capture of British vessels. Three vessels are announced in these Papers to have been taken on the 5th of August, and carried into Martinique, one of which, a three-masted ship from Halifax, had on board seven hundred barrels of flour. In addition to this, two French brigs arrived there on the 6th from France, laden with 1400 barrels of flour. Another French brig also reached Guadaloupe, with 900 barrels of flour. Two letter of marque brigs laden with coffee, sailed from the latter island on the 8th for France, and three privateers were to sail from thence on the 10th on a cruize.

It is a remarkable circumstance in the Roman history that when they met with reverses, the fault was almost always in the commanders, and seldom or never in the army. When the citizens of Numantia fled before the Romans, whom they had so often beaten, their answer to those who reproached them was, "that the Romans were the same sheep, but that they had got a different shepherd."

THE COURT.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived in town from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace, by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of York, Kent, Cambridge, and Cumberland. At twelve o'clock, his Majesty held a private Levee, when Captain Thompson had the honour of being presented to his Majesty, on his promotion.

CITY AFFAIRS.

CONVENTION IN PORTUGAL.

A Special Court of Common Council of the City of London was held in their Council Room, at Guildhall, on Tuesday, to consider of the propriety of a Petition and Address to his Majesty on the subject of the late disgraceful Convention in Portugal.

The Requisition, in consequence of which the Court was called, being read,

Mr. Waithman rose. He had often on former occasions found it necessary, in submitting propositions to the consideration of that Court, to introduce his subject with such arguments as might seem most likely to recommend it to their attention and approval. On the present occasion, however, he was satisfied that no such arguments could be requisite on his part. It would be unnecessary even for him to read over the articles of that Convention, or to repeat what had been already so much better said elsewhere on the subject of them. Previous to the arrival of the Commander in Chief of our Armies in Portugal, it appeared that the exertions of our brave troops there, had been crowned with signal success, in two several engagements. No sooner, however, did our Commander in Chief arrive, than he immediately entered into a Convention, one cause at least of which was his total ignorance on the subject of the command he had been sent to undertake. After the disputes and delays which had taken place in the appointment of a Commander to this Expedition, it, undoubtedly, seemed strange that the choice should at last have fallen on a person, who, himself, professed total ignorance of the nature of the service to which he had been appointed. This Convention went, in the first place, to recognize the French Emperor, while not a word was said of the legitimate Government of Portugal which we had gone there to support. Another article went, in a particular manner, to stipulate that the French troops should not, in any case, be considered prisoners of war. By the 7th Article of the Preliminary Treaty, the neutrality of the Russian Fleet was recognised; and, although we were subsequently liberated from some part of this disgrace, yet it must appear astonishing indeed, that a fleet which had been cooped up in the harbour of Lisbon for a long period, without any means of escape, should be liberated by a Convention of this kind, simply on the condition of its remaining laid up during the continuance of the war. It was utterly impossible, he conceived, not to feel indignation at a stipulation of this kind. It appeared, that the British Troops had gained victories on the 17th and 21st, when not one half of their forces were engaged. There were at that time considerable reinforcements ready to join them. The French, on the other hand, were in an enemy's country, with a numerous body of Spaniards too, advancing against them, while to them not a possibility of escape remained, but they must have surrendered in a short time at discretion. If this was not a subject on which the Court was called on to approach the Throne, and state their disappointment and indignation, he could not figure any subject on which they ought at all to address his Majesty, every thing that was dear to him as a Sovereign, and to his people as a nation, being here compromised and abandoned. He was averse from attributing blame to any person whatever, and, in proposing the present motion, he should be cautious not to accuse either Ministers or Commanders; all he wished was inquiry, and that, he submitted, the Court was called on to approach the Throne, in order to solicit. If Gentlemen who should think this proceeding unnecessary, because inquiry would take place as a matter of course, would point out in what particular instances of failure such inquiry had taken place, it would be acceptable. Gentlemen on the other side had never been adverse to any proposal for a Vote of Thanks, why then should they object to a Vote of Inquiry, in which the interests of the country were so much more deeply involved?—We had been a disastrous Expedition to the Helder; we had seen one equally disgraceful to Ferrol; yet no inquiry had been made into the causes of either. The want of inquiry into these disasters, was the very cause why the present was to be added to the number of our military failures. Had he made a motion for an inquiry into either of these, such motion might have been negatived, but still no man could have denied that such inquiry was necessary and proper. No inquiry, however, had taken place, and yet we saw the Commander in Chief, on the latter Expedition, now hold the Office of Secretary at War. He asked, if we had any security that there would here be an inquiry? Nay, if we had any security, that Sir Hew Dalrymple, Sir Harry Burrard, or Sir Arthur Wellesley might not, as a reward for their services in concluding this Convention, be appointed to the Office of Secretary at War, or to some other situation of equal importance? It was from such examples as these that our military expeditions were hardly ever successful. He was sure the appointments in question could not have given satisfaction, and it was for the country to ask, why such men were selected? He, for one, declared, that he had never heard of any thing meritorious, which either Sir H. Dalrymple, or Sir H. Burrard had done, which should entitle them to such command. If any other Gentleman did know what particular service both, or either of these favoured Officers, had rendered their country, he hoped they would be kind enough to communicate it. As he had already said, he did not wish to attach blame to any one individual, nor to the Ministers by whom particular Officers had been appointed, but only that an inquiry should take place, when it would be seen where the improper conduct lay. He knew there were Gentlemen who had good reasons for the support they gave to Ministers, but he could not persuade himself, with all his knowledge in this respect, that they would have the face to come forward and oppose the present motion. He had often thought those Gentlemen premature in the votes of approbation and thanks which they had uniformly been so anxious to bestow, but could they shew any instances in which they had brought forward motions for the inquiry into abuses or misconduct. He had even thought them premature in a vote on a late occasion. This, however, did not proceed from any disregard on his part to the interests of the gallant Spaniards, or to any wish to withhold from them every testimony of his approbation of the support afforded them by this country. His only objection was, that there was no evidence before the Court of any great or magnanimous effort having then been made in their behalf, or, in fact, of any thing farther than a declaration on paper! It now turned out that at a great and enormous expence to the country, a numerous and well-appointed army had been sent to the assistance of our Allies; and that, after two severe battles, in the very moment of triumph, the victory had been snatched from their grasp—by a Convention, compared with which this country had never concluded any thing so disgraceful!—He asked, however, after having voted such an Address to his Majesty on the confidence of the assistance to be afforded to our Allies in the glorious struggle in which they were engaged, with what face those same persons could now object to an inquiry into the causes by which their expectations were blasted, after they seemed to have been already realized? If, after the ardour displayed by the country in behalf of the Spaniards—if, after the indignation felt and expressed by every individual in these kingdoms on the news of the Convention in Portugal—no inquiry into the causes which led to that Convention is to take place, and the soldier is to see that he is only carried to the field for the useless waste of blood, the country must be aware that its ruin is at hand! It will be impossible for a Commander to make an army enter the field of battle with zeal, if, by such a Convention, following such glorious victories, their laurels are to be blasted, and no inquiry is to be made into the causes which rendered their labours abortive.

He concluded by moving—

"That an humble and dutiful Address and Petition be presented to his Majesty, expressing our grief and astonishment at the extraordinary and disgraceful Convention lately entered into by the Commanders of his Majesty's Forces in Portugal, and the Commander of the French Army in Lisbon; praying his Majesty to institute such an Inquiry into this dishonourable and unprecedented transaction, as will lead to the discovery and punishment of those by whose misconduct and incapacity the cause of the Country and its Allies have been so shamefully sacrificed."

Mr. Quin seconded the motion. This was a question which we were called on to take up on a general ground, being a subject in which every department of the state and every individual in the country was interested. We were now come to that crisis, that we were not to consider who were Ministers. We were called on to express our astonishment, our disgust, and indignation at a Convention equally unexpected as it was disgraceful, and to shew that the day was come in which the interests of the British Nation were not to be sacrificed with impunity. He did not say that he condemned Ministers for appointing to the Chief Command a person who was untried, supposing that to be the case, for he would rather try a man who had never been tried before than employ the Commander in Chief. But if we were filled with sorrow—roused into indignation that British hearts could be found to conceive—British hands to polute themselves by signing so disgraceful a Convention, be hoped his Majesty would not be allowed to remain ignorant of the outraged feelings of his people. Was the battle of Vimiera an imaginary phantom, which could not be grasped—a thing which signified nothing? No, it was a glorious day for the British arms. Seven days after, however, it was converted, in the hands of the Commander in Chief, into our greatest ignominy and disgrace. He might be told of a preliminary Treaty, but it was to the person who ratified the Convention, on due and adequate deliberation, that the public were to look; it was to the Chief in Command, not to the person who was called on to execute his orders; it was from the master, not from the servant, that the public were to expect the necessary explanation and redress! The object of this country, in sending our army into Portugal was, to afford succour to the Patriots in that country; but had we accomplished that end? So far from it, after being successful in two battles, we, instead of serving the patriotic cause in that country, had entered into a Convention, by which we undertook to liberate from captivity a French army which had for some time been in that country in a state of siege. We had even stipulated to carry them home in British ships;—never, certainly, had the British oak been so contaminated! So far, indeed, were we from benefiting our Allies by this step, that in 15 days those same men so liberated by us from Portugal, would be found in the heart of Spain. Having dwelt with considerable force on many points in the Convention, the Worthy Commoner declared, that he should almost be induced to believe that a species of sorcery had been practised upon our Commanders. It had never entered into their sapient heads, that there were 8 or 10,000 of our own subjects languishing at this moment in prisons in France, most of them seized in violation of the laws of hospitality, and of every principle of good faith, in time of peace, while not more than 200 or 300 of them were in a situation to supply themselves with the comforts of life. He alluded to different inquiries which had taken place in our military and naval history, and particularly noticed the inquiry into the conduct of Admiral Calder, about three years ago. It was worthy of notice, that that Officer was severely reprimanded, though he had gained a victory. He (Mr. Quin) hoped there was not to be one law for our Navy and another for our Army. He was convinced it needed not to be so—our Army and Navy were composed of the same spirited materials. The Convention, he declared to be a foul and abominable act of High Treason against the King and Parliament, and the Country, for which nothing but a full, fair, and ample inquiry could satisfy the public honour and feeling. He trusted, therefore, that on such an occasion, there should be nothing but unanimity heard in that Court, as no sentiment but one prevailed on the subject throughout the country.

Alderman Smith perfectly concurred in the motion.

Mr. J. Dixon admitted that inquiry was necessary. He would agree to the motion if it was worded merely to that end, but he would condemn no men, without hearing the reasons by which they were actuated.

Alderman Price perfectly agreed to the motion.

Alderman Birch gave his fullest assent to the motion, and as an Englishman, bearing the honour of his Majesty's Commission as a Volunteer Officer, and feeling for the honour of the British Army, he felt the full necessity of inquiry, and saw nothing in the wording of the motion at all exceptionable.

Alderman Combe not only felt the necessity for inquiry, and the discovery of the authors of this disgrace, but thought, that where guilt was proved, vengeance should follow.

Alderman Curtis concurred in both points; but objected solely to the premature and unnecessary measure of an Address to advise his Majesty to that inquiry, for which no man in the kingdom was more anxious than the Sovereign himself.

Mr. Slade thought the Address necessary, as it would shew his Majesty that the sense of his People was in support of the inquiry he had so much at heart. It was a representation, as it were, from the Grand Jury of the Nation, to the Majesty of the Country, that a great injury had been done, and that inquiry and punishment should attach upon the delinquents; and he hoped the Vote of this day would be an example for every Corporation in the Country.

After a few words from Mr. Waithman, the question was put, and carried unanimously, and a Committee appointed to prepare the Address.

Being returned, the Address was read and agreed to, and the Sheriffs, attended by the Remembrancer, were requested to wait upon his Majesty, to know his Royal Pleasure when the Court may attend to present the same.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be reduced to 14d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and household 12½d.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the following Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, viz.

Capt. Wedderburn, Cumberland; and Capt. Kirkpatrick, Henry Addington;—Bombay and China.

Capt. Welbank, Cuffnells;—St. Helena, Bencoolen, and China.

Capt. Swinton, Carnatic;—Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.

The following outward-bound East India ships arrived at Simon's Bay (Cape of Good Hope) the 31st of May last, under convoy of his Majesty's ship Lion, and sailed from thence the 16th of June, viz.—Calcutta, Hugh Inglis, Exeter, Ceres, Preston, Dorsetshire, Ocean, Lord Nelson, and Canton.

The Phœnix and Walmer Castle, from St. Helena, arrived at Simon's Bay the 31st of May; the former sailed with the fleet, under convoy of the Lion, and the latter proceeded on her voyage to Bencoolen the 9th of June.

The David Scott and Alnwick Castle parted from the fleet, under the Lion, on the 27th of March, in latitude 25. 59. N. longitude 20. 41. W.

On the 29th of June the Mary Ann British lugger spoke the extra ships Alexander and Northumberland outward-bound, in latitude 23. S. longitude 32. 55. W.

The Streatham outward-bound East India ship arrived at Rio Janeiro on the 17th of July last, having sprung her foremast so badly, that it could not be fished at sea. Capt. Dale hoped he should be able to proceed to sea by the 25th of July. The Streatham left his Majesty's ship Leopard, with the following ships, on the 10th of July, viz.—Earl St. Vincent, Bengal, Jane Duchess of Gordon, Harriet, and Huddart. The Lady Jane Dundas parted company on the 1st of June, and the Indus on the 23d.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. IX.

There stands the Messenger of Truth! there stands
The Legate of the Skies!—His theme divine,

REV. WILLIAM JAY,

OF ARGYLE CHAPEL, BATH.

IT is not among the least of those advantages possessed by the various orders of dissenters over the established church, that, by occasional interchange of ministerial services, they are enabled continually to attract and gratify their followers. The religious world, as well as the profane, has its fashions. It has its ministers of the day; and it has its race of sermon hunters, who, as in the apostolic times, run with "itching ears" after every evangelical favourite. This disposition is judiciously to be consulted. New preachers, and popular, do not spring up incessantly; and it therefore seems commendable to keep alive the principle of curiosity, by bringing before the christian public those ministers who have already obtained general approbation and established strong claims to distinction.

Most of the particulars which I am enabled to relate concerning Mr. Jay are collected from his "Memoirs of the Life and Character of the late Rev. Cornelius Winter," recently published. Mr. Winter was his preceptor and friend; and Mr. Jay has most honourably recorded the character of one to whom, says he, "I owe all my respectability in life, and all my opportunities of public usefulness."

The Rev. William Jay was born at the village of Tisbury, the son of reputable but unaffluent parents. Here he was noticed by the late Rev. Mr. C. Winter, during his ministerial labours among the villages adjoining to Marlborough, where he was then established over one of the protestant meetings, and where he had just formed a seminary for the tuition of a very select number of youths. Early in 1785, the subject of this paper experienced the felicity of being received into, and domesticated with, the family of his revered tutor. "Several months before," however, writes Mr. W. to his pupil Mr. Jay, "my eye was upon you, my dear friend, more immediately than upon any other in the congregation, and my heart knit unaccountably to you. I was impressed with an idea that I should one day have you under my roof." It was customary with Mr. Winter to introduce his students soon into the work of the ministry. Satisfied of the tendency of the heart towards piety, when discovered in early religious impressions, he immediately advanced the formation of the mind, and stimulated it to enter earnestly on the course which was afterwards to be pursued. "There are few things," observes Mr. Jay, commenting on and approving this practice, "that I can remember with so much melting pleasure, as my going with him—walking by the side of his little horse, and now and then riding—on a fine summer's evening, into a neighbouring village, and returning again the same night, or very early in the morning." "He engaged his students to preach very early," during these excursions, "after they were with him. He heard their discourses and prayers with the greatest tenderness, and beamed with pleasure at every presage of improvement."

I have not succeeded in exactly ascertaining the time when Mr. Jay first ascended the pulpit. "Your way to Tisbury," writes Mr. Winter, to him, "seems open. On the first of October, if life and health are spared, you are appointed to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ, in the village where you first drew your breath," &c. If, as is conjecturable, this letter alluded to his commencing sermon, the clerical exertions of Mr. Jay are to be dated from the close of the year 1787. His labours seem to have been immediately appreciated. "O blessed villages," exclaims his enraptured teacher, "which were favoured with your respective ministerial labours! O highly-favoured Marlborough, whose streets were then occasionally thronged with them who went to and from the house of God, and had their hearts filled with joy and gladness!" He had indeed taken care to enter upon preaching, in the words of his more than father, as a work of the last importance.

Mr. Winter's connexion with the Rev. Rowland Hill enabled him quickly to place his pupil where evangelical talents would be most extensively estimated. Mr. Jay appeared accordingly at Surry Chapel, Black Friars' Road, during the summer of 1788. His preceptor, with paternal solicitude, followed all his steps, with vigilance so unremitting, with an affection so anxious, that I cannot resist the pleasing task of transcribing his counsels. "If," he writes to Mr. Jay, July 29, 1788, "you really have performed your appointment for Mr. Hill, I would advise you to attend to no further invitations, but leave London immediately. Come into the country, to pray and reflect; and wherever you go, set the picture of your mortality before you, and consider that he who has raised you can sink you," &c. "What a noise [May 8, 1789] have you made in the world! How many eyes are upon you.—How many hearts fear for you! How many envy you! &c. These are your best days, make much of them; and by your indifference to yourself, and that holy negligence which is a bright ornament and necessary to blunt the edge of even kind suspicion; shew that you can be popular without being proud. The church, as well as the world, looks with a jealous eye upon the young minister of the day; and especially upon those who have no paternal property to support gay appearance." Let every young candidate for the church, of whatever denomination of christians, read and reflect on these important counselling admonitions.

Mr. Jay now became rapidly popular. He long since settled at Bath, as Minister of Argyle Chapel, where his hearers are both respectable and numerous. He has published various Sermons, and a tract on Marriage. He is married, and has children.

Easiness is the characteristic of this preacher. "God," to use the quaint but significant description of his preceptor, "has given him a tongue, and an early commission to use it." His great excellence is, that his disposition leads him to delight in the benevolent features of christianity; whence he is persuasive rather than peremptory, and excels in exhorting to repentance. If he is not a Boanerges, he is a Barnabas: if he does not often alarm and intimidate the sinner, yet he always consoles and strengthens the believer. His talents, indeed, are peculiarly calculated to interest minds susceptible of tenderness; and his labours are therefore particularly agreeable to the female portion of his audiences. He is what may be termed an amiable preacher.

The matter of his discourses is generally practical and experimental. But he enumerates his divisions too often; a custom which, however it may assist the speaker, encumbers his arrangement and tires his hearers. His expressions are frequently quaint, as—"the example of king Josiah of old"——"We may say as one of old did"——; and sometimes they border on vulgarity, as—— "being ready to strike the heart out of one's body"——"the ordinance of preaching seems to have swallowed up the duty of prayer."

His style, though deformed by many inaccuracies, is pleasingly familiar. His address is simple, but insinuating. His action, if not striking, has nothing ungraceful.

I should entirely admire the fullness and clearness of his voice, if, apparently in conformity with his system of intercessional instruction, it did not degenerate into petitioning or begging tones, into alms-asking articulation. He is also too long, and sometimes scarcely audible, in prayer.

Highly as I respect the character of Mr. Jay, and willing as I am to allow all possible credit to his public exertions, I cannot consent to class him among the eminently distinguished divines of the age. He began, as we have seen, to preach very early in life; and he probably owes much of his popularity to that circumstance. It is something, however, to have firmly retained his first reputation. I trust that he is as happy in other respects; that profession is never at variance with principle; that experience, instead of changing, has only confirmed the convictions of youth. I confess, commonly speaking, that I entertain many apprehensions respecting juvenile conversions. The man is too often destined to unlearn what the boy has been induced to believe. This I say generally.

Considering him as a writer, I have now no concern with Mr. Jay. Onesimus.

DEFENCE OF THE REV. MR. MOORE.

Onesimus has this moment received the following Animadversions on his Account of the Rev. James Moore. Time does not now permit him to comment either on the veracity or ingenuity of his new antagonist; but he has directed it to be literally inserted, and (though, as the reader will see, a bribe is preferred!) without fee or reward to the publishers of this paper.

Gentlemen, Oct. 6th, 1808.

If you will be kind enough to insert the inclosed Answer to Onesimus in your next week's valuable Register you will infinitely Oblige,

Gentlemen,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

Germanicus.

P. S. Not being acquainted with the rules, I don't know whether any payment is necessary for the insertion; if it is, do not delay to publish it, but in your note to correspondents, let me know, and on the word of a gentleman you shall receive the money the next morning.

Messrs. Bell and De Camp.

The insidious and illiberal attack made on the character of one of the most eminent divines of the age, (Mr. Moore) by Onesimus, could not but excite in every generous and feeling mind, sentiments of indignation and contempt: influenced by such sentiments, I cannot resist offering a few remarks on Onesimus's letter. He, in the first instance, proves himself prejudiced and narrow-minded, by mentioning the first events at Mr. M.'s onset in the world: if Mr. Moore really did at one period "take up the histrionic profession," which I by no means pretend to contradict, is he, on that account, unfitted for more sacred duties? is he less calculated for his important office, because led away into error (if error it may be termed) by the inconstancy and thoughtlessness natural to youth? Have not some of the most eminent Ministers of Christianity, nay, the Apostles themselves, turned from equally "profane pursuits." Onesimus recommends Mr. Moore to clear his character of this supposed speck, by his present exemplary conduct: a recommendation Mr. M. as perfectly understands and fulfils, as Onesimus can possibly instruct him, and if my noble minded friend would trouble himself to make the inquiry, I have not a doubt he would find Mr. Moore's private life as unexceptionable as even his refined ideas could wish. With regard to his style of preaching, Mr. M., I will readily admit is totally persuasive; but because he thunders not forth the terrors of the laws, does it consequently follow, that his doctrine is not evangelic and sound, and that his sermons are mere flowery orations? Is not the human heart, in most cases, as open to persuasion, as to threats? Do not the latter often produce a species of stupified despair, which wholly enervates the mind, and sinks it beyond the power of making those exertions that it ought on so important a point? As to my liberal animadvertor's observations on Mr. Moore's manner in the pulpit, they are much too puerile to be worth the notice of any impartial person, and could come from none but the pen of invidious calumny or weak envy, and will never, from their quaintness, add a wreath to their author's literary fame. I have no more to add, than to advise Onesimus, whenever he again takes upon himself the arduous task of criticising a man, who rises far above his contemptible accusations, he would have some determined point whereon to make his attack, as without that, neither he nor any other will ever make an effectual stand: a general survey of a character, and insinuations thrown over every part of it, shews the accuser fearful or unwilling to risk a closer examination, than which nothing can be a greater proof of its impotency and injustice. I should be sorry to be unjustly severe, but if I mistake not, few will consider the remarks of Onesimus worthy a second perusal, either from the truth of the criticism, or the propriety of their arrangements, and, except his few observations at the conclusion, I think (as he observes in a former part concerning the gentleman he so unjustly asperses) his literary reputation will not be increased by this ingenious and liberal production.

 I have just received, under the signature of Philo Veritas, another Defence of the Rev. John Moore. This last worthy gentleman seems extremely irritable and even vindictive: his resentment has evidently superseded his christianity. "Coward, dastardly coward," and I know not what besides, are the epithets with which this correspondent thinks it proper to honour me! Before my remarks on his reverend friend appeared, I was, in his estimation, all that was commendable; but now——. I really compassionate Mr. Moore's situation, if he has no better friends than Germanicus and Philo Veritas: who, under the pretence of vindicating his character, appear determined to do him the most serious injury. I hope, indeed, they will cease to provoke any further reflections from me.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Tuesday last Mrs. Orger, from Edinburgh, made her first appearance at Drury Lane, in the character of Lydia Languish, in The Rivals. This Lady possesses almost every requisite for the stage, ease, grace, a pleasant voice, a handsome countenance, and an elegant figure. Having been accustomed to meet the applause of a Scotch audience, she thought too highly of the taste of a London one to betray any symptom of fear. Her modest confidence enabled her to give due effect to her part, and was rewarded with deserved plaudits. The youthful simplicity that marked her features, and her moderately whining accent, rendered her imitation of a girl, whose heart is warmed with romantic love through the perusal of novels, more like an original than a copy. In the scene when her aunt and Sir Anthony Absolute are announced, and she bids her maid conceal the works she was reading, she was rather too tame, and gave her commands with an air of indifference, which proclaimed her heart was totally free from the apprehension she so weakly attempted to express. Upon the whole she proved herself worthy of the reception with which she met, and we have do doubt but study will improve her talents, and enable her to occupy a distinguished station in the drama.

Elliston, who, through some unaccountable whim, had till then acted the part of Faulkland, which nearly concealed his powers, at last assumed that of Captain Absolute, which, in his hands, suddenly emerged from the obscurity in which Barrymore had plunged it, into the brilliancy of liveliness and wit. Mr. Henry Siddons, in Faulkland, delivered a few speeches with appropriate energy, but at nearly regular distances, like a clock that strikes at certain periods only. Mrs. Sparks displayed no small degree of excellence, which, however, shrank into insignificance at the mere recollection of Miss Pope in the same character. Dowton, as usual, soared above the sphere of criticism.

KING'S THEATRE.

On Friday night, a pretended new melo-drama, entitled, The Forest of Hermenstad, or Princess and no Princess, was acted at this theatre. This literary theft proves that folly has many champions, but that her stock of arms is nearly exhausted, since two of her most distinguished soldiers are obliged to fight in turn with the same weapon. Scarcely had it dropped from Mr. Skeffington's hand, than Mr. Dibdin slily picked it up, and then boldly assailed sense, taste, and wit, with most unblushing impudence. More fortunate than his robbed companion, undeserved success crowned his cause, and loud plaudits, every one of which proclaimed its author an undescerning patron of nonsense, rewarded his temerity.

We congratulated the Drury Lane audience last week, on the judgment they displayed in condemning two miserable pieces to merited oblivion. We expressed our hope, nay our conviction, that such severity would burst the slumbers of true genius, and at length overpower and annihilate ignorance and its silly brood. But we are sorry to see our expectations nearly blasted by the warm reception granted on Friday night to unworthiness by the crowds that filled the immensity of the King's theatre. Nonsense is a tree of stupendous magnitude, planted in the rich soil of public patronage, it spreads its baneful shade over the whole domains of modern literature, and checks the growth of talent and genius that spring and wither at its foot. Its roots are numerous, but lay near the surface of the ground; criticism now and then severs some of them from the trunk, but their division serves only to strengthen those that remain, or cause new ones to sprout. The axe must be continually and unmercifully applied if we wish to effect its entire destruction. While the audience of one of our winter theatres is industriously bent upon the overthrow of this fatal tree, let not that of the other home afford it every prop that can secure it from falling. It is not a private, it is a general benefit that will be obtained by its eradication. Let the public and periodical critics therefore join their efforts together; let union be their motto, impartial justice their weapon, universal advantage their aim, and success will soon prove their reward.

However severely we animadverted in our last paper, on Mr. Skeffington's Mysterious Bride, and however deficient we continue to deem it, in whatever ought to constitute a drama, we cannot refrain from thinking that he has been very much wronged by the author of The Forest of Hermenstad. The poor man who with only sixpence in his pocket is robbed by a footpad, loses as much in proportion as the wealthy citizen who should have to deplore the rape of a guinea; and the criminality of the deed is equal in both cases. Mr. Skeffington wrote a bad drama in three acts, which was acted successfully three nights last season, and damned the fourth time it was performed, last week. Mr. Dibdin copied the first act, word for word, and reduced the two others into one, with the only trifling change of introducing the Bulgarian Ambassador half an hour sooner than Mr. Skeffington had done. Is this fair? is this honourable? Not only all the incidents were the same, not only the order in which they happened was not changed, but the very language throughout the whole of the first act, and the greatest part of the second, had suffered scarcely any alteration, and when it had, it was much for the worse. To look for beauties in Mr. Skeffington's drama, would be vain, yet the jealousy of the innkeeper's wife gave rise to something like humour, which vanished away in Mr. Dibdin's copy. The former gentleman's play suffered greatly from the imbecility and want of memory of the actor, and Mr. Dibdin's was strongly supported, or rather saved, by the excellence of [illegible].

Mr. Skeffington has loudly complained that his piece has been damned through the influence of a party: We fondly hoped and believed its condemnation had sprung from justice alone, but are now almost inclined to give credit to his assertion. It is impossible that a melo drama evidently stolen from his own, and still less interesting, should have succeeded unless through the influence of a party, the numbers of which were too considerable not to daunt any play against which their animosity was bent. In order to hinder the public from perceiving the theft committed on the Mysterious Bride, it was necessary to crush it on the first night of its regeneration, and before the Forest of Hermenstad made its appearance. This was performed, and we have thus a new proof that good flows from evil. This scheme has however partly failed: Mr. Skeffington is now raised in the estimation of every sensible being as an injured man, that subject title to the commiseration of his fellow-creatures; and Mr. Dibdin has sunk his fame as an author, still lower, and not [illegible] to his reputation as a man of honour.

The music was pretty, but not new; it presented us with several old acquaintance, amongst which O Lady fair! Alas! May public justice overtake this piece at its second representation!

FUNERAL OF PROFESSOR PORSON.

On Monday last the remains of Professor Porson were removed from the house of the London Institution in the Old Jewry in order to be deposited in Trinity College Chapel, Cambridge. The Directors of the Institution ordered it to be shut for the day, and the Officers assisted in the solemnity. The procession from London consisted of four mourning coaches, followed by six private carriages; and the persons who attended were his relatives and most intimate friends.

At half after two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon the [illegible] arrived at Trinity College, Cambridge, and were received at the great gate, and conveyed to the Hall, where the body lay in state till five o'clock.

The Lord Bishop of Bristol, Master of the College, the Vice Master, Senior and Junior Fellows, Bachelors, Scholars, and other Members resident in the [illegible] academical habits, and in black scarfs, bands, and gloves, walked from the Combination-room, accompanied by the Chief Mourners, into the Hall; and after moving round the body, which was in the midst, they took their seats, the Chief Mourners being placed on the right and left of the Master. Several Epithalamiums in Greek and English verse, the effusions of reverential respect, were placed on the pall, and were read with the most sympathetic interest by his former associates in study. An anthem was chanted by the choir. After which the body was raised by the bearers, and a most solemn procession was made round the great quadrangle of the College, from the Hall to the Chapel. On entering the Chapel, which was illuminated, the Lord Bishop, Chief Mourners, and the Members of the College took their places, and the choir performed an anthem. The Lord Bishop then read the lesson, and the procession moved in the same order to the grave, which was at the foot of the statue of Sir Isaac Newton, and surrounded by those of the illustrious persons which this College has produced. When they had taken their stations around the grave, and the body was ready for interment, the funeral anthem was performed by the choir in the adjoining Chapel, during the most perfect silence, and with the most solemn effect.

The service was now read by the Lord Bishop with such an awful, dignified and impressive pathos as we never witnessed on any former solemnity of the kind. He was himself overwhelmed by his feelings; and he communicated the sympathetic emotion to every listening friend of the deceased. The senior members of the College who had lived with the Professor in habits of endearing intercourse for thirty years, and who had the best means of estimating the height and variety of his attainments, shed tears of sorrow over the grave! and the whole assembly displayed a feeling which bespoke the sense they entertained of the loss that not only their own society, but the literary world had suffered by his death.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

FALMOUTH, OCT. 2.—We are in hourly expectation of sailing either to Spain or Italy. The cavalry cannot be embarked in time, they will therefore follow us. Our expedition consists of 11,000 infantry and 5000 cavalry. The staff is not yet completely appointed. This may produce some delay. We are attended by a larger force of artillery than ever accompanied a similar expedition. Our infantry consists of Guards, 1st Battalion, 1000 strong; Royals, 3d ditto, 800; 14th, 2d ditto, 800; 23d, 2d ditto, 700; 26th, 1st ditto, 1000; 27th, 2d ditto, 800; 31st, 2d ditto, 800; 43d, 1st ditto, 1000; 51st, 1st ditto, 1000; 59th, 2d ditto, 700; 76th, 1st ditto, 1000; 81st, 2d 800; 95th, part of the 1st and 2d ditto, 800; in the whole 11,200.

Lieutenant-General Sir David Baird, Commander in Chief; Major-General Manningham, Second in Command; Major-General Warde; Major-General Mackenzie; Brigadier-General Slade; Brigadier-General Crauford; Colonel D'Urban, Deputy Adjutant-General.

The artillery are provided with the new invented guns, to be carried by mules when the march of the army lies through the mountains. The Royal Waggon Train are also to be compleated with mules on their arrival. The transports are provisioned for two months, from which some conjecture we are going into the Mediterranean. But from what has transpired through the Staff, it is to enable these ships after our debarcation, to proceed to Portugal to receive the troops there and convey them to any other point where they may be wanted.

LIGHTNING.—On the 18th ult. the Sultan, of 74 guns, Capt. Griffith, lying at Port Mahon, Minorca was struck with lightning, in a way that was truly awful and terrific. The Officers were at dinner, when, in a moment, the ship received a dreadful shock, as though a ball of fire had struck her, and had gone quite through, making an explosion in its passage as loud as the explosion of a quantity of gunpowder. The Officers, as it were involuntarily, rushed out of their cabins, and discovered that it had struck the jib boom, killed seven men, badly wounded three others, and conducted by some of the iron-work, ran along the jib-boom, tore it to pieces, struck the cap of the bow-sprit, shivered it, and then fell into the water. The three poor fellows who were wounded were dreadfully mangled The unfortunate sufferers were some of the best seamen in the ship.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

DARING BURGLARY.—Countess Morton's House, in Park-street had for several days, been surrounded by a set of suspicious fellows, who generally met about dusk. The servant-maid entrusted with the care of the house, having taken notice of them, gave information at Marlborough-street Office. Accordingly, on Wednesday night, three Police Officers, well prepared with arms, went to the house, and at eight o'clock they sent the servant out; after which they secreted themselves in a closet adjoining one of the rooms, having provided themselves with a candle. Soon after the departure of the servant the kitchen bell was rung several times, and not being answered, the ringing was followed by a hard knocking at the door. The thieves thinking there was no person in the house, broke the door open, and went to the room adjoining the closet where the officers had concealed themselves, when the latter rushed out upon the robbers, who were five in number. A battle immediately ensued, and in the scuffle the candle was put out. One of the Officers had just time to discharge his blunderbuss, and shot one of them in the left arm; the shot went through the bone. Thus rudely assailed, the robbers attempted to make their escape through the back part of the house, by jumping off the first floor, which leads into Park-lane; in the attempt one of the thieves broke his leg, and was immediately secured. The man that had been shot ran down South-street, and turning down a Mews where there was no thoroughfare, he was also taken—the other three escaped. One of them must have received a severe wound, as the cutlass was covered with blood, and those taken had not been touched by it. The two men who had been taken, it appears, are reputed house-breakers. They were taken to Mount-street watch-house. As soon as the man that had been shot was brought in, he dropped down, and fainted from the loss of blood. Medical assistance was immediately procured. One of them is not expected to recover.

SHOCKING SUICIDE.—An Inquisition was taken at three o'clock yesterday afternoon, at the White-Bear, Piccadilly, before A. Gell, Esq. Coroner for Westminster, on the body of Mr. Brooke, an eminent stock-broker, in the above street, who put a period to his existence on the preceding day.—The principal witness to prove the fact of the suicide was the cook-maid of the family. It appeared, that Mr. Brooke had been observed in a very dejected state for some days, and he had been seen walking about the street at an early hour in the morning, a very unusual thing. This dejection was supposed to have arisen from embarrassment, in consequence of Mr. Brooke having speculated to a risk which turned out to a disadvantage, besides his having been a material sufferer by the late failure in the city. He had been walking out on Friday morning, and on his return home, he spent some time in looking at his papers. On a sudden the cook-maid heard the report of a pistol in the privy; and on going there she found her master weltering in his blood, with his head shot to atoms. It was a horse pistol, supposed to have been loaded with two or more slugs, and so crammed with powder, that the barrel was knocked into pieces, and one of the slugs had penetrated two inches into an opposite wall. The deceased was a man universally respected, from his affability and upright dealings. He was the Agent of the Duke of Leeds, and had the partial management of that Nobleman's estates.—He has left an amiable young wife and four children, the eldest six years of age the day of this unhappy event, and whose birth was to have been celebrated in the evening.—Verdict Insanity.

Last Sunday night two of the felons confined in Newgate, succeeded in filing off their irons, and escaping from their cells, reached the wall which enclosed the yard, from which one of them leaped, but fell and broke his back: the other one was secured.

BIRTH.

On Friday morning, at his house in Grafton-street, the Lady of Viscount Hinchingbrook, of a daughter.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-TWO.

THE EXPOSITION OF BONAPARTE'S TREACHERY TOWARDS SPAIN.—BY DON CEVALLOS.

The history of nations is an almost uninterrupted narrative of crimes and weakness; of insolent violation of social and political institutions on the part of the principal actors; and of tame submission on that of the many. In perusing the disgusting story, the philanthropist seldom finds an opportunity of indulging in exultation and pleasure. For the few pages which are consigned to record the beneficial effects of justice, freedom and public spirit, how many volumes are full of private wrongs and public calamity; of vice triumphant and innocence oppressed! We go with horror and indignation through the long series of ages; and whatever favourable opinion we may have entertained before the perusal, we conclude with something like contempt for the human species itself. However disposed we may be from nature or education to resist this involuntary sentiment, almost every line in Thucydides, Tacitus, Guicciardine, De Thou, and others, is an humiliating proof of the insufficiency of reason, and of the weakness, even atrocity, of the human heart. From motives favourable to mankind, we attempt to persuade ourselves, that those philosophic historians may have been biassed in their descriptions; or that the monsters and calamities they describe, have been engendered by a gloomy or misanthropical imagination; we are compelled, however reluctantly, by the atrocities of our own time to renounce the pleasing delusion. Whilst we execrated the triumphs of Cæsar and the infuriated ambition of the Macedonian; whilst we shrink with horror from a belief in the existence of monsters like Tiberius, Alexander the Sixth and Christian of Denmark, we congratulated ourselves on the liberal and humane spirit of our own age, which secured us against similar visitations. But this last prop of our tottering faith is torn from us; and our vaunted philosophical century has engendered a ruffian, who unites with the treachery, dissimulation, remorseless cruelty, insatiate rapacity and ungovernable ambition of the former, the meanness of a pickpocket, and the cunning of a sharper. Whoever has the unfeeling levity to deny the truth of this delineation, after having read the exposition of Cevallos, deserves to be watched with a jealous and attentive eye by the Government under which he lives. There is now no refuge for sophistry, profligacy or treason, should they dare come forward in defence or extenuation of the perfidious ruffian. This unfeeling wretch belongs to no country, no sect, no society. His designs against the happiness and tranquillity of all enforce the necessity of a general confederacy of virtue, innocence and talents, against this common outcast, this universal outlaw. As he has coolly and deliberately, with a few villains whom he has trained and selected, entered into a conspiracy against society itself; as he has trampled on, and disannulled public and private law, he should not be considered as a partaker in their benefits, and every one has an undeniable right to get rid, by what means he can, of the common enemy of all. This doctrine may appear pernicious and immoral; but the persons, who will consider it as such, have no yearnings for the orphans and widows, for the parents and husbands, who now bewail in every province of Spain and Portugal, the injuries or dishonour they have sustained. The humanity and justice of those individuals are of a doubtful kind; but had they, in common with the myriads of victims in Switzerland and Germany, suffered, through the restlessness of one solitary person, the loss of their property, honour and happiness, they would not be so over scrupulous in their means of preservation and defence. At the distance which Providence has kindly placed us from the malignant influence of the unrelenting monster, we can fortunately indulge in speculations on justifiable, honourable enmity, and give a latitude to the generosity of our sentiments; but, had we witnessed the murder of the amiable and enlightened Palm, and the subsequent seizure of the effects of his widow and six children, to defray the expence of the trial and execution; had we been present at the plunder of the innocent and unoffending inhabitants of Lubeck, who, for three days and three nights, had been abandoned to the violence, rapacity and lust of a drunken, licentious, unpaid soldiery; or, had we been spectators of the unheard of injuries offered to the citizens of Cordova, Bilboa and other towns in Spain; or, had our own towns been exposed to the devastation and brutality of these hordes; or, had our own wives and our own daughters been treated like those of the Swiss, the Germans and the Spaniards; we should not be revolted at any means of vengeance, which our courage, or the sense of our excessive injuries, would prescribe.

It is after having read the simple and heart-rending narrative of the honest and illustrious Spaniard, that we know to appreciate the sentiments of those men, who propose a compromise between our Government and the mean, treacherous, equivocating ruffian, delineated in this exposition.

Nothing can be more dangerous to the interests of the community than false principles of justice and humanity. They are false, when they propose only a momentary advantage; and afterwards tend to augment the embarrassments they wish to obviate. Governments, on such occasions, display the same want of foresight and prudence, which we reprobate in the conduct of private men: to get rid, for a short time, of the present evil, they submit to a ruinous engagement which, after a lapse of two or three years, accumulates the difficulties and dangers they endeavoured to escape. Such would have been the unavoidable consequences to this country, had the crude notions of Whitbread, Roscoe, and others, been adopted. We know how superfluous it is at present to point out the fallacy and danger of such theories. The ruffian they wished us to conciliate, or, more properly speaking, to submit to, has proved by his atrocious perfidy to Spain, the unsoundness of their political doctrines, and the extent of their penetration. However, as the same sophistry, presumption, ignorance, and love of singularity, which produced their unceasing cries on the expediency of a Peace may occasion their interference on subjects equally momentuous; it is by no means irrelevant to expose the immoral tendency of their doctrines, and the impolicy of their suggestions.

There is something we cannot reconcile or comprehend, when we examine the Usurper's conduct relative to Spain. Whilst he displayed the most Sovereign contempt, the most brutal disregard for every thing that is considered as indispensable and sacred even by men who are least conscientious in the means they employ; he seemed to shew a degree of confidence, or, rather, credulity, not very usual in his character. The permission he gave Cevallos to return with the Duke del Infantado, and other members of the Bayonne Junta, whose inflexible integrity rendered a distrust in their co-operation, or subserviency justifiable, can be accounted for in no other manner, than by attributing it to that disbelief which tyrants entertain of the existence of virtue; or to the detestable conviction they have that avarice is the great mobile of human actions. However, this apparent inconsistency is perfectly reconcilable with the character of a consummate villain; and the same principle which induced him to make Spain one scene of devastation and murder, encouraged him to believe, that no man is proof against corruption. This extreme depravation, and this profligate contempt of others, have caused an appearance of unsuspecting candour on the one side, and a system of treachery, prevarication, falsehood, and deception on the other. Whilst he feels the excruciating conviction that virtue is no chimera, he will not neglect turning the unpropitious discovery, as much as possible to his advantage, by imputing the effects of unbounded profligacy to the generous, unsuspicious turn of his disposition. Whatever way we examine his conduct on the occasion, the more we admire the total degradation of principle, which could produce a result favourable to humanity; and were it consistent with our religious notions to think that Sovereign wisdom should have chosen a little Corsican upstart as the agent of his incomprehensible decrees, we would believe that this fellow was incited to his nefarious undertaking, in order to rouse the dormant energies of a brave and distinguished people. However, without entering further into a species of speculation rather extraneous to a political disquisition, every honest man cannot fail to exult at seeing the utmost refinement of villainy holding out a prospect of advantage to those whose happiness it conspired to subvert.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 2.—Letters from Bayonne, of September 24, contain the following intelligence:—

"Troops and artillery daily arrive here. The passage of the army will continue through this place during the whole month of October. We have this instant received information, that the Spanish General, Blake, has come from the Asturias with a division of 8000 men, and is marching upon Bilbon. Letters received this morning from Vittoria state, that Marshal Bessieres, who had removed his head-quarters to Burgos, had, upon receiving intelligence of the movement of the Spaniards, marched at the head of a division, with the intention of cutting them off; and it was even said that he had already arrived at Lerenda, through which place it was most probable that Blake's corps would endeavour to escape. The same letters further state that Vittoria is in a state of complete tranquillity. The commercial relations with Bayonne are still in full activity. The troops that were encamped on the glacis set off this morning for Spain; and it is stated, that the troops, on their march for this place, will arrive sooner than was expected, as they are advancing by different routes through the greater and lesser Landes. The supplies of bread, meat, and forage, are ordered to be got ready by the 27th. The corps commanded by Marshal Ney is in the presence of the insurgent army, under the command of General Castanos; and his Excellency appears to have concerted some enterprise with Marshal Mancey. All the troops are full of animation, and their march through France is a truly magnificent expedition.

SEPTEMBER 27.—The news from Keiserlautern mention, that his Majesty the Emperor had passed through that town on the 24th. The presence of the two most powerful Monarchs in Europe at Erfurth will occasion the assemblage of many Princes there. His Majesty, it is said, will appear attended by a very numerous and splendid retinue. This celebrated meeting will, no doubt, furnish ample matter to the historical pen, whether we consider the importance of the decisions, which will involve the fate of nations pending upon it, or the lustre and authority of the two Sovereign Arbiters.

GERMANY.

BANKS OF THE ELBE, SEPT. 23.—An Estafette is said to have reached Hamburgh this afternoon, with intelligence of the arrival of Napoleon at Erfurth, and of Alexander and the Grand Duke Constantine at Weimar. It is rumoured that the Russian Directing Senate had declared itself against the Emperor of Russia's journey, but that its objections were overruled by the Monarch.

CUSTRIN, SEPT. 25.—Yesterday, towards noon, arrived here his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and was waited upon with congratulations by his Excellency the Duke of Dalmatia (Marshal Soult), expressly come here for that purpose. His Majesty condescended to pass in review the troops, which had marched to the Parade for his reception; and after taking a refreshment, immediately set out again on his journey through Frankfort and Torgau to Weimar. His Imperial Highness Prince Constantine had arrived here the day before.

LEIPSIC, SEPT. 25.—His Imperial Highness, the Grand Duke Constantine, passed the day before yesterday through this city, on his way to Erfurth, and was followed by his Majesty the Emperor Alexander, who stopped here the night, and this morning pursued his journey to the above place. His Majesty our King, is expected here in the course of this day, and will set out to-morrow for Erfurth.

A fresh levy, of between sixty and seventy thousand men has been ordered in the Austrian dominions, upon the same footing as the Militia lately organized; they are to be called the Militia of Reserve, and are intended to supply vacancies in the former. The people have been invited to enrol themselves, and thousands have in consequence done so. There are thus two Armies of Reserve, consisting of nearly one hundred and eighty thousand men, besides numerous corps of drivers, &c. The Regular Army comprising upwards of four hundred and fifty thousand men.

The greater part of the Austrian troops, forming the Cordon on the Turkish frontiers, have been recalled into the interior of Hungary.

Every thing in the Austrian dominions has assumed a military character; even the amusements of the children. At Vienna almost all the boys are enrolled on Sundays and holidays in corps, and the Government has deemed it expedient to encourage this sentiment. The Archduke Charles and Maximilian lately attended a review of the brigade of boys, in the suburb of Leopolstadt, and distributed numerous presents among such of these juvenile volunteers as most distinguished themselves.

Count Von Kotschuberg, late Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has arrived at Vienna, on a particular mission. It is reported that he proceeds to Paris.

So great has been the patriotic ardour of the inhabitants of Austria under Ems, that although the province was called on to furnish only 14,000 men for the Army of Reserve, upwards of 40,000 men tendered their services, and have been provisionally enrolled.

The Diet of Hungary, at their late Sittings, have agreed to an extensive system of arming, and the organization of a numerous National Guard of Militia.

The greater part of the Bavarian troops which had been sent to the Tyrol have been recalled, to reinforce the three camps at Augsburgh, Plattingen, and Nuremberg, particularly the latter commanded by Count Von Isenberg. One regiment only, the 13th, Von Kinkels, remains in the Tyrol, from whence some corps of Sharpshooters have been ordered to the army under Gen. Wrede, near Augsburgh. Numerous recruits have also been drawn from the Vorarlberg; those from the Forest of Bregenz are represented as men of singularly large stature.

Prussia is making extraordinary exertions to re-organize her army. The King has issued two proclamations from Konigsberg; the one declares, that all arbitrary punishments in the army, as running the gauntlet, bastinades, &c. are abolished; and by the other, a general conscription, without exemption, is appointed. This latter ordinance, which bears date the 6th ult. declares, that all distinction of rank now ceases; that all have equal rights and duties; that in periods of peace, those only should aspire to Officers' commissions who have knowledge and education; and in time of war, bravery and judgment constitute the only recommendation to command, without the slightest regard to rank. The first and second Lieutenants and Ensigns of the new levies are to be chosen from amongst the most deserving soldiers who served in the late campaign. A numerous corps of Cadets, for the formation of future Officers, has also been established.

In several provinces of the Austrian Monarchy the Government, taking advantage of the late abundant crops, are forming extensive magazines.—The Hamburgh Correspondent, in reporting the circumstance, observes, that it is merely to prevent the recurrence of scarcity.

Austria, with a view to the formation of Military Commanders, has established four more companies of Cadets, in addition to the two at Neustadt and Vienna—each number is to comprise 194 members, and are to be stationed in Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, &c. From these companies all officers are in future to be chosen, and no man, however high his rank, can hereafter obtain a commission in the Austrian army, unless he has served in these probationary corps.

ARRAGON: Don Francisco Palafox, Don Lorenzo Calce.

ASTURIAS: The Most Excellent Senor Don Melchor de Jovellanos, the Marquis de Campo Sagrado.

(OLD) CASTILE: Don Lorenzo Bonifaes de Quintan, —— Valdes, absent.

CATALONIA: The Marquis de Villel, the Marquis de Sabasona.

CORDOVA: The Marquis de la Puebla, Don Juan de Dios Rahe.

ESTREMADURA: Don Martin de Garoy, Don Felix de Ovalle.

GRANADA: Don Rodrigo Requelinde, Don Luis Gines de Gines y Salido.

JAEN: Don Sebastian de Tocapo, Don Francisco Paulo Castanedo.

FOR MAJORCA, AND THE ADJACENT ISLANDS: Don Tomas de Vizi, Don Josef Sangiada de Tajores.

MURCIA: The Most Excellent Senor the President ad interim, the Senor Marquis de Villar.

SEVILLE: The Senor Archbishop of Laodicea, the Conde de Tilli.

TOLEDO: Don Pedro Bibero, Don Joseph Garcia de la Torre.

VALENCIA: The Conde de Contamina, El Principe de Pio.

The Most Serene Deputies assembled in the Sacristy of the Chapel belonging to the Palace of this Royal Residence. They heard mass, which was celebrated by the Most Excellent the Archbishop of Laodicea, Coadjutor of the Archbishop of Seville, and Deputy of that kingdom; after which the following oath, which had been previously taken by that Prelate, was administered by him, upon the book of the Holy Evangelists, to all the Most Serene Deputies:—

"You swear by God and his Holy Evangelists, and by Jesus Christ crucified, whose sacred image you have here present, that in the employment and functions of a Member of the Central Supreme Junta of Government of the Kingdom, you will defend, and promote the preservation and increase of our Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Religion; that you will be loyal to and defend our august Sovereign Ferdinand VII. and his rights and Sovereignty; that you will promote the preservation of our Rights and Privileges, our Laws and Usages, and especially those relative to the Succession in the Reigning Family, and those also which are particularly laid down in the same laws; and, finally, that you will promote every thing conducive to the general welfare and happiness of this Kingdom, and the amelioration of its customs, keeping secret every thing that should be so, protecting the Laws from every evil, and persecuting their enemies, even at the hazard of your life, safety, and property? —So I swear."

"If you do so, God be your helper; and if not, may he punish you, as one who had taken his holy name in vain.—Amen."

A solemn Te Deum was sung by the Community of Barefooted Monks of St. Pasqual of this place; and this religious act being concluded, the Junta passed in front of the fine battalion of light troops of Valencia, which was formed in two files from the entrance of the Chapel to the staircase of the Royal Palace, and adjourned to one of the principal halls destined at present for the sitting of the Juntas. In this public proceeding, and among the multitude of people of all classes and conditions who were assembled, the greatest enthusiasm was discovered in favour of Ferdinand VII. The enthusiasm and interest felt by the people increased, when the Most Serene Deputies proceeded to the great gallery of the principal front of the Palace, from which the actual President, ad interim, Count Florida Blanca, again proclaimed our beloved King Ferdinand.

The Most Serene Deputies being placed in their respective stations, and the President having pronounced a short but appropriate discourse, the Junta declared itself legitimately constituted, without any prejudice to the absentees, who are to compose the Junta of Government, in absence of our King and Master, Ferdinand VII. and ordered a literal certificate of this act to be drawn up, and directed to the President of the Council for his information, and that of the Tribunal. In the mean time communications are made to him of the last orders agreed upon.

Royal Palace of Aranjuez, the 25th of Sept. 1808.

MARTIN DE GAROY,
General Secretary ad interim.

CORUNNA, OCT. 2.—Yesterday morning a fleet of transports, escorted by two English frigates, a brig, and a cutter, hove in sight off the Cape, at the distance of four leagues from this port. They have on board 8,500 men, under the command of the Marquis del Romana, who are to be disembarked at St. Andero, unless the vessels should be prevented by contrary winds from making that port. Our generous Allies, the English, will co-operate with us against the enemy, by sending to our assistance a respectable force of infantry and cavalry. By the post from Portugal, just come in, we learn, that the corps commanded by the Marquis de Valladares, and the rest of the Spaniards in that kingdom, are on their march to join our army, well provided in point of arms and clothing.

EXPOSITION

OF THE PRACTICES AND MACHINATIONS WHICH LED TO THE USURPATION OF THE CROWN OF SPAIN, AND THE MEANS ADOPTED BY THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH TO CARRY IT INTO EXECUTION, BY DON PEDRO CEVALLOS, FIRST SECRETARY OF STATE AND DISPATCHES TO HIS CATHOLIC MAJESTY FERDINAND VII.

"The period when the nation has made and continues to make the most heroic efforts to shake off the yoke of slavery attempted to be imposed upon it, it is the duty of all good citizens to contribute, by every means in their power, to enlighten it with respect to the real causes that have brought it into its present situation, and to keep up the noble spirit by which it is animated.

"The Treaty of Tilsit, in which the destiny of the world seemed to be decided in favour of the Emperor of the French, was hardly concluded; when he turned his eyes towards the West, and resolved on the ruin of Portugal and Spain; or what comes to the same purpose, to make himself master of this vast Peninsula, with a view of making its inhabitants as happy as those of Italy, Holland, Switzerland, and the League of the Rhine.

"At this very time, the Emperor was revolving in his mind some designs fatal to Spain (for he began to disarm her), by demanding a respectable body of our troops to exert their valour in remote regions, and for foreign interests. This he effected without difficulty, and there was placed at his disposal a gallant and picked force of 16,000 men of all descriptions.

"The enterprize of making himself master of Spain was not so easy as Napoleon imagined. It was, above all, necessary to find out some pretext for carrying into execution the daring and gigantic plan of subjugating a friendly and allied nation, that had made so many sacrifices for France, and which this very Emperor had praised for its fidelity and nobleness of character.

"Nevertheless, being accustomed to act with that disregard to delicacy in the choice of his means, which is characteristic of the man who imagines that the conquest of the whole world, the destruction of the human species, and the havoc of war are conducive to true glory, he resolved to excite and foment discord in the Royal Family of Spain, through his Ambassador at this Court.

"The latter, though perhaps not initiated in the grand secret of his Master, succeeded in seducing the Prince of Asturias, our present King and Master, and suggested to him the idea of intermarrying with a Princess related to the Emperor. The affliction which his Highness laboured under from a conjunction of circumstances, as lamentable as notorious, and his anxiety to avoid another connection into which it was attempted to force him, with a lady selected for him by his greatest enemy, and on that account alone the object of his aversion induced him to acquiesce in the suggestions of the Ambassador, but with the stipulation that it was to meet the approbation of his August Parents, and under the impression that it would strengthen the friendship and alliance then subsisting between the two Crowns. His Highness, actuated by motives so cogent in a political point of view, and yielding to the solicitations of the Ambassador, wrote accordingly to his Imperial Majesty.

"A few days after our beloved Prince wrote this letter, occurred the scandalous imprisonment of his August Person in the Royal Monastery of St. Laurence, and the still more scandalous decree which was issued in the name of the King, and addressed to the Council of Castile. There are very strong reasons to believe, that the unknown hand that frustrated this feigned conspiracy was some French agent employed to forward the plan which Napoleon had formed.

"Whilst the Emperor kept Europe in suspense by his journey to Milan and Venice, he thought fit to answer the letters, which he had some time before received from the Royal Father, assuring his Majesty, that he never had the slightest information of the circumstances which he communicated respecting his son the Prince of Asturias, nor ever received any letter from his Royal Highness. Nevertheless, his Majesty consented to the proposed intermarriage with a Princess of his family, undoubtedly with an intention of amusing the Royal Parents; whilst he was sending into Spain, under various pretexts, all the troops which he had then disposable, and was studiously propagating an idea that he was favourable to the cause of the Prince of Asturias, and thus endeavouring to captivate the good opinion of the Spanish nation.

"The Royal Parents, struck with the terror which this conduct of the Emperor naturally inspired, and the Favourite being still more astonished, opposed no obstacle to the entrance of the French troops into the Peninsula; on the contrary, they gave the most effectual orders that they should be received and treated even on a better footing than the Spanish troops.

"The Emperor, under the pretence of consulting the security of these troops, ordered his Generals, by stratagem or force to get possession of the fortresses of Pampeluna, St. Sebastian, Figueras, and Barcelona, which alone could present any obstacle to an invasion. They were accordingly taken by fraud and surprise, to the indignation and sorrow of the whole nation, to which the French still affected to profess friendship and alliance.

"The Emperor, conceiving himself already master of all Spain, and thinking the time had arrived for accelerating his measures, thought proper to write a letter to the Royal Father, complaining in the bitterest terms, that his Majesty had not renewed his application for an Imperial Princess for his son the Prince of Asturias. The King was pleased to return for answer, that he adhered to his former proposal, and was willing that the marriage should immediately take place.

"The recent example of the determination taken by the Royal Family of Portugal, seemed to have fully corresponded with the views of the Emperor, and there is reason to think that his Imperial Majesty promised himself a similar success in Spain.

"Nevertheless, such was the general distrust, such the magnitude of the evils which must have resulted, and such and so many the symptoms of a determination to emigrate, that every one was on the alert, and all seemed to be impressed with the necessity of preventing a measure pregnant with so many mischiefs. The danger increased, and the fears of the public kept pace with it. The consequence was, that the commotions of Aranjuez, on the 17th and 19th of March, burst forth like a sudden explosion; the people being led by a sort of instinct of self-preservation. The result was, the imprisonment of the [illegible], who, without the title of King, had exercised all royalty.

[illegible] tempestuous scene taken place, when the Royal Parents finding themselves deprived of the support of their Favourite, took the unexpected but voluntary resolution which they had for some time entertained to abdicate their Throne, as they accordingly did, in favour of their son and heir the Prince of Asturias.

"The instant the Grand Duke of Berg was apprised of the occurrences at Aranjuez, he advanced with his whole army to occupy the capital of the kingdom; intending, no doubt, to profit by the occasion, and to take such steps as should be best calculated to realize, by any means, the plan of making himself master of Spain.

"In the mean while, the mysterious obscurity of the Emperor's projects, the proximity of his troops, and the ignorance in which Ferdinand VII. was of the real object of the Emperor's approach, induced the King to adopt such measures as appeared to his Majesty best calculated to conciliate the good will of the Emperor. Not satisfied with having communicated his accession to the Throne in the most friendly and affectionate terms, the King appointed a deputation of three Grandees of Spain to proceed to Bayonne, and in his name to compliment his Imperial Majesty. He also appointed another Grandee of Spain to pay a similar compliment to the Grand Duke of Berg, who had already arrived in the vicinity of Madrid.

"In this state of things, the new King made his public entry into Madrid, without any other parade than the most numerous concourse of all the inhabitants of the capital and its environs, the strongest expressions of love and loyalty, and the applause and acclamations which sprung from the joy and enthusiasm of his subjects—a scene truly grand and impressive, in which the young King was seen like a father in the midst of his children, entering his capital as the regenerator and guardian angel of the Monarchy.

"The Duke of Berg was an eye-witness of this scene; but far from abandoning his plan, he resolved to persist in it with greater ardour. The experiment upon the Royal Parents produced the desired effect; but whilst the beloved King, who came to the Throne under such good auspices, continued to be present, it was impossible to carry the plan into execution. It was, therefore, necessary to make every effort to remove Ferdinand VII. from Madrid.

"To accomplish this purpose, the Grand Duke every moment spread reports of the arrival of a fresh courier, with accounts of the Emperor's departure from Paris, and that he might be speedily expected to arrive in this capital. He directed his efforts in the first instance to induce the Infant Don Carlos to set off to receive his Imperial Majesty, upon the supposition that his Highness must meet him before he had proceeded two days upon his journey. His Majesty acceded to the proposal, being influenced by the purest and most beneficent intentions. He had no sooner succeeded in procuring the departure of the Infant, than he manifested the most anxious desire that the King should do the same, leaving no means untried to persuade his Majesty to take this step, and assuring him that it would be attended by the most happy consequences to the King and the whole kingdom.

"The King at length yielded to so many solicitations, and so many flattering hopes and assurances; and his love of his subjects, and ardent desire to contribute to their happiness, by putting an end to this dreadful crisis, triumphed in his generous heart over every feeling of repugnance and apprehension.

"The day appointed for his Majesty's departure arrived.—General Savary, affecting the most zealous and assiduous attention to his Majesty, solicited the honour of accompanying him on his journey, which, at the farthest, could only extend to Burgos, according to the information which he had just received of the Emperor's approach.

"General Savary followed him to Burgos, in a separate carriage; but the Emperor not having arrived there, he used every exertion to induce his Majesty to continue his journey as far as Vittoria. Various discussions arose as to the course which ought to be pursued; but artifice and perfidy contended with honour, innocence, and good faith; and, in so unequal a strife, the same benevolent intentions which drew his Majesty from his capital urged him to proceed to Vittoria.

"General Savary, convinced that his Majesty had resolved to proceed no farther, continued his journey to Bayonne, with the intention, undoubtedly, of acquainting the Emperor with all that had passed, and of procuring a letter from him which should determine the King to separate himself from his people.

"At Vittoria his Majesty received information that the Emperor arrived at Bourdeaux, and was on his way to [illegible]. In consequence of this advice, the Infant Don Carlos, who had been waiting at Tolosa, proceeded on to Bayonne, where he had been invited by the Emperor, who, however, delayed his arrival some days longer.

"In the mean time, General Savary conceited with the Emperor in what manner they should prepare to give the finishing blow; and while the French troops in the vicinity of Vittoria were making suspicious movements, he made his appearance in that city, with the letter to his Majesty from the Emperor.

"To the contents of this letter, which were neither flattering nor decorous, General Savary added so many and such vehement protestations of the interest which the Emperor took in the welfare of his Majesty, and of Spain, that he even went so far as to say, 'I will suffer my head to be cut off, if within a quarter of an hour of your Majesty's arrival at Bayonne, the Emperor shall not have recognised you as King of Spain and the Indies. To support his own consistency, he will probably begin by giving you the title of Highness, but in five minutes he will give you that of Majesty, and in three days every thing will be settled and your Majesty may return to Spain immediately.'

"His Majesty, however, hesitated as to the course which he should take; but anxious to redeem the pledge which he had given, and, above all, to relieve his beloved subjects from the cruel anxiety in which they were, he banished from his heart every apprehension of danger, and shut his ears against my counsels, and those of other persons in his train, as well as to the supplications of that loyal city, and determined to proceed to Bayonne; his Royal mind being incapable of suspecting that a Sovereign, his ally, should invite him as a guest, for the purpose of making him a prisoner, and of putting an end to a dynasty, which, so far from having offended him, had given him so many striking proofs of its friendship.

"Shortly after, he was met by the deputation of the three Grandees of Spain, who had been sent off to meet the Emperor; and their representation, with respect to the intentions of the Emperor, was not the most flattering. He was, however, now too near Bayonne to think of changing his course, and he therefore continued his journey.

"There came out to meet the King, the Prince of Neufchatel and Duroc, Marshal of the Palace, with a detachment of the Guard of Honour, which the citizens of Bayonne had formed to attend the Emperor, and they invited his Majesty to enter Bayonne, where a place had been prepared for his residence.

"His Majesty was doubting what could be the meaning of a reception that he so little expected, when he was informed that the Emperor was coming to pay him a visit. His Imperial Majesty arrived, accompanied by a number of his Generals. The King went down to the street-door to receive him, and both Monarchs embraced each other with every token of friendship and affection. The Emperor staid but a short time with his Majesty, and they embraced each other again at parting.

"Soon after Marshal Duroc came to invite the King to dine with his Imperial Majesty, whose carriages were coming to convey his Majesty to the Palace of Marac: this accordingly took place. The Emperor came as far as the coach-steps to receive his Majesty, embraced him again, and led him by the hand to the apartment provided for him.

"The King had no sooner returned to his residence, when General Savary waited on his Majesty to inform him that the Emperor had irrevocably determined that the Bourbon dynasty should no longer reign in Spain; that it should be succeeded by his; and therefore his Imperial Majesty required that the King should, in his own name and that of all his family, renounce the Crown of Spain and the Indies, in favour of the dynasty of Bonaparte.

"It would be difficult to describe the surprize with which the Royal mind of his Majesty was affected, and the consternation with which all those who were nearest to his person were struck at hearing of such a proposition. His Majesty was not yet recovered from the fatigues of a toilsome journey, when the same man who had made him so many protestations of security at Madrid and on the road, who had drawn him from his capital and his kingdom to Bayonne, on pretence of adjusting matters of the greatest importance to both States, and of his being recognised by his Imperial Majesty, had the audacity to be the bearer of so scandalous a proposal.

"On the following day, I was sent for by the Emperor to his Royal Palace, where I found the Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Champagny, waiting to enter upon a discussion of the proposals verbally stated by General Savary. I instantly complained of the perfidy with which so important an affair was proceeded in; representing that the King, my Master, came to Bayonne, relying on the assurances given by General Savary, in the name of the Emperor, and in the presence of the Dukes del Infantado, S. Carlos, D. Juan Escoiquiz, and myself, that his Imperial Majesty would recognize him at the very first interview between the two Sovereigns, in the Imperial Palace of Marac; that, when his Majesty expected to witness the realization of this promised recognition, he was surprized with the propositions above alluded to; and that his Majesty had authorized me to protest against the violence done to his person, in not permitting him to return to Spain; and as a categorical and final answer to the solicitation of the Emperor, that the King neither would nor could renounce his Crown in favour of another dynasty, without being wanting in the duties which he owed to his subjects and to his own character; that he could not do so to prejudice to the individuals of his own family, who were called to the succession by the fundamental laws of the Kingdom; and much less could he consent to the establishment of another dynasty, which ought alone to be called to the throne by the Spanish nation, in virtue of their original right to elect another family upon the termination of the present dynasty.

"What confidence, I added, can Europe place in her treaties with France, when she looks to the perfidy with which that of the 27th of October has been violated? And what must be her terror when she sees the captious means, the seductive artifices, and the false promises by which his Imperial Majesty has confined the King in the city of Bayonne, in order to despoil him of the Crown to which, with the inexpressible joy of his people, he has been called by the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and the spontaneous abdication of his august father. Posterity will not believe that the Emperor could have given so great a blow to his own reputation, the loss of which will leave no other means of concluding a war with him, than that of total destruction and extermination.

"This was the state of the discussion, when the Emperor, who had overheard our conference, ordered us to enter his own Cabinet, where, to my great surprize, I was insulted by his Imperial Majesty with the infamous appellation of traitor, upon no other ground, than that having been Minister to Charles IV. I continued to serve his son Ferdinand VII. He also accused me, in an angry tone, of having maintained, in an official conference with General Monton, that my Master, in order to his being King of Spain, did not stand in need of the recognition of the Emperor, although that might be necessary, in order to continue his relations with the French Government.

"His Imperial Majesty manifested still greater irritation on account of my having said to a foreign Minister, accredited to the Court of Spain, that if the French army offered any violation to the integrity and independence of the Spanish Sovereignty, 200,000 men would convince them that a brave and generous nation was not to be insulted with impunity.

"After this ill-treatment which I met with, which was as satisfactory to my own feelings, on account of the real cause of it, as it was painful on account of the Royal Personages whose interests were in question, his Imperial Majesty, with his natural asperity, entered into a conversation upon the points which had already been discussed. He was not insensible of the strength of my reasons, and the solidity of the arguments by which I supported the rights of the King, his dynasty, and the whole nation; but his Majesty concluded by telling me, 'I have a system of policy of my own. You ought to adopt more liberal ideas; to be less susceptible on the point of honour, and not sacrifice the prosperity of Spain to the interest of the Bourbon family.'

"The tricks of diplomacy could not prevail over the firmness of the King, or the zeal of his representatives, and the individuals of his Royal Household, who deliberated at a Council (his Majesty being present), upon the interests of the King and the nation; so that the Emperor saw himself under the necessity of changing his plan, in order to accomplish his purpose, and he wished that the Royal Parents should depart for Bayonne, in order to make them the instruments of the oppression and disgrace of their son. For this purpose he ordered the Grand Duke of Berg to employ all his arts to accelerate their journey to Bayonne.

"The Royal Parents required, that the Favourite should precede them in their journey, and the Grand Duke made various applications to the Junta of Government to obtain his liberty. The Junta had no authority to liberate him, having in this point been laid under positive restraint by his Majesty's orders from Vittoria, as has been already mentioned; but the Council, misled by the suggestions of his Imperial Majesty, and intimidated by the threat that the Grand Duke would obtain by irresistible force what would not be conceded as a favour, the Junta ordered the release of Don Manuel Godoi, who was immediately conveyed to Bayonne, under an adequate escort.

"The Royal Parents undertook their journey, and proceeded in it with too much rapidity, for the unhappy state of health of Charles IV.; but the inexorable will of the Emperor had determined that it should be so.

"What his Imperial Majesty undertook was a most arduous task. It was necessary to his purposes to deaden the sensibility of the King; to destroy his affection for his first-born, which the most infamous Court intrigue ever contrived had not yet wholly extinguished. Further, it was necessary, that these loving parents, affectionate to some of their children, should, with respect to him, substitute for their natural tenderness the most frigid and cruel indifference. To fulfil the purposes intended by Napoleon, in the end, with respect to the Royal Parents, they must become the instruments of misery, correction, and imprisonment; they were to become the jailers of their children. His power, by triumphing over all the feelings of nature, accomplished his purposes.

On the 3rd of the same month of May, after in the afternoon, the Emperor went to visit the Royal Parents, and continued in conference until 6 o'clock, when King Ferdinand was called in by his august Father to hear, in the presence of the Queen and the Emperor, expressions so disgusting and humiliating, that I do not dare to record them. All the party were seated except King Ferdinand, whom the Father ordered to make an absolute renunciation of the Crown, under pain of being treated, with all his household, as an usurper of the Throne, and a conspirator against the life of his parents.

"His Majesty would have preferred death; but desirous not to involve in his misfortunes the number of persons comprised in the threat of Charles IV. he assented to another renunciation, which bears on its front all the indications of constraint and violence, and which in no respect answers its purpose, to conceal over the intended usurpation of the Emperor.

"These are the only instances of renunciation in which I have interfered as Minister and Secretary of State. That which is spoken of at Bourdeaux, I have not the least knowledge of; but I know the Emperor, in the last conference with King Ferdinand VII, said to his Majesty, "Prince, il faut opter entre la cession et la mort." "Prince, you have only to choose between cession and death."

"The disgraceful means of which the Emperor availed himself to obtain the renunciation of the crown of Spain in his favour, have already been known; but the violence of Bonaparte to accomplish his purposes did not terminate there. Blinded as he was by the extravagance of his ambition, he could yet discern how easily these acts of renunciation would be disposed of; and therefore he endeavoured to confirm them by the means of a Council, which he called a National Assembly, and which was to be convoked at Bayonne.

"He named about 150 Spaniards, of different classes, conditions, and corporations, to constitute this Assembly, but only about 90 were convened. A part of these, representing some cities, tribunals, or public bodies, brought with them instructions in the nature of powers, given them by those whom they represented, but wholly insufficient to answer the purpose intended. The Ministers of the Council were without any powers or instructions whatever, a precaution adopted by this tribunal in conformity to the opinion of its commissioners, in order to avoid all involuntary compromises. Most of the deputies had no other powers than merely an order to take their departure, and many of them did not belong to any public body, or acknowledged class of the community.

"The Emperor fully expected, from the acquiescence of these individuals, a mask under which to conceal his usurpation. But he was utterly deceived. Instead of finding weak men convenient to the designs of his mercenary ambition, he was met by Ministers incorruptible, Grandees worthy of their rank, and representatives who were faithful defenders of the interest and of the honour of their country. They all, with one accord, informed him that they held powers much restricted, that they were not the legitimate representatives of Spain, and that they could not compromise her rights.

"These and other similar reflections were treated with insolence in the tribunal of the Usurper, who, far from being disconcerted, put into activity all the means of oppression, flattering himself that by victories on the one hand and corruption on the other, he should so colour over injustice that he would not be considered by the world as the subverter of general tranquillity.

"I do not enter into the particulars that occurred in this congress; but one of the Ministers of the Council of Castile, who does so much honour to his robe, will satisfy the curiosity of the public as to this particular.

"I ought not to speak of what I have suffered for my King and Country; the truth is, I have not suffered, for all I have done has been required by my most sacred duties. It was to me the highest satisfaction to see my lodging in Bayonne surrounded by the satellites of Government: to these spies, succeeded, who abound always where these are in authority who in history usurp the characters of heroes. My steps were reckoned; my visits observed; espionage, under the mask of compassion, approached to examine the secrets of my soul; but nothing disturbed the tranquillity of my mind. What I could not behold with patience, was to see myself condemned to a confinement within the frontier of France, until the Emperor should consider that my narration of the scandalous proceedings could not destroy the lofty fabric of the new Spanish Monarchy. In vain, for two months, I applied to the Minister for Foreign Affairs with the utmost importunity to be permitted to return to my beloved country; the determined resistance I made to the attempt of usurpation made the French Government deaf to my entreaties, believing, not without good reason, that I should endeavour to inflame heroism in my country, denominated insurrection in the Journals of Bayonne.

"In such unfavourable circumstances, a mode presented itself to me of avoiding a state of indefinite banishment. Such were the repeated entreaties of Joseph Napoleon that I should continue with him in the situation of Minister, to which I acceded with repugnance and from constraint, but without prejudice of my right to abandon it at a convenient opportunity.

"This opportunity occurred the moment I set foot in Madrid. From that instant I only thought of availing myself of the most early means of resigning my new character.

"Joseph Napoleon could not be grieved at the disappearance of a Minister who so frequently opposed his wishes, and who, in the opinion of some of those who immediately surrounded him, was a Quixote in his maxims, who could not comprehend the sublime intentions of the greatest of heroes in favour of the regeneration of Spain.

"Valour and patriotism have successfully armed the whole nation in its own defence, and for the protection of their legitimate Sovereign, although the people had no knowledge of the will of their beloved Ferdinand as to this movement. That patriotism, united to wisdom, will now impel them irresistibly to perform with promptitude the most important work of the Central Government or Regency, which may administer the affairs of the kingdom in the name of his Majesty.

"Thus will be completed for the advantage of all, the last expression of the will of the King, which he manifested to me the moment before he was forced to renounce the Crown; thus will the nation be preserved from this dreadful tempest; it will have exhibited before Europe an example of loyalty, honour, and generous energy, which will be the subject of admiration in every age, and in every country.

AMERICA.

BOSTON PUBLIC MEETING, AUG. 9.

Agreeably to notification, a very numerous meeting was held in Faneuil Hall, at ten o'clock, when Stephen Codman, Esq. was chosen Moderator. The notification was then read, when the Hon. Jonathan Mason, after a number of very pertinent remarks on the subject, offered the following motion, in the form of a vote:—

Voted, "That it is expedient for the town of Boston respectfully to petition the President of the United States to suspend the laws, either wholly or in part, according to the power vested in him, by the Congress of the United States; and if any doubt should exist, as to the sufficiency of these powers, that he be requested to call the Congress together as soon as may be; and that a Committee of eight persons be appointed to prepare and submit to the town a petition in conformity."

The debate was protracted until two o'clock, when the question to adopt the motion of Mr. Mason passed by an immense majority (not more than 20 or 30 against it).

At four o'clock the town assembled according to adjournment, when the Committee reported the Memorial, which was read from the Chair, and passed nearly unanimously. We believe there were not half a dozen hands against it in the hall.

STATE PAPERS.

SECRET TREATIES RELATIVE TO PORTUGAL.

No. I.

SECRET TREATY.

The following Treaties were concluded on the 27th of October last, between Charles IV. of Spain, and Bonaparte, for the partition of the Kingdom of Portugal. The following are the Articles:—

ART. I. The Provinces of Entre Mino and Duero, with the City of Oporto, shall be given, in full property and sovereignty, to his Majesty the King of Etruria, under the title of King of Northern Lusitania.

II. The Kingdom of Alentejo, and the Kingdom of the Algarbes, shall be given, in full property and sovereignty, to the Prince of Peace, to be enjoyed under the title of Prince of the Algarbes.

III. The Provinces of Beira, Tras los Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, shall remain as a deposit till a general Peace, to be disposed of according to circumstances, as shall be agreed between the two High Contracting Parties.

IV. The Kingdom of Northern Lusitania shall be possessed by the hereditary descendants of his Majesty the King of Etruria, according to the laws of succession adopted by the Reigning Family of his Majesty the King of Spain.

V. The principality of Algarbes shall be hereditary in the descendents of the Prince of Peace, according to the laws of succession adopted by the Reigning Family of his Majesty the King of Spain.

VI. In default of legitimate descendants or heirs of the King of Northern Lusitania, or of the Prince of Algarbes, these countries will be given as an Investiture to his Majesty the King of Spain, on condition that they shall never be united under one head, or attached to the Crown of Spain.

VII. The Kingdom of Northern Lusitania, and the Principality of Algarbes, also acknowledge as Protector, his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, and the Sovereigns of these countries shall in no case make either peace or war without his consent.

VIII. In case that the provinces of Ceira, Tras los Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura, held under sequestration, should be, at a general Peace, returned to the House of Braganza, in exchange for Gibraltar, Trinidad, and other Colonies that the English have conquered from the Spaniards and their allies, the new Sovereign of this Province would have, with respect to his Majesty the King of Spain, the same obligation that the King of Northern Lusitania and the Prince of Algarbes would have been under, and shall possess them subject to the same condition.

IX. His Majesty the King Etruria cedes the full property and sovereignty of the Kingdom of Etruria, to his Majesty the Emperor of the French, King of Italy.

X. When the definitive occupation of the provinces of the Portugal shall be effected, the respective Princes which will be put in possession shall jointly name Commissioners to determine the proper limits.

XI. His Majesty the Emperor of the French, King of Italy, becomes guarantee to his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, for the possession of his estates on the Continent of Europe, south of the Pyrenees.

XII. His Majesty the Emperor of the French, King of Italy, agrees to acknowledge his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, as Emperor of both Americas, at such time as may be prepared for his Majesty to assume this title, which may either be on the occasion of a general peace, or at latest within three years.

XIII. It is understood between the two High Contracting Powers, that they will make an equal divison of all the islands, colonies, and other ultra-marine property of Portugal.

XIV. The present Treaty shall remain secret, shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Madrid, at latest twenty days after being signed.

Done at Fontainbleau, 27th Oct. 1807.

No. II.

SECRET CONVENTION.

Art. I. A body of Imperial French Troops, to the amount of 20,000 foot, and 3000 horse, shall enter Spain, and march directly to Lisbon, where they will be united to a corps of 8000 infantry, and 3000 Spanish cavalry, with 30 pieces of artillery.

II. At the same time, a division of Spanish troops, to the number of 10,000, shall take possession of the provinces of Entre Mino and Duero, and of the city of Oporto, and another division of 6000 Spanish troops shall take possession of the province of Alentejo, and of the Kingdom of Algarbes.

III. The French troops shall be provisioned and maintained by Spain, and paid by France during all the time of their progress through Spain.

IV. From the moment that the combined troops enter Portugal, the provinces of Beira, Trains Montes, and Portuguese Estremadura (which must remain under sequestration), shall be administered and governed by the Commandant General of the French troops, and the contributions which they shall impose, shall be for the benefit of France. The provinces which will be formed from the kingdom of Northern Lusitania, and the Principality of Algarbes, shall be administered and governed by the Commandants General of the Spanish division which shall enter them, and the contributions which shall be imposed, shall be applied to the use of Spain.

V. The central body shall be under the orders of the Commander of the French troops, and to him shall be submitted the Spanish troops united to such central army. Notwithstanding, if the King of Spain or Prince of the Peace shall unite themselves to such army, the Commander General of the French troops, and the troops themselves shall be under their orders.

VI. A new body of 40,000 French troops shall be collected at Bayonne at the latest, by the 20th of November next, to be ready to pass through Spain for Portugal, in case the English should send forces, or threaten an attack upon that country. This new body, however, shall not enter Spain, until the two High Contracting Parties shall have agreed upon the measure.

VII. The present Convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at the same time with those of the treaty of this day.

Done at Fontainbleau, 27th October, 1807.

IRELAND.

STATE OF IRELAND.

DUBLIN, OCT. 10.—Our domestic occurrences wear upon the whole no unfavourable aspect; indeed if we could except out of the statement some atrocities that have been too long persisted in in the County of Kerry, we should have to felicitate the country upon its calm and prosperous condition. That exception, however, not only must be made, but also another, which the frequent outrages committed in the County of Limerick render imperative.

The incessant violations of the public peace in that county, and the continued outrages committed against the persons and properties of individuals, do not appear to tend to any particular object. They seem to be the offspring of a licentious love of evil, which has let itself loose upon the community. But in the county of Kerry the midnight plundering and murders have a manifest design, according as they appear upon the Journals of that part of the kingdom. The actors in these horrid designs have assumed the designation which used to denote those who had taken up arms openly to oppose the levying of tythes—they distinguish themselves by the appellation of White Boys: and their hostility is directed against those whom dealings in tythes have rendered obnoxious. We speak solely upon the authority of the Kerry Prints, the last of which that we have received (Chute's Western Herald), mentions the murder of a Mr. Murray, who is said to have large possessions in tythes.

The poor and miserable of every country seldom enter into the subtleties or refinements of theoretical distress. Tangible grievances they understand, and when those press beyond a certain point, the resentments of the people proclaim their excess. Our peasants do really suffer—that cannot be denied; more than in a well-adjusted condition of society they would be required to bear; but if a question of remedy ever arrive, it should not be left in the hands of those, who being themselves the authors (thinkingly or unthinkingly) of many of the heavier burthens that rouse the peasant's [illegible] ought to obtain more credit for their sympathy than for [illegible] candour, when they attempt to charge upon another rank [illegible] persons and the misery of the country.

s. The late declaration against tythes had the sanction of many hon[illegible] name, no doubt; but every thinking man, who well understood the singular Constitution of our Society, and who knew the gravity and caution which should precede the recommendation of remedies for public evils, saw with some apprehension, the course that had been taken to clamour away the whole Tythe System as the spring and source of general distress. It is very true, that if the Rack-rent Landlords thought that in endeavouring to exempt themselves from the odium of oppression, and to cast it all upon a body of men not perhaps half paid their legal dues, the peasantry should take a part against Tythes, they would have desisted at once. But the invariable result of such public proceedings is, that when sentiments and principles become promulgated they sink into every mind; they light upon the brain of ignorance; they descend upon and are compounded in the reveries of nonsense and folly. The man of education acts and thinks becoming an enlightened mind; but the peasant, poor, illiterate, and oppressed, thinks and feels as it is natural he should, and when he finds a respectable portion of the gentry of the country pointing out as it were the cause of his poverty, and denouncing it, his passions will not allow him to hold a truce with the supposed adversary to his happiness, and he will not wait for the mild and circuitous remedy of the law, but become his own redresser.

It is well for the public that the subject of tythes, or rather that the condition of the peasantry forms now an anxious subject of consideration with the Government. It will throw away all pretext for the intermeddling of ragged politicians with so dangerous and delicate an affair; and it ought to suggest to those who might incautiously and most innocently have excited sensations in the peasantry which they did not foresee, to exert themselves with double zeal in suppressing such painful consequences of misapprehension and mistake.

PROVINCIALS.

MARGATE, OCT. 12.—The hunting and coursing season commenced in the Isle of Thanet this morning. The hounds had some sharp runs; and repeatedly blooded the pack in [illegible] style; they boasted a large field, to which the Cross, the Lane, and the Acres, contributed a snug and friendly little party. Lotions, Potions, and Patent Coffins, were to be seen at the death. The Gentlemen wear their coats short and daggle, even in full dress. The exagerres, or extreme fashionables, have the collar cut very low in the neck, and very long on the lappels; blue is the prevailing colour. The waistcoat is of straw kerseymere, single breasted, and very long, with a triangular opening at the bottom, which exposes the massy chain and seals dangling from the centre; fourteen yellow metal buttons confine the front, and three the pockets. the rest of the outline consists of brown leather shall-cloaths, moderately long topped boots, and a sugar-loaf crown hat. The Ladies wear white muslin dresses of a walking length, and scarlet cloaks; the cottage bonnet of fancy straw, and jean boots. Parasols are exploded. Happily for the Benedicts they still have no reason to complain of petticoat government!

DRAWING A BADGER.—A man of the name of Thomas Lort, well known in West Kent for catching moles, badgers, and vipers, in the season, for the Apothecaries, brought a fresh badger in a bag to Wrotham last Fair, and having dug a hole in a bank as deep as a baker's oven, he turned the badger to earth, and closing the mouth of the hole with his sack, offered to bring out the animal in his teeth, if the crowd would raise him half-a-guinea; which being presently done, he entered the place with a short thick stick. The badger seldom relinquishes its hold, and he immediately seized the stick. Tom Lort then fastened his teeth on the nape of the badger's neck, and brought the animal forth with the stick in its mouth, and having several times performed this exploit, retired with his friends to enjoy the produce of his dexterity.

NEWCASTLE, OCTOBER 10.—On Saturday evening last, about nine o'clock, a most melancholy accident happened in the River Tyne. As the ferry-boat between Howden Pans and Jarrow was crossing to the latter place with a number of persons on board (some accounts say twelve, others fifteen), the wind strong from the East, and consequently a great swell in the river, it unfortunately filled with water, and sunk when about twenty yards from the shore, by which the whole company would have met a watery grave, had it not been for the exertions of the Captain and crew of a sloop near the place, who instantly got out their boat, and saved the greater part of them. We understand there were only three drowned. The greatest attention was paid to the survivors by some persons at Jarrow, one of whom was brought to life after being near a quarter of an hour in the water.

On Monday se'nnight a Gentleman of this town for a considerable wager, ran fifty yards, carrying a man upon his back who weighed 11st. 2lb. against another, who, without any weight, was to run 100 yards. The former beat by about eight yards. A person present, thinking himself a swifter man than he who had lost, proposed to run the same distance, which was immediately accepted, and won by the same Gentleman, carrying the above weight, by two yards.

ANN MOOR, a poor woman of Tutbury, in Staffordshire, has lived upwards of 14 months without food! The credibility of the woman herself was of course discredited, and she consented to be removed to a neighbour's house, to be watched for any length of time that was deemed sufficient to give a colour of truth to her report. This was accordingly done, and she was constantly watched for 17 days and nights, and regularly visited by three surgeons once or twice a day. Till the end of 14 days she did not even drink any water, which she had been accustomed to do in very small quantities, when she felt a nausea at her stomach. She now finds that this is removed by wetting her tongue with damp cloths, by which she escapes the pain of swallowing as before, which was very considerable. During the length of time of the above 14 months abstinence, water, and tea, without either milk or sugar, had been her only beverage. She has been in bed the whole of the time. Her pulse is very little under the standard of good health, but, as may be expected, her frame is excessively reduced. As this extraordinary woman is still living, we recommend her case to the attention of the Faculty, and doubt not that they will consider her as a subject deserving of very minute consideration.

As a countryman last week was nutting in Catsfield Great Wood, he found the nuts so plentiful that he soon half filled a sack, by the weight of which his progress of gathering was so much impeded, that he found it necessary to get rid of his incumbrance, by leaving it, as he thought, in a place of security, until he should have increased his stock, by means of a stretch, from distant hazels, and proceeded accordingly: but unluckily in the interim a black, from a neighbouring barrack, engaged in a similar pursuit, discovered the repository, and after examining its contents, resolved on possessing it; but in order to give a colourable pretence to the possession, he had recourse to the following whimsical stratagem. He stripped off his clothes, and, after concealing them, seated himself naked on the sack, where he remained, clutched up, till the return of the countryman, and by his grimaces, and the yells which he set up to give effect to the part he was acting, on the poor fellow's approach, so terrified him, that he bounded from the wood like a deer, and, happy in his escape, left his nuts, without regret, to be cracked by the Devil, on whose territories, at the moment of his panic, he believed he had been trespassing. Mungo, well pleased with the success of his trick, bore away the prize, and the circumstance has caused no inconsiderable share of mirth in the neighbourhood.

Last Monday evening, about seven o'clock, Mr. Anthony (a traveller from Manchester) was stopped on the road, about half way between Wallingford and Reading, by a footpad, who demanded his money, which Mr. Anthony resolutely refused, when the footpad succeeded in dragging him out of his gig, and a desperate scuffle ensued, in which the footpad was knocked down, and probably would have been secured, had not another appeared, who presented a pistol, and shot Mr. Anthony through the left breast, and he fell; they then proceeded to rifle his pockets, but fortunately he had put his pocket-book, which contained bills and notes to a considerable amount, into his gig box. When they had got every thing out of his pockets, some horses were heard at a short distance, and the villains made off. Through the kind attention of two Gentlemen, Mr. Anthony was conveyed to Reading, where great hopes are entertained of his recovery.

A most melancholy accident happened at a coal pit, near Kimblesworth, Cumberland, belonging to Messrs. Walker, by the explosion of sulphureous air, which unfortunately killed four persons, viz. George Hague, Thomas Hague, John Jarvis, and William Firth; the two former were father and son, and what added to the distress of the scene was, they were found locked in each other's arms—a striking instance of parental and filial affection in the agonies of death.

The Magistrates of Warwickshire came to a resolution, at a late Session, "that Statutes for hiring servants have a tendency to promote idleness and immorality among servants; and accordingly have recommended to masters of servants in husbandry not to attend such meetings, nor to hire servants without characters.

On Saturday night, at Berwick, there was a very heavy gale of wind, which did considerable damage to many houses, by stripping the tiles from off the roofs, and breaking down chimnies. The only serious misfortune occurred at Church-street, where a stack of chimnies fell on and broke in the roof, and buried a woman (the wife of Mr. Hall, bookbinder) in the ruins. She was afterwards got out, but so much bruised, and with one leg broken in two places, that her life is despaired of. A schooner, laden with lime, from Sunderland, was driven on shore near Seremerston-mill, and soon went to pieces; the men were saved. All the new lamps on the Bridge were carried off by the violence of the gale.

A CLASSICAL AND ORIGINAL NEWSPAPER,

WILL BE COMMENCED ON TUESDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1808,

ENTITLED

THE INQUISITOR,

PRINTED IN QUARTO, ON THE LARGEST PAPER ALLOWED TO BE USED.—PRICE 1s.

To be published on the Afternoon of every TUESDAY, THURSDAY, AND SATURDAY.

IT was observed by our illustrious Bacon, in his treatise "De Augmentis Scientiarum," that the multiplicity of books should be considered indicative rather of scarcity than superfluity; and that this penury, instead of being supinely regretted, ought to be relieved by increasing the number of meritorious productions. The observation extends emphatically to what are denominated periodical publications. Every new literary project supposes some deficiencies to be supplied, or some errors to be remedied. Without meaning to depreciate contemporary merit, the Proprietors of this Undertaking know that enough has not been done to satisfy just expectation; while, without assuming undue superiority in the republic of letters, they are confident that The Inquisitor, both in its plan and pretensions, will be found incontestibly to surpass any of those numerous Journals hitherto submitted to the Public. If they obtain the highest possible success, it will be because they are determined eminently to deserve it. They can discover faults, which it will be their concern to avoid; omissions, for which it will be their duty to provide; and adventitious aids, of which their predecessors have neglected to avail themselves. Something new, something estimable, something durable, will they trust, be the result of their labours.

To combine the temporary attractions of a Newspaper with the permanent advantages of an Annual Register, and, at the same time, to connect, with the information of a Literary Review, the diversified interest of a Monthly Magazine, obviously presents the most extensive and desirable arrangement. Comprehensive as is the destined sphere of THE INQUISITOR, the frequency of its appearance, together with the unprecedented dimensions of its pages, will, nevertheless, enable the Proprietors fully to accomplish whatever they stand pledged to perform. The magnitude of their design therefore renders them anxious to attach to themselves public attention. For elegance of effect; for originality, novelty, and variety; for the accuracy and copiousness of its details; for the importance of its information, and the opulence of its literature; for utility, and for delight;—the Proprietors aspire to produce a Publication that will find its way into every rank of society, and whose contents will render it an object of preservation to families the most respectable. It will contain all that can attract, in the evanescent communications of the day; and all that is deserving of perpetuation, in the established records of the age. Volatility will be amused, curiosity gratified, and knowledge stimulated.

Something will doubtless be here expected on the subject of Politics. With respect to the conduct of The Inquisitor in this particular, few professions will, however, be made. Recent events, both foreign and domestic, have demolished most of the ancient barriers of party, and exposed, at the same time, the futility of its distinctions. A large and highly respectable portion of the community begin to emancipate themselves from that clannish spirit which sees right and wrong only through the medium of civil connexions; and it is the patronage of this honourable description of readers that The Inquisitor will be most emulous to obtain and secure.

Orders received at the Office, No. 11, Catherine-street, Strand, and by all Newsmen, Booksellers, Clerks of the Roads, &c.

POLITICAL OCCURRENCES AND REFLECTIONS.

We have received this week no intelligence of any considerable importance from Spain. The enemy seem to limit their operations to occasional excursions in search of plunder; and to maintain, if possible, their positions along the Ebro. The capture of Bilbao, the arrival of the corps under the command of the Marquis del Romana, and some movements on the part of General Baird, which menace their rear, must unavoidably reduce them, before the arrival of any considerable reinforcements, to hazard a general engagement, in which, should they be defeated, their retreat becomes extremely difficult—or to abandon their present advantageous positions. The Spaniards seem to conduct themselves with all that caution, which was so strongly recommended by the Patriotic Junta of Seville.—Their preparations for the great contest, which is to decide the slavery or liberty of their country, are going on, however, with that energy and activity, so worthy of their former reputation, the sacred cause they are engaged in, and the high principles of liberty and honour they have lately displayed. This activity and this caution, united to the unconquerable detestation they feel against their invaders, are, according to human calculation, a certain guarantee of their ultimate success. We feel something like pride that men, labouring under the disadvantages they did, about six months ago, have been capable of forming so bold a resolution, and of executing it. Their patriotism will serve as a glorious example to every age and country, that communities cannot be subjugated, if they have only the will to resist. They have proved that difficulties, however menacing and gigantic, should never induce nations to despair of their means, or enter into a compromise derogatory to their independence and rights. Their Statesmen shew themselves worthy of the confidence of so magnanimous a people. Every act of theirs evinces a spirit of wisdom, and of generous devotion to the interests of the people they serve. There is no man who reads the Exposition of Cevallos, that will not feel reverence and affection for the honest Patriot, who, under the most trying circumstances, displayed such heroic attachment to the rights of his Sovereign, and incorruptible integrity, though constantly assailed by the threats and promises of the Usurper and his infamous Agents. This celebrated document, which tears the last veil from the face of the Tyrant, and points him out to the world as not only a robber, but as a treacherous friend and a despicable foe, gives us in like manner, a very high idea of the talents and virtues of several other Spanish Noblemen, who accompanied the amiable and unfortunate Ferdinand to Bayonne. Those men are fortunately restored to their country, which they have now an opportunity of benefitting with the wholeheart of their experience and patriotism. Some have been chosen as Members of the Supreme Junta, which has already commenced its important functions; and all endeavour by their present exertions, to clear themselves from the most distant imputation of having favoured, or even connived at, the atrocious projects of the enemy. It is after taking this view of the principal topics; and perceiving that not the slightest relaxation is visible in their exertions; that their councils are agitated by no dissensions, and their leaders by no other rivality, than that of honour and glory; after remarking likewise that the Provinces remotest from the danger are as strenuous and ardent in their efforts, as those who are immediately exposed to it; and weighing the influence which the Ministers of Religion exercise, and the incalculable effects the effusions of the press will have on a regenerated people;—it is after such considerations that we have it in our power to pronounce decidedly, and without any apprehension of unforeseen incidents, that the fortunes of that distinguished community are already placed beyond the power of external contingencies. So much are our minds made up to the truth of this assertion, that were the result of the meeting at Erfurth ever so consonant to the wishes and designs of the Usurper, and were he in consequence at liberty to march all his armies from Germany and Italy to the Pyrenees, we would not abandon the sanguine expectations we in this moment entertain. We are not in the habit of being biased in our judgments on so momentous a subject, by the fears or the doubts of others; nor are we to be terrified by what the Tyrant has done, nor by his ostentatious indifference to the storm which is collecting round the summit of the Pyrenees, nor by his blustering menaces of punishment;—we draw our conclusions in favour of a virtuous cause, from the knowledge we have what wonders every nation has performed, when acting under similar circumstances, and animated by motives equally forcible.

Portugal necessarily engages our attention, as often as we reflect on the events which are taking place in Spain. The public must feel a more than usual interest in every thing that relates to that country, the most antient and the most faithful of our allies. For some time it has unfortunately afforded us very little room for triumphant speculation, but it is to be hoped, that the wisdom of our subsequent conduct, and other measures and other men, will tend to obliterate every impression of the past. The enemy has now quitted the shores of our plundered friends; and we look with anxious curiosity to the arrangements which are making in order to restore them to their former tranquillity. The first question which presents itself on this occasion naturally is, how long our army is to remain there, after the evacuation on the part of the French, and if the presence of a part be necessary, in order to insure respect to, and to support the measures of, the Provisional Government. When we reflect how essential the co-operation of our whole force with that of the Spaniards is become, the imperious necessity of any measure tending to that purpose, will be immediately acknowledged. It would, therefore, be unaccountable if no steps had been already taken to induce the Prince Regent to return and resume the reins of government. His presence, and the enthusiastic joy his return will occasion among his subjects, will contribute so much to the tranquillity, and have so great an influence on the exertions of the Portuguese, that we sincerely hope to hear of his speedy arrival.

The next object of public curiosity is the negotiation entering on in the Baltic. From the early dispatches which were received, the public were inclined to believe that the surrender of the Russian fleet was certain. However, weeks have elapsed since that time—the winter is fast approaching, which renders the navigation of the Baltic impracticable, and nothing has transpired leading to corroborate our expectation. Dispatches were received on Friday from Sir James Saumarez and Mr. Thornton, and as their contents have not been published, it is natural to conclude that nothing decisive has been done as yet. From this protracted negotiation, and the respect with which the Russian Officers have been treated on their arrival from Portugal, it is probable Ministers do every thing in their power to conciliate Russia. We are far from condemning this conduct; on the contrary, when we consider the ruinous tendency and the extravagance of the war between the two countries, we think the conduct of Government both politic and just. If the infatuated Monarch is so insensible to his own dignity and interests, and the honour of his country, as to throw himself, after the events which have taken place in Spain, into the arms of a perfidious and sanguinary Usurper, every measure is commendable which conduces to impress on the minds of the Russians, that the difficulties they are exposed to from this mad contest, do not originate in us, but in the imbecility of their own Cabinet.

America is in like manner not unworthy of some observations. Their whole conduct has evinced so much animosity against this country, such servile complaisancy towards Bonaparte, that we are afraid we feel something more than acrimony, whenever we think of the insolent language and the pointed enmity of her demagogues and President. Now that the Ruffian, whose friendship they so much courted, begins to decline in his fortunes, they begin to petition about the removal of the Embargo. But if this country can ever forget their avowed partiality and submissive demeanour to the enemy, we deserve on a future occasion to be treated with similar insolence. They now remove the Embargo, because the consequences of it are only felt by themselves, and it has merely served to prove their desire and their impuissance to hurt us. Their conduct, however, has been so notoriously inimical, that if our Government refused to permit a single American vessel to navigate the Ocean, no individual, animated with a particle of independence, or with British feelings, could dare condemn them for such a measure. We sincerely wish that something may be done to make them feel the effects of their folly and intemperance.

However marked our detestation has been of the humiliating terms of the Portuguese Convention, we cannot help indulging in something like a sardonic smile, at the reception of the City Address. As logicians, it must be allowed, the Citizens do not appear to great advantage. That the public should conclude and feel, upon presumption, is natural, and frequently even beneficial; but an attention to stricter dialectic is necessary in the Addresses of deliberative Bodies. Upon the letter of the Address we cannot, therefore, bestow much commendation, as it, in some measure, anticipated the answer it received. The spirit of it, however, was genuine; and we lament that the first intrusion of the Patriotic Common Councilmen of London should have been so cavalierly treated. In our opinion the Address should have taken for its ground the official communication of the Battle of Vimiera, which justified the public to expect the unconditional Surrender of Junot. If the Common Council and the Nation indulged in too sanguine expectations, to Lord Castlereagh this must be solely attributed. It was reasonable for the City Address to have stated that certain facts had been laid down from the first authority, which, if admitted, and which were admitted, rendered the very extraordinary Articles, complained of, the most proper object of inquiry. Nor can we see any thing so very reprehensible, in an expression of indignation, on the part of a Corporate Body, at circumstances, which were as insulting to the Monarch as to the people.—But whatever our feelings of sympathy may be with the spirit of the Address, we cannot see why some people should be so much offended at its reception. The public at large appear to think that the Citizens deserved a reproof for stepping out of a line, which had for so many years been confined to compliment and congratulation. Our gracious Sovereign and his ostensible advisers, are not insensible to those generous principles of liberty, which placed his Majesty's illustrious family on the Throne; any renunciation of self-will or servile adulation cannot therefore be acceptable to a Sovereign, who owes his greatness and his security to those very principles. The spirit of dignified reproof contained in the answer, must convince the Citizens of London, that only sentiments congenial to the liberal character of our glorious constitution, can be alone acceptable to the King of a free people. They will, we hope, become sensible, that the first City in the Universe, whose approbation, if judicious, would give so much weight to any measure of the executive, should display an independence suitable to its opulence and respectability. If they are wise, they will benefit by the instructive lesson.

Our readers will recollect the apparent subserviency of the Royal Council of Castile to the views of Napoleon after claiming the Spanish throne. That Council has since published a Manifesto of its proceedings, and which is in fact intended as its justification of its conduct in submitting to the French. By this document it appears that Ferdinand VII. even while in the custody of his destroyer, contrived to keep a correspondence with the capital of his kingdom, on measures relating to its defence; and every thing tends to prove that the idea of restoring Charles IV. after his voluntary abdication originated entirely and exclusively with the French.

The following is an Extract from a private letter:—

"Lisbon, Sept. 17, 1808.—I have just returned from Rison, having had the satisfaction of seeing the departure of the Russian fleet for England; but much wish they were going upon more honourable terms for my native country. The 15th was a joyful day for the Portuguese: the French flag was hauled down every where, and the Portuguese hoisted in its stead. The ships in the harbour were taken possession of by the boats of the British fleet; and I understand, that a small detachment of Marines and a sufficient number of seamen to man a boat, is left on board each ship, and Officers are appointed to take charge of the ships, the first division of the French army sailed yesterday under convoy of a frigate and a sloop; the frigate is commanded by Lord G. Stuart. General Junot embarked on board a frigate yesterday morning, not thinking himself any longer safe among the Portuguese; but I understand he will be one of the last that will be suffered to leave Lisbon. He dare not come on shore again.

"The second division is embarking to-day, and it is expected will be ready to sail by the 20th. The British squadron still remains below Belem Castle, but it is expected it will come close to the town as soon as the French are all away. Several Naval Officers have been on shore, and are treated by the Portuguese in the most respectful manner; as they walk along the streets, they are constantly receiving invitations from the principle inhabitants, while the Portuguese take every opportunity to be revenged on the French. Scarcely a night passes without some being killed. Yesterday, at noon-day, a Portuguese observing a French Officer walking by himself, instantly stepped up, and stabbed him through the back; and this will be the fate of every Frenchman they can possibly get into their power. Lisbon was handsomely illuminated last night, and every demonstration of joy shewn, as being once more out of the power of the French."

Extract from a letter received by Messrs. Dennis and James Lyons, of Limerick, from the Captain of their ship James, dated

"St. Ubes, September 5.—The French troops, during the time they were here, behaved in the most shocking manner, having, within a few miles of this town, murdered the whole of the nuns that were in the Convent; they attempted to blow up the town the day they left it, but fortunately the powder, 500 barrels which they put under the fort, on the quay, got wet by the tide running higher than they expected, three barrels only exploded, which did but little damage. At the time I entered this port, the French were only 15 miles from it, but I held myself ready for a start should any reverse happen. The Portuguese scarce know how to behave, or what to do for us, they are so thankful for what Great Britain has done for them; 14 Danish ships that have been lying here for several months, were yesterday taken possession of by the Comus frigate. There are 41 Danish ships at Lisbon. The James, and two other brigs are the only vessels here. It is a grateful sight to the Portuguese to see the British flag flying once more in this harbour.

The Expedition under Sir David Baird sailed on Sunday last from Falmouth. It consists of 15,000 troops, who are embarked in 200 sail of transports, under the convoy of the Amelia, of 38 guns, Hon. Capt. Irby; La Loire, 38, Capt. Schomberg; and the Champion, 24, Capt. Crasford. This expedition will render our force in the Peninsular very formidable, and capable of affording important aid to the patriotic cause. Our troops already in Portugal are estimated at 35,000, and this reinforcement will make the whole 48,000 men.

Dispatches have been received by Government, from Mr. Duff, dated at Seville, the 16th of September. It appears by them, that Mr. Duff has succeeded in forming arrangements for allowing goods of British manufacture, heretofore prohibited, to be brought into Spain. The cargoes of the ships already in the ports of Spain, are to be landed on payment of 15 per cent. duties; 5 per cent. further, for internal consumption; and 7 on being exported to all or any of the Spanish Colonies. There appears to be no doubt whatever, that this indulgence will be extended to all future arrivals; and it cannot fail to be highly gratifying to all manufacturers, particularly those of cotton goods.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales arrived at Portsmouth on Friday morning, and attended the embarkation of the first division of the 10th Regiment of Light Dragoons. His Royal Highness was received by every token of respect.

The Semiramis, with a million of dollars, sailed from Torbay on Thursday.—Mr. Frere and the Marquis de la Romana went passengers in her.

Parliament, we understand, will be further prorogued, so as not to meet till after Chrismas.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be continued at 1s. 2d. the Quartern Loaf of Wheaten, and 12½d. household.

Cotton.—The reduction of the Duties on this article enable the Retailer to vend it at 2s. 6d. per pound, yet there are some conscientious Grocers who still continue to sell it at 6s. per pound.

A Requisition for calling a Meeting of the City of Westminster, to consider of an Address to his Majesty, praying an inquiry into the causes that led to the late disgraceful Convention in Portugal, has been proposed and sanctioned by a great number of signatures. The absence of the High Bailiff, at Cheltenham, is the only cause of delay to its execution.

A very curious circumstance happened in a lane leading from Cork-street, Dublin, a few days since: an old man having died, and a carpenter's boy being sent to measure him for a coffin, the limbs of the corpse being much cramped and drawn up, the boy sat on his knees to straighten his legs and thighs, so that he might the better take its length, when the body necessarily bouncing up, struck the carpenter, who was so much affrighted, that he leaped instantly out of a one pair window into the street, but fortunately was only a little bruised. The circumstance occasioned much laughter in the neighbourhood.

THE COURT.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor, where he was received by the Duke of Kent. At two o'clock his Majesty was waited upon by a Deputation from the Corporation of the City of London, consisting of the Lord Mayor, the Mace and Sword of State, the Recorder, Alderman Smith and Wood, the Sheriffs, the Common Serjeant, Town Clerk, the Secondary, the City Council, and other City Officers, Messrs. Waithman and Quin, the mover and seconder of the Address and Petition to his Majesty, to cause an enquiry to be made into the circumstances that led to the late Convention concluded at Portugal.—There were likewise present of the Common Council, Messrs. Loveland, Frisby, Hale, Sadler, Griffiths, Brook, Metcalf, Nash, Chapman, &c.

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

The humble and dutiful Address and Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled,

"MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, most humbly approach your Majesty, with renewed assurances of attachment to your Majesty's most sacred Person and Government, and veneration for the free principles of the British Constitution; to express to your Majesty our grief and astonishment, at the extraordinary and disgraceful Convention lately entered into by the Commander of your Majesty's Forces in Portugal, and the Commander of the French Army in Lisbon.

"The circumstances attending this afflicting event cannot be contemplated in British minds without the most painful emotions, and all ranks of your Majesty's subjects seem to have felt the utmost concern and indignation at a Treaty so humiliating and degrading to this Country and its Allies. After a signal victory gained by the valour and discipline of British Troops, by which the Enemy appears to have been cut off from all means of succour or escape, we have the sad mortification of seeing the laurels so nobly acquired torn from the brows of our brave Soldiers, and terms granted to the Enemy disgraceful to the British name, and injurious to the best interests of the British Nation.

"Besides the restitution of the Russian Fleet upon a definitive Treaty of Peace with that Power, and the sending back to their country, without exchange, so large a number of Russian sailors; by this ignominious Convention, British Fleets are to convey to France the French Army and its plunder, where they will be at liberty immediately to re-commence their active operations against us or our Allies. The guarantee and safe conveyance of their plunder, cannot but prove highly irritating to the pillaged inhabitants over whom they have tyrannized, and for whose deliverance and protection the British Army was sent, and the full recognition of the title and dignity of Emperor of France, while all mention of the Government of Portugal is omitted, must be considered as highly disrespectful to the legitimate authority of that country.

"We therefore humbly pray your Majesty, in justice to the outraged feelings of a brave, injured, and indignant people, whose blood and treasure have been thus expended, as well as to retrieve the wounded honour of the country, and to remove from its character so foul a stain in the eyes of Europe, that your Majesty will be graciously pleased immediately to institute such an enquiry into this dishonourable and unprecedented transaction, as will lead to the discovery and punishment of those by whose misconduct and incapacity the cause of the country and its allies has been so shamefully sacrificed.

"We beg to assure your Majesty of our unalterable fidelity, and earnest desire to co-operate in every measure conducive to the peace, honour, and security of your Majesty's dominions,

"Signed by order of the Court,

"HENRY WOODTHORPE."

To which Address and Petition his Majesty was graciously pleased to return the following Address:

"I am fully sensible of your loyalty and attachment to my Person and Government.

"I give credit to the motives which have dictated your Petition and Address, but I must remind you that it is inconsistent with the principles of British Justice to pronounce judgment without previous investigation.

"I should have hoped that recent occurrences would have convinced you, that I am at all times ready to institute inquiries on occasions in which the character of the Country, of the honour of my Arms is concerned, and that the interposition of the City of London could not be necessary for inducing me to direct due inquiry to be made into a transaction, which has disappointed the hopes and expectations of the Nation."

The Address and Petition were read by the Recorder, and the Answer by Lord Hawkesbury. After the Deputation had withdrawn, His Majesty held a private Levee, which was attended by

The Archbishop of Canterbury, the first Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Privy Seal, the three Secretaries of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Duke of Montrose, Lords Arden (in waiting) Heathfield, (gold stick), and Somerset, Sirs T. Jones and A. Wellesley, Generals Turner, Ferguson, and Clavering, Admiral Pickmore, Colonels Bradshaw, Birch, O'Loghlin, and Torrens, Captains Bristow, Stanhope, Mellish, Malcolm and Temple, Lieut. Davis and Ensign Wyndham.

The following had the honour of being presented to His Majesty:—

Lieutenant-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, upon his return from Portugal, and on leave of absence. Colonel O'Loghlin, of the first Regiment of Life Guards, upon his promotion. —Colonel Bradshaw, of the first Regiment of Life Guards, upon his promotion. Major General Turner upon his return from abroad and upon his promotion. Lieutenant-Colonel Birch, of the first Regiment of Life Guards upon his promotion. Sir Thomas Jones, upon his being created a Baronet. Lieutenant Davis, of the first Regiment of Life Guards, upon his promotion. Ensign Wyndham of the first Regiment of Guards upon his return from the army in Portugal. Captain Bristow, of the first Regiment of Life Guards, upon his promotion. Captain Stanhope, Aid-de-Camp to Sir Arthur Wellesley upon his return from the army in Portugal. Captain Malcolm, R. N. upon his being appointed to his Majesty's ship Donegall. Lord Fitzroy Somerset, upon his return from Portugal. Lieutenant Colonel Torrens, upon his promotion. Major General Ferguson, upon his return from Portugal. Captain J. Temple, R. N. upon his being appointed to his Majesty's ship Crescent. Captain Mellish upon his return from Portugal. Rear-Admiral Pickmore upon his promotion. Brigadier-General Clavering, upon his return from the Cape of Good Hope.

Mr. Ryder as Judge-Advocate, laid before His Majesty the proceedings of several Courts-Martial.

About six o'clock his Majesty set off on his return to Windsor.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. X.

I would express him simple, grave, sincere.
* * * * * * * * * * *
* * * *Avaunt all attitude, and stare,
And start theatric, practis'd at the glass!
I seek divine simplicity in him
Who handles things divine; and all besides,
Though learn'd with labour, and though much admir'd
By curious eyes and judgments ill-informed,
To me is odious.—Cowper.

REV. PHILIP DODD, M. A.

WHEN circumstances induced me to communicate to the world a series of Clerical Criticism, incidentally embracing reflections connected with the State of Religion among us, I expected to encounter opposition the most formidable and hostility the most acrimonious. So many prejudices were not to be routed without difficulty, so many abuses were not to be exposed without danger, so many interests were not to be assailed with impunity. Suggestions of this nature did not escape me. As I entered impenetrably on the duty I had assigned myself, as I was resolved to prosecute it faithfully and vigorously, I foresaw the resistance I was likely to experience; and it would therefore have evinced something more culpable than folly, on my part, if I had omitted to discipline myself for so arduous a conflict. What I have not lightly undertaken, I shall not hastily abandon. Having calculated the importance of my commission, I shall endeavour to fulfil it

"As ever in our great Task-Master's eye!"

I have already met with many antagonists, of whom some may be denominated adversaries. Alas! the day is fast approaching,—whether as affecting Onesimus, or W. M. Smith, M. G., or master Seek-Truth, or Mr. Moore, or Germanicus, or Philo-Veritas,—when the intentions of all hearts must be disclosed; when what has been devised secretly will be divulged openly, and when men will be estimated not by the surmises of each other, but by the unerring judgment of omniscience. It is not for me therefore, however dared to "stand forth," to declare the extent of my opinions as to the real characters of my contemporaries. While I shall never presume to anticipate the decisions of omnipotence, I have only to hope that my antagonists look forward to them with confidence. I leave "the hypocritical heart" to him who seeth not as man sees; and I can leave also with him, to whom alone vengeance belongs, "the punishment due" to the offences of his creatures! My present task is more grateful; and I enter upon it with entire satisfaction. I have not now to adjure our spiritual governors, in the language of the ever admirable Cowper, to

"lay not careless hands
"On scalls that cannot teach, and will not learn!"

The Rev. PHILIP DODD is descended from a respectable family; and, after the usual course of preparatory education, was sent to Magdalen College, in Cambridge, of which he is still a Fellow. He is now Rector of Saint Mary at Hill, the Afternoon Lecturer of Camberwell Church, and one of the Evening Preachers at the Asylum. Mr. Dodd was also some years Morning Minister at South Lambeth Chapel; and, during the mayoralty of Sir Wm. Leighton, Knt. in 1807, he was Chaplain to the Lord Mayor. Two of his Sermons are in print; and he is the writer of an ingenious little tract entitled Hints to Freshmen, though, from its being published anonymously, others have pretended to claim the honour attached to its real author.

Mr. Dodd owes his preferment to his character, not his character to his preferment. He has been the architect of his own reputation. "You," says the Rev. Lawrence Gardner (whom Mr. Dodd succeeded, at South Lambeth Chapel), in a Farewell Sermon to that congregation, delivered on June 19, 1803,—"You will have the advantage of a public instructor in every respect worthy of the appointment he is going to fill. Were he not present, I should speak of him in a manner more agreeable to my own feelings, and to his merits, than I now with delicacy can do. I shall therefore merely say, that, I verily believe, for correctness of moral conduct, for purity of principles, for soundness of doctrine, and for excellence of manner, he has very few, if any, superior to him." Malice could subtract nothing from such merited eulogium.

Manliness of mind, and christianity of conduct, constitute the leading pretensions of this preacher. When he enters the pulpit, it is with the seriousness of one chiefly solicitous for the good of the souls committed to his charge. Of his almost peculiar excellence in repeating the Lord's Prayer, I confess myself incapable of conveying, by writing, an adequate idea to others. His Discourses are always practical, inclining to experimental. His plain but nervous language, his inculcation of doctrines no less than duties, and the judicious conciseness of his applications, are evidences alike of his earnestness and ability. Proceeding from the heart, his preaching, at once, appeals to the heart. While the understanding is satisfied, the affections are rectified.

During the ceremonial, as well as the preceptive, part of religious duty, worshipping as teaching, Mr. Dodd is altogether uniform. Preachers have been so long accustomed to join in congregational services, that any objection to the practice will doubtless appear singular. Considering, nevertheless, what it is to fill the pulpit, how much of solemn meditation is required and how much of private emotion it may occasion, I have almost concluded that the preacher should be left entirely to himself, to spiritual solitude, till he appears in his proper sphere. Much has he previously to do, in which no human being can participate. He is not with men. His presence may indeed grace their devotions, but the association must be distracting to him; employed, as he ought then to be, in absolute communion with divinity!

It is not enough, however, to have filled the pulpit with effect; to have ascended it circumspectly, and occupied it impressively. Consistent throughout, the pious preacher will not, after having spoken wisely,

"At the close,
"Grow wanton; and give proof to ev'ry eye,
"Whoe'er was edified, himself was not!"

He, therefore, will not hurry from his sacred station, as if he felt fatigued by its demands, or was eager to meet the salutations of the vestry, or anxious to escape to some more pressing or pleasing engagement; but, like the subject of this sketch, he will remain where duty placed him, awaiting the time for modestly withdrawing from the gaze or compliments of his hearers. He will bar all intrusion. He will be solicitous only to avoid notice, and avert congratulations.

Mr. Dodd, though successful, is not inaccessible, and I shall therefore advert briefly to his deficiencies.

Animated as generally he is, he has yet too much the air of reading his discourses; and he fingers his manuscript, turning over leaf after leaf, with such precision as considerably weakens his powers of address. His delivery is not sufficiently diversified, the fulness of his voice occasionally impedes his articulation, and his emphases are sometimes prolonged till they approximate to pauses. I know the detestation in which he holds fanaticism, but I trust it will never drive him from spirituality.

Why do I write in commendation of Mr. Dodd?—Personally I have not the happiness of his acquaintance, I know him only in the pulpit; but, this knowledge is perfectly sufficient. Hence then my estimate is formed. If he is among the few whom, as clerical characters, I venerate; it is because his conduct, as far as I can learn, demands my respect, and because his talents have acquired him my warmest approbation. Full of his charge, but negligent of himself, he accomplishes every thing without affecting any thing. His energy is his sincerity; his simplicity is his dignity. Whatsoever are his defects, and he is not exempted from imperfection, still the man is forgotten in the minister.

As it is painful to me to be compelled to expose the delinquencies of clergymen, so do I feel it truly exhilirating when circumstances authorise me to admire the characters, and applaud the exertions, of ecclesiastical instructors. My opinion of Mr. Dodd has not been immaturely advanced. He is now far, very far, above those christian pastors, described by our illustrious Milton, to whom "The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,

"But swoln with wind; and the rank mist they draw,
"Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread!"

I therefore confidently hope, that as he has begun, such he will continue; that, in truth, he will persevere to the end; and that he will certainly be found among them who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises. He has now my wishes, because he has long excited my esteem; while, in commending him, I trust that I am furthering the cause of the church itself.

ONESIMUS.

 The communication from An Enemy to Clerical Hypocrisy has been regularly received. Having no personal antipathy to gratify, Onesimus, though obliged to this writer for his information, wishes, now to drop the subject of it, unless, indeed, he is again braved to the encounter. It will be seen, by his introductory reflections on the present occasion, in what way Onesimus contemplates the whole transaction.

FINANCIAL PROSPERITY OF THE COUNTRY.

It is with the greatest satisfaction that we present to our Readers, the result of the Quarterly Accounts, which have lately been made up at the Exchequer, and which afford the most substantial proof of the very flourishing condition of our financial resources. From these, it appears, that in the quarter which ended the 10th instant, the surplus of the Consolidated Fund has amounted to 2,714,000*l.*—This is the largest quarterly surplus of that fund that has yet been known. In the corresponding quarter of 1807, it amounted to 2,310,000*l.* But as there is a sum to be deducted from each of these amounts, on account of the deficiency of the preceding Quarter, (the Consolidated in the Quarters ending 5th July and 5th January, on account of the Consols in those periods);—the following statement will be a clearer mode of exhibiting the actual surplus produced towards the current service of the year, in the half years ended 10th October, in 1807 and 1808 respectively:—

Surplus on the 10th October, 1807	£.2,310,000
Deduct deficiency of 5th July to be made good	148,000
Remained surplus applicable to the service of the year	2,162,000
Surplus, 10th October, 1808	£.2,714,000
Deduct deficiency of 5th July	406,000
Remains surplus applicable to the grant of the year	2,308,000

It only remains to be observed, that whole surplus granted for the service of the year 1807 (ending 5th of April 1808), was 3,750,000*l.* and that considerably more than that sum will actually produced with the year. For the present year, 3,500,000*l.* only has been charged upon the sinking fund; so that deducting from that sum the 2,308,000*l.* above stated, there remains only 1,192,000*l.* to be produced in the two ensuing quarters of January and April, to compleat the grant. There appears therefore the strongest probability, that there will be a considerable excess at the disposal of Parliament at April 1808.

With respect to the War Taxes the prospect is not less favourable:—

Their amount in the quarter just ended is	£6,194,705
In the corresponding quarter of last year, it was	6,128,913
The net produce of the Property Tax, paid into the Exchequer in the year ended 10th of October 1808, is	11,851,000

ANSLEY, MAYOR.—CAUTION.—Whereas information hath been given to the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, that many instances of HYDROPHOBIA, arising from the bite of a Mad Dog, have lately occurred, as well in various parts of the Kingdom as in and near the Metropolis; And as there may be just reason to apprehend that unless due measures of Caution are used to prevent the spreading of so fatal a calamity, the public safety may become greatly endangered. The Lord Mayor deems it highly necessary, in a matter of such importance, to the lives and comfort of all ranks of his Majesty's subjects, to give this Public Caution; and to require of every Citizen and Inhabitant of this City, who have Dogs, to keep those animals within their respective houses or premises, and not permit them to go into or perambulate any of the public Streets until sufficient proofs are afforded that the prevalence of the Malady has ceased, or that such caution may no longer be necessary: and the Lord Mayor will, in the mean time, use his utmost endeavours to obtain the fullest information upon the subject, and not fail to apply such promptand necessary measures as the public safety may require; not doubting but he will have the willing co-operation of his Fellow-Citizens therein.

JOHN ANSLEY, Mayor.

Mansion-House, Saturday, Oct. 15, 1808.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

When the Russian squadron arrived at St. Helen's, Admiral Siniavin's flag was flying; but it was struck at sun-set on Friday se'nnight; and all the Russian ships hauled down their pendants. The Russian Officers have leave to come on shore; the crews of the ships are to be sent home immediately. The ships are come into Portsmouth harbour to be laid up. They are said to be in so bad a condition, that they never will be serviceable again. Their crews are ordered to have the same allowance as our own seamen, until they arrive home. It is a singular circumstance, that after Admiral Tyler had given Admiral Siniavin intimation that he must not weigh his anchor any longer, and that his arrival at a British port was the fulfilment of that part of the Convention which allowed him to do so, it was generally apprehended that he would make an attempt, however rash it may appear, to get away from St. Helen's in the night; the Bardour in consequence cleared for action, after she anchored at St. Helen's on Thursday night.

The Port-Admiral, at Portsmouth, has received orders to treat the Russian Admiral, Officers, and sailors, with all attention and politeness. The ships are to be taken into the harbour as soon as their powder has been landed. This work has been delayed in consequence of the want of casks to store it in, as it is at present made up in cartridges on board the squadron.

A very large fleet of merchantmen have arrived from Stockholm and Gottenburgh; they sailed from the latter place on the 30th ult.; 25 are bound to Hull. The whole convoy consists of about 100 sail; many of the ships are from the ports of Revel and other Russian ports, and have on board valuable cargoes of the produce of that country.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

SUICIDE.—A beautiful young woman, who was recently the adored of a certain Maquis, and who has since been under the the protection of a military officer, put a period to her existence at her apartments, a draper's, in Oxford-street, on Sunday night, by taking a considerable portion of laudanum. Her last protector had dined and spent the day with her on Sunday, and after his departure, at eleven o'clock at night, the Lady was found in tears, and much dejected. She was found dead in her bed at nine o'clock on Monday morning, and it was ascertained, that she had taken a tea-cup full of the poisonous liquid.

Monday a boy died of the hydrophobia in Little Windmill-street, Haymarket. He had been bitten by the dog which bit the person who died lately at the London Hospital; a third person died in Westminster, also bitten by the same dog. Nine or ten other persons who were bitten, are under the greatest anxiety respecting their fate.

FIRE.—Tuesday morning at two o'clock, a fire blazed forth in a private house in Bermondsey street, which illuminated the Thames and the neighbourhood; but by the sudden arrival of the engines the fire was quenched where it began, with the destruction of the furniture.

Some bricklayers repairing a house in Titchborne-street, Piccadilly, through carelessness, let fall a spade from the top, which unfortunately fell on the head of a poor boy who was passing at the time and fractured his scull. He was taken to St. George's Hospital, with little hopes of his recovery.

Yesterday, at the Public Office, Hatton Garden, a young man in easy circumstances was committed for re-examination, charged on suspicion of stealing two bank notes, value 100*l.* with other notes, amounting altogether to 120*l.* from his fellow-lodger, in a lodging house in the City-road;—he immediately went to the Bank, and got the larger ones refitted to smaller ones: he besides took a silver watch, with gold chains and seals, which he wore as if he had been unconscious of the theft.—James Hancock, the Officer, stated, that when sent for to apprehend the prisoner, he was greatly agitated, and hoped that he would not hang him. Several clerks of the Bank attended to prove the exchange of the notes which seemed to be correct, by enumerating their numbers and date.—He stands fully committed, but subject to be brought up again on a future day.

An Inquisition was taken on Wednesday at the George Tavern, Duke-street, on the body of a youth of the name of Yeovil, who met his death suddenly on Tuesday. It appeared in evidence that the deceased, who was the son of a liquor-merchant, had complained on Sunday night of a violent pain in the chest; he having eaten immoderately of filberts whilst drinking wine. His case became dangerous on Monday, and on the following day he died suddenly; having apparently previously recovered.—Died by the visitation of God.

BIRTH.

On Saturday se'nnight the wife of a labouring man, residing in Micklemire, in Yorkshire was delivered of two girls and a boy, who, with the mother are likely to live.

DIED.

Monday se'nnight at the venerable age of 93, the Rev John Langdon, Rector of Winston, in the county of Gloucester. He had constantly resided at the first-mentioned parish 66 years.

On the 7th instant, in Hill-street, Berkeley-square, Katherine Maria, wife of William Leveson Gower, Esq. heiress of the late Sir John Gresham, Bart. of Titsey-place in Surrey.

Lately, at Oxford, aged above 90 years at the house of her son the Rev. the Warden of All Souls College, Mrs. Isham, and mother of the present Sir Justinian Isham, Bart. of Lamport, Northamptonshire.

POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

NUMBER FORTY-THREE.

MR. COBBETT.

We have, for a considerable time, taken no notice of The Political Register. It will appear superfluous to those, who know how to appreciate our motives, to make any apology for this omission. We have made our strictures on that journal from no personal animosity to Mr. Cobbett, nor from any expectation of honour from the apparent courage of entering the lists with so formidable an antagonist. We have acted on far different motives; sensible to the no inconsiderable influence, which this journalist exercises over the public opinion, by the singularity of his style, a certain popularity of manner, the confidence of his assertions, and the courage he displays in the examination of public questions, we felt how necessary it was to expose his involuntary errors, and detect his wilful misrepresentations. The very respectable circulation of his journal, the celebrity he has acquired, and the notoriety of his tenets, exclude the necessity of apology, whenever we think it incumbent on us to make him the subject of our animadversions. He has been, for some time, strenuously and very successfully engaged in reprobating a silly and knavish transaction; on which occasion we applauded his courage, and were pleased with his zealous exertions. As long as he continued in this honourable career we were proud of commending his labours; but, unfortunately for his own reputation, and, in fact, for the public cause, his principles are too unsettled, and his habits too inveterate, to permit him to remain long in a direct and obvious road. To make up for the restraint of a few weeks of good conduct, he invariably indulges in twice as many of extravagance and error.

Had not Mr. Cobbett too frequently exposed himself to an imputation of inconsistency and unsteadiness, he might have rendered essential services to the public, and ranked high in the list of political writers; for he joins to an unusual share of strong good sense, an unbiassed judgement and a discriminating understanding. A circumstance, which renders these natural advantages the more striking and perhaps popular, is their not being restrained by the delicacy which a polite education bestows, nor by the refinement which taste confers. Mr. Cobbett appears to set no value himself on these elegant acquirements and gives a manifest preference to that kind of vigour which borders on grossness. Whatever influence he might acquire over a certain class of the public by his masculine air, and his professions of independence, he has had the misfortune to forfeit by his levity and inconstancy. He has, at the same time, so extravagantly condemned, and so excessively commended, at no distant intervals, the same men and measures, that his praise and disapprobation are considered as conveying neither censure nor eulogy, and, are, therefore, regarded as unworthy of notice or resentment. He has involved himself in the mortifying predicament, in consequence of his unmanly shuffling, of having his opinions received with distrust or indifference, whatever professions he may make; however zealous he may labour to appear, or however serious he may really be. Whatever he does, or writes, a strong imputation of apostacy attaches to his character; and his strictures on the parties he abandoned, and once so intemperately praised, whilst they convey some suspicion of a treacherous, unattaching heart, produce no other effect than what his present professions in favour of the popular cause excite;—they contribute to make his readers heartily laugh!

We have observed another striking peculiarity in Mr. Cobbett. It is universally known that he has raised himself from the lowest obscurity, by his exertions and abilities, to a state of opulence and respectability; which does him more honour in the public esteem, than if he owed his independence to the accidental and unmeritorious circumstance of birth. But singular and extravagant in every thing, he reproaches his antagonists with indecent acrimony, the very poverty, under the pressure of which he had consumed the greater part of his life. The weakness, folly, and indecency of a simular accusation, from his pen, are rendered more flagrant, by his affected aversion to men of fortune and title. We are certain of finding, once a week, a most angry diatribe against the peculation, pride and insolence of both opposition and ministers; whilst the opulent citizens of London are accused of still greater offences by our indignant leveller. Mr. Cobbett, in his eccentric course, menaces destruction, not only at the habitations of the great and the opulent, but he threatens to consume the naked, tottering chamber of the poor forlorn inhabitant, of Grub-street. This blazing comet is fortunately forced to move in a certain orbit by the laws of our social system; and however terrific and fiery his course, his inability to injure raises only our admiration of a plan, which can tolerate and restrain within fixed bounds so rapid and irregular an orb.

We know how customary it is to censure Mr. Cobbett, on account of the grossness of his language, and the abusive vulgarity of his reproaches. Without attempting to excuse him on this head, we are fully of opinion that a very great allowance should be made him on the score of a neglected education, and the force of early habits. If persons, tormented with this excessive delicacy, had called to mind a very homely proverb, "that custom is second nature," they would not be so overhasty in condemning him for what he could not, without the most extraordinary vigilance and perseverance, have avoided. It is, therefore, as silly to blame him for grossness and indelicacy, as an animal, attacked with the hydrophobia, for biting. We wish it were as easy to exculpate him in other respects, as we can in this; and our satisfaction would be more genuine, than we receive from the task we have undertaken.

He is, however, liable to censure of a more serious and more objectionable kind. We would willingly have dispensed with the trouble of the foregoing remarks, and chosen a subject more consonant to our wishes, had not Mr. Cobbett given, in his Register of last week, a specimen of a detestable disposition he seems to feel of imputing the actions of public men of every country, however respectable their names, and acknowledged their virtues, to impure and corrupt motives. If we did not suppose that he is guilty of this unintentional atrocity, from the silly and repulsive vanity of wishing to appear more knowing than others, we should look down on him as one of the most vicious and loathsome animals that infest the earth. This foolish pretension to superior penetration induces a sensible man to expose himself wantonly to the imputation of being a consummate rascal: for if his remark be just, that the greatest and most admired of our statesmen were nothing better than political knaves, what claims can Mr. Cobbett produce to dispense him from a similar imputation? If the reputation of the worthiest and most respectable characters be not secure from the rancour of malice, the surmises of folly, or the censure of profligacy; what chance of safety will those individuals have, who afford by their conduct too much room for uncharitable surmises? This is unquestionably one of the most worthless and reprehensible uses to which the pages of The Political Register are devoted. We should be worse than enemies of the imprudent writer, if we took him at his word, and believed him serious in the charges he prefers. What an opinion should we then entertain of his heart! what! does neither honour nor integrity regulate the actions of men? .... Is virtue no more than an hypocritical mask, in order to deceive with greater advantage and security? ... Is all our belief in the integrity of others and the divinity of our origin to be flung away? ..... Should such infernal principles gain ground, the whole fabric of society is destroyed to the foundation; and men would look upon one another with as much distrust and apprehension, as savages of contending tribes. How an individual of Cobbett's sense could compromise himself in so wanton a manner, is inconceivable. He may be convinced that others will not shew so much toleration for his imprudence as we do, and will seize with avidity an opportunity of inflicting on his character a wound, which neither the balsam of time, nor of art, will be able to heal. They will impute to the worst and most pernicious of principles, what we conceive to be the effect of an insolent, overbearing vanity. What is the object of all this fuss and impertinence, on the part of Cobbett? .. Remark readers:—Mr. Pitt, Fox and Chatham, whom you are so proud of revering, were no more than rogues and blockheads; and as very few are in the habit of condemning themselves, Mr. Cobbett is a man of genius and spotless integrity!! Bravo, Mr. Cobbett! Your modesty and discretion are admirable!

We have made the foregoing remarks in order to save Mr. Cobbett from the persecutions of private malice; to prove him to be no more than a presumptuous, silly Journalist, and by no means deserving of the violent indignation which a foolish article, in his last Number, has universally excited. We have often stared at his temerity, and smiled at the latitude he gave himself in abusing English credulity, and tampering with English patience. Like all noisy, blustering individuals, he swears, foams, bullies, cocks his hat, looks fierce,—and means nothing. After this introduction, we feel no difficulty in stating the cause of these remarks; in particular as we have reason to think we have secured the object of them from intemperate, unreflecting animosity. In his ranting, paradoxical manner, and from an insolent affectation of superior penetration, he consigned some columns of his last Number to prove that the Exposition of Don Cevallos was,——a lie! and the patriotic Author an Intriguer! That the whole business was nothing but one of those trumped-up tricks so usual with Politicians, in order to gain credit with the People of Spain; with some ingenious and witty insinuations relative to the favour he enjoyed under King Charles, King Ferdinand, and King Joseph; and such like nonsense. However we may execrate the levity and impertinence of observations tending to weaken the interest and credit of a publication so admirably calculated, from its simplicity and candour, to benefit the cause of innocence and justice; we saw, by no means, that degree of danger or criminality in them, which some affected to discover. They only contributed to confirm us in a belief we have long entertained, that some of our Journalists, and particularly this very Cobbett, are guilty of a most unwarrantable abuse in their remarks and strictures on the Governments of friendly States. The injury they do their own country, by their insolent interference, is incalculable. Our Newspapers are read with avidity in Sweden and Spain; and when a journal, like Cobbett's, falls into the hands of a Spaniard, who is unacquainted with the peculiar customs of England, and the licentiousness of our press, he is naturally astonished at finding the language of our Papers so contrary to the declarations of Government. Every article in a Spanish Gazette which refers to this country is a warm effusion of eulogy and gratitude. That a man laying strong claims to understanding, and pretending to have the interests of his country at heart, should, for the gratification of making a quaint, or an impertinent remark, contribute to weaken the union and confidence so happily subsisting between us and the people of Spain, is a species of pleasure we are incapable of comprehending. Whilst we acquit Mr. Cobbett of the criminal motives, some may be too prone to impute to him, we sincerely bewail, that, from indiscretion and vanity, he should act in a manner as injurious and disgraceful to himself, as it is repugnant and offensive to others.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE PAPERS.

SPAIN.

ANSWER said TO HAVE BEEN GIVEN BY THE COUNCIL OF CASTILE TO THE PROCLAMATION OF THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH, FROM BAYONNE, MAY 25, 1808.

"The Council of Castile, in the name of the Spanish nation, tenders to his Imperial and Royal Majesty, Napoleon, its most respectful acknowledgments for the disposition he has shewn to make the Spanish people happy, availing himself for this purpose of the sovereignty over the country he has derived by the cession of King Charles IV. and of the rest of the Royal Family, under the treaties of the 5th and 10th of May, 1808.

"The Council, whose determinations must be regulated by the established laws of the Monarchy, respecting, as it ought, the annunciation of the will of your Imperial and Royal Majesty, deems it its duty to inform you, that to fulfil its own obligations, it is necessary that the whole of those circumstances should be imparted to it, to ascertain if the renunciation of the crown there stated, be a valid or a nugatory act.

"The Council is firmly pursuaded of the truth of the general principle, that nobody can resign what is not his own; that the Government is a Magistracy sanctioned by the law of the kingdom; and that the reigning authority can only surrender that portion which is in his personal and actual possession, and not what appertains to his successors.

"The Council would likewise remark, that the renunciations stated are invalid, because they were not made within the boundary, of Spain, and because they were exacted by constraint and violence.

"If your Imperial and Royal Majesty sincerely desires, as you profess, to learn the wishes of the Spanish nation, it hopes that you would be pleased to set at liberty the Prince of Asturias, who has been proclaimed throughout the realm the legitimate successor to the Crown; and if, in this state of perfect freedom, and within the limits of his territories, he should sign such a renunciation, the Spanish nation will consider all difficulties and legal obstacles removed, and will feel itself authorised to acknowledge that Monarch as its Supreme Ruler, which the benevolence and affection of your Imperial and Royal Majesty should nominate for it.

"The Council signifies its profound respect for the Grand Duke of Berg, and begs of him to receive this humble representation, and to procure its delivery into the hands of his Imperial and Royal Majesty, that when he shall please to take it into his lofty contemplation, the nation may receive from him that solace which it expects from his acknowledged generosity.

DETAILS OF THE OPERATIONS OF OUR ARMY, TRANSMITTED TO THE MOST SERENE JUNTA, BY HIS EXCELLENCY DON JOAQUIM BLAKE, COMMANDER IN CHIEF, &c.

"MOST EXCELLENT SENIOR,

"I have the honour of informing your Excellency of the singular proofs of valour which the troops under my command have evinced, in the re-capture of the city of Bilboa, which achievement would have been most complete, if some of our advanced posts, who, the preceding night, fired upon the enemy, had not given them an opportunity of drawing our positions at a moment when they were most ignorant of them, believing us to be many leagues distant; aware that of our arrival, they took a different determination, and it followed that they were not all made prisoners, undoubtedly would otherwise have been the case.

"At half past three in the morning of the 20th, Brigadier Don Manuel Fabio set out with the vanguard, consisting of two companies of the regiment of Barbastro, the tirailleurs of Toledo and the Prince, the 2d battalion of grenadiers of the army, two of Toledo, and the regiment of Lugo, to cut off the retreat of the enemy at the new bridge, a point necessary for their passage.

"The enemy soon commenced firing, and having crossed the river, possessed the avenue. Notwithstanding their forcing the passage, he continued his march, forbidding the troops to fire, and stationed himself behind a house. Whilst these movements were executing, the day began to break, and after forming the regiment of Lugo to support his flank, he charged the enemy, who from various points commenced firing, reducing the action to a mere mountain warfare. In the mean time I ordered the rest of my troops to advance, which were the first battalion of the grenadiers of the line, three companies of tirailleurs of Aragon, and the second of the Prince, leaving two companies of the third battalion of the last corps to cover a pass, and two other posts on a height. I also ordered four companies of Barbastro and the tirailleurs to proceed to the van-guard, and reconnoitre the ground on the right, the left, and the centre; but observing that the attack was well sustained on different points, I determined that the companies of Barbastro, as well as the grenadiers, should support the van guard. The resistance of the enemy was most obstinate; but after an action of three hours and a half, in which they lost from 350 to 400 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, they were obliged to retire precipitately, leaving on the field of battle knapsacks, fusils, and one ammunition waggon. Part of the regiment of Barbastro, with the Colonel at its head, and the tirailleurs, passed the stone bridge, charging with the bayonet those who remained, and routing them in every direction. In consequence of this, I proceeded to take possession of Bilboa, which, without suffering any thing, was witness of the action, and caused to revive in its inhabitants, an inexpressible joy and satisfaction at seeing themselves free from the cruel oppression in which they had lived during the infamous domination of the French.

"I cannot do less than recommend to your Excellency the Brigadier Don Manuel Fabio, who, by his valour and military talents, has rendered himself worthy of the highest considerations. I recommend also the Colonels and Chiefs of the corps, who, by their bravery and military ardour, have eminently distinguished themselves; the Adjutant-Generals, Don Francisco Losado, Don Joseph Castilar, &c. and in general all the officers and troops under my command, for having given constant and repeated proofs of a valour which makes them worthy of the greatest eulogy. I hope that your Excellency will communicate this to the Supreme Junta of Gallicia, for its own satisfaction, and of these brave soldiers.

"May God preserve your Excellency many years.

TO THE GOVERNMENT OF GALLICIA.

"MOST SERENE SEGNIORS,

"The enemy's centre corps, which, as I have informed you in my dispatch of the 27th, had marched to Vittoria, directed its route from that city towars Bilboa, under the command of the General in Chief Marshal Ney, for the purpose of falling upon our fourth division, with a force of about three to one. The latter, however, opportunely evacuated the place, and retreated with the artillery and baggage in the best order to Balmaseda, in which place, or its environs, they still remain. The third division advanced the same day, as far as Pena de Ordena, to the assistance of the fourth, in defiance of a column of the enemy that observed them at a very short distance from their line of march, and between whose advanced parties and ours, some firing took place. Brigadier-General Don Francisco Riquelure was on his march to Bilboa, when he was informed of our having evacuated it, and the enemy having entered it; in consequence of which, he altered his route, and marched in a direction to facilitate his assisting or forming a junction with Portazgo. The position which he last occupied was Oqueuda.

"The above is communicated for the information of your Most Serene Highnesses. May you live many years, &c. &c.

COPY OF A LETTER, DATED MADRID, OCTOBER 1.

"The Supreme Government have ordered Lieutenant General Urbina, Governor of Segovia, to bring before them, from the State Prison in the Tower of that place, his prisoner, Valdes, Counsellor of State, and Deputy of the Province of Leon. They have at the same time ordered General Cuesta to leave his army, and come to give an account of his motives for arresting General Valdes. They have further declared Valdes the legal Representative for Leon, and have rejected the man chosen by Cuesta. General Castanos is expected to be appointed Commander in Chief of the Armies of Andalusia, Castile, Valencia, and Estremadura. These troops compose the central army; the effective number of which is as follows:—

Andalusia	25,000	troops of the Line.
Valencia	16,000	mostly Peasantry.
Castile	12,000

RIVADES, SEPT. 30.—Two transports arrived to-day in this port, which parted company with the convoy of about 300 sail, on board of which are our troops escaped from the North. They are well dressed, inured to war, and in high spirits. When they disembarked from the above two transports they kissed the earth, and exclaimed Long live Ferdinand VII. The whole regiment of Asturias, and those of Guadalajara and Algarve, made the most vigorous resistance against the French; but as the latter were in very great numbers, amounting to twelve thousand men, they were obliged to surrender and deliver up their arms.

CORUNNA, OCT. 6.—Bilboa is certainly in the hands of the French, who, it is said, entered it with 32,000 men, General Ney had the command. The Marquis De Portazzo withdrew all his troops and artillery in good order, taking a position which enables him to wait for reinforcements without molestation.

PORTUGAL.

LISBON, SEPT. 17.—The 15th inst. was the day fixed for the evacuation of this capital, and the entrance of the British army. At noon, the Portuguese colours were hoisted from the castle; the artillery fired a royal salute, which was repeated by all the forts and ships of war in the Tagus. The inhabitants embraced and congratulated each other on the fortunate event, with the strongest demonstration of heart-felt satisfaction, and the air resounded with the shout of "Long live the Prince Regent our Lord; long live England and Spain." The capital was lighted, and the preceding night illuminated; several fine transparencies were exhibited; one attracted particular notice, representing Lusitania lying at the feet of Great Britain, and the latter in the act of raising her with one hand, while with the other she points to the picture of the Prince Regent. In the night between the 14th and 15th, and in the morning of the latter, the French continued to embark. It became indispensably necessary to order them to be escorted by English troops, to shelter them from the populace, who in every other point of view conducted themselves with the utmost propriety and order.

SEPT. 24.—The day before yesterday was a day of jubilee and satisfaction for the Spanish army, on account of having its arms delivered to it, on which occasion salutes were fired from all the English ships in the river. Measures have been taken to remount the Spanish cavalry on the same horses they brought to this country.

Yesterday morning the English Commanders, both by sea and land, paid a visit to the Regency, and afterwards to the Spanish General. Every thing continues in the greatest harmony between the three nations.

SEPT. 27.—There is now posted up here the following

EDICT:

"The Commissioners authorised to receive the reclamations on the part of the English and Portuguese notify to all persons, who may have in their possession any effects or moveable property belonging to the Royal Family, the Nobles, and others, who accompanied her Majesty and their Royal Highnesses, or who may have in their possession any property belonging to subjects of the King of Great Britain, and sequestrated by order of the French Government, that they shall deliver in an account of the same within the term of ten days, reckoning from the 22d of the present month, into the office of the Secretary of the Commission, under pain that if not accounted for, and feloniously concealed, the offender shall pay thrice the value of the said effects to the lawful proprietors. The same penalty shall be incurred by all those who, knowing how such property is disposed of, do not acquaint the Commissioners therewith."

FROM THE DUTCH AND GERMAN PAPERS.

GERMANY.

ERFURTH, SEPT. 28.—Yesterday at nine o'clock in the morning arrived here his Majesty the Emperor of the French. The Commandant of the town, the Magistrates, and Deputies of the Livery, the University, and the Clergy, met him without the gates; the President of the Senate tendered him the keys of the gates of the city, and presented an Address, expressing the fidelity and attachment of the inhabitants to his person and government. The Emperor having perused the Address, and testified his satisfaction, entered the town on horseback, amidst the firing of guns, ringing of bells, and joyful acclamations of the inhabitants, and alighted at the hotel prepared for his reception. Soon after the Emperor mounted his horse again to pay a visit to his Majesty the King of Saxony, who arrived on the preceding day. He afterwards inspected the troops quartered in this town, and then proceeded on horseback to meet his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia. About three o'clock in the afternoon the two great Monarchs entered the town on horseback, attended by a great number of persons of the first distinction, and escorted by two regiments of foot, and two regiments of horse.—At night the whole town was illuminated.

At Weimar 300 men of the Imperial Russian Guards are expected.

His Majesty the King of Westphalia, his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine, and the Duke and Hereditary Prince of Weimar, have arrived in this place.

FROM THE MALTA AND GIBRALTAR MAILS.

The arrival of the Isabella Packet, from Malta and Gibraltar enables us to announce, that the Garrisons of both were well and in high spirits at the end of the last month.

GIBRALTAR, SEPT. 19.—This morning the King's-Fisher sloop of war arrived from Malta, having her Highness the Princess of Orleans on board. Her Highness made her escape with great difficulty from some village near Barcelona, on its being attacked by the French, and arrived at Malta about three weeks ago.

SEPT. 23.—The letters from every part of Spain speak in the most indignant terms of the ignominious Convention concluded with the French at Lisbon. The British Government escape censure, but the evils expected to result from the Convention are not the less regretted on that account.

CADIZ, SEPT. 17.—Yesterday a Russian Officer arrived here express from Lisbon, by way of Badajoz, on his way to Trieste, with dispatches to the Russian Government. By him we have learned the authentic accounts of the extraordinary terms which have been granted to General Junot and the French Army under his command in Portugal. It is impossible to describe the amazement and indignation they have excited in this country, where they are reckoned far more degrading to the British national honour, than those which Liniers dictated to General Whitelocke, at Buenos Ayres.

HAMBURGH, SEPT. 30.—His Majesty the King of Denmark has thrown open the navigation from Denmark, and the whole western coast to Norway, to all Danish ships. But 25 per cent. of the amount of the cargo must be deposited, which is forfeited to the King, in case that the arrival of the ship and cargo in Norway cannot be satisfactorily proved.

SICILY.

MESSINA, AUG. 26.—We are all in expectation of an early move of part of the army. Troops have been moving in various parts of the Island—transports have been long preparing for the reception of men and horses, and forage has within these few days been embarking—stores to a considerable amount have been long on board. We have now eleven Generals on the Staff here; General Disney, of the Guards, goes home by this packet. Our force on the Island amounts to about 15,000 men, a great proportion of them foreigners. We have very little communication with Calabria. You have heard, I dare say, of our unsuccessful attempt to cut out or destroy a vessel from under the rocks of Scylla. She has been one of our transports (the Lord Melville), and was employed in bringing round Lord Forbes from Palermo. His Lordship landed at the Faro, a short time after she got into the current, which drove her under the guns of Scylla, when she was abandoned by her crew. That night a plan was formed to destroy her; but unfortunately a boat, containing a Captain of the 89th, and a Lieutenant of the 35th, with nine soldiers on board, got a-head of the boat to which the enterprise was principally entrusted, and got close under the vessel and between her and the shore, which was lined with French troops ready to receive them. The two Officers were badly wounded, but are getting better. The plan was accordingly frustrated.

AMERICA.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANSWER TO THE BOSTON PETITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 6.—The following Answer to the Petition of the Inhabitants of this town, from the President of the United States, was received on Tuesday by the Select Men, and is now presented to the public by their order.

(Signed) WM. COOPER, Town-Clerk.

"SIR, August 29, 1808.

"I beg leave to communicate, through you, the inclosed Answer to the Representation which came to me under cover from you, and to add the assurances of my respect.

(Signed) "TH. JEFFERSON.

"Charles Bullfinch, Esq. for the Select Men of Boston."

TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE TOWN OF BOSTON, IN LEGAL TOWN MEETING ASSEMBLED,

"Your representation and request were received on the 22d instant, and have been considered with the attention due to every expression of the sentiments, and feelings of so respectable a body of my Fellow Citizens.

"No person has seen with more concern than myself the inconveniences brought on our country in general by the circumstances of the times in which we happen to live; times to which the history of Nations presents no parrallel. For years we have been looking at spectators on our brethren of Europe, afflicted with all these evils which necessarily follow an abandonment of the moral rules which bind men and nations together. Connected with them in friendship and commerce, we have happily so far kept aloof from their calamitous conflicts, by a steady observance of justice towards all, by much forbearance, and multiplied sacrifices. At length, however, all regard to the rights of others having been thrown aside, the belligerent powers have beset the highways of commercial intercourse with edicts, which, taken together, expose our commerce and mariners, under almost every destination, a prey to their fleets and armies. Each party, indeed, would admit our commerce with themselves, with the view of associating us in their war against the other. But we have wished war with neither. Under these circumstances were passed the laws of which you complain, by those delegated to exercise the power of legislation for you, with every sympathy of a common interest in exercising them faithfully.

"In reviewing these measures, therefore, we should advert to the difficulties out of which a choice was of necessity to be made. To have submitted our rightful commerce to prohibitions and tributary exactions from others would have been to surrender our independence. To resist them by arms was war, without consulting the state of things, or the choice of the nation. The alternative preferred by the Legislature, of suspending a commerce placed under such unexampled difficulties, besides saving to our citizens their property, and our mariners to their country, has the peculiar advantage of giving time to the belligerent nations to revise a conduct as contrary to their interests as it is to our rights.

"In the event of such peace, or suspension of hostilities, between the belligerent powers of Europe, or of such change in their measures affecting a neutral commerce, as may render that of the United States sufficiently safe, in the judgment of the President, he is authorised to suspend the embargo. But as peace or suspension of hostilities—no change affecting neutral commerce, is known to have taken place. The Orders of England and the Decrees of France, and Spain, existing at the date of those laws are still unrepealed, as far as we know. In Spain indeed, a contest for the Government appears to have arisen; but of its course or prospects we have no information on which prudence would undertake a hasty change in our policy, even were the authority of the Executive competent to such a decision.

"You desire, that in this defect of power, Congress may be specially convened. It is unnecessary to examine the evidence or the character of the facts which are supposed to dictate such a call; because you will be sensible on attention to dates, that the legal period of their meeting is as early as, in this extensive country, they could be convened by a special call.

"I should with great willingness have executed the wishes of the Inhabitants of the town of Boston, had peace or a repeal of the obnoxious Edicts, or other changes, produced the case in which alone the laws have given me that authority; and so many motives of justice and interest lead to such changes, that we ought continually to expect them. But while these Edicts remain the Legislature alone can prescribe the course to be pursued."

"Aug. 26, 1808." "THOS. JEFFERSON."

NEW-YORK, SEPT. 10.—The following letter to the New Hampshire Legislature, fully explains the views of the Administration; and taken in conjunction with the great expence Government is about to incur to equip armed vessels on the lakes, to enforce the embargo, it leaves not a doubt behind, that the embargo will be continued until "the people take it off," that is, until there is a change of rulers. Read the following letter, and see whether any other meaning can be attached to Mr. Jefferson's declaration.

TO THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"In the review, fellow-citizens, which, in your Address of the 14th of June, you have taken of the measures pursued since I have been charged with their direction, I read with great satisfaction and thankfulness the approbation you have bestowed on them; and feel it an ample reward for any service I may have been able to render.

"The present moment is certainly eventful, and one which particularly requires that the bond of confederation, connecting us as a nation should receive all the strength which unanimity between National Councils and the States Legislatures can give it.—The depredations committed on our vessels and property on the high seas, the violence to the persons of our citizens employed on that element, had long been the subject of remonstrance and complaint, when, instead of reparation, new declarations of wrong are issued, subjecting our navigation to general plunder. In this state of things, our first duty was to withdraw our sea-faring citizens and property from abroad, and to keep at home resources so valuable at all times, and so essential, if resort must ultimately be had to force. It gave us time too to make a last appeal to the reason and reputation of nations. In the mean while, I see with satisfaction that this measure of self-denial is approved and supported by the great body of our REAL Citizens—that they meet with cheerfulness the temporary privations it occasions, and are preparing with spirit to provide for themselves those comforts and conveniences of life, for which it would be unwise ever, more to recur to distant countries. How long this course may be preferable to a more serious appeal, must depend for decision on the wisdom of the Legislature, unless a return to established principles should remove the existing obstacles to a peaceable intercourse with foreign nations. In every event, fellow-citizens, my confidence is entire that your resolution to maintain our national independence and sovereignty will be as firm as it has been forbearing; and looking back on our history, I am assured by the past, that its future pages will present nothing unworthy of the former.

"I am happy that you approve the motives of my retirement. I shall carry into it ardent prayers for the welfare of my country, and the sincerest wish for that of yourselves personally.

"Aug. 2, 1808." "TH. JEFFERSON."

FROM THE BOSTON PAPERS.

REMARKS ON MR. JEFFERSON'S LETTER.

We would always wish to respect the communication of our first Magistrate, especially when it is couched in language so civil and soothing as the Letter from Mr. Jefferson to the town of Boston; but we must not be led by its fawning words into a ready credence of its contents. We have had enough of professions under this Administration, and would now wish to realize that our Rulers sympathise with the people in their distress, by seeing some effort to relieve it. Now, we know Mr. Jefferson has not taken one step towards our accommodation with England; and if he has done any thing more than send to the Court of the Continental Tyrant assurances of obedience, we know no relief is to be expected, for at the very moment the haughty Napoleon assures Mr. Livingston of his hearty approbation of all Mr. Jefferson had done to please him, he positively declares, he shall not relax, and orders our ships to be condemned. Not so with England. While suffering every insult from us, in non-intercourse and prohibitory laws, and the most abusive language from Government Papers, accompanied with threats of our vengeance, she makes every concession to us, even to a degree satisfactory to the patriotic Pinckney; yet all is in vain. No adjustment must take place, lest it offend Napoleon, and bring us into a war with France, as if we were not already at war, while her cruisers arrest, and her Courts condemn every American ship brought into her ports. Citizens of Boston, be not deceived; the danger to which our Commerce is exposed, as described by Mr. Jefferson, is of his own making. He keeps up a quarrel with England, to please his French Master, who issues his decree for this very purpose, and he then takes advantage of these dangers (brought on and continued by his own choice) to annihilate our Commerce. This is the grand object in view Mr. Jefferson says, "We have wished war with neither." Yet we know that he did try every means to work Congress up to a war with England, but could not succeed. We do know that this is now his object. He speaks in his Letter to New Hampshire, of preparing for his Last Appeal, and we have already some hints from Washington of his insidious plan to involve us in a war, which is to be brought forward in Congress, and which in time we shall fully expose.

We forbear to remark on the attempt of Mr. Jefferson to convince the people that all our commerce with each of the Belligerents is interdicted by the other, when it is notorious that Great Britain will not interrupt our immense trade with our enemies' colonies. But a volume of severe reply might be written to this letter, which is full of cold, hollow-hearted hypocrisy; but one point only have we time to touch upon: his apparent indifference to the fate of Spain. Astonishing boldness in the Ruler of a free people, after all his professions, to speak of the "contest for government in Spain" with such indifference. Does he think our feelings are buried with our servile acquiescence in his own arbitary measure? We may have lost feeling for ourselves, but we do feel for the Patriots of Spain.

Yes, the people of Boston, the cradle of American independence, do know and feel that the Patriots of Spain are engaged in a contest like ours—for national independence—though with much stronger grounds of union. There is no subtle point to be discussed, as here, about the right of taxation. The only alternative there, is submission to the dominion of a foreign despot, to the most odious and hateful tyranny, or a successful resistance and re-establishment of their own self-government. We also know there is no division among the people; every soul is animated with the holy fire of patriotism, and resolved to live free or die: we know that they have been hitherto successful, having possession of nearly all the Kingdom, and having possession also of all the Colonies, we know that with this whole people we might and ought, on every principle, to have free trade, and we should have it, if this cold-hearted Philosopher was sincerely willing to relieve our distresses. But it is too plain that he is not. He affects to doubt that a peace is made between Spain and her Colonies and Great Britain. Yet he knows that there is the most friendly intercourse, and that, with regard to those immense tracts of country, the English Orders do not prescribe neutral commerce, and, of consequence, we might have free and profitable trade, sufficient to take nearly all our produce; but he dares not to offend the tyrant Bonaparte, who calls the Spanish Rebels! he, too, probably does not wish to open any commerce to us again, and he therefore pretends there is no such peace as will authorise him to grant us permission to trade.

ALBANY, AUG. 24.—It is reported that the Federalists intend to impeach Mr. Jefferson, at the meeting of the Congress.

Among the hostile preparations against England are several flotillas, ordered to be constructed for the American Government on the Lakes on the frontier of Canada. The partisans of Mr. Jefferson pretend, however, that these armaments are made against smugglers, Mr. J. intending the embargo as a permanent measure, until a peace in Europe. But should not hostilities cease soon on the other side of the Atlantic, a civil war will undoubtedly be the consequence in this country, where the people are discontented and divided, and the Government despicable and despised.

The Democrats now quarrelling among themselves about the election of the next President, make daily disclosures, proving here, as in Europe, the infamy and intrigue of all Democratic Factions, who, under the pretension of patriotism, are the most guilty, as well as the most disgusting of egotists. Some hopes are entertained, that the people will open their eyes, in feeling their humiliating misery (entirely the work of Democrats), and elect a Federal Ruler.

P. S.—It is now here a known fact, that the American Messenger to England, in the Osage, carried no message at all; Mr. Jefferson wisely expecting, that his embargo, Mr. Rose's return, and Bonaparte's wrath, would engage the British Ministers to offer on their knees, an acceptance of all his former, and modest, and moderate demands.

WEST INDIES.

BRIDGE TOWN, BARBADOES, AUG. 30.—As we all along have had too much reason to apprehend, an attempt has been at length made from Guadaloupe to surprise the garrison at Marigalante, and retake the Island. On the 23d instant, a party of 250 men, under Colonel Camphriel, of the 66th regiment of French infantry, effected a landing near Grand Bourg, and proceeded to the attack of it; but before their approach to the battery, Lieutenant Welch, of his Majesty's ship Circe, having thrown in a reinforcement of twenty or thirty seamen, which he landed at the moment of discovering the enemy, they were unexpectedly received, on attempting to assault the works, with such spirit, as instantly compelled them to give way, and after a short skirmish, retreated with the loss of one captain and six men killed, and two made prisoners. Three or four marines, and one or two seamen, were killed on our part; but the enemy lost all his boats, amounting to seventeen, which had brought the troops from Gaudaloupe, and was retired into the interior of the Island, when the accounts were dispatched from Marigalante. Although there has hitherto been no military co-operation in the defence and garrisoning of Marigalante (the responsibility of the capture and retention of the island resting exclusively with our naval Commander), Lieut.-General Beckwith, on the information of the enemy's attempt upon it being received here on Saturday afternoon, dispatched the same evening to its relief, a small expedition under Lieut.-Colonel Blackwell, of the first West India Regiment, which was embarked with the greatest promptitude on board his Majesty's ship Intrepid, and has in all probability before this expelled the enemy, and restored the security of the Island.

IRELAND.

It is mentioned as the intention of the Post-Masters General, countenanced by Government; and in consequence of representations from the Merchants of Belfast, Limerick, Waterford, &c. to appoint five additional Holyhead packet-boats, in order to forward a more prompt intercourse between the interior of this country and England, the Captains to be placed in a similar situation as to pay, and their vessels under the same regulations and [illegible] as those of the existing establishment. This [illegible] the proposed execution, will be attended [illegible] advantages to the inhabitants of those [illegible] whose letters, though they should [illegible] the morning at the General Post-Office [illegible] delivance of the Dublin communications [illegible] delay of twelve or fourteen hours; [illegible] by the augmentation of vessels, they [illegible] dispatched on their arrival, and correspondent regulations adopted at the other side, various injurious consequences to men of business must be obviated; passengers also being too numerous as not to admit their accommodation with the expedition that their exigent circumstances may require; those inconveniencies would likewise be removed.

SCOTLAND.

FRASERBURGH, OCT. 11.—Saturday last, during the tremendous gale from North, the sloop Isabella, of Kelchearty, Captain Yule, coal laden, was driven ashore in the bay of Fraserburgh. As soon as the vessel struck, the life-boat was hurried to the beach in an instant by the crowd; and although the first instance of her being used, she was, without hesitation, manned by several stout young men, under the direction of Capt. Alex. Dalrymple and Capt. Torrie, and launched into the enraged elements. At this time the sea was running mountains high, and making a fair passage over the vessel; and the wind continuing more boisterous, if possible, the life-boat was driven so much to leeward, that she could render the crew no assistance, nor were the men able to pull her up against the tempestuous waves: the crew of the life-boat were not, however, to be discouraged by this—they landed, and, with the assistance of those on shore, the boat was carried to the windward, and again launched, but was a second time blown to leeward. Many of the crew being now exhausted with fatigue, their places were supplied by volunteers from the beach, and the life-boat again carried by the strength of men to windward, and launched. She now fortunately gained the ship, and, to the inexpressible joy of those present, succeeded in relieving from their cold and perilous situation, Captain Yule and his crew.

ABERDEEN, OCT. 15.—Saturday last we experienced a very hard gale from the northward, accompanied for some hours with heavy rain. The gale commenced between four and five o'clock in the morning, and continued with great violence during that day and great part of the following night, veering from N. N. E. to N. and N. W. The effects at sea, we regret to state, have been very disastrous, and great losses and damage of shipping have happened on different parts of the coast. The sloop Neptune, of and for this place from Milton, with apples, after losing part of her sails, went ashore in Lunan Bay, near Montrose; crew saved, and the vessel expected to be got off without much damage, or loss of the cargo. The schooner Bée, of this place, for Newburgh, with lime, caught fire by the sea breaking over her, and when near the Tod-head was driven to Berwick, where she was put ashore and totally wrecked, crew saved. A sloop, it is confidently reported, foundered off Arbroath in the gale, and all the crew perished. The Alert, Johnson, of and for this place from Sunderland, after being off the Tod-head, was driven to the Southward, and got into Sunderland, with the loss of sails, boats, &c. besides other damage: a seaman, of the name of William[illegible], was unfortunately washed overboard from the helm and drowned, leaving a wife and destitute young family of four or five children to lament this loss.

PROVINCIALS.

BRIGHTON, OCT. 17.—The pleasures that were enjoyed at at the Castle Rooms, Thursday evening, is still the current topic of fashionable conversation. The number of elegant individuals there exceeded considerably five hundred; an assemblage, excepting on particular occasions, the Prince's Birth-day balls, for instance, greater than ever was known before. The company began to assemble soon after seven o'clock, and before nine o'clock the ball-room was crowded, all the rank and beauty of this place being there.—The Ladies were very splendidly dressed, with a profusion of diamonds, and for the first time, here we believe, white was not the most predominating costume of the Belles. Blue and green sarsnets were in abundance, more so than white, though the latter still found many admirers.

MARGATE, OCTOBER 16.

DEAR SIR—I came down here a few days ago in a packet, for the sake of clarifying myself by the rolling of the sea, nice an emetic; and after fifteen hours sailing, we arrived at Margate. The voyage was agreeable—passengers few. We were a night on the water; and when we had landed, and walked terations in the town as to the buildings, save a small row of houses called Cottage Place, on the skirts of the town, towards St. Peter's, and a small cottage called Weippert's Cottage, which belongs to Mr. Weippert the celebrated performer on the harp; and a row of houses at Westbrook. The Formian villa of Lord Holland at Kingsgate, is undergoing a modernisation; and is intended to form four commodious houses. The premises are now in the possession of a gentleman in London, who is new-organizing it for use, and modern purchasers have not that violent goût for antique ornamental building which the founder of the ancient reliquies, built in the year 1761, had. There are still many beautiful faces here, and many respectable families who have taken houses until Christmas. the libraries, balls, and theatre, are as you may suppose, but thinly attended.

A potatoe was lately taken up by Mr. John Crosthwaite, at Braithwaite, near Keswick, which measured 13 inches and a half in length, and 28 inches in circumference. It is intended to cut it into 35 plants next year; and the produce will be noticed.

There is now living at the Higher Ferry, near Chester, a widow lady, the daughter of a Welsh 'Squire, that lived at Bagilt, aged 89, who can read, thread a needle, and knit stockings, without the help of glasses. She generally walks two or three times a week to Chester; her other faculties are as strong and perfect as a person of twenty. There is also in the same house a favourite cat, which never quitted the room of the late Mr. Jones, during his four weeks sickness, and upon his decease quitted the habitation entirely for a month. It was with the utmost difficulty she was enticed to settle in the house afterwards. Mr. Jones died twelve months ago, at the advanced age of 74.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

On Friday a flag of truce, from Boulogne, arrived in the Downs, with a Russian and French Officer on board. The former immediately landed, and set out for London, where he arrived that night about eleven o'clock. He was conducted immediately to Mr. CANNING'S house, in Bruton-street. The following is a letter from a Deal Correspondent upon this subject:—

"DEAL, Oct. 21.

"A Flag of Truce arrived in the Downs this morning from France. She came out of Boulogne last night at ten o'clock, and after a boisterous passage, arrived in the Downs about eight o'clock this morning. Two messengers have since been landed from her; one a Russian Officer, the other French, and after waiting on the Port Admiral, the Russian courier set out about eleven o'clock in a post-chaise and four for London, accompanied by the Admiral's Lieutenant. The French Officer was not permitted to go, and has since been put on board the Princess of Orange, in the Downs, till the pleasure of our Ministers be known. It is, however, stated, that this was done by order of Lords HAWKESBURY and CASTLEREAGH, who are both at Walmer Castle, and were consulted on the circumstance previous to their landing.

"The vessel which brought them over is put under charge of the Clyde frigate, Commodore Owen; and it is supposed, is to wait to convey her passengers back again to France, or, at least, the decision of our Government to the dispatches. She is a French victualling lugger, marked No. 1, on her bow."

These Officers are the bearers of dispatches of a pacific nature from the Emperor ALEXANDER and BONAPARTE, who are at present at Erfurth. It was not very difficult to anticipate an offer of this kind. As often as the Tyrant projected some profound scheme of mischief, he always endeavoured to palliate it, by his proposing a negotiation on terms, which he knew were inadmissible. Of the dangerous and comprehensive villainy of the man we cannot have a more satisfactory idea, than his effrontery in proposing a reconciliation with a people, whom he so inveterately abhors. However, let us take him at his word, and examine the sincerity of his proposals. If he feels the slightest inclination to give peace to a suffering world, he can have no objection to subscribe to such conditions, as will ensure our security, as well as that of our Allies. Let us now ask every impartial Englishman, whose mind is unbiassed by party interest, and who has no other object in view than the independence, as well as reputation of his country, what terms he should consider as sufficient to guarantee national security and honour.—Let him speak without prejudice, and fully impressed with the decisive importance of the subject he is going to determine on; let him sacrifice, also, to this momentous object every sentiment of abhorrence against the man who has committed so many atrocities against the States who confided most in his promises and his treaties.—Let him then propose those conditions coolly and deliberately; and he would say, and so should we, that in order to secure the inestimable blessings of peace on a permanent footing, and on one reciprocally advantageous, it is, in the first place, necessary that the French soldiers quit immediately Spain; that Joseph BONAPARTE renounce his usurped title to the Crown of that country, and that King FERDINAND be restored to his subjects. 2dly, That MURAT should abandon Naples to the lawful Sovereign. 3dly, That the ELECTOR of HESSE CASSEL, the PRINCE of ORANGE, the DUKE of BRUNSWICK, and the KING of PRUSSIA, should be put in re-possession of their former dominions. 4thly, That Finland should be restored to the gallant KING of SWEDEN. And, lastly, we insist on the restitution of Hanover.—We have a right, and a very justifiable one, to insist on much more; however, we are willing to renounce those pretensions, in order to give peace to the nations who are now groaning under the scourge of a ruthless Tyrant. But is there any man in this country insane enough to believe the insolent, haughty Upstart has any other object in this farce of sending messengers, than to deceive ALEXANDER; or, in concert with that unfortunate Monarch, to endeavour to sanction the pretended necessity of some nefarious project he is about to embark in? We admire the conduct and moderation of our Government in allowing those men to land. They acted with wisdom in suppressing their indignation, and condescending to read the contents of the dispatches. Had they sent them back unopened, there is not an honest, or an honorable man in the country who would have blamed them. It is a folly to speculate on the subject. Just Heavens! When we recollect the missions and promises of Marshal BESSIERES to KING FERDINAND, we cannot conceive how we had the resolution to stain our columns with any serious reflections relative to the sincerity of a man whose whole life is one tissue of falsehood, treachery, deception, and atrocity. Peace and reconciliation with that man!—We might as well enter into a treaty of amity with the hungry tyger. Never will he forgive us our virtue, our commerce, our freedom. It is madness to negotiate, or to answer the dispatches. The injury that will ensue from such imprudence is incalculable. The Spaniards will be tortured with suspicion if another messenger is allowed to land on our shores. Why did we make a difference between a Russian and French Messenger? If Alexander had been sincere in his overtures he would have made them from his capital, unclogged by French influence; but in making them from Erfurth, he has no other object in view than to insult our Government, by confessing his perfect acquiescence in the projects of the Enemy. That this circumstance has been noticed by no other Paper is surprising. Bonaparte vaunted, before his departure from Paris, the friendship subsisting between him and Alexander; and, in order to let this country know that what he advanced was perfectly true, he requests that infatuated Sovereign to send a messenger as the bearer of pacific dispatches. The moment we heard of the arrival of the Messengers we had not a doubt relative to the object they were sent for; which was no other than an insolent, triumphant display of the dependence of Russia; a wish to turn aside the attention of the Continent from the disgraces he suffers in Spain, and a desire to excite some jealousy between that country and this. He knows very well we will not, nor cannot, listen to his overtures; but he hopes, if we should have the folly to receive more of his dispatches to keep Austria in suspense, and, perhaps, compel her to submit to some ignominious conditions.

Intelligence was received on Friday, by the Iris frigate, from Spain. It proves the falsehood of a report, which was very prevalent, a few days ago, of an engagement having been fought on the 1st inst.; in which the Spaniards were said to have sustained a very considerable loss. The positions of the two armies are such, however, that we may expect from one day to another, news of the highest importance. The following letter from a British Officer who accompanies the army of General Blake, and has consequently every means of obtaining authentic information, will be read with interest. It contains a very circumstantial account of the positions and relative strength of the French and Spanish armies. The letter is as follows:

"TRIAS, SEPT. 27, 1808."

"As a courier is just setting out, I take the opportunity to inform you, that every thing goes on here to the utmost of our wishes. The army of Castanos is at Levia. A few days will bring the enemy to a general action, the result of which cannot be doubtful. Great discontents prevail among the enemy; and they also labour under a scarcity of provisions. The army gives a little disquiet to the right; we shall close them to-morrow. I yesterday went with General Blake, close to the advanced posts in order to recognoitre from a hill near Ona. We plainly saw all the line and position in Miranda and its vicinity. Blake sees clear.

"The order of the enemy seems to be thus, (to use the words of a Lieutenant Colonel, who deserted from the French at Vittoria): Au quel elle s'est borne en appuyant les epaules de son centre au Fort de Pampelune, pour proteger ses defiles dans le cas que l'on ne puisse se tenir sur L'Ebro.—The right is appuye on the defile of Pancorbo, its centre being at Miranda del Ebro, the head-quarters of the soi-disant King. It lies along the Ebro to Logrono, the head quarters of the centre. The left keeps up the communication appuye on the little mountain of Lade, which is the head quarters of Marshal Moncey. His corps he says, is destined to keep in check Logrono, and to observe the Spanish corps at Calliabora and Tudela, which threatens he says, to cut off the communication between the left and the centre of the French army.

"This French Officer adds, that there are in left of our side 10,000 men:—In centre, 18,000:—In right, 15,000; 60 pieces of field artillery—nor does he diminish. According to this statement, we are three times stronger than the enemy. Caution, indeed, is to be observed in giving credit to the statement of a Frenchman.

—Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

Now let me give you the amount of the Spanish force:—

	Cavalry.	Infantry.
Castano's Army	2,500	26,000
Blake's ditto	250	32,000
Cuesta's	1,500	10,000
Llamas's	800	20,000
Palafox's	500	20,000

"In Asturias here are 16,000 men; besides armies of reserve are forming in all the provinces to supply the respective ones.—After this enumeration of our forces, can any fears be felt for the result of the first general action."

According to this letter, the Spanish force, already in the field, amounts to 109,000 men. If we add to these the 13,000 British troops advancing under Sir DAVID BAIRD, and the 9,500 Spaniards, who escaped from the Baltic under the Marquis de ROMANA, Spain will have an army of 131,000 infantry, together with 6000 cavalry. To this formidable army, the enemy can oppose not more than 43,000 men, and 60 pieces of artillery. This is the statement, which may be relied on as correct. We have every reason to suppose, that the result of the expected engagement, will be favourable to the party which has innocence and justice on its side. One of the principal objects, which General BLAKE has in view, is said to be the recapture of Bilboa; should he succeed, it will require all the skill of Marshal NEY, who commands the French army in Spain, to secure the retreat of the enemy. It is now known that the French force which re-captured Bilboa, amounted to nearly 10,000 infantry and 1,100 cavalry. The attack was made very unexpectedly in the morning of the 26th September, and filled the city with consternation; as the inhabitants were still impressed with the atrocities the enemy had committed in their last visit. The Spanish garrison, which did not amount to more than 5,000 men, under the command of the Marquis of Portazgo, not being strong enough to resist the French column, retired, in the greatest order, with the whole of their baggage and artillery, in the presence of the enemy, who did not dare to make the slightest attempt to molest their retreat. As they were too far in advance to receive timely succours from General Blake's army, they fell back on Valmaseda, a strong post in the mountains, which they effected in the most masterly manner. The French were commanded on this occasion by Marshal Bessieres. It is said that Joseph Bonaparte arrived in Bilboa about the beginning of this month.

The obstinate impolicy of Mr. Jefferson, in continuing the Embargo, in such direct opposition to the interest and wishes of the Americans, would afford ample matter for speculation as to the object he proposes from so desperate a measure, were his acquiescence in the projects of the Usurper against the prosperity of Great Britain, and his rooted antipathy to this country, not sufficiently known. It is this partiality to France, and enmity to this country, which first suggested to him a measure, whose object was to ruin our commerce, and whose consequences, in conformity to the principles of eternal justice, have been destructive only to those, whose object was mischief. Knowing the President's sentiments, we are, certainly, not astonished at the answer he returned to the Petition of the Citizens of Boston. This focus, or, more properly speaking, the cradle, of the insurrection against the mother-country, smarting under the mad policy of Jefferson and his Antifederalists, thought, by the way of petition and remonstrance, to prevail on their Chief Magistrate to sacrifice his animosity to England to the welfare of America. But neither remonstrances nor petitions, nor the sufferings of his countrymen, could soften his Anti-British heart; and the friendship and approbation of a man, whom the rest of the universe unanimously execrate, seem to outweigh, in the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, the prosperity of the United States, and the indignation of his cotemporaries. In order to form a just opinion of this republican President, it is only necessary to read over his observations on the generous contest the Spaniards are so successfully engaged in against their execrable invaders. According to this worthy Magistrate, it is no more than a factious struggle between two parties in that country, contending for power. This free enunciation of Mr. Jefferson's sentiments on so momentous a subject, which, he could not be ignorant, fixes irrevocably the happiness or misery, the slavery or independence, of eleven millions of Spaniards, and perhaps of Europe, will establish his reputation in the judgment of honest men. However, let him enjoy the advantages of his Embargo; let him exult in the misery and ruin it infallibly brings on Old England; let him anticipate, with rapturous pleasure, the prostration of this country, imploring, on its knees, mercy and trade; let him congratulate his Corsican friend on the near prospect of our renouncing our maritime rights, and submitting to any other degrading restrictions they may both think proper to impose:—we should not disturb him in the enjoyment of such extatic sensations; but wait, with patient resignation, till he is pleased to open the American harbours to our impatient and ruined merchants.

The Electors of Westminster assembled on Thursday last, in Westminster Hall, for the purpose of Petitioning His Majesty, that an inquiry should be instituted relative to the Portuguese Convention. When we consider how important a part of our freedom consists in the right of petitioning, we cannot sufficiently express the pleasure we feel, that no ill-advised censure is sufficient to deter the people of this country from the exercise of it. Any servant of the Crown, who should endeavour to impress on His Majesty's mind any repugnance to an act so strongly sanctioned by the Constitution, is as hostile to the real interests of the Sovereign, as he is to those of the people. It is unnecessary to repeat here what has been a thousand times adverted to, that we are indebted for the inestimable blessing of having a Sovereign of the House of Brunswick seated on the English Throne, to the tenacious adherence of our ancestors to the exercise of their rights. Had they been lukewarm, or pusillanimous in this respect, their children would now groan under the bigotted despotism of a Stewart. Any person, therefore, who should advise the Monarch to censure the exercise of a constitutional right, contributes, as much as lies in his power, to effect a schism between the King and his People.

Sir Hew Dalrymple arrived in town on Tuesday evening, accompanied by Major Dalrymple, his son, who carried out his order of recal, and his Aides-de-Camp, Captains Gibbons and Fanshawe.

The Niobe, with Sir William Scott, also arrived at Portsmouth on Tuesday evening. Both vessels sailed at the same time from the Tagus.

The arrival of Sir Hew Dalrymple will afford satisfaction to every one who felt both abashed and indignant at the issue of the Campaign in Portugal. We are informed that he has expressed the highest indignation at the efforts made by the friends of another officer to save the reputation of the latter at his expence, and that he demands peremptorily a court-martial. We have no antipathy to either of the persons implicated; but we are convinced of the injustice, as well as the illiberality, of criminating one in order to palliate the conduct of the other. This Officer, we know, is not supported by the powerful interest the other can command; and this very circumstance will be sufficient inducement to a British Public, to suspend their judgment, till the promised inquiry proves to whom criminality is to be attached.

We have received the following Letter from Portsmouth dated, Oct. 18.—

"The Prince of Wales has been here since Friday, superintending the embarkation of the 10th Light Dragoons; and as each division has arrived, his Royal Highness has gone with them to the Dock-yard. They are now all on board, and it is said that his Royal Highness will leave us to-morrow. The Prince is quite adored by his regiment; and some of the men, as they went on board, could not refrain expressing aloud their attachment. In taking leave of the Officers, his Royal Highness actually burst into tears, and expressed in the strongest manner his regret at not being able to accompany them; but he said,—"I give my sword to Brigadier-General Slade, who will be at your head, and under whose command I know you will like to go, as much as I do that you should." It appears that General Slade entered the Prince's regiment as a Cornet, and remained in it near seventeen years; it is therefore very natural they should like to go out under his command.

The Prince left Portsmouth on Wednesday morning, when the works were manned for him, and the road, for upwards of four miles, and till he passed the out-works, was lined with troops, who saluted as he passed them. The short residence of the Prince at Portsmouth endeared him to the soldiers and sailors: perhaps no act of his life ever shewed him in a more amiable view, or so entirely won the hearts of the army, as his kind, condescending, and affectionate conduct to his own regiment, when they embarked for a foreign country to meet the enemy.

We grieve to say, that the various accounts received yesterday from the Coast, are very disastrous, owing to the gale of wind the night before last. A large fleet of transports were very much damaged off Dover, on their passage to Portsmouth. One of them foundered, and several sail are driven on the Coast of France. Report says twenty. Several ships have lost anchors and cables.

SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY'S DEFENCE.

This General has circulated among a few select friends a statement, authenticated by his own signature, detailing the late Campaign in Portugal.

He assumes the motto of Suum cuique! and solemnly repeats the declaration, so frequently made by his friends, that he had no participation whatever, directly or indirectly, in the councils which led to the late Convention.

After the battle of Vimiera had crowned our brave troops with victory, Sir Arthur suggested to those sent to take the command, that it would be highly judicious to take up an advanced position with the whole British army—and he accordingly pointed out the most eligible locality for that purpose. This suggestion was not acted upon, and, in three hours, the French troops, with a rapidity of movement peculiar to themselves, had occupied the point in question!—The description given of this position states it to have been of such a commanding nature, that an advantageous attack could have been made from it at any moment, upon the French army.

On the subject of Sir Arthur's signature appearing to the original Convention, he remarks that he was ordered to subscribe his name by his superiors in command; and that his refusal would have been a breach of the articles of war. The disinclination on the part of his superiors to follow up his suggestions, excited apprehensions in Sir A. Wellesley's mind for the fate of the contest. Upon the occasion of the Convention being presented to him for signature, he did solemnly protest against it, in the name of the British army, which he had a few hours before led on to victory; he now repeats this protest to his friends, and boldly challenges his enemies, to prove his assent or participation in the terms granted to Junot.

The terms of the Convention, however, in his opinion, do not seem to warrant the animadversions so copiously bestowed upon it by the public feeling. He ascribes to party spirit the abuse bestowed upon those who signed it, and upon himself in particular. In reply to what has been advanced against setting Junot and his army at liberty to march against Spain, Sir Arthur observes, that we had, at the same instant, a much more numerous and better appointed army set at liberty ready to act in Spain at a moment's notice, and without having to watch over a numerous body of prisoners of war in Portugal. He justifies the terms granted to Junot with respect to landing his troops in France, upon the principles of magnanimity, and calls in the law of nations in support of his arguments.

He proceeds to state, that 38,000 men, with a well-appointed battering train, would have been requisite to have bombarded Lisbon with success, and that the army so employed would have lost twice as many men as the besieged, besides the massacre to which the inhabitants would have been exposed.

An allusion is made by Sir Arthur Wellesley, in the conclusion of his address, to a newly-invented method of attacking our enemies, which was first tried in Portugal with the most wonderful effects. This consists, we believe, in a new military projectile, invented by Colonel Shrapnel, and hence called the "Shrapnel bombs." They have been alluded to in several private letters from Portugal.

MEETINGS TO ADDRESS HIS MAJESTY

RELATIVE TO THE LATE DISGRACEFUL CONVENTION IN PORTUGAL.

Thursday a Meeting was convened in Westminster Hall, to consider of an Address to His Majesty, to promote a full investigation of the causes which led to the late Convention in Portugal. A platform was erected for the Speakers, and at one o'clock Mr. Sheridan entered the Hall amidst loud shouts of applause. He was followed by A. Morris, Esq. the High Bailiff, the Hon. Mr. Mathew, Mr. Wishart, of Coventry-street, Major Cartwright, Messrs. Thompson, West, Mills, Roberts, Gibbons, Sowe, Martin, Clarkson, Jenkinson, Brooks, Pace, Puller, and other public characters. The business commenced by the High Bailiff reading the requisition signed by the inhabitants, after which he stated the purport of the meeting.

Mr. T. Wishart then proceeded to move an Address and Resolutions, which he prefaced by a speech to the following purport:—

GENTLEMEN—I trust there is no person at this Meeting but holds it to be the bounden duty, as well as the rights and privilege of the people, legally assembled, when events have occurred by which well-grounded hopes of compleat success have been blasted, or the high honour and distinguished character of the nation has been tarnished, to address his Majesty, that a full and efficient inquiry should be made into the causes of the disaster, that those implicated in it, however high their situation, if found guilty, after a fair trial, might be brought to speedy disgrace and punishment. Impressed with the idea that the late Convention in Portugal was a transaction at once mysterious and disgraceful, I joined several of our Fellow-Citizens in signing the requisition to the High Bailiff, for the purpose of your being assembled here to take into your serious consideration that transaction in all its points and bearings, that, after mature consideration, you may adopt such measures and pass such resolutions as the imperious necessity of the case may require.—Mr Wishart entered into a review of the events which led to the Convention, paid many deserved compliments to the troops employed, and then observed—the moment was auspicious for our ancient and faithful Ally, auspicious for all Europe, and our Ministry ordered large bodies of troops, originally intended for other services, to be sent to Lisbon. Whether any unnecessary delay took place in their sailing, or whether a more proper destination might not have been thought of, it is not our intention now to inquire; that may form a subject of serious discussion in another Assembly, which, unfortunately, is not now sitting. After a delay of some time, perhaps occasioned by petty jealousies and disputes for patronage, our Ministry, by a fatality unaccountable, appointed to the command of this gallant army a General totally unknown to military fame. I am not inclined to dispute that he might have done very well as General of a district in peaceable or quiet times; but you will agree with me, that it requires very different ingredients to form a parade and a fighting General. Indeed, he with great candour soon informed his employers, that he was totally unfit for the appointment they had given him, and entirely ignorant of the concerns they had entrusted to him.—Whether the failure arises from the inabilities of the General, whether from the proper instructions that were given, or whether from want of cavalry, battering cannon, and proper stores, is immaterial; in any of these cases a full and effective inquiry is necessary. Gentlemen, the Citizens of London have presented an Address to His Majesty on this subject; it is couched in warm, but certainly constitutional language. But as to the Answer to this Address, as a warm well-wisher to the House of Hanover, I read it with regret and surprize. No friend of that Illustrious Family but must read it with sorrow; to their enemies if enemies they have, it must be matter of triumph and gratulation. Many here present have lived in other times; the late King's Ministers did not dare to advise him to return such answers on the unfortunate miscarriage at Minorca, by Admiral Byng.—George the Second participated in the feelings of his People, when his son William, Duke of Cumberland, made the Convention of Closter Severn, which reflected disgrace on the country, he would not see him on his return from Germany; and though his victory at the battle of Cullodon had finally settled the Crown on the heads of his family, he was dismissed from all military employments. I doubt not that he felt as a Father, but he acted as a King. Perhaps our Statesmen thought that this Answer would prevent future Addresses on the same subject, or strangle them in their birth, or that many might be deterred from attending the Meetings for fear of incurring the Royal displeasure. I am happy to see, from your numerous attendance, that it has failed in this respect; and I trust that this subject, aided by this Answer, will rouse the freeholders and inhabitants in all parts of the kingdom to come forward, to inform His Majesty of their sentiments. I shall therefore beg leave to submit to your attention several Resolutions on the subject, and which I hope will meet with your approbation.

Mr. Finnerty complained that the Resolutions about to be moved were inadequate to answer the end proposed. The only way to produce a satisfactory investigation, was to address His Majesty to convene Parliament. A Court of Inquiry could only discover military misconduct, and as it was probable that Ministers might be implicated in this disgraceful Convention, a Military Tribunal was incompetent to answer the end of ju-tice. He then suggested several Resolutions relative to the necessity of Parliamentary Reform.

Mr. Sheridan came forward amidst loud applause, and said, that he would not at present make any observations on the conduct of Ministers, as far as they might be supposed to be implicated in the Convention of Cintra, since he was confident that their conduct would become the subject of investigation in Parliament, where he should have an opportunity of delivering his sentiments on that subject, which he should therefore not dilate upon now. He must object, however, to the present resolution, inasmuch as it had the appearance of throwing a stigma on the Address of the City of London, by re-echoing that reply of the King, which it was perfectly constitutional to consider as coming from Ministers, and not from his Majesty. Approving, therefore, as he did, of the Address from the City, he could not countenance any Resolution which might be contrued as a censure upon it. On the present most respectable Meeting of the Inhabitants of Westminster, he certainly regretted as much as any man the absence of their worthy Representative, Sir Francis Burdett; but he was perfectly convinced that his absence was owing to a cause that was most honourable to his feelings, however much regretted by himself, and those who heard him. And he must say, for his own part, that, looking at the conduct of the worthy Baronet in the last Session of Parliament, he had never heard him utter one word, or lay down one principle in which he did not coincide, and in support of which he should not be proud to stand by him. (Loud Applause.) An Honourable Gentleman on his right had been pleased to pass upon him (Mr. Sheridan) a panegyric which he was conscious was far beyond his deserts; but this he would say, and he trusted that his past conduct would bear him out in doing so, that the inhabitants of Westminster at present listened to a man whose price was not upon earth, that could induce him to desert the cause of the people. (Applause.)—Something had been said too as to the necessity of a Parliamentary Reform, in order to make an Address of this kind perfectly efficient. Whenever any motion to that effect was brought forward, it should meet with his warm support; but the Gentleman had gone farther, and contended, that until there was a Reform in Parliament, there could be no honest Minister in this country. But this he thought was going rather too far, for though he still looked forward to see the day when a Parliamentary Reform could be effected, yet he firmly believed it never could be accomplished but by an honest and upright Minister. To be convinced of this, it was only necessary to look at the Abolition of the Slave Trade. That measure had for many years all Mr. Pitt's eloquence in its support, and the voice of all the saints and hypocrites in the House (A Laugh), and yet it could not be carried. But when that truly honest Minister, Mr. Fox, succeeded, then the measure was carried by a great majority; and he therefore believed, that an honest Ministry were essential to a Reform in Parliament. That was not, however, properly the subject at present under consideration; we were met to assert our undoubted right to Address his Majesty on the subject of a measure, which, to say the least of it, had disappointed the hopes and expectations of the whole nation, and to demand an enquiry into the causes of this disappointment. The City of London, in his opinion, had done nothing but what they were entitled to do. They thought the Convention disgraceful, and demanded an enquiry, and though the answer of his Majesty, which he had a right to consider as the answer of Ministers, said that they had no occasion to be reminded of their duty, yet he trusted that the people of Westminster, and of every other part of the kingdom, would use their own discretion on that point, and, far from trusting implicitly to Ministers, would express those feelings of disappointment and regret, which the Convention had universally excited. He did agree that there was perhaps no radical remedy but a Reform in Parliament, but still the sentiments of Parliament, constituted even as it was, must have great weight; and whenever the subject was brought forward there, in as far as Ministers were implicated, he trusted that he should not be found to shrink from his duty.

Three Resolutions were then put by Mr. Clarkson, which stated the facts of the battles in Portugal, and the Convention, as they appeared in the London Gazette, and also expressed the sense of the Meeting, that this extraordinary Convention had destroyed the hopes of the country.

On the fourth Resolution being read, which merely re-echoed the declaration of his Majesty, "that it was not consistent with the principles of British justice, that any man should be condemned unheard."

It was then agreed that the 4th Resolution should be withdrawn, as not being likely to meet with unanimous approbation.

Mr. Power then came forward, and dwelt, with considerable energy and effect, on the importance of a parliamentary enquiry being instituted, as speedily as possible, into an affair which uninvestigated and unpunished, must degrade the national character in our own eyes, and in those of Europe at large.

Mr. Sheridan pledged himself that, whenever an enquiry was moved in Parliament, it should meet with his warm support: and, instead of the resolution which was now withdrawn, he should move another, expressive of the wishes of the people of Westminster, that Parliament should be forthwith assembled, in order to give opportunity for an immediate enquiry.

A resolution to this effect was then read, and unanimously agreed to.

The additional Resolutions proposed by Mr. Finnerty were then read in a most audible manner by Mr. Puller, and submitted to the approbation of the Meeting.

This brought Mr. Wishart again forward, who observed, that though he concurred in most of the sentiments stated, yet this did not seem a proper occasion for adopting them. Whenever the subject of Parliamentary Reform was regularly brought forward in a Meeting of this kind, it should meet with all the support which he could give it: but the declared object of the present Meeting was to address his Majesty on the Convention, in Portugal, and he could not agree that another subject should be brought in by a side-wind. Such an example would furnish a reason to the supporters of Ministry for opposing Meetings of this kind in other parts of the country; they would say, that the real object was very different from the apparent one. For his part, he was determined not to look one way and draw another.

The additional Resolutions not seeming to meet with general approbation, were withdrawn and the following Address to his Majesty was then read:—

TO THE KINGS MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY,

We your Majesty's loyal Subjects, the Inhabitants of the City and Liberty of Westminster, beg leave to approach your Majesty and to express our firm persuasion, that the late Convention, agreed to by your Majesty's Commanders in Portugal, no less afflicted your Majesty than disappointed the hopes and expectations of your Majesty's faithful people.

That your petitioners were filled with admiration and joy at the valor and success of your Majesty's forces in Portugal, as detailed in the Extraordinary Gazette published on the second day of September last.

That your Petitioners are concerned to observe, that at that time your Majesty's Commanders had signed Preliminaries for a convention, by which the British Nation engaged to carry to France, the whole of the French Army, with their Baggage, Artillery, and Ammunition; that they were not to be considered Prisoners of War, but were allowed to act, immediately on their return to France, in any place where their services should be required by your Majesty's Implacable Enemy.

We, therefore, humbly beseech your Majesty to direct a full and effective Inquiry to be made into all the circumstances which led to the Conclusion of a Convention, so inconsistent with the brilliant Achievement of your Armies, on the seventeenth and twenty-first of August, that the true causes thereof may be made manifest to your Majesty's faithful and affectionate People; and that your Majesty will be graciously pleased forthwith to assemble your Parliament, that such Inquiry may be instituted, as to them in their wisdom shall seem expedient.

The motion was put, that this Address be agreed to, which was carried unanimously.

The Address was appointed to be presented to his Majesty by Sir F. Burdett, Mr. Sheridan, and the High Bailiff.

The thanks of the Meeting were then voted to Arthur Morris, Esq. the High Bailiff of Westminster, for his honourable and impartial conduct on the occasion.

The Meeting was very numerous, there being at least 5000 people in the Hall, and the business upon the whole was conducted within great decorum.

READING (BERKS), OCT. 18.—Pursuant to a requisition signed by a number of the Freeholders of this County, and an order issued in consequence thereof by the High Sheriff, a most numerous and respectable Meeting of the Nobility, Clergy, and Freeholders, was this day held in the Town-hall, for the purpose of taking into their consideration the terms of the late Convention in Portugal, which has been acceded to by the British General Officers commanding in that country, and for expressing to His Majesty their sentiments on the occasion. After the usual form of opening the Court, it was moved and seconded, "That an humble and dutiful Address be presented to His Majesty, praying that he may be graciously pleased to order that an Inquiry should be instituted with respect to the cause of the late disgraceful Convention in Portugal; and also beseeching His Majesty that he may be graciously pleased to order that such steps may be taken as will insure the punishment of the guilty person or persons in that disgraceful transaction, however high his rank in society may be." This was supported by G. Mitford, Esq. Lord Folkestone, and several other Gentlemen. It was opposed by Mr. Serjt. Shepherd and some other Gentlemen. The opposition rested not only on the idea that judgment would by this motion be pronounced before trial, but also on the old Tory principle, of its being improper to offend the Royal Ear, by a subject presuming to give his advice in a manner which was known to be contrary to the declared sentiments of the Royal Mind.

In reply to both these points, it was argued by the Gentlemen who signed the requisition, that no individual was implicated, either by the words or tenor of the motion; it pointedly, no doubt, censured the thing; but it, at the same time, called for inquiry as to who may be the guilty person, and expressed the anxious hope of the Freeholders, that exemplary punishment may follow his trial and conviction.

The Motion was then put and carried by a large Majority.

On Monday week the Corporation of Winchester held a Meeting at the Guildhall, for the purpose of considering the propriety of addressing His Majesty on the late Convention, when the following Address was unanimously voted:—

"TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY,

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, inhabitants of the city and suburbs of Winchester, beg leave to approach the Throne to express our sincere attachment to your Royal Person and Family, and being sensible that your Majesty's true glory is inseparable from that of your People, we humbly presume to pray that your Majesty will be pleased to order a full, free, and effective Inquiry to be made into the causes and circumstances of the Convention of Portugal—a Convention which has caused general mortification and disappointment, and deprived your brave Soldiers of the expected result of their good and honourable exertions—the unconditional surrender of the whole French army. Your Petitioners cannot but deeply lament that such an opportunity was lost; but as we do not presume to anticipate conviction, if, upon mature investigation, it shall be found that your Commanders were compelled by insurmountable obstacles to conclude such a Treaty, justice demands that they should be reinstated in the good opinion of the country; but, on the other hand, if they were actuated by any thing less than imperious necessity, we are fully persuaded, from the interest which your Majesty must ever feel in the fair fame and honour of your kingdom, that they will experience such marks of your Royal displeasure as may prove a severe example to others, and deter them from tarnishing in the Cabinet the glory acquired in the field."

Sir Richard Gamon, Bart. and H. C. P. Mildmay, Esq. the Representatives of the City were desired to present the same, attended by Mr. Alderman Earle.

On the first of the present month was published, No. 192, of the Sporting Magazine, and which completes the Thirty-second Volume. The Copper Plates given in this Number are—1. Milo, Frontispiece to the Volume; Vignette Title Page to ditto; and, 3. His Majesty's Cream-coloured Charger, from a Painting by Chalon. Among others, in the Literary Department, is an article, to be continued every month, entitled, Disputes among Gentlemen on Points of Honour, &c. Complete sets, with upwards of 400 Copper-plates, on Sporting and other subjects may be had.—N. B. The Work proceeds with great spirit.

REV. ROBERT STEVENS, A. M.

SEVERELY as it has fallen to my lot to animadvert on the Foundling Chapel, and convinced as I still am of the justice of my strictures on that occasion, it gives me pleasure, though unequivocally disapproving of all sabbatic theatricals, to be able to speak favourably of the worship of the Magdalen Chapel. I will even admit, with reference to those whose hearts are elevated by sacred melody, that the singing of the Magdalens is calculated to excite feelings of devotion; that, in the language of one of our most favourite bards, they can

"regale your ear
"With strains it were a privilege to hear."

What, however, essentially distinguishes the Magdalen above the Foundling, as to divine service, is the decency with which its worship is conducted, and the respectful attention of its assemblies. This difference between the two chapels, as it excites observation, calls for investigation. Effects are not without causes. Since the Magdalen differs from the Foundling, to what then is this distinction to be attributed? Both of these chapels exhibit nearly similar public attractions; both employ popular preachers; and they are, reciprocally, frequented by almost the same audiences. What is the inference deducible from these considerations? The business of religion is in one place conducted with decency, while it is elsewhere disgraced by puerile incentives and frivolous accompaniments.—

"Oh, Italy! thy sabbaths may be, soon,
"Our sabbaths, clos'd with mummery and buffoon;
"Preaching and pranks may share the motley scene,
"God's worship and the mountebank between."

Among the successful characters which Cambridge has produced, and which, in various degrees, reflect lustre on its University, is to be ranked the REV. MR. STEVENS. He is said, indeed, not greatly to have distinguished himself while at college; but his subsequent career has sufficiently evidenced, that he possessed talents which were gradually to unfold themselves into notice. Having happily acquired the countenance of Dr. Andrews, the present excellent Rector of St. James's in Piccadilly, Mr. Stevens was by him placed in the "post of observation," where he became so conspicuous as to be elected Alternate Evening Preacher at the Magdalen. He is now, in addition to that appointment, Morning Preacher at the Asylum, and at St. James's Chapel in the Hampstead Road; the Afternoon Lecturer of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster; and one of the Evening Preachers at Margaret-street Chapel, near Cavendish-square.

Does it not seem strange, while the members of the established church are daily decreasing, that our "lords spiritual" should persist in their resistance to measures which alone promise to disconcert the adversaries of the hierarchy? I again advert to the practice of reading, as opposed to that of preaching; and I shall take this opportunity of introducing, I hope very generally, a document to which I formerly alluded, connected as it is with my present disquisition.

"Vice-Chancellor and Gentlemen,

"Whereas his Majesty is informed that the practice of reading Sermons is generally taken up by the preachers before the University, and therefore continues even before himself.

"His Majesty hath commanded me to signify to you his pleasure, that the said practice, which took beginning from the disorders of the late times, be wholly laid aside; and that the said preachers deliver their Sermons, both in Latin and English, by memory, without book, as being a way of preaching which his Majesty judgeth most agreeable to the use of foreign churches, to the custom of the University therefore, and to the nature of that holy exercise.

"And, that his Majesty's commands in these premises may be duly regarded and observed, his further pleasure is, that the names of all such ecclesiastical persons as shall continue the present supine and slothful way of preaching, be, from time to time, signified to me by the vice-chancellor, for the time being, on pain of his Majesty's displeasure. "MONMOUTH."

"Oct. 8, 1674."

This highly singular document is extracted from the Statute Book of the University of Cambridge, page 300, Carolus II. Rex. It is not merely uncommon; it is, especially at this moment, important.

Preaching, "after the Reformation, was," says Dr. Gregory, in his Letters on Literature, "chiefly extempore; but in England many complaints were made of those who were licensed to preach, I presume on account of the doctrines they advanced; and, to enable them to justify themselves, many of the clergy began to write and read their sermons. The ease which this practice afforded, and the correctness it induced, has continued it in the Church of England ever since." So much, according to this writer's conjecture, as to the origin of reading sermons. Touching the comparative merit of extemporary and written discourses, he is also immediately applicable.

"It has been debated," adds Dr. Gregory, "whether sermons may be most advantageously delivered from written notes, memory, or perfectly extempore. Dr. Beattie decides in favour of written sermons. Indeed there is scarcely any extempore discourse which is not too diffuse for the time usually allotted for the pulpit, that might not, in fact, be comprised in much fewer words; and which does not abound in impertinencies, tautologies, or solecisms. YET A GOOD EXTEMPORE DISCOURSE HAS MORE EFFECT, in a common audience, THAN A WRITTEN ONE." Now, if, as this divine confesses, and methodism proves, extemporary preaching is most efficacious, and if as royally asserted, it is also most agreeable to the nature of the holy exercise itself, why is it not encouraged among the ministers of our national church? To urge diocesan amenability, as I have recently heard it advanced, in excusation of the manuscript mode of instructing congregations, is to little purpose. This may furnish a plea, but never will it amount to a defence. Excepting visitation, fast and thanksgiving, corporation, or judicial sermons, except on some public occasion, when are the clergy called upon to account to the world for the sentiments they deliver from the pulpit? I wish to obtain attention to this subject. All men are not eloquent; for the orator, as well as the poet, must be naturally oratorical: but, were the apostolic eloquence duly countenanced and estimated, I am convinced that the established religion of this country might tower as far above the talents of its rivals, as it does above their power.

Mr. STEVENS, who seems to have chosen Dr. Andrews for his model, preaches, of course, from manuscript. His deportment is becoming, and his earnestness, which is often discernible, entitles him to the character of sincerity. His talents, generally considered, are not of the highest order; but he is capable of improving, and will improve.

Though unaffectedly reverential, Mr. Stevens, resembling in this respect the divine whom he imitates, is culpably hurried in the delivery of his prayers; nor does he pronounce our benedictions with that emphasis and impressiveness which they demand, and of which they are so highly, and uniformly, susceptible. His voice, though clear and equal, might, by judicious management on his part, be rendered more agreeable. If sometimes he did not endeavour so much, probably he would effect more. Exhaustion is not quercy.

Mr. Stevens seems addicted to what I would term pictorial preaching; a species of excellence to which young speakers frequently aspire, but which, as it is difficult of attainment, ought to be circumspectly cultivated. The pictorial preacher, as I have ventured to designate him, is he who delights in descriptive illustrations of established axioms; who, if he treats of intemperance, will embody its effects in representation; or if inveighing against avarice, draws the character of the miser; and this he does so as greatly to add to the force of the truths which he designs to impart to his hearers. This, however, requires very considerable judgment and ability: it is one of the highest achievements of oratory, when successfully accomplished. If, on the other hand, the pictorial preacher does not rise to perfection, he disgusts good taste, disappoints plain sense, and renders himself unprofitable as well as ridiculous.

While truth will not authorise me to place Mr. Stevens among the highest in the scale of pulpit excellence, I nevertheless respect his present exertions, and augur very favourably of his future progress. The prospect, indeed, brightens. It is gratifying to see Philip Dodd, in the pulpit once occupied by Septimus Hodgson; and to hear Robert Stevens preach, where Archer Thompson was accustomed only to declaim.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

Monday night the Comedy of the Busy Body was acted, and the Grand Romance of Blue Beard revived at Drury-lane.—Before the Play began, Mr. Putnam made an apology for Mr. Bannister, who, on account of a domestic calamity, was prevented from filling the part of Marplot, which Mr. Lewis of Covent-garden Theatre had the kindness, at a short notice, to assume. He informed the Public, likewise, that Mr. Mathews would be replaced, in the character of Ibrahim, in Blue Beard, by Mr. Dowton, and would become the representative of Shacabac, instead of his absent friend. The Audience marked their approbation of these arrangements by loud applause.

Miss Duncan, Messrs. Dowton, Lewis, and Palmer, displayed consummate excellence in their respective characters. The latter, who had long confined himself to the parts of eccentric beaux, proved, by his delineation of an old man, that he is a more faithful imitator of Nature itself, than of the irregularities of fashionable stupidity. The talents which he displayed in Sir Jealous Traffic must make the Public sincerely wish he would not deviate from the new path of acting which he has lately entered. The Mechanist of the House seemed desirous to reveal all the creative powers of his genius, for he presented to our eyes scenes which we had never beheld before:—now, a wide-spreading oak intruded into a drawing-room; and now, part of a chimney, with the one-half of a magnificent glass, attended by two or three pillars, placed themselves in the midst of a wood. The galleries, who are not fond enough of novelty, hissed most tremendously; but, conscious of being right, the Mechanist despised popular clamours, and persevered even through the after-piece, in astonishing the audience by the pleasing incongruity of his scenes.

Blue Beard was revived in all its magnificence. The scenery, the dresses, and processions were truly splendid; Mr. I. Smith is not only a good singer, but, what is scarcely ever the case, an equally good performer. Raymond's Abomelique, was neither deficient in majesty of action, nor loudness of tone. Perley, who gave the lie to Mr. Putnam's assertions, by filling Mr. Bannister's part instead of Mathews, was so truly excellent, that he turned the resentment of the disappointed galleries into peals of applause. Mrs. Mountain and Miss Lyon sung delightfully. It appears that bulls are committed on the stage by Turks, as well as by Christians; for, after having heard every performer mention the mysteries of the [illegible] chamber in a manner that convinced us it must have derived its name from its colour, we found at last when it was unfolded to our view, that it was a red one. This [illegible] is the most splendid afterpiece that has been represented for several years, and highly deserves the reception which it has [illegible] with.

ing Miss Norton's exertions last night; as her successor in the same part, we see no reason to change our regret into approbation. During the first three acts when the character does not rise above the level of feminine graces and accomplishments, Miss Norton had perhaps the advantage; but when she assumes with the disguise, the manly spirit and solemnity of a judge, Miss Smith remained unrivalled. Although greatly inferior to the latter, she is fully equal to the part which she supported with great animation throughout.

Miss Bolton made also her first appearance in the character of Jessica, which gave her an opportunity of displaying the sweetness of her voice, but will not add to her fame as an actress.

Mr. Cooke was as great in Shylock as ever. He seems to rely perhaps too much on the expressiveness of his countenance; for his tones are now and then so low that the eye alone and not the ear can catch his meaning. What would we think of a man, who whilst reading aloud to us from the farthest extremity of the room, should now and then drop his voice entirely, and content himself with turning the inside of the book towards us for our perusal of certain passages?

Mr. C. Kemble seemed nearly overpowered by his occasional disorder on the stage, an enervating langour that robs his voice, his action, and his countenance of all sort of expression, save that of a man half asleep, which but little suits the warmth of love, gratitude and friendship.

Mr. Munden, in Launcelot, repressed a little the luxuriancy of his grimaces. He consequently received less applause but deserved more.

Mr. Taylor who can distinguish himself as a musical ideot had in some afterpieces, such as The Escapes, &c. was probably so surprised at finding himself placed in the part of a spirited lover and gentleman, in Lorenzo, that astonishment deprived him of the power of action, and reduced his voice into an unmeaning and almost unmodulated sound.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

HARWICH, OCT. 20.—Arrived the Hope, of Shields, from Plymouth to Shields, in ballast, with loss of anchor, cable, and fore yard. Also the Collins, of London, from Sunderland to London, with coals, leaky, and brought in by a Southwold pilot boat.

OCTOBER 20.—Sailed his Majesty's sloop Orestes, Captain Lapenetiere; also the Active cutter, which sailed in chase of a French lugger, which appeared to-day, within the Edystone, till she observed a brig, supposed to be an American, going up Channel, and waited for her till within two miles, and then made all sail, and ran alongside and captured the brig, about two leagues off the stone, and made off; but it is hoped the Active, Capt. Kinsman, will be able to recapture the brig, if not lugger.

DOVER, OCT. 21.—A large fleet of transports and coasters to the number of 200 sail, passed by here yesterday to the Westward, but it coming on to blow hard at S. S. W. they were driven into the Roads again: but the wind suddenly shifting to N. N. W. and blowing a perfect hurricane, the transports were dispersed in all directions: between 20 and 30 sail are blown over to the French coast, and it is much feared that several will be lost. The Liberty transport, having on board 20 of the royal waggon train, is come in totally dismasted: the schooner William, Captain Thomas, of and for Carmarthen from London, was blown on Dungeness Beach this morning in the gale, but the tide flowing very high, she got off again, and immediately filled; the crew had but just time to save themselves before she went down.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS,

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 19.

The Westminster Quarter Sessions commenced at the new Sessions House, before Mr. Mainwaring and the Bench of Magistrates. The business was confined to swearing in constables, and the crowd and pressure was so great, that many persons were alarmed for their safety. The Court proceeded this day to try the traverse indictments.

THURSDAY, OCT. 20.

The only case of interest that occurred through the day was an indictment for an assault, of which the following are the particulars:

A plump matron, about 50, named Mary Love, who keeps a toy shop in Westminster, was indicted for assaulting the fair person of Miss Mary Anne Lewis, a beautiful young woman, about 18. It appeared that the father of the prosecutrix, who is a schoolmaster, occupied the upper part of Mrs. Love's house, and had with her some unpleasant altercation. In the month of July last, Miss Lewis was standing at the hall-door buying some fish of a hawker, when Mrs. Love came out and insisted on the fish hawker's going off the flagged way. Miss Lewis said that she must first have done with her, when Mrs. Love, seizing with one hand a child's chair, and with the other a mouse trap (commodities of her calling), made a violent attack with the latter upon Miss Lewis's face, and very nearly spoiled a fascinating chef d'œuvre of nature's handy work; while with the other hand, she furiously pressed the chair upon her delicate foot, which, resting on the threshold, peeped from beneath her snow-white petticoat.

The Jury found the intemperate matron guilty, and the Court sentenced her to pay a fine of 3s. 4d.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

MAD DOGS.—On Monday a large bull-dog, belonging to one of the Sun Fire men, was seized with canine madness in the Strand. The animal foamed, and exhibited the usual symptoms of hydrophobia. The fireman, on perceiving the situation of his dog, made signs to the spectators to stand aside; he then seized the dog, in the most resolute manner, by the neck, and dragged it to the shop of Mr. Willows, fishmonger, where he procured a hammer, and the dog was destroyed. Dogs in various parts of the Metropolis have lately died mad, and the public ought therefore to be peculiarly on their guard against them.

A mad dog, yesterday morning, made his appearance in St. James's Park, and bit a little girl. A soldier on duty at the back of the Admiralty, seeing the child's danger, ran the animal through with his bayonet.

A Gentleman of Distinction, about 50 years of age, who has used the Russia Oil regularly this twelvemonth for dressing his hair, has declared to the Proprietor, that his hair is not only grown in thickness and strength, but it has also prevented it turning grey, which was before on the decline; it is therefore recommended to Ladies and Gentlemen, who wish to benefit from the Russia Oil, not to neglect using it regularly, as it cannot be expected of having the desired effect if only applied at intervals. The Royal Family, and Ladies and Gentlemen of Distinction and Fashion, use Prince's Russia Oil for moistening the Hair when dressing, which is so great a nourisher to the Hair, as to prevent it turning grey to all periods, promotes the growth, and making the hair grow thick and long; prevents its falling off; and restores it on bald places, if the least roots remain.—Several Gentlemen that were bald have declared, after using the Russia Oil regularly for three months, the bald places became nearly covered with hair; promotes eye-brows, whiskers, and prevents them turning grey, at 7s. per bottle, or a bottle containing four small, at one Guinea. Sold wholesale and retail by the Proprietor, A. Prince, No. 9, John-street, Oxford-street; and, by appointment, Mr. Smith, Perfumer to his Majesty, New Bond-street; Hendrie and Sons, Perfumers to her Majesty, Titchborne-street; Bayley and Blew, Perfumers to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and Duke and Duchess of York, 5, Cockspur-street; Harding and Howell, 89, Pall-Mall; Newberry and Son, 45, St. Paul's Church-yard; Dicey and Sutton, Bow Church-yard; Barclay and Son, Fleet-market; Butler, 4, Cheapside; Shaw and Edwards, 66, St. Paul's Church-yard; Berry, Johnson, Greek-street, Soho; Low, Strand; Davison and Son, 59, Fleet-street; Rigge, 65, Cheapside; Bacon, 150, Oxford-street; Withers, 229, Strand; Ward, 324, Holborn; Tutt, Royal Exchange; Bull, Dublin; Raeburn, Edinburgh; Collins, Salisbury; Crutwell, Bath; and by most principal Perfumers and Medicine Venders in England, Ireland, and Scotland.—Caution.—As Impostors are travelling about, imposing noxious counterfeits on Shopkeepers, particularly on Hairdressers and Booksellers, purchasers will particularly ask for Prince's Russia Oil, and observe the label on the outside wrapper of each bottle is signed in Russian gold ink, "Mechrikeffsky and Prince;" any without that signature are counterfeits. Country Shopkeepers sending their orders to any Wholesale Vender they deal with in London, will receive liberal allowance.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-THREE.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE FRENCH AND RUSSIAN MESSENGERS.

As we have laid it down as a rule to furnish our readers with a disquisition on some prominent feature in the politics of the week, we know of none which excited more lively and extensive interest, than the arrival of French and Russian Messengers, said to be the bearers of pacific overtures to our government. As nothing has transpired which might enable us to pronounce decidedly on the nature or tendency of these proposals, we are placed under the necessity of recurring to conjecture, in order to make up for the deficiency of positive information. However the public, notwithstanding the silence of government, appear to be unanimous in their opinion, that the dispatches contained proposals for a negociation; and as we have not been able to discover as yet any justifiable pretext for discountenancing this belief, we intend taking it for granted that such was the object of their mission. Before we proceed to any discussion on the subject, we cannot avoid expressing our admiration at the facility and indifference with which Bonaparte confers on us, one week; epithets the most insulting; and proposes friendship and reconciliation in the next. He has either a most sovereign contempt for our feelings and understanding; or, speaking with more propriety, for those of the states he curses with the name of allies; when he imagines, by a farce of this kind to justify his conduct in the judgment of mankind. This is a most curious specimen of the effrontery and boundless insolence of that extraordinary individual. We have admired on this, as on prior occasions of a similar nature, the same atrocious consistency. He finds it expedient, perhaps, to gratify the weak Alexander, who, we are still inclined to hope has not lost, by the intercourse, every particle of honour and principle; to show an inclination to re-establish the tranquility his ambition has incessantly disturbed; and, as if he were willing to remove every doubt of his sincerity, he exhausted declamation and virulence, only a few days before he sent off his messengers of peace, to insult and irritate the very government he effects to conciliate. To judge from the first ostensible act after his arrival at Erfurth, he set out from Paris for the purpose of proposing, in concert with the Emperor of Russia, terms of accommodation to this country; and, a day or two before his departure, he made an unprovoked declaration to his army and to Europe, that he considered no peace attainable, as long as England retained her independence. If this was not literally his language; his meaning was sufficiently obvious. We are fully sensible that the honourable cause we are engaged in, is not benefitted by exaggeration or falsehood, we, therefore, scrupulously refrain from imputing to that dangerous man any other intentions than what he has constantly announced. Had he been serious or earnest in his proposals; is it probable that he would render their acceptance inadmissible, and entirely incompatible with notions of honour, by previously and wantonly insulting the government and nation he affects to treat with? He has given cause enough to doubt of his integrity, but none to suspect his discretion; it would be, therefore, more than good nature, it would be folly in the extreme, to ascribe his proffered negociation to motives consonant with out happiness and security, or those of our allies.

We have introduced this subject with a coolness unusual with us, as often as we were called upon to develope the dangerous tendency of his projects, and to propose measures to counteract them. We are sensible how superfluous it is to irritate the national feeling against a man who avows himself the irreconcileable enemy of the country and its institutions; but it is necessary to deprive egotism and disloyalty of every means of turning the present circumstance to their advantage. We are sensible we expose ourselves to the ridicule of many, whose minds are already made up on every overture of this nature, in treating, with so much gravity, a subject, whose treacherous tendency they consider as obvious to the most limitted, and even biassed, understanding. But an attentive observance to the character of the French Ruler, and an experience of the mischiefs that have resulted to other states, in consequence of having listened to his pacific professions, after they had as many, and far more, proofs of his perfidy than we have received, justify any degree of seriousness we may shew in the present discussion. Our readers cannot be ignoraht at the same time that there exist numbers of persons, respectable for their rank and abilities, who, a very inconsiderable time back, were loud and urgent in recommending a peace between the two countries; and we have not observed such an extraordinary change in the language or actions of Bonaparte, which might induce them to renounce sentiments, they so warmly and pertinaciously professed. His conduct towards Spain, it may be objected, has been so flagrantly criminal, that no person would have the temerity to recommend to a British public a measure, which was less objectionable at the time they proposed it. Was his conduct towards Switzerland and Venice less atrocious? Did he not develope, on both those occasions, as much want of principle, remorseless cruelty, and brutal indifference to the sufferings of individuals, or the laws of nations? Did he shew any humanity or tenderheartedness towards the poor, unoffending herdsmen, who inhabit the almost inaccessible summits of the Swiss Mountains, where they thought themselves, on account of their poverty and situation, secure, at least, against the encroachments of ambition? For no other motive than their attachment to a constitution, which, during five centuries, had secured them in the enjoyment of innocence and tranquility, he gave orders, coolly and deliberately, to fifty thousand of his soldiery to scale their hills, penetrate into the deep recesses of their vallies, where they massacred the inhabitants, burnt their villages, and carried off their cattle. This crime was equally atrocious with that committed against the Spaniards, and less justifiable on the plea of advantage. And what reason did he assign for covering with mourning and desolation the habitations of the happiest and most innocent people upon earth, whose wisdom and moderation had preserved them for almost three centuries in a state of constant Peace, with all their neighbours? He gave no other than what he assigned in vindication of his conduct towards the Spaniards:—That their independence and form of Government were incompatible with the happiness of France! Just Heaven's! If the felicity and security of one state, or rather of one individual, can only be maintained by the misery and debasement of the rest of Europe, we have not a stronger proof of the degradation and apathy of the nations of the Continent, than their not having long since risen to a man, in order to extirpate a community, which avows so monstrous a pretension. Under this very pretext, revolting as it may appear, he committed so many outrages on the Swiss; and what is more irremediable, destroyed the innocence and integrity of their character, by inoculating it with the pestilential virus of French manners! However these facts were known; these atrocities were committed, when a number of individuals in this country had thought fit to recommend peace and amity between the British Nation and the Ruffian, who was guilty of all these crimes. They are now silent, because the horror of the perfidy, with which the Spaniards have been treated, is too recent and deeply impressed in the minds of the public; but as soon as any reverse occurs to our Allies, or to our ourselves, they will again raise their impious voices against the honour and loyalty of their country. They were also silent, as long as the Swiss were contending for their freedom and property; but as soon as their oppressors had succeeded in robbing them of both, they reiterated their cries and remonstrances in support of their favourite project.

Let us now say a few words on the object and tendency of these overtures. If every impression of the past be not totally effaced from our recollection; if we are not voluntarily blind to the gigantic events of our time, we cannot be at a great loss to make a satisfactory conjecture on that head. We have, certainly, no right to pretend to a more loyal and equitable treatment from Bonaparte, than Austria, Holland, Italy, Prussia, and Spain, have received at his hands. We have done more to baffle his designs, and resist his power, than any of those States; it would be, therefore, childish to imagine he had more deference or friendship for us. There is no individual so enamoured of his opinion, or so infatuated by his prejudices, as to expect from a man we have offended, beyond the power of pardon or reconciliation, more honourable treatment than those nations have received, who have made most sacrifices to acquire his esteem and good will. We expect our Readers will spare us the recapitulation of what they suffered, and still sustain in consequence of their submission and confidence. It is, however, perfectly useless to indulge in all these conjectures; for Bonaparte, knowing well what ought to be the sentiments of the People of this Country with regard to him, and pretty well convinced of the penetration and energy of our Secretary for Foreign Affairs, entertained no expectations of imposing on our Cabinet by any offers he may be disposed to make. He wished to reconcile the Russian Nobles and People with the conduct of their degraded Sovereign. He received from his agents the alarming account of their loud dissatisfaction! and in order to prevent its bursting forth in the present crisis of his fortunes, he could devise no other expedient, than by shewing a disposition to negociate. Under these circumstances, it is a question of the highest importance to decide what answer our Cabinet ought to have returned, to overtures made so insidiously, and under such pressing necessity. To send no answer, but to treat them with contempt, as the sincerity with which they are made is not unknown, should be, perhaps, not advisable: But, we are firmly of opinion, that whatever answer Ministers have given, should be made known to Europe, and that immediately, as the spirit of it cannot fail to coincide with the wishes and feelings of every State on the Continent: and we are as strongly persuaded, that, as our sine qua non is the immediate evacuation of Spain, Finland, and Naples, no other communication of any kind should be permitted with this country, till these points are consented to. That Bonaparte proposes some mischief, or treachery in these overtures, nobody doubts; but that he has done it in consequence of some unexpected embarrassments, exclusive of those in which he has involved himself in Spain, many may not be inclined to believe. The extraordinary restrictions, however, ordered in Holland, afford strong ground for surmise, that events of an important nature have, or are on the point of breaking out either in Russia, or in Germany, which he is unwilling we should know. Why should we, then be guilty of the weakness to assist in extricating him from these difficulties, by turning the attention of the Continent from the present cause of its discontent to the attractive novelty of a Negociation. It would be unpardonable if our Government could be guilty of such an oversight. The stand we have made against the united efforts of Europe, and the formidable army we have sent to Spain, are a favourable specimen of our resources, and of the encouragement-bombast of the tyrant's menaces. Let every village and town, from Gibraltar to Moscow, know this; let the Cabinets likewise sensible of it; and a spirit of union and resistance shall be diffused over that large tract, which it will not be in the power of Bonaparte to counteract. This cannot be effected by an inclination on our parts to concede; it is our energy, and the independance of our attitude, which alone are capable of raising the courage of nations, and of inspiring them with a desire to fall on their oppressor. By simply adopting the language of defiance, we have already done wonders. Mankind look up to us with astonishment and veneration: they were led to believe that our doom was pronounced, and that no exertions could ever defer the fulfilment of our destruction. What must be their opinion of us at present? There we stand, that devoted community, after having not only weathered the storm which menaced us, but more powerful and secure than we had been in any one period of our history! Will this make no impression on the neighbouring States, or produce no revolution in their sentiments? The more pains the enemy takes to depreciate our resources and situation, the more falsehoods he accumulates in order to paint our weakness and despondency, the more unfavourable and disastrous the consequences will be for him, as soon as the truth is known. Whatever edicts he may publish, whatever rigorous restrictions he may enjoin, it will finally burst out, like thunder, and confound him, whilst it enlightens and rouses the people he at present enslaves. Let us not prevent, by weakness or an act of false policy, what must eventually happen. As we have profited so much by a display of energy, and as no nation gained any thing by pusillanimous concession but blows and outrage, we have reason to pect that Government has employed in its reply a tone of language consonant to our situation, and the feelings and expectations of Europe.

Shall we now indulge ourselves, as a matter of curious speculation, in a few observations on the consequences of a peace. The first result of it must be the reduction of our army and navy, in order to diminish the unprecedented burthens the people have submitted to, in order to secure their independence and existence as a nation; and to remove every cause of discontent and complaint, for all the calamities of war are far less troublesome than a peace tortured with suspicion and never-ceasing complaint, it will be necessary to invite our volunteers to disband. General Caulincourt, the present Ambassador to the Court of Russia, better known as the murderer of the Duke D'Enghien; or General Junot, we mean the Duke D'Abrantes, or some other virtuous and disinterested General shall be sent as Minister to our Court, to cement the auspicious union. And as every principle of gratitude must suggest to Bonaparte the necessity of providing for the companions of his dangers and victories, he will find it expedient and just to send to the principal sea-ports of the United Kingdom a number of Engineers, in the quality of Commercial Agents. France, as a military state, can have no pretext for disbanding her armies; and the losses she has sustained during the course of the Revolution, render an augmentation of her navy indispensable. As Pondicherry must be returned, we have no right to dictate to her as to the number and quality of the Agents she will send to occupy it; besides the French are particularly addicted to an interchange of politeness, and it is to be presumed they will endeavour to establish a friendly intercourse with the Princes of Hindostan. Bonaparte has, in like manner, at his disposal contributions to the amount of four hundred millions of livres, the honourable fruits of his prowess and success; and what a man has gained nobly, he wishes to spend liberally, he might, therefore, be inclined to relieve the embarrassments of our fellow-citizens, in order to bind closer the friendship and good-will among the two nations. And—away with irony and supposition—when our soldiers and sailors are disbanded; after France has augmented her's; when Ireland and India swarm with her Agents; when the stamina of our national character is vitiated by an intercourse with that vile people; when we have fettered the liberty of our Press, and restrained the freedom of debate in our Senate, in order to avoid entering on a new war with incalculable disadvantages—When our youth, among the nobility, and those endued with a spirit of levity and restlessness among the middling class, have swarmed to France; when our workmen from the manufacturing towns have been seduced by every art to abandon their country; when our morals are degraded; our spirit broke down; when the use of arms is forgotten; when, after a lapse of ten years spent in accommodating our haughty, republican character to submission and obsequiousness; the abominable Tyrant shall pronounce his tremendous sentence!—Then, say of us, who have the infamy to prefer a life of bondage to death, will see our country, which is now the seat of freedom, opulence, the arts, of private and public virtue, of so many social endearing ties, and of so many philanthropical institutions, plundered, enslaved, and tyrannised by a horde of rapacious adventurers!—Oh, God! may thy awful fiat, sooner than that dread event occur, loosen the strong foundations of our Islands, and plunge them into the surrounding ocean, with our name, our virtues, the monuments of our greatness, and every vestige of our being.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

SPAIN.

EXTRAORDINARY GAZETTE, OCT. 6.

The most Serene Council of the Kingdom having received on the 3d of this month a report from General Blake, of the 27th September, whereby he acquainted their Highnesses that the centre of the enemy's army was falling back to Vitoria, by which retreat he afforded our army an opportunity to extend its advanced posts and occupy very important points, and their Highnesses having learned that very disastrous accounts were circulated in this place, of which they had no kind of information, but had rather to believe the contrary, they thought it right to publish, with that noble frankness which becomes the Soverelgn Council, the favourable intelligence which they had received, and their well-grounded hopes of still greater advantages. The retreat of the enemy was a feint, intended to draw our attention to another part, and fall with treble their strength, on the troops we had in Bilboa. This was the plan of Marshal Ney, who commands the whole army of the centre, which was destined for that operation; but the vigilance and foresight of Marquis de Portago disconcerted Marshal Ney's plan, because observing the immense superiority of strength which the enemy could surprise and defeat his division if he imprudently remained in Bilboa, he left that place of his own free will, with his whole corps, and all his artillery, and merely changing his position without the loss of a single man, and without experiencing the least check; he took post at Balsemeda, and this he did, after having beaten the enemy; General Reguelme, with his division, occupying at last the point of Oquendo: all which appears more fully by the said report, which, by command of their Highnesses, is inserted herein, in order that the public may not entertain the least uneasiness or apprehension on that head. The Serene Council hope that the above movement of the enemy will lead to the surrender of Marshal Ney, and of the whole corps with which he occupies Bilboa. General Blake having very properly fallen back, and taken post with his whole army on the neighbouring heights, from which position and the reinforcements which he must have received, we may hope for a complete and signal victory.

REPORT.

RECEIVED YESTERDAY, 5TH OCT. BY THE MOST SERENE COUNCIL OF THE KINGDOM, FROM THE GENERAL IN CHIEF OF OUR ARMY.

"Most Serene Lords—The corps of the centre, which, as I informed your Highnesses, under date of the 27th inst. marched from Vitoria, moved from that town to Bilboa, commanded by its General in Chief Marshal Ney, with an intention of falling on our fourth division with at least treble its strength. The said division, however, evacuated that place in good time, and retreated with all its artillery and baggage in the best order to Balmaseda, which place, and its environs, it still occupies. The third division had, the same day, marched to Ordune, to succour the fourth, taking no notice of a column of the enemy's troops which was watching its movements, from a position at a short distance from the road, and with whose advanced posts our tirailleurs were frequently engaged. Brigadier-General Don Francisco Rignesme was marching to Bilboa, when he was informed of the evacuation of that town, and its occupation by the enemy. In consequence of this information, he altered his route, and directed his march to such points as afforded him an opportunity of either to support Portago, or to form a junction with him. The post he occupied last was that of Oquendo; I communicate it to your Highnesses for your information.—God preserve your Highnesses many years!

"To the Most Serene Council of the Kingdom of Galicia."

Bilboa, Oct. 13.—His Excellency Don Joachim Blake reports from this town, and under this day's date, to the Council of the Kingdom, that General Merlin, fearful on account of the movements made by our army, precipitately evacuated Bilboa; our advanced guard took twenty prisoners. The most expedient measures had been adopted to cut off the retreat of the said General, with his corps, five thousand strong, and to make them prisoners; and this operation was on the point of being carried into effect, had not the enemy, informed of our movement, retreated at break of day, carrying off his artillery by way of Mondragon, and having in the town a small corps which brought up his rear; and fell back as our army advanced. One Officer, a Serjeant, and eighteen men, were taken prisoners, and some killed.

Declaration of a French Officer, taken Prisoner on the 12th of October, when General Merlin evacuated Bilboa.

Queries.—Your name? Answered—Francis Joseph Escalier. Your age? Twenty-three years old. Your native place? Strasburgh. Who is General of your division? Merlin. What is the name of your regiment? The 3d Legion of Reserve. What is the strength of your division? From 4 to 5000 men—all infantry, with the exception of 80 horse. To what army does Merlin's division belong? Merlin's division forms part of the army commanded by Marshal Ney. What service has your division performed since it evacuated Bilboa? The first time, the 20th September, it left Bilboa, compelled by the Spanish troops, and retreated to Durengo; its advanced posts were first at Guardiache, and on the 24th at Mondragon, where on the 24th and 25th a reinforcement of 8000 men arrived; on the 27th the troops left Durengo, under the orders of Marshal Ney, and returned to Bilboa; they immediately occupied the heights of Muso, and Achurri with 850 men, while the rest took post on the left of the high road, while the light troops, grenadier horse, chasseurs, and the Neapolitan guards and dragoons directed their march to the town. On the 28th, Marshal Ney detached a strong body of horse to observe the movements of the Spanish army, the French remaining in the same position; on the 29th, Gen. Merlin marched with 2000 men to occupy the heights of Mirabelie and Leoes, where he remained till the first of October, by orders of Marshal Ney, who marched to Vittoria with 8000 men; the following day he returned to Bilboa, leaving some advanced posts in the former place. At what o'clock did Merlin's division leave Bilboa on the 12th inst. and for what reason? Merlin's division began to evacuate Bilboa on the 11th at night, and continued doing so on the 12th at break of day leaving only some advanced posts in the town; the French evacuated Bilboa, because they expected to be attacked by the Spanish troops. How were you taken prisoner? I was taken prisoner by the Spanish troops, near the bridge of Goldacona where my detachment was posted to cover the retreat of the other corps. What is the opinion of the French Officers and soldiers respecting the present war. The French Officers think it unjust, and occasioned by the ambition of Bonaparte, the whole nation is of the same opinion, but the soldiers are always satisfied if they are allowed to rob, because they do not reflect on the calamities attending war. Is King Joseph considered by the army as a good general, and has he got any strong party among the French? King Joseph does not possess any military talents, and never commands an army, but the French respect him on account of the meekness of his character, and because he is brother of the Emperor.—Corunna Diary of Oct. 22.

CORUNNA, OCT. 19.—Yesterday arrived here an extraordinary courier from the Army of Biscay, with the interesting intelligence that the French had evacuated Bilboa, and that our head-quarters were there; in the next number we shall state at full length the circumstances which have occurred. They write from Lisbon that the English, in number 14,000, with four thousand Spanish troops which were there, have embarked for Catalonia, to assist the brave Catalonians; with which reinforcements it is very probable they have expelled the French rabble, which, under the command of their Leader, Lechi, has so long oppressed the capital of that principality.—(Corunna Gazette.)

CORUNNA, OCT. 19.—By his Majesty's Cabinet Courier, Don Juan Lesquerre, who arrived here yesterday, at three o'clock in the afternoon from Madrid, which he left the 15th inst. at ten o'clock in the morning, intelligence has been received that Don Pedro Cevallos has been confirmed by the Supreme Central Junta of Government in the office of Principal Secretary of State. Don Benito Ramon de Hermida has been appointed Minister of Justice. Don Antonio Cornelly Ferraz, Minister of War. Don Antonio Bacaro, Minister of the Marine; and Don Francisco Sauvedra, Minister of Finance.—The same Paper.

CORUNNA, OCTOBER 22.—The Messenger has arrived from Madrid with an answer to the Junta, authorising the landing of the troops, the disembarkation will commence to-morrow, Sir John Moore's army began its march from Lisbon on the 5th inst.—By the Portuguese mail we have received intelligence, that the division of the Marquis de Valladares continued on the 13th in Oporto, whither it was called from Carballo, where it halted, to assist in disarming the French, who came from Almeida; but on the arrival of our troops the whole business was done.

ARANJUEZ, OCT. 12.—In consideration of the imminent services rendered to the country by Don Joseph Palafox y Melzi, during the siege and blockade of the city of Saragossa, which he gloriously defended with honour to our arms and disgrace to our enemies, and to the general vote of the inhabitants, who proclaimed him Captain-General of the Kingdom of Arragon, the Supreme Central and Governing Junta of the State have agreed to promote him to the rank of Major-General of the Royal Armies, confirming him in the command as the Captain-General of the said Kingdom, and President of its Audience.—Madrid Gazette, October 14.

MALAGA, OCT. 8.—Letters from Merida, of the 29th ult. confirm the intelligence that the French have evacuated both Yelves and Fort Lippe, and that Portugal is therefore completely cleared of the common enemy. The Spanish, English, and Portuguese troops, who have so gallantly defeated him in that country, are now ready to march to this country, and do here the same.—Corunna Gazette, Oct. 22.

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MALIS,

ARMISTICE CONCLUDED BETWEEN THE SWEDES AND RUSSIANS IN THE NORTH OF FINLAND.

An Armistice has been concluded between the Swedes and the Russians in Finland: it has been published in a Bulletin, dated Oct. 12, 1808.

ARMISTICE.

There shall be an Armistice concluded for an unlimited time, between the Russian troops posted as well upon the river of Gamla Carlby, as in the environs of Knopio, and the Swedish army under Count Klingspor, from the moment of the signature of this Armistice, till eight days after, either party gives notice of its cessation. Neither of the contracting parties, whilst this Armistice lasts, shall send any part of their troops to act in other parts. The Russian troops which are in the Government of Wasa, will keep their positions at Gamla Carlby, and the Swedish troops theirs at Hemango, and not advance beyond Kaunus, and from thence to the church of Hykanmus to the lake of Leske, and from thence in a straight line to the church of Idinsalmi; and in order that there may remain a central space between the two armies, the Russian troops shall place their advanced posts in such a manner as not to pass the river which discharges itself into the Juntela. On the side of Knopio the Swedish troops shall place themselves in such a manner that the church of Idensaimi may remain neuter. The Russian troops shall occupy the defile which is on the south-east of it, and the Swedes that on the north-west. Should the Imperial Russian troops have passed the church of Idensalmi on the other side, before these orders arrive, they shall retire to the position agreed upon.

There shall be an exchange of prisoners, man for man, rank against rank. Head-Quarters, at Lucka, 29th of September, 1808.

M. KLINGSPOR, Field Marshal.
SUCKELIN, General in Chief and Quarter-Master General.
Le Conte KAMINSKOF, Lieut.-General.

GOTTENBURGH, OCT. 17.—The King is displeased with the guards, and has broken them and disgraced all the officers. This will create great discontent among the first families here.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, SEPT. 18.—The members of the Confederation of the Rhine, are to assemble in Frankfort by the 25th inst.

General Oudinot is gone to Erfurth.

The troops of the German Confederation, which have marched for France, will be formed into an army of reserve.

His Royal Majesty's yacht Amadis, at anchor off Granboda, Oct. 6.

His Royal Majesty has received the following report from Adjutant-General Baron Boye:

"Having been ordered by your Majesty to take the command of the second division of the Southern Finnish Army, the main body of which was at Wiais, I immediately proceeded to that place; one battalion of the regiment of Warnera had been left at Helsing, to cover the magazine, and another battalion of the same regiment was ordered to march with one 3-pounder to Waisari-bridge, in order to protect the army's rear on the side of Lokalax. The rest, or main boy, posted near Wiais, consisted of three battalions of foot guards, two battalions of the regiment of Kronoberg, one battalion of the regiment of Westmainland, with one 6-pounder, four howitzers, and one three-pounder; two squadrons of horse guards joined the army near Jarweupoa.

The 28th, in the morning, certain intelligence was received, that during the night the enemy had been considerably re-inforced by troops arrived in waggons from Winkoln, Lokolax, and Abo, and taken up a position with his whole force at the distance of about a quarter of a mile from Wiais.

"Under these circumstances no other expedient was left than to drive the enemy from his position by means of a vigorous attack, for the successful issue of which it became necessary to turn his flank, on account of his great superiority in number.—I accordingly detached Lieut.-Col. Lazerbring, with two battalions of foot, to march by Harus and Nopperla to Banda, in order to attack the enemy's rear near Pousta. This detachment, which, from the badness of the road, could not be accompanied by artillery, filed off accordingly, and at one o'clock, when it could be supposed to have reached the concerted point, I intended to attack the enemy in front, with the whole remainder of my force, penetrate through his centre, break his line with the assistance of the detachment which was to fall upon his rear, and thus to make ourselves masters of his position near Pousta.

"All the necessary preparations and arrangements have been made for the execution of the above plan of attack. At ten o'clock a violent musketry fire was commenced on our left flank, which I supposed to be directed against Colonel Lazerbring; and this supposition was soon confirmed by a report received from our chain of chasseurs, and immediately after by a report from Colonel Lieutenant-Colonel Lazerbring himself, stating, that he was engaged with a strong Russian corps. At the same time the enemy attacked my front with chasseurs and infantry, two pieces of cannon, and two howitzers. I immediately ordered the battalions to advance. The chasseurs moved to the left, the regiment of life guards was in the centre, and the Finnish guards on the right. One six-pounder and one howitzer were mounted on the heights, and the whole line was ordered to make the utmost exertion to repulse the enemy, which order was executed with alacrity, intrepidity, and success.

"The enemy detached thereupon a column against the right wing of our army, which was completely outflanked by the Russians. I immediately ordered two six-pounders to be mounted on the right of Wiais, which opened such a violent and destructive fire of grape-shot, that the enemy was forced to retreat into the wood.

"But soon after I received a report from Lieutenant-Colonel Lazerbring, stating, that from the enemy's vast superiority in numbers, being continually attacked by fresh corps, he was no longer able to cover my left flank, in consequence of which report I was necessitated to order the troops under my command to retreat, which was done with the utmost order. I joined Lieutenant-Colonel Lazerbring, and continued my retrograde movement to Helsing, where I found that from an account of the enemy's vast superiority in artillery and troops of every description—nothing else was left them but to re-embark; this was done accordingly, and the transports set sail successively for Lehmakurko Sound.

"According to the statement of the Russian Officers and soldiers taken during the action, the enemy's strength amounted to 12,000 men and 40 pieces of artillery. I humbly beg leave to assure your Majesty, that all the troops under my command performed their duty with great gallantry and spirit."

G. Boye, Adjutant-General.

Commodore's ship Kopparomman, at anchor off Lehmakurko Sound, the 29th September, 1808.

"His Royal Majesty has received a report from Field Marshal Count Klingspor, dated Head-Quarters, Lohto, September 25, whereby it appears that the army under his command has continued to retreat to Lohto in good order.—The King landed, on the 8th near Gromborla, from on board the yacht Amadis, and proceeded to Lamland, where the Head-Quarter are now established.—Stockholm Gazette, 12th October.

HOLLAND.

NEW COMMERCIAL DECREE.

The following new decree was issued on the 17th instant:

"I. All exportation is suspended until further orders.

"II. The superintendence of the coast shall be divided into three districts: 1. From the Helder to the island of Walcheren, shall be commanded by General Dumonceau. 2. From the Helder to Harlingen by Admiral De Winter. 3. From Harlingen to the Ems by General Castanet.

"III. The Commanding Generals shall be personally responsible for the execution of the existing measures relating to the total shutting of the ports of the kingdom, the communication with the enemy, as well as for all those we may hereafter order. There shall be a daily report made by them to the Minister, or immediately to the King; and they are required to give an account of the negligence or disinclination of the civil and military agents.

"IV. All fishing boats shall be compelled to return to the place from whence they sailed, and they shall not be admitted any where else, even under the pretence that they have received damage. If they shall be found to have any proof of having communicated with the enemy on board, such as strangers not belonging to their crews; the least packet of merchandize of any kind; letters or newspapers, they shall become the property of the Civil or Military Authorities who assist in seizing them, as soon as the legality of the seizure shall have been determined by the Judge, who must pronounce a definitive sentence in the course of fifteen days at farthest.

"V. All merchant vessels, whether bearing the Dutch, or a foreign flag, which shall attempt to enter any of the harbours or roads in the abovementioned districts, shall be warned off by a boat, and apprized that they will be fired upon by if they attempt to enter."

This Decree is stated to be the result of an engagement agreed upon by the two Emperors at Erfurth. They have, it is said, mutually pledged themselves that none of the ports or places under their control shall be open to any foreign commerce. The line of exclusion is to extend from St. Petersburgh to Bayonne. Our accounts also mention, that the vessels which were ready to sail were detained, their papers taken away, and it was expected their cargoes would all be re-landed.

They, moreover, notice a rumour, that the Emperor Alexander was pacifically inclined, but that Bonaparte was for strong measures, and upbraided the former with a disposition to renounce the principle of the engagements he had entered into at Tilsit.

PROVINCIALS.

BRIGHTON, OCT. 14.—A most severe and distressing accident occurred here the night before last. Mr. and Mrs. Ball, and Miss C. Henwood, having paid a visit to the fair at Steyning, in a whisky, had returned from thence between six and seven o'clock in the evening, and were proceeding along the Cliff, in the front of the town, to their residence on the Marine Parade. They had just reached the opening by the Gun Inn, where some boys were imprudently diverting themselves with letting off rockets, squibs, &c. one of which, we believe by accident, exploded very near to the horse. The animal was so alarmed by this circumstance, that he became unmanageable, and dashing furiously forward, brought himself in contact with a brewer's dray. Startled by the shock, he instantly dropped, the chaise being at the same suddenly overturned. Dreadful to relate, Miss Henwood, a blooming young woman, about twenty years of age, fell with such violence on the kitchen gratings of Mrs. Fox, fruiterer, two or three doors below the Star and Garter Tavern, as to fracture her skull above and about the temple. She has been insensible ever since; the skilful and worthy Sir Charles Blake, who attends her, gives no hopes of her ultimate recovery. Mrs. Ball, who fell on the steps of Mrs. Fox's house, is also so seriously injured that she now confined to her bed; and Mr. Ball, who is a surgeon of this place, has also received some material hurts. It was at first apprehended that the horse was dead; the animal, however, has recovered, and is likely to do well, though he has received other parts, that he can scarcely be rendered fit for servic

A ludicrous accident occurred to a Mrs. H. a dashing woman, who had been at Brighton some little time, on Thursday last. Mrs. H. had been taking an airing on horseback, with Mr. S. and had purposely diverged from the Lewes road, to enjoy the rural beauties of the Earl of Chichester's park, and the village of Stanmer, which is situated about the centre of it. Mrs. H. had been in the park but a short time, when she imagined that her horse betrayed symptoms of being thirsty, and instantly guided him to a pond there, to drink. Whether from having been for some days on the coast, an inhabitant of a watering place, he wished to be numbered among the most daring bathers of the season, or from whatever cause we know not, the animal, the moment he found himself foilock deep in the water, gently laid himself down, and took a willing and refreshing roll in the pond. The situation of Mrs. H. may be well imagined. Mr. dismounted, darted to her assistance, and in the end succeeded in extricating her from her unpleasant dilemma, but not before she had once or twice disappeared in the water and mud. Happily Mrs. H. received no material injury; and the residence of a peasant in Stanmer furnished her with dry habiliments.

WITCHCRAFT, MURDER, AND CREDULITY.

An artful and villainous plot, accompanied by the most unprecedented instances of credulity that ever engaged public attention, was lately developed before the Magistrates at the Rotation Office, Leeds. The parties were Mary Bateman, of Campfield, near this town, and William Perigo and his wife, of Bramley; she, the witch, and they the dupes. It appeared that in August, 1806, an application was made to this woman by Perigo, to cure his wife of a complaint which was not stated on the examination, but which we suppose to be what is called amongst people of her rank, "nervous," and amongst their betters, "the hip." Mary, with becoming modesty, declined to undertake the cure herself; but said, that she had a Friend at Scarbro', a Miss Blyth, who could "read the stars," and collect from them the knowledge requisite to remove all corporeal and mental maladies, and as a preliminary step required, that Perigo's wife should send her flannel petticoat to Miss Blyth, in order that she might from that article of dress collect a knowledge of her disorder: the petticoat was sent, and a prophitious answer returned, wherein it was required, that the Medium, Mary Bateman, through which all communication betwixt the Atrologer and Patient was to be made, should have four guinea notes presented to her, and she was in return to give Perigo four other guinea notes inclosed in a small bag, into which if either his own curiosity, or the still stronger curiosity of his wife, should induce them to look, the charm would be broken, and sudden death would be the consequence. Strange as it may appear, the wife of Perigo never looked into the enchanted bag to the day of her death. Soon after the four guineas had been given to Mary Bateman, a letter arrived from Scarbro', directing that another guinea should be paid into her hands. Similar requests were repeated and complied with, till forty guineas had been thus extorted from these infatuated people, under a promise, however, that they should by and by be allowed to open the bags, and these bags, they were told, would be found to contain all the money they had advanced.

About six months had now expired, and the business of fraud and delusion still went on. Miss Blyth could not, while certain planets ruled, sleep on her own bed; and in order to promote the comfort of the "wise woman," Perigo was to buy her a new bed, with all the necessary appendages, and send it to Mary Bateman, through whose hands it was to be transmitted to the nymph at Scarbro'. The bed, &c. which cost eight pounds, was bought, and notes to the amount of three pounds more, paid at various times into the hands of the Imposter. Unbounded in her extortions, she next demanded a set of china; this was also furnished to her; but she complained that the tea-canister was not sufficiently handsome to set before the genteel company kept by a lady of her distinction, and demanded a tea-caddy in its stead; which demand was also complied with.

Perigo and his wife, thus drained of all the money they had in the world, and all the sums their former good credit had enabled them to raise, and the wife's health still growing worse rather than better, they became impatient to look into the mysterious bags, and extract from them the wealth they contained. Their curious impatience probably became troublesome, when, it should seem, to silence their importunity, Mrs. Bateman delivered, as she said, a packet from Scarborough; this packet contained a powerful charm, which was to be mixed up in a pudding, to be prepared for the purpose, and of which Perigo and his wife were to eat, but on no account to allow any person to partake with them. They did eat, and there is but too much reason to suppose, that this vile woman had said within herself in the day you eat thereof you shall surely die. The husband eat sparing, he did not like the taste, but his illfated wife, less scrupulous, eat freely, they both became sick almost immediately and continued in the most deplorable situation for twenty-four hours; the wife lost the use of her limbs, and after languishing five days, died on the 24th of May, 1807, a victim of credulity. Perigo recovered, partially, but from that time to the present has never had the perfect use of his limbs. Part of the pudding was, by way of experiment, given to a cat, and it died; some fowls also picked up other parts of it, and shared the same fate. Contrary to the direction of Mary Bateman, Perigo applied to a surgeon in this town for advice, and was told by him that he had taken poison, but fortunately not in a quantity sufficiently large to occasion his death.

After the death of his wife, it is natural to suppose that the husband would have possessed sufficient fortitude to emancipate himself from the fangs of this wicked woman; this, however, was not the case, she had thrown her toils over him, and though the wife might not have been, as she supposed, bewitched, it is pretty evident the husband was under some such influence. From May 1807, till Wednesday last, the charm continued to operate, and the spell could not be dissolved.

At one time he went to Manchester by the direction of this Jezebel; at another he sent her one of his wife's gowns, again she contrived to coax or frighten him out of another gown, a petticoat, and the family bible! And last of all she demanded from him half a bushel of wheat, with three seven shilling pieces inclosed. His creditors, at length, became impatient, and the hopes of getting any part of his property back failing, he determined to brave all danger, and look into the mysterious bags—but what must have been his surprise and vexation to find that the contents of these bags were not worth one penny!! And to find himself a pauper, without property, and with a ruined constitution.

The bubble now burst: and after having kept the business an entire secret from every soul living, his wife alone excepted, for upwards of two years, he laid his hopeless case before some of his neighbours; by their direction Mary Bateman was apprehended; when brought before the Magistrates she in part confessed her delinquency, and admitted that there was no such person as Miss Blyth in existence, but that the whole was a mere phantom, conjured up to forward her vile purposes. The Magistrates have committed the offender to the House of Correction, whether to be tried for swindling practices, or to be removed from there to the County Gaol, there to take her trial for wilful murder, we are not informed.

On searching the house of this woman, (who has a husband and several children) the bed and some other articles, the property of William Perigo, amounting in value to about 10 or 12l. were found, and will be restored to the owner.

It is worthy of observation, that Mary Bateman is the person whose hen laid an egg, about two years ago, at the Bank, in this town, bearing this marvellous inscription, "Christ is coming."

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, Oct. 25, 1808.

His Majesty's ship Seahorse, off Skyro, July 6, 1808.

My Lord—I have the honour to inform your Lordship, that yesterday evening we observed two Turkish men of war and a galley coming round the east end of the island of Scopolo, towards which we immediately made sail. On coming near enough to make out that they were both single-decked ships, I determined to bring them to action, having every confidence in the officers and crew of this ship. The action began at half past nine, the Turks going a little off the wind under easy sail, and continually endeavouring to run us on board; indeed I early saw that their chief attention was directed to this object, and as the largest ship appeared of great force and full of men, I kept this ship in a position not to be boarded. At ten o'clock, observing a good opportunity of more particularly attacking the small ship to advantage, we dropped along side of her, and after a quarter of an hour's hot fire, at half pistol shot distance, her fire having totally ceased, we left her in a state of the greatest distress and confusion, with her sails mostly down, and just before we had left her, she had partially blown up forward. By this time the large frigate, which, from having fallen a little to leeward, had not been able to assist her consort, had again got pretty close up, and the action between us soon recommenced; still so obstinate was the resistance of the Turks, that it was not till a quarter past one we rendered her a motionless wreck. As they now would neither answer our fire, I conceived it most prudent, knowing the character of the people, to wait for daylight to send on board her. At day-light, observing her colours upon the stump of the mizen-mast, we poured a broadside into her stern, when she struck, and I had the pleasure to take possession of the Badere Zaffer, a very fine frigate of the largest dimensions, carrying 52 long brass guns, 24-pounders, on the main-deck, except two, which are forty-two pounders, and twelve-pounders on the quarter-deck and forecastle. She had a complement of five hundred men, and was commanded by Captain Scanderli Kichne Alli, who, I am informed, was only prevented by his own people from blowing her up. Her loss in killed and wounded is prodigious. One hundred and sixty-five killed, and one hundred and ninety-five wounded; ours comparatively small. Five killed and ten wounded. Our mizen-mast fell soon after the action, which is the greatest injury we have sustained. The other ship was named the Abs Fezan, carrying 24 thirteen-pounders and two mortars, commanded by Captain Daragardi Alli, with a complement of 230 men. I understand they took most of the men out of the galley before the action, and sent her away. Having now, my Lord, given you the details of this affair, there only remains the pleasant office of recommending to you the Officers and ship's company, who, during a tedious night action, where much depended upon working the sails as well as the guns, behaved in a manner to command my utmost gratitude.

The disparity of force, with the loss in the enemy's ships, will prove the greatness of their exertions, to which I shall add, that 30 men were absent from the ship. Mr. Downie, the First Lieutenant, is an officer of merit, ability, and experience; and I beg strongly to recommend him to your Lordship's protection for promotion. Mr. Lester, Master's-mate, who has passed, is also very deserving of promotion. Thomas Hully, Gunner's-mate, and an excellent man, acted as gunner; and, from his conduct, is very deserving of such a situation. I am now proceeding with the prize for any port I can get first into amongst the islands, as it is with difficulty we can keep her above water.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) JOHN STEWART.

The Right Hon. Lord Collingwood, Commander in Chief, &c.

His Majesty's ship Porcupine, at Sea, July 14, 1808.

My Lord,—I have the honour to inform your Lordship, that on the morning of the 9th instant, being off Mount Circello, on the coast of Romania, I observed two French gun-boats, with a merchant vessel under convoy, going alongshore to the westward. As the ship was becalmed, I sent Lieutenant Price with the boats in pursuit of them: after a row of eight hours, in a hot sun, he drove the latter on shore, and forced the gun-boats to take shelter under the batteries of Port Dango. At this time, seeing three very suspicious vessels coming down with a fresh breeze from the westward, I was obliged to recal him; but before we could cut them off, they also got into the same harbour. Next morning I observed that one of them, a large polacre ship, lay further out than the others, and having reconnoitred, thought it possible to take her: I was the more induced to try it, from a wish to give a check to the trade along this coast, which they think, from their numerous batteries, they can carry on without molestation. As soon as it was dark the boats went in, under the command of Lieut. Price, and, from under the heaviest fire I ever saw, brought her out. She carries eight long six-pounder guns, and had on board between twenty and thirty men, from Hieres Bay, bound to Naples with salt. When I consider that this vessel was moored to a beach, lined with French soldiers, within pistol shot of two batteries and a tower, and of three gun-boats, carrying each a 24 pounder, and 30 men; that from the baffling winds she was an hour and 20 minutes before she got out of range of grape, and that the enemy were at first perfectly prepared for the attack, I cannot find words to express my admiration at the intrepid conduct of all officers, seamen, and marines employed in it. I am sure that the services of Lieutenant Price, he having been more than 30 times in action with the boats of this ship since October last, and his sufferings on this occasion, being severely wounded on the head and right leg, will be a sufficient excuse for my requesting, in the strongest terms, that your Lordship will recommend this gallant officer to the consideration of the Lords of the Admiralty. Inclosed are the names of the officers employed in the boats, and a list of the wounded, all of whom, I am happy to say, are likely to do well; fortunately we had none killed. I am, &c.

HENRY DUNCAN, Captain.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The meeting of the Freeholders of the County of Essex, in the Shire-hall at Chelmsford, on Friday last, excited the warmest degree of interest and participation in the minds of the public. The purpose, for which they were convened, was so truly momentous, that we fondly anticipated a result very different from that which has taken place. The individuals, who were most vociferous and indecent in their cries for adjournment, have, unfortunately, not reflected enough on the consequences of the precedent they have given. We expected dignity and dispassionate conduct on so serious a business; and did not believe that any person would employ oblique insinuations, or irrelevant remarks, to distract the attention of the assembly from the main point in agitation. The conduct of those, who voted for an inquiry, was moderate, dignified, and always relative to the question; it is to be lamented, that the persons who voted on the other side, were not influenced by the example. The strong indignation, which the first intelligence of the Armistice and Convention of Cintra produced, had subsided; and the public, in conformity with maxims of British justice, demanded an impartial and immediate inquiry into a transaction, which they consider as disgraceful to the national honour, and highly injurious to the interests of our allies. On no one occasion, for the last fifty years, have the people manifested more moderation, we were almost tempted to say, unwarrantable lenity, than they have on the present. They were sensible that their character was strongly implicated by the ignominious business; and they were willing to give every credit to government for its sincere desire to institute an immediate investigation. Labouring under this conviction, they thought it expedient and loyal to give weight to the determination of Ministers by seconding it with their petitions to the throne. A vague rumour had gone abroad, that a powerful family had influence enough to counteract the honest exertions of some Members of the Cabinet, whose talents, independence, and integrity, justified the opinion, that they were favourable to an Inquiry; and the Cities of London and Westminster immediately came forward in support of these honest Servants of the Crown. The Answer returned to the Petition of the former, so far from invalidating this report, was considered as an undeniable proof of this undue influence; and the Public felt a stronger desire to interpose between the Royal ear and the troublesome cries of an obnoxious and interested Party. Such we believe, were the impressions under which the several Meetings were convened; and not, as was very insidiously, very imprudently, and in a manner very insulting to the acknowledged generosity of the British Nation, to promote the designs of Faction, or to supersede the usual forms of Justice. In order to give a direct contradiction to so unjustifiable an assertion, the Freeholders of Essex were invited to assemble, and an uncommon degree of interest was attached to a Meeting, where, from the maritime situation of the county, a number of Naval and Military Officers were expected to attend. It was a kind of National Synod, where representatives from the Army, the Navy, and People were assembled to give their opinion on a subject which was equally disgraceful to all. However, serious and impressive as these motives have been, a majority of that very Meeting, with a perfect disregard for the feelings of the Country, and the opinion of Europe and Posterity, have felt no repugnance to vote an adjournment, on a question the most momentous, the most comprehensive, that was ever submitted to discussion. It was a question of right they had to decide on, as well as to express their strong sense of disapprobation of a transaction, which their KING himself had told them was disgraceful and unexpected; and we had the mortification to see one member, who was repeatedly called to order for incorrect statements, and travelling out of the record, come forward with an assurance we did not expect from him, or any other man in this country, to defend the necessity, and even prove the advantage of this very Armistice and Convention, which have occasioned so much regret, disappointment, and shame, to the people of the United Kingdom. We are very much mistaken in the sentiments of our SOVEREIGN, if the efforts of this Mr. BRAGGTON to defend a measure so detrimental to the character of the Nation and Government, will be received with any other feeling than contempt and disapprobation. He is egregiously deceived if he thinks that his zeal in a cause so repulsive to the Royal mind, as insulting to the popular feeling, shall be requited in any other manner. We abandon him and his colleagues to the honourable task of defending a transaction which, even the individuals who signed it consider so ignominious, that they probably would, with the sacrifice of their very lives, clear their character, if possible, from any share in the abominable disgrace.

To point out their conduct in the clearest light it is only necessary to contrast it with the spirited resolutions adopted, on Thursday last, by the Common Council of London. That day was an honourable one for that respectable Corporation; and, if we except a certain SAMUEL DIXON, and an Alderman BIRCH, who, we recollect, came boldly forward as advocates for inquiry on a former day, there was an unanimity of opinion evinced, and a spirit displayed, which we thought interred in the tombs of BECKFORD, CROSBY, and WILKES. The contemptible minority of two, we alluded to, thought, on a former occasion, that their votes in favour of investigation should be acceptable to their patrons; but as soon as they began to discover contrary sentiments in that quarter, they were eager, by their obsequiousness and servility, to prove that their conduct, in the first stage of the business, was not an insolent affectation of independence; but proceeded from their conviction, that it might have been conformable to the wishes of their superiors. They made poor people, a most egregious blunder; and we are very much deceived in one, if he would not give the tip of his little finger, that he had been more discreet and circumspect. His waywardness has done him an injury which years of submissiveness and want of principle shall not be able to obliterate.

We received, yesterday afternoon, Spanish Papers to the 22d inst. which communicate the highly-pleasing intelligence of the re-occupation of Bilboa by the Spanish Army under the command of General BLAKE. This interesting event took place on the 13th inst. The whole of the French army, amounting, it is said, to no more than 43,000 men, have made a retrograde movement towards their own frontiers. These Papers also state the return of the Messenger who was dispatched to the Central Junta. He brought back an answer authorising the landing of the troops under Sir DAVID BAIRD. The disembarkation was to take place the following day.

The Semiramis also arrived on the 20th at Corunna, having on board Mr. FREER, our Ambassador to the Supreme Central Junta, and the Marquis de la ROMANA. They were received with extraordinary marks of honour; and, as soon as they landed, the mules were taken from their carriage, which was drawn by the people, amidst the loudest acclamations, to the Government House. A general illumination took place, the same evening, on the occasion. The Semiramis had a million of dollars on board for the use of the Spanish army. Letters were also received at Corunna from Lisbon, which mention the embarkation of 14,000 British, and 4000 Spanish troops, for Catalonia. Sir JOHN MOORE commenced his march on the 5th for Spain.

We have so often eulogised the Spaniards, and recommended their cause, that it would be perfectly superfluous to make any more professions of the lively participation we take in every thing that has the most remote tendency to advance their interests, or contribute to their success. We never entertained the slightest doubt of their ultimately succeeding in chacing beyond their frontiers, the base rabble, as they themselves energetically call the enemy. However high our opinion of their character and exertions has been, we acknowledge they have far surpassed the sanguine expectations we entertained in their favour. They have been always an honorable and a brave people; they are now become a very great one. How much we admire their patience under privations and the most harassing duties of war! How much circumspection do they combine with the most enterprising activity. Their Statsemen, their soldiers, their clergy, and their private citizens display unrivalled marks of disinterested attachment to their country, and captive monarch. What are now become of the tyrant's vaunted legions, who, like the Romans, are expected to triumph, in a single campaign on the Ebro, the Vistula, and the Euphrates. They are brow-beaten, the miserable slaves of the most unprincipled and capricious tyrant. Such wretches, driven from their homes with the scorpion whip of despotism, to subjugate a community of irritated freemen in arms! what a curious and instructive example does Bonaparte at present receive with insolent fastidiousness, the homage of vassal Monarchs and of fifty Princes, whilst his remorseless and perfidious heart is agitated to frenzy by the disastrous accounts he receives from the Pyrenees. Should NEY be pursued as far as the Garonne by the United British and Spanish Armies; and if he were to receive the fulminating intelligence in the midst of this brilliant cortège, how we should like to see the impression it would make on the face of the insolent Upstart. The degraded Princes who obsequiously crouch before his throne, how they must sink with shame and confusion, when they compare their infamy and humiliation with the glory and independence of the Spaniards. Miserable wretches! in order to preserve their cooks, their mistresses, their harlequins, their Italian singers, their flatterers, and their pimps, they submit to a drudgery and debasement, to which the most pinching poverty, or all the horrors of the most loathsome dungeon would be trifling in the opinion of some of their predecessors. Should PETER the GREAT be suddenly restored to life, and hear that one of his immediate descendants had quitted his throne and kingdom to do homage to a Corsican, he would wish the earth might re-open and swallow him up, in order not to witness this monstrous humiliation: All the effects of his creative genius, and of CATHARINE's comprehensive policy are frustrated by this weak, unthinking Monarch. The pillage and marauding warfare of his Cossacks and Tartars in Finland, and his attempts to rob his gallant brother-in-law of that province, are a poor compensation to his dishonored subjects, for the disgraceful part he acts at present. He has done every thing in his power to gratify the animosity and rancour of BONAPARTE against the KING of SWEDEN; but the day of retribution shall come, when he will have cause to bewail his own infatuation, and the perfidious councils of the traitor ROMANZOW. The discontent of the Russian Nobles has hurled more powerful Sovereigns than ALEXANDER from their thrones. Sincerely do we regret the dishonorable and impolitic part he is playing. The Philanthropist and Philosopher entertained such sanguine expectations from the first years of his reign; and he has sacrificed his honor, the love of his subjects, the aggrandisement of Russia, and the veneration of mankind, to the approbation of a murderer.

The campaign in Finland has terminated in an indefinite Armistice. The Swedes have gained immortal honor in the exertions they made to recover that province from the Russians; but the latter poured such strong reinforcements into the country, that Field-Marshal KLINGSPOR was reduced to the reluctant necessity of concluding a cessation of hostilities, in order to save a part of the army, which was in danger of being cut off by the enemy. This gallant veteran evinced some time ago a wish to retire; but as soon as this reverse occurred to his country, he wrote to his Sovereign, and said, that as he shared the triumphs of the Swedish army he would not abandon it in its misfortunes. It is difficult to decide whether this armistice will lead to a peace between the two powers. Every thing relative to the attainment of so desirable an object, depends on the impressions Alexander receives at Erfurth. If he return dissatisfied, the first consequence of his discontent will be the restitution of Finland; but if the tyrant continues to exercise over his mind the fatal influence he acquired during the conferences at Tilsit, there is no doubt but he will prosecute with renewed vigour, a war he undertook for no other object than to gratify the hatred of Bonaparte.

Our Cabinet has finally determined upon the Answer which they ought to give to the Proposition received from the Emperor of Russia, and from Bonaparte; and yesterday morning Mr. Shaw, one of the King's Messengers, left London, with the ultimatum of the British Government, he will sail in a flag of truce, to Boulogne, and proceed to Erfurth with his dispatches.

THE COURT.

Yesterday, about twelve o'clock his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, where he was received by the Dukes of York, Kent, Cumberland, and Sussex. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private levee, when the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:

Lieutenant-General Thornton, on his promotion to the 2d Major of the First Regiment of Guards.

Hugh Elliott, Esq. upon his being appointed Captain-General and Governor of the Leeward Islands.

Brigadier-General Nightingale, upon his return from Portugal, and leave of absence.

Admiral Tyler, who brought the Russian Fleet to England, by Earl Camden, upon his promotion and return from Lisbon.

The Marquis of Douglas, upon his return from St. Petersburgh.

His Excellency Le Chevalier de Brinckmoney, the Swedish Ambassador, by Mr. Canning. After which, his Excellency had a private audience of his Majesty, and delivered his credentials. He was most graciously received.

Le Chevalier D'Adlerberg, the late Swedish Ambassador, took leave of his Majesty, previous to his leaving England.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, the Cabinet Ministers present, the Marquis of Douglas, and Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, who laid before his Majesty the proceedings of some Courts Martial.

About seven o'clock his Majesty set off on his return to Windsor.

COMMON COUNCIL.

THE CONVENTION.

The Common Council of London assembled on Thursday, to receive the Answer to their Address, on the subject of the Convention which terminated the Campaign in Portugal. The Recorder having read the Answer,

Mr. Waithman rose and addressed the Court—He could, he said, not allow this Answer to pass without some observations, stating it at the same time to be his intention to propose such a Resolution founded upon it as the nature of the case appeared to demand. He conceived the Corporation of London had a right to approach the Throne with petitions and remonstrances, even although his Majesty might have expressed an intention of adopting such proceedings as they might recommend. It was proper that the King should be acquainted with the state of public opinion on all occasions, whether for or against the measures of his Ministers, and it was the duty, as well as the privilege of the subject to give that information to the Crown. It was the mode established by the Constitution, for conveying the truth to the ear of the Sovereign, in spite of the machinations of those around him who might wish to keep him in darkness. This was not a right conceded by the Crown as a favour; but one required and demanded at the Revolution as essential to our civil liberties, and to be exercised without obstruction or censure. (Hear! Hear!) It appeared from the Records of the Court, that they had often gone up with petitions and remonstrances to the Throne, drawn up in a style and spirit much less humble than their late Address, and yet the answers had not been of so repulsive a description. But the degrading reply which they had just heard read, they had drawn upon themselves; and if it had been merely a severe lecture upon their past conduct, he owned he would not have been sorry. During the last twenty years, a period distinguished for the most momentous occurrences that ever called for the interposition of any body of men, the Court of Common Council had scarcely ever exercised its right of petitioning or remonstrating, except some years ago on the high price of provisions, when they petitioned for convening the Parliament. But during all that time they not only did not omit, but eagerly sought for occasions of congratulation. They were ever forward to shew their zeal for prerogative and the rights of the Crown; but no anxiety appeared to guard the privileges of the other branches of the Constitution. Occasion was taken in the Answer, to remind the Corporation, "that it was inconsistent with the principles of British justice, to pronounce judgment without previous investigation." How it was possible to construe the Address, so as to imagine that it had pronounced judgment previous to investigation, he did not know. It called for inquiry certainly—it called for punishment on the guilty, without pretending to point out where the guilt rested. That was the matter to be investigated; and if no guilt was found, then of course there could be no punishment. When our arms by land were attended with such constant disasters, and these sometimes following victories, it was time to exercise our constitutional privileges of petitioning for inquiries with vigour and perseverance. But it was said, "that recent circumstances might have convinced us that his Majesty was at all times ready to institute inquiries, on occasions in which the character of the country, or the honour of his arms were concerned;" and that the interposition of the City of London was unnecessary." He supposed the allusion must be to General Whitelocke and Sir H. Popham. But yet it was perfectly well known, that though the greatest attention and ingenuity had been shewn in squeezing money out of the pockets of the people, it was found almost impossible to prevent the embezzling of their property, or to get the offenders brought to justice. The strongest attempts had been made to prevent the bringing of Lord Melville to trial—and the business of Alexander Davidson had not as yet been publicly investigated. He had been told that Ministers would institute an inquiry into the business at the Helder, but no investigation had taken place—and would they be more earnest to institute an inquiry into the causes of the Convention which they had announced as a victory, than into the business of the Helder, which had been allowed to be a great calamity? (Hear! Hear!) The situation of the army in Holland had been, according to the account of Officers who were there, the most horrid that could well be imagined—men perishing in the snow, amidst plains where they could have no shelter, with other circumstances almost too shocking to describe—yet no investigation had taken place into the causes of the evacuation of Holland. What need he mention the case of Quiberon, where arms for 28,000 had been delivered by us, and afterwards turned against ourselves? What need he mention the affair at Ferrol, where the inhabitants were seen coming out humbly with the keys by 18,000 men who had landed, as if to take a survey, but where, the keys being taken for guns, the whole army was hastily embarked? No inquiry had been instituted into these disastrous events. Expensive expeditions were every now and then proposed, trusting to chance for an object; and were the people who bore the expence to be obstructed and reproved for calling for investigation as to the mismanagement of these expeditions? Many other cases might be mentioned, if it were necessary. As to General Whitelocke, it was not to this day known who had procured his appointment. All that was known was, that he had been appointed under one Administration, and brought to trial by another. Sir H. Popham had been appointed by one, brought to trial by another, and after being reprimanded by a Court-Martial, was again taken into favour by a third. Lord Melville, to be sure, had been acquitted—very properly, no doubt—he could not now contest that—but, notwithstanding the very considerable minority against him, and the Resolution on the Journals of the House of Commons, he was taken into favour at Court, and had a considerable share in advising the measures of the present Administration. If the same system were pursued in our army as in our navy, the same consequences would follow. The men were the same; the difference was only in the way of managing them. Sensible of the importance of promoting inquiries by every possible means, he could not but think the answer to the Petition of the City of London very ill-judged, to say the least of it. He would move, therefore, that it be entered on the Journals, with the following resolutions expressive of the opinion entertained of it by the Representatives of the City of London in the Common Council.

RESOLVED,

That his Majesty's Answer be entered on the Journals. That at the same time this Court cannot forbear declaring it as their opinion, that the Address and Petition presented to his Majesty by this Court on Wednesday the 12th instant, was conceived in the most dutiful and respectful terms; that it is the undoubted right of the subject to petition, and that this right ought at all times to be freely exercised in all matters of public grievance, without obstruction or reproof.

That they are, therefore, at a loss to know by what construction of their said Petition, however strained or perverted, his Majesty's Advisers could attribute to them any intention of desire "to pronounce judgment, without previous investigation."

That they are equally at a loss to know why his Majesty's Advisers should have deemed it necessary to remind them, "That it was inconsistent with the principles of British Justice," unless to throw an unmerited odium on this Corporation, and raise a barrier between them and the Crown, on all occasions where their object is free and constitutional inquiry.

That had this Court refrained from expressing to his Majesty their feelings at the humiliating termination of the campaign in Portugal, they must have ceased to feel—to think—to act as Britons, and have shewn themselves unsusceptible of that patriotism so essentially necessary for the preservation of their liberties—the maintenance of their national honour—and the independence and security of his Majesty's Crown and Dominions.

They cannot, therefore, sufficiently express their concern, that they should, by any suggestions, have met with obstruction and reprehension in the exercise of this undoubted and invaluable right.

That they particularly regret that his Majesty should have been advised to express a hope "that recent occurrences would have convinced them that his Majesty is at all times ready to institute inquiries on occasions in which the character of the country, or the honour of his Majesty's arms is concerned; and that the interposition of the City of London could not be necessary for inducing his Majesty to direct due inquiry into a transaction, which had disappointed the hopes and expectations of the nation."

Because it appears, that during the eventful period of the last 15 years, various enterprizes and expeditions have been undertaken, "in which the character of the country, and the honour of his Majesty's arms, were concerned," which have grievously failed, and "disappointed the hopes and expectations of the nation," and into which, "due inquiry" has not been made. That in one of the recent occurrences to which his Majesty's Answer refers, it is not known even at the present moment by whose advice the Commander in Chief was appointed, or on what account such Commander was selected.

That during all these calamitous events, and wasteful profusion of blood and treasure, the public burthens have been patiently borne, and his Majesty has not been called upon by "the interposition of the City of London" (if their humble supplication must be so termed) to institute inquiries into these failures; although it appears to them that such "interposition" might have been highly necessary and beneficial to the country, and, by promoting "due inquiry," precluded the necessity of their late application.

That during these unhappy reverses, and while his Majesty's subjects submitted to so many privations, the most shameful and scandalous abuses and peculations have prevailed, into which due inquiry has not been made so as to bring to justice such great public delinquents.

That whoever advised his Majesty to put so unfavourable and unwarrantable a construction on their late Petition, has abused the confidence of his Sovereign, and is equally an enemy to his Majesty's and the just rights of his People.

That they do not attribute guilt to any one, much less do they pronounce judgment without previous investigation. They ask for investigation, prompt and rigid investigation, and the punishment of guilt wherever it may be found.

Mr. S. Dixon insisted that the Answer ought to be entered separately, and asked the Recorder, whether this was not the usual practice? The Recorder replied, that it was the practice to propose the Motion for entering the Answer separately first; and if any thing was intended to be added, to move it as an Amendment.—Mr. Waithman observed, that he would contend against all the Lawyers in Westminster Hall, that the Court might do as it pleased, as there was no standing order on the point. This was at any rate an extraordinary occasion, and required an extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. Quin said, the answer was to be regarded as that of the Ministers, since, constitutionally speaking, the King could do no wrong. It was then the answer of the Ministers, and he believed it might be considered as the answer of the Noble Lord, by whom it was delivered. What strange crime did the Noble Lord suppose the City to have committed by this interposition? Other places, however, in spite of his intended check, had chosen to partake in the guilt. Winchester had interposed—so had Westminster, Berkshire, &c. In 1621 the Parliament remonstrated with James the First, who had come from Scotland replete with despotic notions, about the system of policy which he pursued. The reply was, "that the Parliament ought not to interpose in any prerogative matter, except the King was pleased to desire it." This prerogative extended to all points of the King's public duty. Such was the notion of the right of interposition under the Stuarts; and the Noble Lord who delivered the answer appeared to have taken his ideas on the subject from this source. The City of London, therefore, ought not to interpose unless his Majesty was pleased to desire it! But it ought to be recollected, that these despotic principles drove the Stuarts from the throne. Had Magna Charta—had the Bill of Rights, and the other great documents securing our liberties, been forgotten? Had the Noble Lord looked at the first of William, where the right to petition was recognised? In the reigns of Henry and Elizabeth, even while the Constitution was floating between life and death, the answers were less insulting than that now read. Even Charles the First had treated the Remonstrance of the City of London with more respect. To keep the truth from the ear of the Sovereign was the surest way to bring a Government into contempt. This had lately been exemplified in the case of Spain. We ought to learn wisdom from experience. The Ministers received flattery with smiles, but turned up their noses at the truth. It became the Court, however, to have a due sense of its own dignity, and to act as became the Representatives of the City of London; not with a view of pleasing any Ministers, but with a single eye to the common weal. This he hoped it would do on the present occasion. The whole of the Motion of his worthy Friend had his hearty concurrence.

Mr. S. Dixon opposed the Resolution. A great deal had been said of the dignity of this Court; but was not the dignity of the Sovereign also to be consulted? This Court had exercised its right in petitioning, and his Majesty had also exercised his right in the answer which he had thought proper to give. He should move, therefore, by way of amendment, that the rest of the Resolution after the words "inserted on the Journals," be left out.

The Recorder here again read the original and amended Resolutions, in doing so, he by a lapsus described his Majesty's Answer as "grievous" instead of "gracious," and thereby occasioned considerable laughter in the Court.

Mr. Alderman Birch wished the Court to consider the subject fully and deliberately, and not come to any hasty or intemperate resolution, which the case would not warrant. He knew as well as any Member of the Court, that his Majesty's subjects had an undoubted right to address their Sovereign upon any subject, and at any time they might desire; but he also knew, that it was the Sovereign's undoubted prerogative to give whatever answer he might please. That was a doctrine sufficiently understood, and if it were not admitted, would be highly prejudicial to the country. He knew of cases having occurred, and he thought such might occur again, where the Citizens of London had presented addresses full of insult and abuse; and if his Majesty should not be at liberty to make a discretionary answer, the most important branch of the Constitution would virtually become annihilated. In his opinion, the answer made to the address could be viewed in no other light than as emanating from the Sovereign personally; and their censuring it would not tend to discredit Administration but his Majesty.

Mr. Deputy Goodbehere said he considered the answer of his Majesty to the City Address, as being highly injudicious, improper, and dangerous. When one and all ought to be united with one heart and one hand, as an independent nation, the City of London had been loaded with insult and degradation.

Mr. Alderman Combe did not question the right of his Majesty to return what answer he chose to such addresses as that Court, or any other Body, or number of individuals, might present to him. All he contended for was, the right of that Court to state the sensation which they felt on receiving an answer, such as the present to any Address which they might have presented to his Majesty. The Address to which the answer in question had been returned, was not to be treated as if it had been the Address of a Faction, or of a short majority. It was the unanimous Address of that Court, breathing a sentiment unanimously adopted throughout the country. The affront thrown on the Court, therefore, in the answer which had been made to it, was uncalled for and unnecessary.

Mr. Waithman contended, that it was a fundamental principle in the British Constitution, "that the King can do no wrong," the Ministers must, and always did, take the responsibility of all the Sovereign's public acts upon themselves. He said, that the Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dixon) was generally cautious not to get beyond his depth, and that on subjects wherein he was incompetent to advance reason, he never condescended to attempt it. The worthy Alderman (Birch) had that day appeared in a new character, by attempting to reply; but he trusted that, as it was his first attempt, and from the manner in which he had managed it, so it would be the last. Few men, he said, had the assurance to maintain, that the King was his own Minister; and if the principle were now admitted, the liberties of England are extinct. Such was the doctrine that ruined the monarchy of Spain. He was anxious that a question of so much vital importance should not be treated with levity, but considered seriously and deliberately. The country was woefully destitute of the superior talents which ought to rule the state in its unprecedented circumstances. On former occasions, Ministers used to drug the people into wild and extravagant projects by every artifice; but the Spanish cause had excited the national feeling unashnoosly, and the people dragged Ministers to perform their duty. He concluded with hoping, that the motions he had the honour of making would be acceded to unanimously.

The question was put, and the original motion carried by a great majority.

Mr. Waithman then rose, and said, that the Court ought to proceed much further than they had done, and to examine the foundation of the disasters which had lately befallen the country. He proposed to address the Sovereign on the subject of military appointments, and to pray for the speedy assembling of Parliament, that they might advise on the measures to be taken in support of our Allies.

Mr. Box, Mr. Dixon, and several other Members opposed the latter propositions of Mr. Waithman, on the ground that the Court were not apprised of his intention to bring them forward.

Mr. Birch said, that all military appointments were the prerogative of his Majesty, and that the people had no right to call for a disclosure of the circumstances which induced the Sovereign to make them.

Mr. Waithman agreed to withdraw the clause relating to military appointment; and a Committee was appointed to draw up an Address, conformably to his original motion.

COUNTY OF ESSEX MEETING.

Friday there was a numerous meeting of Freeholders at Chelmsford, in consequence of a public notice from the Sheriff, to consider of an Address to his Majesty on the late Convention in Portugal.

The hall was completely filled at twelve o'clock, which was the hour appointed for the Meeting.

The High Sheriff read the requisition, in compliance with which he had convened the County.

The Earl of St. Vincent then came forward and said, that it had been assigned to him to state to the Freeholders what were the grounds and objects of the requisition, and the nature of the Address which was to be submitted to their consideration. He should, in the first instance, both in his own name and in the name of those who joined with him in the requisition, entirely disclaim the idea of casting any censure on the conduct of any particular Officers. The Officers employed on the Expedition to Portugal had enjoyed an unblemished reputation before their arrival in that country, and he knew that some of them had previously acquired a high character. Without, however, considering who were the individuals on whom the criminality attached in the present instance, he must say that he felt that so foul a stain had never been cast on the military character of the country, since the days of the tyrannical and detestable reign of the family of the Stuarts. This most inglorious Convention of Cintra had lowered the just pride of England among the nations of the earth, and had roused the most unanimous feelings of indignation against its authors, not only in this country, but in the minds of our allies, and of all Europe. It was the duty of his Majesty's subjects to approach his throne with dutiful and loyal addresses, praying him to cause a strict and effectual inquiry to be made into the causes of that transaction, which had, to use his Majesty's own words, "disappointed the hopes and expections of the nation."

It certainly was not his object, nor the wish of those who joined him in the requisition, to prejudge any thing, or impute criminality to any particular individual. If he were allowed to express himself by a strong but homely proverb, what he wanted was, "that the saddle should be put upon the right horse." It appeared to him that the Ministers themselves were liable to great suspicion. It had been said, by many officers who were employed upon the expedition to Portugal, that the preparations were most wretchedly deficient in many points; that the army had not been properly supplied with what the French call "munitions de guerre et bouche," or, as we would call it, ammunition and provisions. It was said, that with the great army which sailed to Portugal, there was not artillery enough sent to reduce even the few miserable forts about Lisbon. He called them miserable forts, because he had himself seen them, and examined their strength. If Ministers had been so very deficient in their preparations, it became the duty of the people of England to call upon his Majesty for the fullest inquiry into the circumstances; and if they did not call for an inquiry, they would be acting unworthy of their ancestors. If ever the right of addressing his Majesty could properly be exercised upon any occasion, he thought it could most properly be exercised on the present occasion, in which the honour of his Majesty's arms and of the country were so deeply involved. It was to be observed that while such shameful events were occurring the means of corruption were increasing in the hands of the Ministers. After further observations, his Lordship concluded by moving an Address to his Majesty, expressive of their loyalty and attachment to his person and Government, and, at the same time, of their strong feeling for the honour of his Majesty's arms and the character of the country, and praying him to institute such an inquiry as would lead to the discovery of the real causes and authors of the Convention in Portugal.

Mr. Western read the Address, which was to be submitted to their consideration.

Mr. Du Cane warmly supported the motion of the Noble Lord. He agreed with the universal sentiment in reprobating the Convention at Cintra, as a most disgraceful transaction, and in thinking that the right of petitioning the Throne could hardly be ever exercised on a more important or proper occasion. It had been said, that such an interference would be prejudging the case of individuals. He could not see the justice of such an observation; nor did he see how the nation could avoid forming an opinion that guilt or misconduct attached somewhere, when they compared the Gazette which had announced a glorious victory over the whole of the French army, with that Armistice and Convention by which we engaged to send the French home in British ships. It appeared to him very important that the sense of the nation should be distinctly pronounced upon this Convention, as that might wipe away, in some degree, the stain which our character had received, of being wanting in good faith to our allies, and of being careless of their interests.

Mr. Burgoyne moved the adjournment from the Hall to the open air, which was put and carried.

The Meeting then adjourned, and the Petition was again read and supported by Mr. Du Cane, with arguments similar to what he had before adduced.

Mr. Conyers (who was on horseback) then addressed the Meeting. He said, that he felt as much as any man for the honour of the country, and would do as much to support it. He, therefore, congratulated the country on their feeling with respect to the Convention, but did not think it proper or decent to address his Majesty for an inquiry when his Majesty had pledged himself to the nation that he would institute an inquiry. He thought Gentlemen should at least treat his Majesty with as much respect as they treated one another, and not act towards him in a way that one private gentleman could not with impunity act to another. He thought, that in bringing forward this question, there was something of party motives, and that he saw a snake in the grass. A great canvass had been made to induce the Freeholders to support it; and it had been said, that the Earl of Essex and the Marquis of Buckingham approved of it. He had the honour of personal friendship with the Earl of Essex, but on the present occasion he would not ask what was the opinion of the Earl of Essex, but what was the opinion of the Freeholders of Essex. As to the Marquis of Buckingham, he considered him as the most successful political speculator in the country. He had got more places and pensions for himself and his family than any other man in the kingdom. His family still bear "blushing honours thick upon them," although in opposition to his Majesty's Ministers, and would certainly not be sorry to have their great talents called again into employment, and receive still farther rewards. Not meaning to express an opinion favourable to the Convention, and at the same time wishing to avoid any personal disrespect to his Majesty, he moved that the meeting should adjourn.

Mr. Bramston seconded the motion for adjournment. He conceived any Address to his Majesty, in the present stage of the business, as being unnecessary and unjust. It was unnecessary, in as far as his Majesty had already declared, that an inquiry into the transactions in question was to take place; and to doubt his Majesty's declaration on this head, was to treat him with disrespect and suspicion. On considering the Articles of the Convention, he confessed that he could not contend that they were not in some respects reprehensible; but, at the same time, he could not admit them, comparatively speaking, so decidedly calamitous as they were generally represented. They bore in many respects, and that too in their most objectionable features, a great similarity to the conclusion of one of the most gallant and brilliant campaigns in which this country had been engaged in modern times.—He meant the campaign in Egypt, for which the gallant Officer who commanded in it had been rewarded with a peerage and pension. By the terms of the Convention it had been stipulated, that the French should evacuate Egypt at two different periods, of three and five months. A certain number of cannon was to be carried away, for the conveyance of which three transports were to be allowed, and more if they could be procured. They were also to have ten rounds of ammunition; indemnity was granted to all those who might have taken up arms in favour of the French, and the sequestrations which had been laid on the property of all such were removed, and the property itself restored to the proprietors. In all these features the Convention in Egypt resembled the Convention in Portugal.

The Sheriff put the question of adjournment, by desiring that those who were for the petition should go to his right hand, and those who were for the adjournment should go to the left. The majority appeared for the adjournment, and consequently the original motion was lost.

Ghostly Counsel—if it be not backed
With shew of love, at least with hopeful proof
Of some sincerity on the giver's part;
Or be dishonor'd in the exterior form
Or made of its conveyance by such tricks
As move derision, or by foppish airs
And histrionic mummery, that let down
The pulpit to the level of the stage;
Drops from the lips a disregarded thing.—The Task.

REV. ISAAC SAUNDERS.

WHILE it is incumbent on him whose writings are supposed to influence public opinion, not to disguise those defects which are open to observation and obnoxious to animadversion, still it must be always more grateful to himself, and perhaps as useful to society, when the writer is enabled to exhibit characters of real excellence,—promising to obtain the esteem due to private integrity, and candidates for the approbation that is honorably awarded to public ability. Let us sometimes contemplate the favorable aspect of human affairs. It is honest, it is consoling, it is generous, it is animating, to discover worth for ourselves, and then openly to commend it to the attention of others. Where, indeed, is the delectation of incessantly brooding over dissatisfactory and desponding conceptions; aggravating those evils which, if not unavoidable, are continually incidental to mortal existence, and refusing either to discern the beauties or enjoy the blessings of our condition?

Without being unapprised of the errors and vices of the age, I confess, for myself, that I can frequently derive consolation from the virtues, and delight from the information, of my contemporaries. Checquered and mixed as this scene of action undoubtedly is, still, amidst depravity and ignorance and dishonor, I can every where see illustrious evidences of worth, intelligence, and talents. If it is demanded of me to apply this sentiment to the object that is more immediately in my view, I am perfectly contented. It has been so long the fashion to complain of the clergy, without troubling ourselves to investigate the fact, that what at first was perhaps erroneously asserted, generally speaking, has, by repitition, become almost indubitably admitted. The system, however, has had one good effect. Accusation naturally roused enquiry; enquiry produced circumspection; and the result is, even at the present hour, that we now possess an uncommon number of truly able and eminent clergymen, while, at the same time, several young divines, emulous of adorning the most important of all professions, are rising rapidly into reputation. Our church is really indebted to its adversaries. Schism has awakened energy; and infidelity has called forth ability.

ISAAC SAUNDERS, the divine of whom I proceed to detail some short particulars, is from Edmund Hall, in the University of Oxford. He is now, with Mr. Gurney, alternate Morning Minister at St. Clement Danes, and the Free-Chapel in West Street, formerly belonging to the memorable John Wesley, St. Giles's; he is also Afternoon Lecturer of St. Andrew by the Wardrobe and St. Ann's in Black Friars; and the alternate Evening Lecturer of St. Bride's, in Fleet Street.

Prepared for the ministry by the late Alphonsus Gunn, patronised by Mr. Goode and Mr. Gurney, and succeeding, in religious estimation, the late Mr. Patrick, there can be no difficulty in determining as to the clerical character of Mr. Saunders. He ranks high among the Evangelical Ministers of the metropolis.

It may be proper to qualify the last sentence. When I class Mr. Saunders among evangelical ministers, as almost all extemporary preachers are too commonly called, let him not be confounded with the calvinistic methodists. He is practical, as well as doctrinal. While he earnestly contends for the faith once delivered to the saints, he soundly inculcates, at the same time, the necessity of living so as in all things to adorn the christian vocation. Works, indeed, are never to be substituted for faith, but they are as certainly the necessary fruits of it.

What first struck me in the present preacher, whose whole deportment my situation enabled me to scrutinise, was the manner in which he ascended the pulpit. I think it impossible for time to obliterate the impression which he then made on my mind. His look, his manner, was devotion itself. A preacher so evidently, yet unaffectedly, impressed with the awful importance of his divine commission, I recollect to have but seldom seen. His only difficulty seemed to consist in labouring to controul the emotions of his heart; and of him I am confident to affirm, that "the tear,

"That dropped upon his Bible, was sincere!"

If my aim was to flatter individual presumption, or gratify the execrable taste of satirical minds, Mr. Saunders, and such as him, would not be the subjects of my selection and the objects of my commendation. I cannot cater, I confess, for the depraved appetites of too many of my contemporaries.—God forbid that I should! Let me, however, still indulge the hope, that honest exertions, in the best of causes, may be productive of some good.

Mr. Saunders's discourses are entirely extempore; and, while he displays much of the excellence of the system of preaching he has adopted, he exhibits some of its disadvantages. His reasoning is not always connected; his expressions, which are not uniformly felicitous, are frequently repeated and sometimes recalled; and his metaphors partake both of ineleganey and inaccuracy. Metaphorical language is, indeed, that in which the extemporary speaker is most liable to failure. To be forcible, metaphors should evince correctness of construction and propriety of application; but these are qualities which require premeditation, and are therefore seldom discovered in the effusions of unstudied oratory.

The personal appearance of Mr. Saunders is happily interesting,— his countenance being finely intelligent, his stature and form adapted to his station, and his action, without extravagance, sufficiently impressive. His voice is both manly and melodious; but it requires, what he appears not to have attended to, judicious management. His cadence is too abrupt, and he too often indulges in the supplicating whine to which I objected in Mr. Jay. He would do well to pay more attention to his emphases. I wish, too, that I may prevail upon him not to "bundle out" of the pulpit almost as soon as the congregation begins to separate. He ascends it devoutly; and, notwithstanding all the exceptions I have taken to him, he fills it most ably. These considerations compel me the more to regret the hasty, not to say indefensible, manner of his departure.

I have freely, and fully, descanted on the faults of this preacher; because, I hope, he is not inaccessible to candid admonition; and because, when I consider his youth, I feel that he is capable of profiting by it. If he knew—strangers though we are to each other—how honorably I estimate his present pretensions, and how sincerely I desire his future usefulness, perhaps he might condescend seriously to notice my observations. ONESIMUS.

PORT NEWS.

FALMOUTH, Oct. 26.—Arrived this evening, his Majesty's ketch Glaneur, of 16 guns, from St. Andero, 4 days passage; the Commander of which, immediately on landing, set off for London, in a post-chaise and four. It is since reported, that Bilboa has been taken possession of by the Spaniards, after a very severe action, in which the French are stated to have lost eight thousand men, and the Spaniards about nine thousand, under General Blake. The Glaneur was from Lisbon, having on board two Aides-du-Camp of General Junot, to be landed in France; but owing to strong gales of wind, he was obliged to put into St. Andero; after which he intended landing them there; but the Spaniards, so exasperated against the Convention, actually refused; so they were put on board his Majesty's ship Plantagenet—the mob at St. Andero would have murdered them both, had they been landed. Also arrived, his Majesty's ship L'Aigle and Foxhound brig, from off Brest; as also the Lady Pellew packet, from Corunna, 4 days passage.—The Expedition under Sir David Baird had arrived safe. The Prince of Wales packet, sailed 5 days before the Lady Pellew, and is not yet arrived. The Princess Elizabeth packet takes the first mail to Lisbon.

BOXING.

The grand match between Crib and Gregson, for a stake of 500 guineas, was decided on Tuesday at Moulsey Hurst, in a thirty feet roped ring, in the presence of as considerable a number of spectators as ever assembled on a similar occasion. It was made known on Monday afternoon, that Moulsey would be the spot for the grand exhibition, and the sports of the day proved abundantly diverting, inasmuch as the battles between Crib and Gregson, and Cropley and Belcher, were the most admirable specimens of skill and courage that stand recorded. The Public are so well in possession of a knowledge of the contending parties, that, would be superfluous to attempt to give information on that head.

The beating Gregson received a few months since at the hands of Gully, spurred him on to be tenfold solicitous for another combat; and on Major Morgan, his former backer, declining giving his patronage, the Marquis of Tweedale stepped forward as his patron for this combat, against Crib, who was backed by P. Mathews, Esq. At half-past twelve o'clock, the company having formed a ring round a roped one of thirty feet, where the pugilists contended, the champions appeared and prepared for battle. Gully and Gibbons seconded Crib, and Jem Belcher and Richman seconded Gregson. Precise betting was five to four on Crib, but there were some more desirous of betting the odds than of taking them. At a quarter before one the combatants set to, and strict silence prevailed.

In speaking of this battle, it is a very difficult matter to hazard an opinion which of these men proved the most courageous. If it be compared, it resembles that at Newmarket more than any other on record, in a sanguinary point of view.—Gregson has sustained quite as much injury as in his former combats with Gulley, and Crib is to all appearances as badly beaten as Gregson; the latter, however, is as a perfect novice at boxing as when he first exhibited. His mode of fighting in this battle was precisely his original one, without, as in his last battle with Gulley, attempting any parade or studied manner. Crib was never sure of beating him until the battle was over; although he was a number of times beat to a stand still, yet he recovered his wind at intervals, and maintained the contest with wonderful courage. He proved himself, as before, a very bad judge of his distance, a thing necessary for him more than any other man. In rallying he has but one hit, and if that first hit happen not to stupefy his adversary, he is lost in the rally; for he even fights back-handed, throws his hands behind him, and his nature being so good, it leads him into difficulties where a half cur would stand to be hit. His only perfection is that of hitting harder than any other man with his left hand, when it so happens by chance that he gets his right distance, which he is so bad a judge of. Crib fought him at great odds, in being a shy and very good fighter, and one, to use the phrase in a technical way, who is the most perfect glutton in the boxing list. There were some few, the most learned of the learned, who backed Gregson freely, on the supposition that Crib could not hit hard enough to beat his adversary. The battle lasted 36 minutes.

YOUNG BELCHER AND CROPLEY.

This was, perhaps, the veriest boxing match that has been seen for some years, where the real science of the art of boxing was exhibited in a very superior degree. The seat of action may be truly called the field of blood, when the reader is informed, that this battle was even of a more sanguinary nature than the former, and the combatants as determined bottom as ever were pitted.

They were to have fought a match of fifty, but Cropley's backer did not appear, and consequently a purse of fifty was the object of the battle. It was a contest which excited much interest, and Dutch Sam had beaten them both.—At setting-to bets were 7 to 4 on Belcher, and but few takers, as the odds were too long to be sought after, and there were no takers at any thing less. The battle consisted in obstinate rallying fighting, but to the advantage of Belcher, from the beginning to the end, although Cropley once brought the match to even betting in about the tenth round. Belcher beat his adversary in a safe cautious manner. Cropley, although supposed to be as good a boxer, having a knack of giving his head when he hits, a manner, perhaps, better suited to Belcher's scientific mode of fighting than any other man. Belcher seldom made play, and availing himself of this natural fault of Cropley's, by waiting and stopping him, and putting in a facer. In this cautious manner Belcher vanquished his adversary without sustaining any very serious beating; and he put in at least a hundred hard blows on Cropley's face, during a battle which lasted fifty-six minutes, and in which thirty-four rounds were fought. Cropley bled constantly in torrents during the whole combat, from every part of the head, and maintained a furious conflict until he was beat blind, and to a state of stupefaction. Mendoza and Dutch Sam seconded Belcher, and Jones and Hall seconded Cropley.

Another battle was fought between Dogherty and a man of the name of Powell, for a purse. This battle, which lasted an hour and a half, was also well contested, and won by Dogherty. Thus ended a day which may be considered as having afforded as much amusement to the amateurs as any on record.

SHARPERS.—On Tuesday morning, Mr. William Embry, a wealthy farmer, who resides at Bannersfield, near Hereford, arrived in London by the Gloucester mail. He put up at the George and Blue Boar Inn, in Holborn. On Wednesday morning, after breakfast, as he was walking in Holborn, his attention was attracted by a drove of sheep; he stopped to look at them, and while in this act, a man came alongside of him, and began talking about the sheep; they continued in conversation, and the farmer told him what country he came from; the man told him he came from near Hereford, and served his time to a grocer in that town; the farmer, highly pleased at having met with a countryman, continued to walk with him for some time, during which he observed the man pick up a small parcel, but took no notice; they at length agreed to go into a public-house, near the Foundling Hospital, to have some liquor, and in a short time the man pulled out the parcel he had picked up, and said he would see what it contained. On examination, it purported to be a diamond cross, and a receipt for it, amounting to 255l. The old trick was played off, of a man following them into the public-house, to whom the business was referred, and he was asked if he did not think the name of the person who had purchased the cross was a French one? he agreed it was so, and as such a fair prize, as the French had done us a deal of mischief; but advised that it should be kept a secret. He likewise gave it as his opinion, that the farmer should have half the value, as he was in company, which was objected to by the finder. He, however, at length agreed to give him one hundred pounds for his share, but he had not so much about him; he would therefore deposit the cross with the farmer, if he would entrust him with a sum of money in his hands till the following day, as he had not the pleasure of knowing him, which the farmer complied with, and actually gave him 55l. 5s. The trick was not discovered till the time arrived for the farmer to receive the one hundred pounds, and the man did not appear with it.

DIED.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-FOUR.

TO THE CITIZENS OF LONDON.

Gentlemen,

You have given, on a recent occasion, the most unequivocal proofs, that your independence, as Citizens, is not inferior to your obsequiousness as subjects. We notice, with pleasure, this distinction; the more so, as it completely refutes an imputation strongly attached to your resolutions of late years, that as often as they referred to the conduct of Ministers, however objectionable it may have been, they were formed with a spirit of adulation and servility, as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, as it was unsupported by precedents, in the course of your former proceedings. We will not enter here into a recapitulation of the addresses your corporation voted, in the beginning of this, and towards the conclusion of the last reign; the monuments in your Guild-Hall incessantly remind you, on what principals your predecessors acted. Statues are always considered as marks of the highest honour and gratitude, when voted by independent assemblies; and so splendid a distinction is never conferred, in free countries, but on men who have rendered the most distinguished services to the community. Under this impression the Common Council of London resolved to commemorate and perpetuate the services rendered by Mr. Beckford, during his Mayoralty. What were those services, which the most respectable corporate body in Europe thought fit to requite in the most honourable manner, in which human actions can be rewarded? They consisted in the generous efforts he made, during his Magistracy, to preserve inviolate the rights and privileges of his fellow-citizens, and in his incorruptible attachment to the genuine spirit of the Constitution. If the patriotic exertions of that illustrious citizen deserved the immortality, which is bestowed on the greatest benefactors of mankind, his conduct must have been, in the highest sense, meritorious; and his principles should serve as a beacon to guide and enlighten his successors in office. These observations are either strictly just; or the conduct of those who voted so extraordinary a remuneration, was the most silly, unreflecting, and pernicious in its consequences that can possibly be imagined. It must be either allowed that Mr. Beckford rendered the most distinguished services to his country; or the Common Council of London were guilty of the dangerous and indefeasible levity of rewarding a factious and turbulent citizen, with the same profound marks of their veneration and gratitude, as are given to the greatest statesmen and warriors. If that be the case, not only the men who voted this uncommon and undeserved distinction, but those who tolerate it; are equally reprehensible. Such an apotheosis would be an insult to virtue, to merit, to justice, and the present members of that respectable body, if they consider it in that light, are traitors to their constituents, and insensible to their own reputation, if they do not hurl from its pedestal, a statue erected to so undeserving an object. But should you feel a reluctance, Gentlemen, to attach so much criminality to his conduct, and wish to extenuate it by imputing it to the spirit of that time, acknowledging that his intentions were honest, though mistaken; you are equally blameable in allowing that mere docrity or error should usurp an honour due only to the most disinterested patriotism. This unwarrantable prostitution would place you in the same rank with the degraded Senate of Rome, when they placed Caligula's horse on the list of the candidates for the Consulship, or voted statues to his master; but the latter, as soon as the tyrant, who overawed them, ceased to exist, rescinded their infamous decree, and overturned the altars and monuments they had so servilely raised. You are not placed in the same predicament. No tyrant intimidates you with the apprehension of instantaneous death, should you form any obnoxious resolution.

It is therefore only doing you justice to presume, that you consider the services rendered by that honest citizen in the same distinguished light in which they were regarded by those who thought them worthy of so eminent a recompense.

You acknowledge, Gentlemen, by thus sanctioning the honours conferred on a former member of your Body, that the greatest virtue in a magistrate and citizen, and tantamount to every other obligation, is a strict adherence to those very principles which prominently marked his public conduct; and that the right of petitioning is the most sacred and inalienable right of Englishmen. The proceedings, moved in a former Court, relative to the Answer returned to your Petition, are irrefragable proofs that the same liberal and patriotic spirit which immortalised the services of Mr. Beckford, still exercises it's powerful and salutary influence. Your spirited and truly constitutional conduct, on this occasion, has secured you the thanks and the approbation of your country; whilst it shews that your loyalty to your Sovereign is too genuine and enlightened to adopt a language of submissive, undiscriminating adulation, which would be as injurious to his real interests as insulting to his understanding. The Monarch must and ought to be approached by his people; for his situation excludes him from a knowledge of particulars it is so much his interest to know, and which the persons who immediately surround him might feel it their advantage to conceal. If it be true, what is proverbially repeated, that the Servants of the Crown frequently sacrifice to their passions the honour of their master and the interests of their country, it is indispensably necessary that he should have some other channel, through which he may be acquainted with the grievances and complaints of his subjects.

On no occasion was this necessity so imperious as on that of the Convention of Cintra. The honour of his Majesty's government, which is inseparable from that of his subjects, was so strongly implicated by that disgraceful and unwarrantable transaction; that it was a mark of duty on the part of the people to sympathise with the feelings of the Sovereign. They hastened to convey to the Throne the expression of their regret and disappointment; and a slight deviation from form was excusable, when their minds were strongly agitated by a keen sense of the dishonour so wantonly inflicted on the national character. This strong effusion of their indignation, and their sympathy in the acute sufferings of the Monarch, must, they had reason to think, have been acceptable to him, as they were the only possible means of rescuing the Government and Country from any share in the dishonourable business.

It was not only your right, Gentlemen, but it was a very awful duty incumbent on you, to express to the Throne your indignation at this degrading compromise of the national reputation; and any censure of your petition was as ill-timed, as it was unconstitutional. Judgment and feeling are not the hereditary patrimony of a few; and however whimsical fortune may appear in the dealing out of her largesses, nature, more bountiful and just, has not given, either to princes or their servants, the exclusive privilege of discriminating right from wrong. It were happy for mankind that their abilities and integrity were proportionate to their rank in society; but, unfortunately, as that is not always the case, it would be the most degrading and offensive kind of tyranny, if they pretended to usurp to themselves a claim to infallibility in similar decisions. Your late proceedings have evinced your opinion of such pretensions; and it is happy for you, the country, and the Sovereign, that your attachment to the Chief Magistrate is not incompatible with your duty as citizens, and your independence as men.

One of your Members, Gentlemen, is reported to have said, that Bonaparte trembled at a resolution of the Common-Council of London. If that audacious and unprincipled individual should feel that anxious deference for the proceedings of your respectable body, you may rest assured, it is your independence and patriotism which can intimidate the tyrant. The servility and degradation of mankind are the surest supports of his usurpation, and every exertion of a contrary tendency contributes to undermine the foundation of his colossal power. He has dissipated the armies of continental despots, as the whirlwind does chaff; but the first people, who dared oppose to him the irresistible efforts of freedom, stopped him in his ambitious career and turned the tide of his fortunes.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, OCT. 17.—According to letters from Naples of the 6th instant, the island of Capri, which the English some years since fortified in the most formidable manner, has been attacked and carried by the French and Neapolitan troops. The division assembled for this service, under the command of General Lamarque, was embarked in three or four vessels. The attack commenced at eight in the morning, and by five in the afternoon all the batteries of the English were successively carried. In this affair more than 900 of the enemy have been taken prisoners. The English Commander still defended himself with a handful of men in one of the forts, but an account of his having surrendered was expected every moment.

OCT. 20.—At one o'clock this morning his Majesty arrived at St. Cloud, on his return from Erfurth. At break of day the guns were fired to announce that joyous event. The day before yesterday her Majesty, the Empress, left Malmaison for St. Cloud.

OCT. 21.—An official account has been received from Vttoria, of the 12th October, with regard to the affairs of Spain, stating that the division of General Sebastiani, composed of 16,000 men, has already reached Bayonne; where, between the 20th and 30th of October, upwards of 100,000 troops are to arrive.

They write from Bayonne, under date of the 14th October—"Marshal Lefebvre, Duke of Dantzic, arrived here yesterday. He is to command a corps destined to act against Saragossa; a numerous park of heavy ordnance, and a great number of Officers of the Corps of Engineers are attached to that corps. Another corps is to act against Navarre, and to penetrate into Spain by Orthez, at St. Jean Pied de Port.

PARIS, OCT. 24.—Yesterday his Imperial Majesty gave a private audience at St. Cloud to his Excellency Prince Masserano, Ambassador from Spain; and also to his Excellency the Duke of Frias, who delivered his credentials as Ambassador from his Catholic Majesty.

BAYONNE OCT. 17.—Certain intelligence has been received here from Paris, that the Emperor Napoleon will shortly arrive in this town to take the command of the grand army, which is to act against Spain.

GERMANY.

THE CONFERENCES AT ERFURTH.

ERFURTH, OCT. 11.—On Sunday last the Emperor of the French heard Mass performed in his Palace, as he also had on the preceding Sunday. There was also a grand parade in front of the High Church, where all the Generals attended Mass. The two Emperors live in the closest intimacy. They constantly spend a part of the night together. Yesterday evening Rhadamistes was excellently performed at the Theatre by Talma, Saint-Prix, Damas, and Madame Raucourt. The two Emperors took their places in distinguished seats in front of the stage. The Pit was divided into two parts, separated from each other by a ballustrade. The first place, close to the orchestra, was allotted to the crowned heads. The other part was filled with the Ministers, the Marshals, and the other distinguished persons of the several Courts.

OCT. 14.—This day, at one o'clock, his Majesty the Emperor Napoleon, and his Majesty the Emperor Alexander, proceeded half way from this place to Weimar, where with the same solemnity as when they met, the two Sovereigns embraced each other, and took a most affectionate adieu. The Emperor Alexander went forward to Weimar, where he will remain a few days. The Emperor Napoleon returned hither, received a visit from the King of Saxony, gave a farewel audience to Count Tolstoi, the return to Prussia, and soon after an audience to Baron Von Vincent, to whom his Majesty delivered a letter in answer to the communication of his Majesty the Emperor of Austria. It is believed that the Mission of Baron Von Vincent has removed all the distrust which gave rise to the Austrian levies. Soon after the audiences, his Imperial and Royal Majesty departed from this place.

OCT. 15.—Notwithstanding that the conferences of their Imperial Majesty's, during their residence here, have been covered with a thick veil, there appears to be no doubt that they had the following objects:

1st, The restoration of general Peace; for two Couriers one French and one Russian, have been dispatched from this place whose journey could be for no other purpose but to communicate to the Court of London the desire of both Emperors.—2dly. the securing the tranquility of Germany; indeed it appears that the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine have received orders to break up their encamped contingents for their respective garrisons, or the neighbouring cantonments.—It is also certain, that, through the mediation of the Emperor Alexander, Prussia has obtained in the last treaty with France, a considerable reduction of her contributions. His Majesty the Emperor Napoleon has presented Count Von Tolstoi and his brother with the Grand Eagle of the Legion of Honour, and Messrs. Wieland and Goethe with the Cross of the same Legion.

HOLLAND.

AMSTERDAM, Oct. 28.—Mr. Mane, an Officer of the 1st regiment of light infantry, and Mr. P. Morel, captain of the privateer Jena, of Dunkirk, embarked at Ramsgate on the 16th inst. between four and five o'clock at night, in a two-oared boat, fourteen feet in length, in order to put a period to their captivity. During the night between the 16th and 17th, it blew excessively hard, and the sea was so heavy, that it proved altogether impossible for them to steer the boat. At midnight, they supposed to be between Ostend and East Cappel, when they descried a Dutch lugger; by dint of exertion they came within hail of the lugger, and demanded her assistance, which they stood in need of, their boat being already half full of water. The captain of the lugger, John Fenken, seeing the distressed situation of those unfortunate men, used his best efforts to save them; his humane endeavours were crowned with success, and he landed them safe at Ter Veere.

FROM THE HAMBURGH PAPERS.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, SEPT. 28.—A Courier arrived here on Sunday from Constantinople, with intelligence that the Grand Vizier, Mustapha Baraictar, has called upon all the Governors and great men of the Ottoman Empire, from Asia, Syria, &c. to deliberate with them upon the means of averting the dangers that threaten the dominions of the Porte.—Neue Zeitung.

WEIMAR, OCT. 3.—A Courier expedited to the Archduke Charles of Austria, has passed through here, and last night a Russian Courier passed through this place from Erfurth to Vienna.

BANKS OF THE ELBE, OCT. 12.—Neither the Archduke Charles of Austria, nor the Grand Duke of Wurtzburgh, went to the Congress at Erfurth.

Some private letters from Paris state, that Napoleon has assured some high Officers of State, previous to his departure for Erfurth, that the golden age should commence with the year 1809.

BANKS OF THE ELBE, OCT. 21.—In the Oldenburgh Country, some letters from England have been intercepted by the French and Dutch authorities; and as lately some papers containing interesting details from Spain and England have been circulated; the French agents redouble their vigilance to prevent the truth from transpiring, from which it is with great reason inferred by many that the Spanish concerns must be desperate. The Danes gave no credit to the glorious accounts lately sent by the English in an empty boat to Denmark; the papers that were found on board the vessel were immediately destroyed by order of Government: thus the Continent remains in the profoundest ignorance of the events that ought by no means to be concealed from the public.

It is further circulated, that a British army has defeated the army of Italy and Naples in Calabria, and is on its march against Naples. Respecting the ultimate result of the Congress at Erfurth, not a syllable has been made public.

ERFURTH, OCT. 5.—Our town increases in splendour every day, from a number of illustrious persons hourly arriving. The most sumptuous carriages, attended by servants profusely adorned with gold and silver, fill the streets. All the houses in which the Royal Personages lodge have a guard from the Grenadier Guards of the Emperor, and the residence of the principal Princes and Generals an honary guard from the troops of the line. There is scarcely any large house which does not lodge some distinguished person. In the theatre we find the utmost pomp and magnificence. In front of the stage their Imperial and Royal Majesties and the Grand Duke sit in arm chairs; Napoleon in the middle. Behind them is seated an illustrious assembly of more than one hundred Dukes, Marshals of France, Princes, Ministers of State, Generals, and Ambassadors, all in grand full dress, and shining in the insignia of different orders; it is a most imposing spectacle. The dresses of the actors and actresses are uncommonly splendid and sumptuous, with silk and gold and silver embroidery; the scenery and every part of the dramatic representation is beautiful and magnificent in the extreme.

Immediately after the lever, the Emperor Napoleon usually gives audiences, and receives the visits of the Kings and Princes who are here; at the same time, those who have addresses to present are admitted. After breakfast, his Majesty is employed in his cabinet, and afterwards rides without the town with his Russian Majesty. They review the troops; and after dinner, which is usually about six o'clock, go to the theatre.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, SEPT. 10.—Ismael Bey has arrived at Peres with 15,000 men. Ibraim Bey followed him three days after, at the head of 20,000. These two armies have encamped within a league of Constantinople. Fifteen thousand, under the orders of Clapin Oglu, are marching towards Rudschuk, to act against the Russians, in case they commence hostilities. We are not yet acquainted with the destination of the two first armies, but suppose they are destined against Abdul Wohab, who is become very powerful near Damascus.

FROM THE ALTONA PAPERS.

PETERSBURGH, OCT. 5.—Our fleet, consisting of eight sail of the line and some frigates, which were blockaded upwards of four weeks in Baltic Port by the combined Swedish and English fleets, far superior in number, arrived the night before last in Cronstadt, without having sustained the least loss. A violent storm, wind E. blew the blockading squadron out to sea. The wind changing afterwards suddenly to W. and blowing hard, our fleet availed itself of that favourable circumstance, and set sail for Cronstadt.

VIENNA, OCT. 12.—The Hungarian Diet acceded on the 4th inst. to the proposal of his Imperial Majesty, to render the insurrection, as it is called in Hungary, a permanent military establishment. By this resolution of the States of Hungary, the Austrian army has obtained a permanent reinforcement of 80,000 men.

HAGUE, OCT. 28.—We learn by a letter from Rochelle, of the 20th of October, that part of the first division of the army of Portugal has arrived in that place. The second division, commanded by General La Borde, has been disembarked in the Bay of Quiberon. The passage was very tedious and troublesome. All the officers of the army unanimously affirm, that the battle of Vimiera proved very glorious to the French arms. General Laborde, who had no more than 1700 men under his command, was attacked by 20,000 men, and he, notwithstanding, maintained his position until he was dangerously wounded. The action lasted from nine o'clock in the morning till six o'clock at night. The first division is in cantonments in the vicinity of Vannes.

VITTORIA, OCT. 13.—On the 5th of this month King Joseph set out from Vittoria, with his whole Staff, and repaired to Arminon, where Marshal Bessieres was, with his whole army. On the same day his Majesty, accompanied by that Marshal, having placed himself at the head of two divisions, took the road from Miranda to Bilboa, wishing to reconnoitre the forces which the enemy might have on that point: his Majesty arrived the same day at Orduna, without having perceived the enemy. The next day he sent a strong party to reconnoitre Bilboa. This reconnoitring party did not find the enemy, and a communication was thus established between the corps of Marshal Bessieres and the division of General Merlin, whom Marshal Ney had left at Bilboa some days before. The King having thus rendered free the great road from Miranda to Bilboa, returned on the 7th with his Staff to Vittoria, where the general head-quarters of the army still are at present. Every thing is quiet, the army preserves its positions; Marshal Bessieres, after having completed his reconnoitring, established himself on the 12th at La Puebla, one league from Arminon, whence he set out on the 5th; Marshal Ney occupies with a part of his army Trevino, the capital of the province of that name, in order to be able to oppose the plans of General Castanos, who is in the environs of Logrono. Generals Bonnet and Lasalle still occupy the banks of the Ebro, with one division of infantry, and one of light cavalry. Their head-quarters are at Miranda.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

CORUNNA, OCT. 26.—The Government has received the agreeable information, that the fourth division of our army continues in possession of Bilboa. Both Officers and men concerned in the memorable action behaved with the greatest courage and enthusiasm. We communicate this for the general satisfaction, till the complete details can be published. The disembarkation of the English troops has commenced, and will continue, to the amount of three thousand men. These will proceed on their march directly, and will be followed by others when they are sufficiently advanced. Not more than a battalion can proceed at a time, on account of the want of accommodations on the road. The whole will meet at Burgos, when they will join General Moore, who is advancing thither from Portugal, with about 15,000 more. His Britannic Majesty's ship Amelia sailed this morning with transports, having on board the 27th and 31st regiments. Their destination is said to be Lisbon. Mr. Frere has set out for Madrid.

SCOTLAND.

MOFFAT, OCT. 26.—We had yesterday a most dreadful storm of wind and rain, and the rivers in the neighbourhood came down in such torrents as were never seen before by the oldest people here. Amongst the damage occasioned by it, we are sorry to state a distressing accident which happened to the mail coach from Glasgow to Carlisle, which passes this way, at the Bridge over the River Evan, about nine miles from hence, at a place called Howcleagh, betwixt nine and ten o'clock last night.

The coach had just got about half way over when the bridge gave way in the middle of the arch, and the coach, passengers, horses, &c. were instantly precipitated into the river, down a fall of 35 or 40 feet. There were four inside and two outside passengers; the two latter and two of the horses were killed upon the spot, and the other passengers had a most miraculous escape with their lives, but we are sorry to say they are very considerably hurt; the coachman and guard were also much hurt, the former had his arm broken and otherwise much bruised, and the guard got a severe contusion on the head.

The other coach from Carlisle to Glasgow narrowly escaped sharing the same fate; it arrived at the bridge just at the time the accident happened, and from the darkness of the night, and the rate the coach necessarily travels, must inevetably have gone into the river at the same breach in the arch, had not the cries of one of the sufferers alarmed the coachman, and induced him to stop.

By the exertion of the coachman and guard of the other coach, the passengers who survived (a lady and three gentleman) with the coachman and guard that had fallen into the abyss, were extricated, and conducted to a place of safety, until other assistance was afforded them. Much praise is due to the proprietor at Moffat, for his exertion and assistance on this occasion; immediately on hearing of the accident, he set out in the middle of the night with several of his servants and surgical assistance, and gave every possible relief to the passengers, and by this means, we are happy to say, the London Mail and many valuable articles in the coach have been saved. The exertions of one of the proprietor's servants is particularly deserving of notice: at the risk of his life, he went down the precipice suspended by a rope, and saved the life of the lady (one of the passengers), and recovered the mail bags, which must have been carried down the stream. The bodies of the two passengers have been found and conveyed to Moffat, and notwithstanding the detention occasioned by this calamity, the mail was yesterday delivered in town in its regular course.

PROVINCIALS.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The sowing of the wheat crops has now been almost wholly completed, even in the more northern districts of the kingdom. Those which were put in early are now up, and look remarkably well, in many instances nearly covering the ground. The potatoe crops have likewise now, in a great measure, been taken up, and are found in all the northern districts to turn out uncommonly well, affording a much larger return than those of last year. They are also at the same time unusually good on all the more dry and elevated grounds. On thrashing out the grain crops, we are sorry to find that in some cases they do not produce so well as there was reason to suppose, while standing on the ground. There is more light grain than was expected even during the harvest season. Since the finishing of the ploughing for wheat, the farmers have kept their teams at work, as much as possible, in making up the land for their spring crops, a mode of husbandry which is of the utmost advantage, and which should never be neglected when it can be had recourse to with convenience. The droppiness of the season in the preceding, as well as the present month, has afforded an unusual quantity of feed for live stock, both in the meadows and pasture-lands; so much so, that in some of the counties in the northern part of the island, they have scarcely a sufficiency of stock to consume it before it becomes injured by the frosts. The turnips, both Swedish and common, as well as most other sorts of green eatle crops, in general look uncommonly well, and have in many cases risen to a size that must afford a considerably more abundantly supply of winter and spring food than was at one period supposed by those farmers who grow them. The season has been highly favourable for them in most places. The beans in most of the more northern counties are but very indifferent crops, yielding an unusually short produce.

HEREFORDSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—At the late Anniversary Meeting of the Herefordshire Agricultural Society, which was more numerously and respectably attended than on any former occasion, the premium for the best new variety of the Apple was adjudged to T. A. Knight, Esq. for the Foxley Apple, being a cross between the yellow Siberian Crab and the Orange Pippin. In size it is nearly equal to the Old Golden Pippin; the pulp is of a deep yellow colour, and the juice remarkably rich and saccharine; the wood and blossoms are supposed to be as hardy as the native Crab. The premium for the best two-year-old heifer was not awarded; that for the best three-year-old was adjudged to Mr. Edward Jefferies, of the Sheriffs; and that for the best pen of fine-woolled ewes to Mr. Watkins, of Brinsop. After the business of the day was finished, the company dined at the hotel, amounting to nearly 100 persons, and included the Earls of Oxford and Talbot, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir George Cornewall, Sir H. Hoskyns, the members for the county and city, and many other gentlemen, farmers, and breeders.

MORE WITCHCRAFT.

We last week exposed to public view some of the wicked and diabolical arts practised by Mary Bateman, of Campfield, near Leeds, upon the distressed and ruined family of William Perigo, of Bramley.

We have another atrocious act of the same kind to communicate.

James Snowden and his family have also been the dupes of Mary Bateman, in a degree little inferior to Perigo; living at the next door to this artful woman, she learnt that Snowden's wife had a sort of presentiment that one of her children would be drowned, and offered her services to avert so heavy a calamity. The agency of Miss Blyth was called in here again. Mary pretended to write to her at Thirsk, and received a letter directing that James Snowden's silver watch should be sewed up in the bed by Mary Bateman;—next, money, to the amount of twelve guineas, was demanded, and obtained in a manner a good deal similar to the way in which it was extorted from Perigo: this was also to be sewed up in the bed. By and by, it became necessary, Miss Blyth said, in order to prevent their son being drowned, and their daughter becoming abandoned, that Snowden's family should leave Leeds and go to Bowling, in the neighbourhood of Bradford, taking the bed, with the watch and money in it, with them, but leaving a considerable portion of their property in their house at Leeds, and giving Mary Bateman the key. At length, they expressed their wish to Mary to be allowed to look into the bed, and to take out the watch and money, but the time had not yet arrived; and before this inspection was to be made, the family of Snowden were to take a dose, which was at that time in preparation for them, and was to have been administered during the present week! Happily, this dose was never taken. On Saturday last, James Snowden was passing part of his evening at a public-house in Bradford, and the Leeds Mercury being produced, one of the company undertook to read the article which had produced so much conversation during the day, under the head "Witchcraft, Murder, Credulity;"—Snowden heard the narrative with violent emotion; when it was finished, he started from his chair and made the best of his way home. His first care was to open the folds of the bed, when lo! instead of his watch and money, he found—a Coal! He next came over to Leeds, and found his house, which he had left in the care of Mary Bateman, plundered, and on a search warrant being procured, part of the property was found in Bateman's house;—John Bateman was in consequence apprehended, and, as we have stated above, committed to York Castle, to take his trial for the offence. The dark history does not end here.

Judith Cryer, a poor aged widow, in Meadow-lane, in this town, who earns her livelihood by getting up linen, was another dupe. In the month of April last the grandson of this poor widow, a boy 11 years of age) had occasioned her some uneasiness, this being observed by Winifred Bond, (a kind of agent to the sorceress) she recommended to her Mary Bateman, as a person who could remove the cause of her distress; Judith consented to see this wicked woman, who having learnt the nature of her uneasiness recommended an application to Miss Blyth. Miss Blyth again! this being consented to, Mary Bateman undertook to write to her dear friend. In a few days an answer was received from this lady, which shocked poor Judith beyond description; the letter contained a representation of a gallows, with its usual appendage, a rope, accompanied by the horrid denunciation that the grandson would be executed on the gallows before he attained 14 years of age, and that his fate could only be averted by four guineas being raised by the old woman, and appropriated as Miss Blyth should afterwards direct. It was in vain that this poor woman declared her inability to raise so large a sum; the sorceress was inexorable; the sum was at length obtained with extreme difficulty, it was then put into a leathern bag, and sewed up in Judith's bed, where it was to remain untouched and unlooked at, until the boy had attained the age of 14 years. The former part of these instructions were immediately carried into effect, the money was deposited as directed, and if the detection and apprehension of the witch had not occurred, the latter part, as far as depended on this poor woman, would have been scrupulously observed; but the apprehension of the sorceress having dissolved the charm, the unfortunate victim of her spells ventured on Saturday se'nnight, to unsew the bed, and look for her money; it is hardly necessary to add, that she looked in vain—it was not to be found.

Mary Bateman, not content with plundering this poor widow of her last mite actually prevailed upon her to wash for her three months, to defray the expence of the postages incurred in effecting the infamous robbery.

A circumstance has been mentioned since the commitment of Mary Bateman that has given rise to no small share of conjecture and surmise, and which has not, we are happy to say, escaped the attention of the Magistracy.

In the month of September, 1803, Miss Kitchen, a shop-keeper, near St. Peter's-square, in this town, along with her sister and mother, who came over from Wakefield to visit her, were taken suddenly ill, and all three of them died within ten days, of a complaint then said to be Cholera morbus; a Physician of eminence who was called in, to visit the last surviving sister, entertained, however, a different opinion, and was so strongly impressed with the belief that their sickness and subsequent death proceeded from some poisonous drug having been received into the stomach; that he examined, with much care, many of the vessels in the house, asked if any water for poisoning flies had been in use, and expressed a wish to upon the body. The family being all dead, and no persons at hand who thought themselves authorised to give this permission, the corpse was interred unexamined, and with it probably the opportunity of detection, unless by means inscrutable to human wisdom. It must be remarked, that Mary Bateman was on terms of the strictest intimacy with Miss Kitchen, and although she had no visible business there, her anxiety about the fate of these unfortunate females, kept her constantly about the house, and led her to procure for the sister who died first, a medicine from some country Doctor, Miss Blyth, perhaps. After the death of the family it was discovered that all Miss Kitchen's books were missing, and her property so much diminished by plunder, that her creditors only divided eight pence in the pound.

In manners, Mary Bateman is very plausible; of an appearance sedate and respectable, and, as Shakespeare says of Richard,

"Seems a Saint when she most plays the Devil."

BRIGHTON, Oct. 31.—On Friday evening Mr. Cooke amused a fashionable auditory at the Theatre, by appearing in two of his best characters, Shylock, in The Merchant of Venice, and Sir Archy Macsarcasm, in Love à la Mode. He was in good voice and spirits, and the two characters were delineated in a style of excellence peculiarly his own. On the following evening Mr. Cooke again exerted his efforts on these boards, as Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, in The Man of the World, to an audience equally fashionable, but considerably more numerous than the former. Before he had finished his first scene, however, he became so exceedingly hoarse, that he felt himself under the necessity of apologizing in consequence, to the audience, which he did, observing that an hoarseness with which of late he had been afflicted, had suddenly seized him, but that he had great hopes that it would be but of very short continuance. Plaudits followed, and Mr. C. went on, and with great difficulty to himself, as the hoarseness continued, finished the arduous task he had undertaken. The weather yesterday was showery, and, as on Saturday, it rained incessantly from sun rise to sun set. To-day the sky has been unclouded; the sun, therefore, has had great power, but a strong breeze has predominated since day-break.—There was a numerous congregation at the New Chapel, or Chapel Royal, yesterday morning, which included many families of the first rank and consequence. The ball at the Castle this evening, it is expected, will be elegantly attended; and the Circus, from the attractive bill of fare, promises to be crowded. The Prince is now daily expected at the Pavilion, though no notice as to when his Highness will arrive has as yet been received there.

CURIOUS ANTIQUITIES.—In the course of last month Mr. Canning opened various barrows in the neighbourhood of Stonehenge, under the direction of Sir Richard Hoare, Bart. and with the aid and assistance of A. B. Lambert, Esq. and found a number of curious remains of Celtic ornaments, such as beads, buckles, and broaches in amber, wood, and gold: one of which, for its elegance and appropriate form, is at once a proof of the Nobility of the person for whom the barrow was raised, and the elegance of the arts at the period of the interment, about 3000 years from the present period. The shape of this curious article is conical, and the exact form of the barrow itself, which it was most probably intended to figure. Conceive a piece of wood, imbricated in layers, one over the other, to the summit of the cone, and covered with thin plates of pure gold, and adorned with circles round the middle, and near the bottom with a triangular festoon about the lower edge, in which are two holes for a thread or wire to suspend it.

PEDESTRIAN FEATS.—On Thursday last, Mr. Bevan, jun. brazier, of Shrewsbury, for a wager, walked from the centre of the English Bridge to Church Stretton, a distance of 17 miles, in two hours and three-quarters, which he performed with ease. The time allowed was three hours. In the afternoon of the following day, Mr. Pickstock, wine-merchant, also undertook to go eight miles in an hour; the ground chosen for the performance was the bottom walk in the Quarry, which was strewed with sawdust for the occasion. Considerable sums were depending on the event, and Mr. Pickstock won with ease, in one minute and a half under the time.

On Thursday evening, the 27th ult. Stephen Simmons, a shepherd's boy, about eight years of age, took shelter from the rain in a cart shed, in Husterperpoint, where two large rollers were placed one upon the other, the uppermost of which fell upon him, and unfortunately killed him upon the spot. A dog which attended the deceased was the means of leading to the discovery of the accident, by repeatedly running home, and returning to the hovel, until he attracted the attention of the boy's father, who at length followed the dog to the hovel, and there found his ill-fated son lying on the ground, with the fatal roller upon his head.—Verdict—Accidental Death.

HAMPSHIRE MEETING,

Thursday, pursuant to a public requisition, the High Sheriff, G. H. Mitchell, Esq. convened a Meeting of the Nobility, Gentry, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the County of Southampton, at the Castle of Winchester, to take into their consideration the propriety of addressing his Majesty on the Convention of Cintra. The Meeting was both numerous and highly respectable. The High Sheriff having taken the Chair,

Lord Northesk presented himself to the attention of the Meeting, for the purpose of proposing a Resolution. He felt that on a subject involving both the character and interests of the country, it would not be deemed a presumption in him to offer to their consideration a motion, expressive of the wishes of the County of Hants, to request a full enquiry into the causes which led to that disgraceful event, the Convention of Cintra. After these prefatory remarks, his Lordship proposed the following Resolution:—

Resolved—That an humble and dutiful Address and Petition be presented to his Majesty, expressing our grief and regret at the Convention lately entered into by the Commanders of his Majesty's forces in Portugal, and the Commander of the French army in Lisbon; praying his Majesty to institute such full, public, and effectual inquiry into this transaction, as will lead to the discovery of all those causes which produced an event so injurious to the honour of this country, and the interest of its Allies.

Mr. Cobbett then addressed the Meeting, by re-capitulating a number of topics relative to the Convention, and the Officers employed in it. He maintained that Petitions for investigation were not at all rendered unnecessary on account of the answer given by his Majesty to the Address of the Citizens of London, inasmuch as that Answer was addressed to the Court of Common Council alone, and not to the inhabitants of Hampshire. He then dwelt upon the various appointments held by Sir Arthur Wellesley previous to his going to India, as well as those he received since his return, and said, that out of 291 Staff Officers, it was a shame that Ministers did not select one of them to command the expedition to Portugal, without calling upon the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. But Ministers, he said, would attempt to screen Sir Arthur Wellesley, because he was allied to a powerful family, who had raised themselves not by such talents as were shining or laudable, but by beating the poor Indians as a dog would a flock of sheep. The family, he said, possessed twelve votes in the House of Commons, and it was not wonderful that Ministers should endeavour to screen Sir Arthur—Hear! Hear! That single family, he said, received no less than 23,766*l.* annually from the Country, a sum which exceeded the poor rates of sixty parishes, on an average of the parishes in England and Wales. In the progress of his speech, Mr. Cobbett said, he could read a list of individuals who benefitted by the war, and which would occupy two hours. He mentioned Mr. Garniere, of Wycombe, who, as Apothecary General to the Army, received an annual income of 12,309*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*—A great uproar and confusion here took place; some of the meeting crying, Stop! Stop! others, Go on! Go on!

The Sheriff observed, that every thing irrelevant to the question should be omitted upon this occasion, and if there were any difference of opinion upon the subject, he must take the sense of the Meeting upon it,

Sir Francis Baring rose to speak to order. The Meeting, he said, was called for a special purpose; that purpose was a public, not a private purpose, and therefore it was, in his opinion, totally irregular to introduce the name of an individual who had nothing to do with the Convention.

Mr. Cobbett then resumed. He said Ministers had motives for not bringing certain Military Officers to trial; and that one of those motives was, the interest certain individuals had in perpetuating the war. After a long speech in condemnation of the Convention, and some observations on the offices and emoluments of the Duke of York, in the course of which he was occasionally interrupted by applauses and disapprobation, and twice called to order, he read an Address, which was seconded by the Rev. Mr. Baker,

The Rev. Mr. Poulter next offered himself to the attention of the meeting. He thought the answer of his Majesty to the citizens of London completely satisfactory. He maintained that, on that account, all further addresses on that subject were completely unnecessary. Could there be the least doubt of such an Inquiry taking place, he should be the first to petition for it. After making some panegyrics on the military talents of Sir Arthur Wellesley, he deprecated any factious attempt to alienate the people at this time from the Executive Government, because, being united, we cannot fall, and divided we cannot stand. He therefore felt it his duty to propose, as an amendment to the resolution proposed by the Noble Lord, "that notwithstanding the disappointment experienced throughout the country in consequence of the late Convention, yet, upon the ground of his Majesty having already pledged himself to institute Inquiry, and in conformity with the principles of justice, we forbear interference, until acquainted with the result of that investigation."

Mr. Portell supported the original resolution; after which Mr. Poulter's amendment, seconded by Mr. Garnet, was put, and on a division, was declared to be negatived by a great majority.

The Assembly afterwards divided on the question, whether the Address proposed by Lord Northesk, or that by Mr. Cobbett, should be adopted, when it was decided in favour of the Address of the Noble Lord. It is as follows:

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

May it please your Majesty,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Nobility, Gentlemen, Clergy, Freeholders, and other Inhabitants of the County of Southampton, beg leave to approach your Majesty's Throne, with the sincerest assurances of our zealous attachment to your Royal Person and Family; and knowing that your Majesty's true glory is inseparable from that of your people, we humbly beg leave to express our grief and regret at the Convention lately entered into by the Commanders of your Majesty's Forces in Portugal, and the Commander of the French Army in Lisbon; and further, humbly to submit to your Majesty our earnest and anxious prayer, that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to institute such full, public, and effectual enquiry into this transaction, as will lead to the discovery of all these causes which have produced an event so injurious to the honour of this Country, and the interest of the Allies.

After the motion of thanks to the High Sheriff for his upright and impartial conduct, the Meeting dissolved. The evening concluded with splendid dinners at the George and White Hart Inns.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. SHAW, the Messenger, arrived on Friday morning from Paris; after delivering the answer returned by his MAJESTY'S Ministers to the proposal of negotiation made by the EMPEROR of RUSSIA and BONAPARTE, from Erfurth. Mr. SHAW is said to have been received by the French with the utmost cordiality; and the people every where expressed the most earnest desire of peace. That they, unfortunate wretches, harrassed by the most revolting conscription, which tears from the arms of the labourer and manufacturer their struggling children, should entertain an anxious wish to see their present calamities cease, will be easily credited. But how far their desires crash with the ferocious ambition of BONAPARTE, a very short time will develope. We have already delivered our sentiments clearly on the matter; and would as soon expect the possibility of a reconciliation between the famished tiger and the trembling victim panting under his paw, as a sincere desire, on the part of the Tyrant, to sacrifice his ambition to the repose of Europe. We may be mistaken; would to Heaven we were. We feel no other animosity to the man, that what his crimes, his remorseless cruelty, his infuriate ambition, and his unrelenting thirst of vengeance against the much-injured Spaniards inspire. We are actuated by no party-prejudice; we strongly disclaim so unwarrantable a motive for our animosity. We detest and reprobate him, because he injures and oppresses every individual, who has the misfortune of writhing under his despotic lash. We distrust his professions; because we are taught by an experience of the calamities which accrued to those, who trusted most in his honour and probity, that he embraces only to murder.—We can attach no confidence in his conversion; because he made such frequent promises of reformation, which all terminated, as Italy, Switzerland, Prussia and Spain can, to their misfortune, too strongly attest, in an increase of profligacy and moral depravity. Such are our motives for feeling an uncommon degree of anxiety and distrust, whenever BONAPARTE holds out to us his hand, in sign of reconciliation; we involuntarily fix our eyes on the other, to see if it be armed with a poniard to stab us, should we have the weakness to accept his perfidious embrace.

Mr. SHAW was not detained in Paris—and it is therefore supposed that a French Courier will be sent with the reply. This negotiation, and this sending of Couriers, are a most inauspicious circumstance. Our Ministers, we have reason to hope, are as convinced of BONAPARTE'S perfidy and insincerity, as we are. We cannot, therefore, refuse them the justice to suppose, that their relaxation from their former energy has been occasioned in consequence of some insidious overture for an exchange of prisoners; and if this be their motive, whilst we regret the embarrassing and mortifying situation they are placed in, we cannot but applaud every feasible effort they may make, to extricate our suffering countrymen from the horror of their confinement. If they act on these generous and humane principles, however hopeless our prospect of success, we are also inclined to ascribe to them the enlightened policy, that they wish to deprive the enemy of every plea for justifying his outrageous aggression against thirteen millions of Spaniards and Portuguese. He will deceive us; and he has partly succeeded already in doing so; for he has had the superlative art of embarrassing our Ministry in the intricate labyrinth of negociation; the consequences of which can solely and exclusively turn to his advantage. He has promised ALEXANDER to offer us peace; and he has had the effrontery to tell his obsequious Legislature, that he is willing to make sacrifices, for the purpose of giving peace to a hundred millions of inhabitants which are under his protection: and whilst the lacerated Continent anxiously waits for this balsam, he hastens from the scene of negociation in order to burn, devastate, and murder, beyond the Pyrenees. Atrocious, unblushing, and remorseless hypocrite! Your dissimulation may last too long for the happiness of mankind; but the time approaches rapidly, when the mask shall fall from thy hideous face, and the world behold thee as the cruel, designing, artful villain.

BONAPARTE left Rambouillet on the 30th ult. for Bayonne: and, before his departure, pledged himself to the Legislative Body, that he was setting out for Spain to put himself at the head of his army; and, with the help of God, to crown his brother in Madrid, and to plant his eagles on the forts of Lisbon. Impious Ruffian! to invoke the sanction and assistance of Heaven for the most unprovoked and atrocious aggression, ever undertaken by the most worthless and unprincipled of tyrants. Humanity, justice, religion, are employed as mere instruments to advance the projects of an unjust, unfeeling, and irreligious Usurper. It is this revolting abuse of the most sacred principles, which has made so many sceptics in religion, and so many villains in society. We start back with horror, as often as we reflect on the effects of this revolting depravity. The worst and most impious men are generally most forward to appeal to Heaven about the purity of their intentions, and the innocence of their designs.

We insert the following Extract, from the Dutch Papers, of BONAPARTE'S Message to the Legislative Body:

EXTRACT OF THE MESSAGE OF HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY TO THE LEGISLATIVE BODY, ON THE 25th OCTOBER.

"Russia and Denmark are united with me against England.

"America has preferred to renounce Commerce and the Seas, rather than to recognise slavery.

"I set off in a few days to put myself at the head of my army, and, with the help of God, to crown in Madrid the King of Spain, and to plant my eagles on the forts of Lisbon.

"I cannot do other than congratulate myself on the sentiments of the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine.

"Switzerland daily feels more and more the benefits of the Act of Mediation.

"The people of Italy give me only new subjects of satisfaction.

"The Emperor of Russia and myself have had an interview at Erfurth. Our first thought has been a thought of peace. We have even resolved to make some sacrifices the sooner to obtain, if it be possible, for the hundred millions of men whom we represent, the blessings of a maritime peace. We are of the same mind, and invariably united both for peace and war."

Another letter states, that Napoleon, in his Address, after giving a cursory view of the state of the French Empire in respect to its internal situation, speaks of its external relations as follows:

Digitized by Google

"That Russia and Denmark are joined with him in the war against England—that he is perfectly satisfied with the conduct and dispositions of the Princes of the Confederation of the Rhine—that the Swiss nation has deserved his confidence; and that the experience of every day shews the advantage they have derived from the act of mediation—that the people of Italy are fully sensible of the value of being connected with, and protected by France; that the Americans persevere in the embargo, and would rather relinquish for ever the benefits of commerce, than accede to any arrangements destructive of the principle of the freedom of the seas."

Does the Message contain even a solitary proof of his pacific intentions. He pleases to profess his willingness to submit to some sacrifices, in order to give peace to the hundred millions he and ALEXANDER protect! But who has rendered them unhappy?—who has drained the sources of their industry, and cursed them with all the horrors of famine, oppression, and war? Who has caused the innumerable unprotected orphans, whose fathers he has murdered, to bewail the loss of their patrimony, and the misery they are exposed to? He, himself, is the source of all the misery and disorder he affects to deplore. If he had only the feelings of other men;—if his savage heart was susceptible of pity, or remorse;—if the cry of conscience, or the shrieks of persecuted innocence, could touch his obdurate breast;—were it possible that he could, deliberately and even vauntingly, announce his departure, for the purpose of placing his brother JOSEPH on the throne of Spain;—or, in other words, of plundering and burning every town, hamlet, and village, on the way to that capital, and exposing the unfortunate inhabitants to the lust, brutality, and discretion of his 150,000 ill-paid, ferocious soldiers. He boasts of the friendship subsisting between him and Russia; and the union of the latter with Denmark against Great Britain. Too much reason, he has to triumph over the credulity, 'ignorance, and folly of these besotted Cabinets.' But they alone are the victims of their passions and unreflecting animosity. The people of this country are actuated by no sentiments of hatred or jealousy against these States, and sincerely bewail their intemperance and indiscretion. If their Sovereigns, or Ministers, are so deaf to the call of honour and interest, whilst we mourn over their sufferings and degredation, we disregard the feeble, unavailing efforts of their rancour and vengeance. In another place he speaks of his satisfaction with the Swiss; and that they daily feel more and more the benefits of the Act of Mediation: feel it—yes, in the loss of their independence and innocence. The once happy and peaceable inhabitants, had they permission to tell their own story, what a series of crimes and misery, from the time of RAPINAT and REUBEL, to that of TALLEYRAND and BONAPARTE, would they have to relate! They were formerly so comfortable and satisfied; and there is not, in this very instant, when they enjoy all the benefits of the Mediation Act; a single cottager, on the most accessible summits of their mountains, or in the deepest recesses of their vallies, whose manners are not vitiated, and who has not cause to complain of injustice,—these benefits remind us of those which prisoners are supposed to enjoy, who are secluded by the humid walls of their dungeon, from the cares and anxiety of the world. poverty, degradation, and loss of liberty be benefits; people entering enjoy them in a larger proportion. Unfortunate people of Switzerland! you only wanted this gravation to your misery, that the tyrant, who so cruelly injured you, should add insult to injustice! In another place he asserts, that America prefers to renounce Commerce and the Seas, rather than recognise Slavery. This attempt to encrease the dissatisfation between that country and this is too plump and too palpable, even to delude his legislative automatons. We are inclined to entertain very serious doubts, at present, of the animosity of the Americans to this country. That the cool, systematic JEFFERSON and his Party, coincide in his extravagant project of liberating the seas, we have no doubt of; but after this confession of BONAPARTE, we have strong reason to believe that the discontent of the Americans with the embargo is greater and more universal, than was hitherto imagined. But the most interesting feature in this exposé, is the silence it affects to maintain towards Austria. We have not forgotten his petulance, the rancour and depreciation of his allusions, when he wrote to the Senate, some weeks ago, "That he could not answer for the perverse errors of other Courts." But now not a single syllable to tranquillize his Legislative Body, and inform it that the Austrian Cabinet has returned to reason and submission. What means this extraordinary silence? Only some weeks back so much fuss and uneasiness! and in this crisis of his fortunes, in the grand exposé of the political state of the Continent, he cannot find leisure to add a single line, mentioning that Austria has consented to disband her new levies. Extraordinary, in fact! His suspicion of that Cabinet, we plainly see, is as great as ever; and what is more satisfactory, he dares not resent the menacing attitude she has assumed. This circumstance sets beyond every doubt, that her armaments are of that formidable kind, as to enable her to defy any force he can, in this moment, employ against her. But will Austria remain inactive, when the resistance of the Spaniards affords her so auspicious an opportunity of making a diversion in Germany? Some unreflecting men will have the folly to object to us, that her former exertions were attended with no other effect than the subjugation of her capital and provinces; that she is now grown prudent from the experience of her reiterated disasters, and will wisely avoid irritating a man who has so frequently chastised her; with such like stuff. Can any one, in the possession of his senses, or with understanding enough to discriminate his right from his left hand, seriously believe that it is the interest of Austria to wait till BONAPARTE has succeeded in subjugating Spain; and then contend single-handed with his undivided strength? Or do they imagine that he will acknowledge, with gratitude, her present neutrality? Yes, her acknowledgement will consist, should Austria have the imbecility to wait, in a fulminating decree, that the House of Hapsburg has ceased to reign; because its power is incompatible with his security and greatness. And however we might bewail this deplorable event, we should be reduced to the distressing necessity of declaring, that a government so infatuated, so blind to its interests, and inattentive to the occurrences of the time, deserved the fate it had neither the energy nor foresight to prevent. We have frequently alluded to the patriotism, military and political talents of the Archduke CHARLES; and we are happy to find that his influence in the Austrian Cabinet is proportionate to his integrity and merit. We have also had the satisfaction of reading in one of the German Journals, that he refused to appear among the vassals of the Corsican, at the Meeting at Erfurth. Is he also blind to the events passing in Spain, and the situation of the Monarchy? There is some thing like pedantry in attempting to refute the vague and inconsistent reasoning we daily hear on this very subject. We are sometimes inclined to think that people talk in this manner, for the pleasure of saying an absurdity; and afterwards laughing at their own incongruity; for there is no other means of accounting for the extravagant opinions we are condemned to listen to, or to read, on the political combinations of the Austrian Councils.

We are sorry to have to announce the escape of the Russian Fleet from Port Baltic. They lost, however, a frigate, which stranded in coming out of the harbour. The boisterous seas in that northern latitude, the inclemency of the season, and the approach of winter, rendered it impracticable for our gallant seamen to continue the blockade. The Officers who command our Fleet, preclude the suspicion of negligence on their part; and we are fully persuaded, that Sir J. SAUMAREZ and Sir S. HOOD, have neglected nothing which professional skill, or persevering courage suggested as expedient. The public have been once more disappointed in their expectations. But on this occasion they have been frustrated, because they expected impossibilities.

Two Gottenburgh Mails arrived last night, but bring no intelligence. A report of Marshal KLINGSPOR contains a circumstantial account of the retrograde movement of the Swedish Army in Finland, but it is now perfectly uninteresting. It serves only to prove, what was universally known, that the Swedes and their gallant Sovereign, could courage ensure them success against the vast superiority of the Russians in point of number, displayed during the whole of the campaign, whose issue was so unexpected, a degree of patriotism, patience, and intrepidity, worthy of their ancient military reputation. It was mentioned at Gottenburgh, that Sir JAMES SAUMAREZ arrived there in the Victory, to render his Swedish Majesty an account of the campaign in the Baltic. The Emperor ALEXANDER was expected at Riga, the 10th of last month, on his return to Petersburgh.

THE COURT OF INQUIRY.—The Warrant for summoning a Court of Inquiry on the Armistice and Convention, has been signed by his Majesty; and the Court, consisting of General Sir David Dundas, President; Gen. Earl Moira, Gen. Peter Craig, Lieut.-Gen. Earl of Pembroke, Lieut.-Gen. Lord Heathfield, Lieut.-Gen, Oliver Nicolls, and Lieut. Gen. Sir George Nugent, Bart. will be assembled as soon as possible, after the Warrant shall be countersigned by the Secretary at War, who is now in Scotland. Then Inquiry will be public; and the Warrant directs, "That an Inquiry shall be made into the conditions of the Armistic and Convention, and into all the causes and circumstances, whether arising from the previous operations of the British Army, or otherwise, which led to them; and into the conduct, behaviour, and proceedings of Sir Hew Dalrymple, and of any other Commander or Commanders, or of any other person or persons, as far as the same were connected with the Armistice and Convention."

It is said that the Duke of Northumberland has made a magnificent present to Mr. Kemble, on the occasion of the late fire. He wrote him a polite note, reminding him of an early service his Grace had received from him, by instructing Earl Percy in the art of speaking, and saying that the present was a fit moment to acquit the obligation.—The letter contained a draft for Ten Thousand Pounds.

In erecting the new Theatre in Covent-Garden, the Piazza is to be carried through into Bow-street, under the Old Shakespeare Tavern; the houses in Bow-street, Nos. 8, and 15, have been purchased to make room for the intended improvements.

Saturday se'nnight, Captain John Impey, of the Royal Navy, son of Sir Elijah Impey, of Newick Park, Kent, set off from Teignmouth in a Post-chaise and four, accompanied by Miss Cazal, of Exeter, on a matrimonial excursion to Gretna Green, where the ceremony was performed; and the parties are since returned to Exeter. The young Lady is a ward in Chancery, amiable and highly accomplished, and will possess a handsome fortune when of age.

A lighter, supposed to be loaded with coals, was yesterday seized in the river, but under the coals was discovered a cargo of French plate glass, worth 10,000*l*.

MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—On Saturday last, a Corpse was brought from Charter-house-square, and buried in Islington Church-yard, and a stone erected at the place with this inscription:—

"IN MEMORY OF
MRS. ELIZABETH EMMA THOMAS,
Who died 28th October, 1808.
AGED 27 YEARS.
She had no fault, save what trav'llers give the moon,
The light was bright, but died, alas! too soon."

Mr. Hodgson, the Coroner, received a letter, intimating very strong suspicions that the deceased had not died naturally, in consequence of which he applied to the Parish Officers, who ordered the grave to be opened, which was done yesterday morning, and the body removed to the vault under the church, for the inspection of the Jury, which sat upon it in the course of the day, when the following appeared in evidence. The lady died on Friday, was buried on Saturday, and the Gentleman with whom she lived (not being married), left town on Sunday and embarked at Portsmouth on Monday for Spain. On examining the body, a silver pin, about nine inches long, was found sticking in the heart through the left side of the body. A Medical Gentleman who had attended the deceased, declared that the pin was inserted at the request of the Gentleman, to prevent the possibility of her being buried alive. The Jury brought in a verdict of, died by the visitation of God. The corpse still lies unburied in the vault.

CONVENTION STAKES.

TO START FROM THE HORSE-GUARDS.

Abrantes---well bred, though of low extraction, has much pluck, is well known in the field, and has lately carried off many sweepstakes.

Sir Hew---an old horse; has often walked over the course for King's plates, but never won a heat. He is now broke down, after a most lucrative career; is got by Boxing, out of a Windsor mare---Parade. His keepers have never exercised him much on the turf, but are understood to have spared no expence on him in the stud. His condition is consequently good, and he certainly inherits many valuable qualities from his sire.---Many counties boast the honour of his birth.

Sir Arthur---got by Nobis, out of an Irish mare. He is a well-bred horse, and will take a stone wall. He beat Abrantes hollow some months ago, in a match, pp. but the knowing ones say that he is become skittish, and expect that he will bolt from the course.

The General Kellerman---is sound and bony, will go great lengths, and has an unusual depth in his fore-quarters. The odds are between him and Sir Hew, but Kellerman is the favourite on account of his bottom; and because he is well skilled in crossing and jostling.

Burrard---is not much known, and is supposed to be entered for the purpose of promoting sport. He will probably be drawn after the first heat.

N. B. The Steward is an illustrious personage, who fully understands the duty and prerogative of his office. It is therefore requested that no boby will intrude or interfere with the business of the stand.

THE REV. THEOPHILUS LINDSEY.

On the 3d of November died, at his house in Essex-street, between the hours of six and seven in the evening, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, formerly Vicar of Catterick in Yorkshire. This living he resigned in the year 1773, from a conviction that the service of the church of England, as far as it involves the doctrines of the Trinity, is repugnant to the precepts of our Saviour and his Apostles, and particularly to the great command of God solemnly promulgated to the Jews, and urged with the strongest emphasis by our Saviour—Thou shalt have no other gods but me. In consequence of this conviction, and the ineffectual attempts to obtain redress for the Clergy in the subscription to the thirty-nine Articles, having resigned his living, and quitted Yorkshire, he came to London; and in the year seventy-four, encouraged by the application of several persons of high respectability, who were earnest in the same cause, he opened a room in Essex-house for the worship of the only true God, in which he performed divine service, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, reformed by the celebrated Dr. Clarke, with some variations adapted to his own more improved views of the subject. Four years afterwards he preached a sermon on the opening of the chapel in Essex House, which has since that time been dedicated to Unitarian worship. Here his services as a Minister were most acceptable to a numerous congregation: and whatever disapprobation his opinions might excite among the uninformed of different denominations, even they could not but esteem a character of such benevolence, honesty, and integrity. The attachment of those who were more intimately acquainted with his virtues was unbounded, for seldom is to be found a man who has fixed so deeply in his heart the grand characteristics of the Christian religion—love to God and love to man. He lamented the divisions amongst Christians, owing to the unreasonable adherence of many to tradition, merely of human or political authority, in opposition to the language of revelation. The whole tenor of his preaching was benevolence, and the easy yoke of Christ, ardour in the study of the Scriptures, humility in the sight of God, and the rejection of that false piety which lays undue stress on external circumstances. In these useful labours he was engaged to the 70th year of his age, when he resigned his pastoral office, dedicating the remainder of his life to the great objects of promoting scriptural truth, in which service he continued occasionally to employ his pen. No man was a more sincere friend to civil and religious liberty; no one more attached to those principles which placed the Brunswick Family upon the Throne. To these principles he never failed, when a proper opportunity offered, of bearing his testimony with consistent firmness and characteristic mildness: for mildness, benevolence, and humility, founded on piety and entire resignation to the will of God, and combined with habitual cheerfulness, were the striking features in his character. During the latter part of his life the infirmities of age gradually pressed upon him, but he bore them all without a murmur, and his favourite maxim, on which he dwelt emphatically almost in his last moments, and when utterance became difficult, was—What God wills is best.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, His Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor, where he was received by the Duke of York. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee, at which the following had the honour of being presented:—

Sheriffs Hunter and Smith, by the Lord Mayor.

Mr. Clark, by the Lord Chancellor, upon his being appointed a King's Counsel.

Rear-Admiral Apodaca, Minister from the Supreme Junta of Spain, by Mr. Canning. His Excellency had an audience of his Majesty, and delivered his credentials, and was most graciously received.

Mr. Merry, upon his being appointed his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary, and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Sweden.

Mr. Augustus Foster, upon his being appointed his Majesty's Secretary of Legation at the Court of Sweden, by Mr. Canning.

Dr. Mansell the new Bishop of Bristol, did homage before his Majesty, upon his being appointed to that See.

His Majesty gave audience to the Duke of Portland, the other Ministers, and Mr. Merry.

A little before six o'clock his Majesty set off on his return to Windsor.

ELEGANCIES OF FASHION FOR NOVEMBER.

Extracted from Le Beau Monde Magazine.

The chilling blasts of Winter are now hastening to supersede the mild freshness of the Autumnal evenings, and the Steyne, the Parade, and the hoarse-resounding Beach, will soon be deserted for the Opera, the ball-room, or the cheerful domestic fire-side. The almost universality of half-dress, so convenient and proper at a watering-place, will, therefore, soon be laid aside for the more dashing and eccentric elegancies of fashion, and the Purveyors of the different articles of female ornament, for we cannot call it attire, are all on the qui vive to bring out the newest thing.

The pelisse of scarlet cloth and the velvet mantle, of course, are the most conspicuous articles for winter wear, in order to give the appearance of warmth, if they do not produce its reality; and as last winter they were worn on one shoulder, we may fairly expect, for the coming season, that it will be sufficient to carry them on the arm, unless some dashing female should wrap her fur cloak round the broad shoulders of her attendant footman, in order to keep herself warm by proxy. In these articles, it is intended by the Arbiters of Fashion, that neatness and a tasteful fancy shall render all gaudy ornaments unnecessary, and we understand, that an Andalusian vest and cloak, unique in this country at least, will be sported by the Goddesses of our morning promenades, in honour of our Southern Allies. This simple and comfortable dress, so interesting when on the voluptuous, yet graceful forms of the Andalusian Paysannes, consists of a short and full mantle of dark brown cloth or kerseymere, with a vest of the same materials, fitted with long sleeves, and trimmed with a narrow binding of the same colour; the vest is worn close to the form, and fastens close up to the neck, being ornamented with a profusion of silk buttons in front and at the wrists. At present the short gypsey cloaks, made of fine scarlet cloth, very different to those of last winter, seem to have many admirers.

Those who are partial to furs as a trimming, or merely for shew, will adopt the Northern costume, and with them the Lapland Jacket will have its day. This consists of a close-bodied dress of ruby-coloured or scarlet superfine cloth, or sarsenet, reaching half way to the knees, with a high open collar, and trimmed all round with the richest spoils of Siberia. It may be worn over a morning dress of any appropriate colour, or contrast, surmounted with a white tippet, and accompanied, or not, by a muff, according to the fancy of the wearer.

With the Andalusian costume, the Montero cap of the southern parts of Spain would be a proper accompaniment, but as it might be thought to bear too close a resemblance to a fool's cap, our wise folks will of course dispense with it, in order to avoid mistakes, and content themselves with a small round bonnet of the same colour and materials as the mantle, chastely ornamented with ribband tassels. With the Lapland jacket it has been proposed to introduce the high Siberian fur cap, formed square on the top, and gradually increasing in size as it rises from the head.

The in-door morning costume will be more striking from its tasteful simplicity, than from its stile of ornament; the muslin cap, as usual, will hold its place at the breakfast table, and the hair modestly dressed, will as usual grace the morning drawing room. In carriages, the moss straw hat or the cottage bonnet.

In full dress nothing very striking is yet on the tapis, nor will the regulators of the mode produce any thing very dashing until the birth day, as the late meeting of Parliament will operate rather as a check on an early opening of the fashionable campaign.

Black, from its interesting appearance, it is expected will be a favourite; this will be of flowered Italian Gauze, worn over muslin or white sarsnet, and either trimmed with rich laces, or with a light ornamented edging of the simplest flowers in silk embroidery. The plainest Grecian Costume for the hair will be all the rage, set off with such simple ornaments as fancy may dictate; these will consist principally in wreaths of flowers and silver foil, or diadems formed of several turns of silver cord, with one or two silver stars placed negligently over the left temple. Necklaces and bracelets of the antique, will be worn, but not by the very youngest of Fashion's votaries.

The Male Costume will, as usual, be more elegant in dresses than in ornament; blue and the darkest brown or green, with white nankeen waistcoats, and breeches of black silk or double coloured kerseymere will be quite the thing in the early part of the season, nor will the olive or any of the lighter colours make their appearance till the Spring: for Morning wear, the stocking web pantaloons, of the dark blue, drab-colour, or a mixture, with short Hessian boots, will in general accompany the blue morning coat, though it is expected that a dark grey morning coat will also become fashionable. These will be cut rather short in the skirts, and higher in the collar, with buttons on the sleeves the same as the coat, or of the basket kind, which has not yet lost its attraction; the barrel buttons are also in fashionable estimation.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

Mr. Russell had, on Monday night, the pleasure of displaying a most ridiculous picture of coxcombical vanity, in the part of Tom Shuffleton, in the Comedy of John Bull, before the most overflowing Audience which this Theatre can boast this Season. The character, as drawn by the Author, may appear a burlesque on fashionable extravagance, although it be in reality little more than a faithful copy of the manners and morals of those vicious fools commonly called Beaux: but Mr. Russell determined to turn it into a caricature. Originality seemed to be his aim, and certainly he was the most original Coxcomb we ever beheld.

Fashionable folly, however ridiculous, does not exclude a certain degree of elegance and gentility. Mr. Russell's levity was that of an idiot, who welcomes every person, and listens to every speech, with the same vacant grin on his countenance. His gentility consisted in his dress, not his manners; and lest he should commit the unpardonable fault of imitating, or run the danger of being thought in his acting like Mr. Lewis in the same part, he wisely banished animation from his features, vivacity from his gestures, and if he resembled anything, it was a vulgar Quaker assuming the dress, and aping the manners of a Beau, without being able to conquer his natural stiffness and serious inanity.

The character of Dan, in the same Comedy, was performed by Mr. Decamp. The bills told us that it was for the first and last time, and our judgment bids us ask, why he should not continue to fill a part in which he has displayed no small degree of talent. Unlike the preceding Gentleman, whose proud spirit spurns at the imitation of his betters, Mr. Decamp, without sinking into a servile copy of Mr. Emery, stole his general manner of acting and a spark of his genius.

Miss Duncan surpassed all her predecessors in the Part of Lady Caroline: and the contrast of her excellence with the ridiculous vulgarity of her inamorato, formed a striking picture of conscious talent and blind presumption.

Johnstone, however, was the hero of the night. He was the focus that collected all the rays of attention, and his exertions were proportionably great, and deservedly successful. We had never seen him display more consummate excellence. He was enthusiastically applauded, and compelled, when the Play was over, to come forward and gratify the Public with the Epilogue.

Bannister was full of blunt goodnature and feeling in the part of Job Thornberry; yet, though he equalled, we do not think he surpassed Fawcett in the same Character.

Mrs. H. Siddons represented Mary with the most delightful simplicity. She really looked like timid Innocence in the garb of youthful beauty.

Last night Mrs. Mudie appeared for the second time in the part of Mrs. Haller, in The Stranger. As want of room prevented us from noticing her the first time she came before the Public, we trust our remarks, though longer than a second appearance requires, will not be deemed superfluous.

Notwithstanding the immorality of the play, and the impropriety of its representation at a time when our courts of justice re-echo almost incessantly with the complaints of outraged husbands, and when adultery has taken too deep a root in our island to need the fostering sunshine of dramatic incentives, the part of Mrs. Haller is rendered so interesting by the circumstances attending her crime, her remorse and humiliation, that any actress, however deficient in superior talents, is sure whilst filling it, of commanding attention. Many blamed Mrs. Mudie's rashness in venturing to assume a character, in which her abilities cannot be investigated according to the ideal rule of excellence which every man lays down for himself, but must immediately be brought into comparison with those of Mrs. Siddons, before which it might be expected they would shrink into insignificance. We think, on the contrary, that her prudence was conspicuous in the choice of her part, the interest of which defended her weakness and bade the heart feel without trusting to the deceptions of the eye.

Mrs. Mudie's voice is very good, her whine is never disgusting, but seldom pathetic; her delivery is impaired by a lisp which she struggles in vain to conquer entirely, as it now and then intrudes passages, when the voice of the passions alone ought to be heard. She understands her part very well, but is, perhaps, rather cold when animation is required, and her scream when she discovers her husband in the Stranger, is too loud and too shrill to touch the heart of sensibility. Her action is rather awkward, but evidently so through the anxiety to please, without a perfect notion of the means of pleasing, which every performer must feel on a first, and even a second appearance in London. Her features seem a little withered by the hand of age, and although possessed of no mean talents, we do not think she will ever become a favourite of the public.

COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

On Friday night The Mourning Bride and The Forest of Hermanstadt were acted for the Benefit of the Sufferers at the late Fire. We do not know exactly who are included among the Sufferers; nor whether the contributions of the Public be destined to fill the coffers of the treasury, or to compensate for the losses which the neighbours and inferior dependants of the Theatre have sustained. We were glad to see by the fullness of the house, that the British Nation do not rest satisfied with the enjoyment of pleasure, but also liberally support those who have contributed to their amusement, when they are assailed by misfortune.

We rejoice to see that Mr. Young, from the Haymarket, will make his first appearance at the King's Theatre, in a new Melodrama, next Tuesday night, as it will open a larger field to his exertions, and we doubt not to the gratification of the Public.

CITY AFFAIRS.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor Elect, accompanied by several of the Aldermen, Sheriffs, City Officers, &c. in the usual form was presented to the Lord High Chancellor for his Majesty's approbation, when the Recorder introduced his Lordship with a suitable address, complimenting him on that integrity, independence, and loyalty, which distinguish his character, and had procured him in an eminent degree the approbation and applause of his Fellow Citizens. The Lord Chancellor then expressed his Majesty's full and entire approbation of their choice, and after alluding to the very arduous duties which would necessarily devolve upon him had no doubt, that highly flattering and honourable as this day was to him, by fulfiling the expectations of the City and community, he would feel even a greater degree of honour and satisfaction to his own mind at the expiration of his office. After which they returned and were splendidly entertained by the Lord Mayor Elect, at the City of London Tavern, the evening was concluded with the utmost conviviality. His Lordship's new private carriage, which was launched for this occasion, is uncommonly beautiful, and we understand the state liveries will surpass any thing of the kind that has appeared for several years.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised Half an Assize, or a Penny in the Peck Loaf to commence this day; the Quartern Loaf of Wheaten is then to be sold for 1s. 3½. and Household, 1s. 2d.

Thursday, there was a Court for the purpose of disposing of the business, the principal of which was Mr. Waithman's motion for the inquiry into the abuses of Christ's Hospital. Previous to entering on the motion, the resolutions passed at a previous Court upon the subject of his Majesty's Answer to the Address of this Court were read—

Mr. Dixon took occasion to observe, that for a number of years past, during which wars were carried on, miscarriages of course had occured, and must occur, let what Administration would be in power; the resolutions, therefore, were such as did not meet his approbation; and it would seem from the tenor of them, that the Gentlemen thought this Court competent to direct his Majesty what Ministers he should appoint. He therefore gave notice of a motion, that on a future day he should move that his Majesty should not presume to call to his Councils any set of men, or appoint any commander in chief, without having first consulted the Court of Common Council for that purpose.

Mr. Quin observed, that if Mr. D. was in earnest, he should follow up the motion by another, and would move, that Mr. S. Dixon be appointed First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. Alderman Coombe considered Mr. D.'s motion as an insult to the Court; he, however, could hardly think him serious.

Mr. Goodbehere thought the term "miscarriages," would better suit an assembly of old women.

Mr. Waithman with some warmth observed, that Mr. D. had insulted the Court. He was not quite certain whether a vote of expulsion would lie, but this he knew that Mr. D. had shewn himself an unworthy Member and deserved expulsion, and he (Mr. W.) should not be wanting in bringing it forward.

Mr. Dixon did not press his notice, which was of course intended as a mere sarcasm on the late intemperate proceedings of the Common Council.

A long conversation arose respecting a motion of Mr. Alderman Coombe's for granting a sum of 500*l.* towards the maintenance of a Public School in Derry. The grant was objected to on the ground that the funds of the Corporation would not allow it. It was at length agreed to. The Speakers for it were Messrs. Aldermen Wood, C. Smith, Slade, &c. and against it, Messrs. Waithman, Dixon, Quin, &c.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. Waithman then brought forward his motion for an inquiry into certain abuses in this public charity. The foundation of this motion arose out of some statements in the public prints, so long back as December, last year, which charged the Rev. Mr. Warren, Vicar of Edmonton, a man in possession of 1200*l.* per annum, with getting his son into that charity, to the prejudice of needy and poor persons who have not the means of educating their children, and against the express directions and object of the charity.

On this motion a debate of some length arose, in which Mr. Dixon, Mr. Dornford, Mr. Griffiths, Mr. Quin, Mr. Jacks, Mr. Kemble, Mr. Thorpe, Mr. Box, Mr. Bell, &c. took a part.

It was contended by those objecting to the motion, that this Court had not the power of interfering with the concerns of the Hospital, having relinquished that power by the Act of 1782; that the facts of the case, as stated by Mr. W. were derived merely from Newspaper authority, and might not be correct. On the other hand, it was contended, that the facts were true; that neither the Rev. Gentleman nor his friends had denied the statements, and that consequently the child was not a proper object.

Mr. Waithman consented to word his motion in such a manner as to be acceptable to those who objected, and it was then agreed to.

ORANGE-STREET CHAPEL,

AND ITS

MINISTERS.

CONNECTED as it is with the name of Augustus Toplady—a preacher whose ability and energy are not yet forgotten—I never enter Orange-street Chapel without contrasting the past with the present, without those recollections of departed excellence which are not always favourable to succeeding talents. I am not now discussing the doctrines formerly promulgated in this place, by the eminent divine whose name I have just introduced; but, while I refrain from diverging into such an inquiry, it may nevertheless be permitted to me to give to his eloquence the encomium it deserved,—to commend his sincerity, and admire his zeal.

His successors have been abundantly successful. Without pretending to his purity of design, and without his command of intellect, this chapel, under their management, has been very considerably enlarged, the number of its frequenters has increased and seems increasing, and its revenue, as may naturally be supposed, is in the most flourishing condition. Many causes have concurred to produce these effects. Being a trading concern—for such this Place of Worship literally is—it was the interest of pious individuals, as will always be the case in similar circumstances, to consult, in every practicable way, the gratification of the religious community. Hence their chapel is splendidly fitted up; hence, modelled on the system of Rowland Hill, their singing is uncommonly melodious and surprisingly magnificent; and hence pastors of every description, of all sorts and from all quarters, are sedulously collected for the entertainment of their hearers. From a Cartwright to a Durant, from a Townsend to a Lindell, they have successively rung the changes of popular preaching. As, therefore, its Managers pay (and, I believe, pay well) for every thing—for lights, for melody, and even for ministers—as the fact is so, Orange-street Chapel seems fairly entitled to its present prosperity, and the proprietors of it to their present profits. It is an elegant, and (may I add?) an exhilirating sabbath lounge, where numbers of both sexes doubtless enjoy, week after week, the most agreeable religious relaxation!

Mr. TOWNSEND, whose seniority in this chapel entitles him to precedence, is certainly one of its most respectable preachers. His voice, however, is extremely monotonous; and his delivery is frequently rendered disagreeable by a hem, which appears in him to be constitutional. He is, among those self-taught divines which the chapelers so generally admire. His prominent deficiency is want of animation. If he is rather interesting, he cannot be considered as at all energetic.

Mr. LINDELL does not preach here so frequently as Mr. Townsend; but criticism must contemplate him as demanding to be distinguished. This gentleman is unquestionably one of the most original preachers now in existence. His tones, his emphasis, his manner, his action, his language, are alike his own. Of him, indeed, it is eminently true, that "None but himself can be his parallel!"

Even his learning, for learned he really is, contributes to heighten the effect of his peculiarities. I would willingly describe his preaching, but the powers of description absolutely fail me on this occasion. When I attempt to catch the features of his oratory, I am so divided between merriment and admiration, that I know not how to express the mingled feelings with which I am agitated only by the remembrance of his discourses. Laughing is not always scoffing. I do not design to deride Mr. Lindell; but though he may tell me (as he told the audience at Orange-street, last Sunday Evening), in reprobation of my conduct, "I a'n't a funny preacher," still I must persist, if we are to admit the evidence of our own senses, I must still persist, I aver, in thinking him one of the drollest divines that ever pounced into a pulpit.—

"I don't come here," indignantly exclaimed our preacher, "to spout to fine folks; nor do I preach as a school-boy reads his lesson, but" — — —"Your loins," said he, at another time, speaking of afflictions, "are loaded; and men walk over your heads." "About eighteen years ago," said he, retracing his progress in piety, "I found it very hard to separate myself from young persons of both sexes. Then, he shortly after added,—"It is your vile propensities [How did I tremble for the "fine folks," just behind him, almost within the reach of his strong and uplifted arm, in the gallery!] that keep you from Christ. You will be damn'd for your filthiness!" I suppose some of the female part of the "fine folks" reddened at this tremendous denunciation; for, if I saw rightly, I perceived several ladies attempt to cover their faces with their fans. What can I say more? Mr. Lindell is, I now repeat it, one of the most truly original preachers that ever ascended the stairs of any pulpit. He is boldly commanding, and he is irresistably humourous. Every where is he great: but at Orange-street, among the "fine folks," oh!—

"His happy eloquence is here at home."

Mr. GEORGE CLAYTON now claims my consideration. He is young, popular, and aspiring; followed by the multitude, and desirous of their distinction. He has recently commenced his labours at Orange-street; but, as he seems anxious to render himself very agreeable to the frequenters of its chapel, it behoves me to investigate his ministerial qualifications.

I cannot rank Mr. G. Clayton quite so high as some part of the religious public seem inclined to exalt him. He paid his court, however, tolerably well to the masters of his new pulpit, when he prayed that their chapel might be always the "Nursery of souls for Heaven!" If I am disposed to dispute his ability, I can therefore still praise his dexterity. He is soo studied, if he aims to be foremost among extempore preachers; and he is too negligent, if he wishes to acquire the honour of being considered soundly logical. His epithets are often strangely applied. What reasoning man ever talked of punishment as "the reward due to crimes?" His metaphors are no less faulty than his epithets; and, like too many others who labour to preach fluently, he is compelled frequently to correct himself by recalling his words. He has the art, rather than the gift, of preaching. There is one master-defect in him, common to those who are destined to the pulpit from the cradle,—he does not know enough of human experience and feelings. He has been too good to do good. His illustrations are not sufficiently intelligible; nor do his exhortations find their way instantly to the heart. He succeeds better in intercession, than in exposition: he prays better than he preaches.

I now take my leave of the Managers of Orange-street Chapel. They are happily in possession of one of the most thriving conventicles in this metropolis; and, in order to insure its stability, they have only to continue to employ their present organist and singers, and look out for truly eminent ministers. I suspect they know better than to flatter themselves with anticipating blessings on their cause, without taking the measures necessary to procure success.

November 4, 1808. OXESIMUS.

LEGAL ABUSES.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

My Lord,

DEEPLY sensible of the evils arising from the present practice of the law, and determined, for the benefit of civil society, to investigate their causes and expose their consequences, to whom can I so properly address myself as to Lord Ellenborough! There exists only one opinion, my Lord, respecting your talents; and, as there seems no doubt entertained of your ability to resist professional imposition, let me presume that your inclination to remedy it where reform is practicable, or to punish it where reformation is hopeless, will be found equally unquestionable.

If it be true of human governments, as Pope asserted, that if, and experience appears to corroborate it, there is any propriety in this position of our poet, it must emphatically attach to the administration of judicial affairs. Fruitless has been the vigilance of patriotic ancestors, and vain is the excellence of political constitutions, unless the concerns of the country are directed by judgment and transacted with equity. You, my Lord, must be fully aware of the truth of this remark, and of the extent of its application. Of the arts that are employed to evade public justice, and the efforts that are made to obstruct and counteract it, you cannot be absolutely ignorant. Much, however, remains concerning which it were desirable you should still be apprised. There are cases of which it is impossible for you to take immediate cognizance; there are complaints, which never reach your ears; there are grievances which too often call in vain for the scrutiny of your wisdom, and which, trying though unostentatious, are humble suitors for the interposition of your authority.

"That which is best administer'd is best,"

Laws ought not to be converted into snares. It naturally excites surprise, and may justly awaken indignation, when what was designed for protection becomes the instrument of oppression. Men do but commonly expect to be poisoned by the bread they daily eat, or to find themselves buried in the ruins of the house they are accustomed safely to inhabit. This is not the ordinary course of things.

I am, my Lord, perfectly serious. My language may appear strongly metaphorical, but it is hourly illustrated and exemplified. Whether it accrue from ignorance or peculation, carelessness or knavery, elegance or effrontery, multitudes of innocent individuals are continually smarting under the lash of the law, whose professors, with certain illustrious exceptions, from the office to the bar, evince the most sovereign contempt for the unfortunate sufferers, and, indeed, for truth and justice.

Permit me, therefore, to entreat your Lordship's countenance towards the undertaking in which I purpose to engage. I shall here plead calmly, but boldly, the cause of those who retain no advocates elsewhere. If my cases should not always seem to demand high consideration, let me remind you, my Lord, that petty ills, as they incessantly recur, are, like petty perplexities, ultimately productive of results the most fatal. They constitute the unintermitting fever of the social system. The progress of disorder may remain unobserved, but, if not timely and [illegible] treated, its consequences may be easily predicted.

It is then to these lesser evils of the state, these [illegible] chiefs, that I would occasionally turn your [illegible] attention. Individuals, my Lord, are not so much affected by public changes, as they are indisposed by the misconduct of [illegible] proceedings injuriously interfere with private interests, [illegible] subversive of social happiness.

I have now the honour to subscribe myself, my Lord, your very humble Servant,

A GRATUITOUS BARRISTER.

 As the GRATUITOUS BARRISTER intends [illegible] various Legal Malpractices, he strongly [illegible] Communications on the objects of his inquiry.

not to shrink, in any way, from the proposed inquisition; nor will delinquency be spared, when once facts shall have been fairly ascertained!

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, GUILDHALL, Nov. 3.

WOLF AND WORKMAN V. TANNER AND TOMLINSON.

This was an action to recover the sum of 22,000*l.* for money advanced to the plaintiffs under the following circumstances:—The defendant, Tanner, was a ship-builder at Dartmouth, who was in the habit of building ships by contract for Government, and by a deed, executed in 1804, Tomlinson, the other defendant, joined him in partnership in all the Government business.—The plaintiffs, Wolf and Workman, were Merchants in London, who negociated their money matters in London, such as receiving their bills from the Navy Office, getting them cashed, and answering drafts drawn by the defendant, from Dartmouth, in the course of which they had made advances to the amount claimed, and also for a 1*l.* per cent. commission upon the sums paid, provided it did not fall short of 300*l.* per annum. The defence set up by Tomlinson was, that it was an usurious contract, and that there was no partnership between him and Tanner. In support of the first it was contended, that the 1*l.* per cent. charged for commission, was but a cloak to take more than 5*l.* per cent. for the money advanced. In respect to the second point, an affidavit was read, sworn to by the plaintiffs in another cause, in which they both deposed that they knew the deed of partnership was but a cover to conceal other usurious transactions between Tomlinson and Tanner, and that it was intended to secure 5 per cent. above legal interest, on a sum of 10,000*l.* advanced by Tomlinson to Tanner; and it was stated, that this action was now brought by the plaintiff in hopes to recover against Tomlinson, who was solvent, their advances made to Tanner, who had become bankrupt.

Lord Ellenborough told the Jury there were two questions for their consideration; first, whether the defendants were rightly sued as partners; and, secondly, whether the 1 per cent. commission on the money advanced was a pretext to take more than legal interest. With respect to the first, he said it was clear that the plaintiffs had, in their own affidavit, stated, that they know the partnership-deed was but a fabrication to cover other purposes; and he intimated that his opinion was, that the transaction was altogether usurious. Two or three of the Jury, however, which was a special one, stated that it was a common practice in London for merchants to take a half per cent. commission on money transactions, as a compensation for their trouble.

The Jury withdrew, and, after a long consultation, found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Havre gun-brig is arrived at Yarmouth. She sailed from Gottenburgh upon the 28th ult. on which day Sir J. Saumarez arrived there in the Victory. The whole of the British fleet has left the Baltic, and may be shortly expected in a British port. Should His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence hoist his flag as Commander-in-Chief of the British Fleet, in the Mediterranean, and the Western Coast of Europe, to Cape Finisterre, Admiral Keates will accompany His Royal Highness, as his Captain of the Fleet.

The Goliah and Calypso, belonging to the Baltic squadron, arrived at Yarmouth on Thursday, but the surf was so high, that no communication could take place between them and the shore.

The Swedish fleet has returned to Carlscrona in a very sickly state. So great a mortality has prevailed on board it, during the last six weeks, that if even the season were favourable, it could not possibly have kept the sea much longer.

On the 29th ult. a convoy arrived at Gottenburgh, from the Baltic. Several of them have been a-ground; three of the fleet are burnt by the Danes; one of them, a Russian vessel, has run on shore at Elsburgh, by the terrible storm we have had.

POLICE.

SINGULAR CHARGE.

Bow-Street.—Yesterday a charge of a very novel nature was exhibited against Miss Sarah P. a maiden lady, of considerable fortune (for robbing her own servant) who keeps a house in Barnard-street, Russell-square, and a number of servants. It appeared that Miss P. suspected that some bottles of brandy had been stolen, and on Thursday, between one and two o'clock, she was going over her house in search of the brandy, particularly the servants rooms and boxes; she called to Martha Kent, one of the servants, and asked her for the key of her box? The girl said she had it, and was very readily giving it to her mistress, but Miss P. observed, that she need not do it, as, when she was moving the box by the lid, it came open in her hand, and she was satisfied the brandy was not there. Martha Kent returned to the kitchen, but it immediately struck her, as her box was open, to ascertain if all her things were safe, and on her examining the box, she found that the lid had been broken open, and that all her clothes were safe, but that cash and notes, to the amount of 16 guineas, had been stolen, which she saw in the box the night previous; and Mary Dixon, the cook, saw the box safe, and not broken, a short time before Miss P. was at it. It was urged by Miss P. the improbability of her taking the money, and that all the servants, as well as a hair-dresser, who had been at her house that morning, had access to the room where the box was. Mr. Read, in reply, observed, that the servant had lived with her between five and six years, consequently she had approved of her conduct, and as such her testimony unimpeached. It was clear the box had been broken open, and she (Miss P.) was the only person found near it, and she acknowledged to have been at it; with these facts before him, it was impossible for him to discharge her; however, on the application of her Attorney, she was not committed, he engaging for her appearance on a future day.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

Coroners Inquest.—An Inquisition was taken yesterday at the Bush public house on the Enfield road, on the body of Francis Herd Bingham, whose death was occasioned on the preceeding day, whilst contending with a man of the name of James in a casual combat.

The parties had disagreed on the road in consequence of Bingham who was a driving a cart not having given sufficient room for James who was driving a single horse chaise, to pass. Some words arose and according to the testimony of a person of the name of Kemp who was in company with James, Bingham struck him with a whip, and a fight ensued. The combatants beat each other severely, and some heavy falls were given, and it was the opinion of a medical man it was one of these falls that occasioned Binghams death. He survived the combat 24 hours—Manslaughter.

The fortune teller Joseph Powell, who is sentenced to one years imprisonment and whipping, on Thursday underwent his sentence, behind the tail of a cart from Mutton-lane, Clerkenwell-green, to the end of Aylsbury-street. He had been four times convicted of the same offence; he endeavoured to evade his sentence by pleading ill health, but his plea was not attended to. Jacob Moses, a sable son of Ham, was also accommodated with a whipping from the Sessions House to Back hill, pursuant to his sentence, for defrauding several tradesmen. The scene of punishment was crowded by spectators.

On Tuesday night a servant of Messrs. White and Co. Chocolate-makers, in Greek street, Soho, fell from the street down the area which had been incautiously left open. He was dreadfully lacerated by the fall and is not expected to recover.

BIRTH.

On the 1st inst. at Lindley Hall, Leicestershire, Lady Caroline Capel, of a daughter.

MARRIED.

At Elloughton, in the county of York, J. W. Leuthal, Esq. of the Third, or King's own Dragoons, eldest son of J. Leuthal, Esq. of Burford Priory, Oxfordshire, to Frances Mary, eldest daughter of the late Thomas Terry, Esq. of Beverley.

DIED,

On the 6th ult. at Aberdeen, Mr. Charles Reid, many years Collectors Clerk of the Customs, Montrose.

On Saturday morning, in Park-street Westminster, Mrs. White, the wife of George White, Esq.

On Monday last, at Bath, most universally regretted Mrs. Mann, wife of Admiral Mann.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-FIVE.

DEPARTURE OF BONAPARTE FOR SPAIN.

The fulminating menace is partly executed. Bonaparte and a considerable proportion of his two hundred thousand assailants have already scaled the Pyrennees. We feel however no extraordinary anxiety or depression, in consequence of this event, because, we were prepared for it. In weighing the chances of Spanish success and regeneration, we threw into the opposite scale, the whole mass of their invader's talents and resources. In proportion, however, as our hopes and wishes are ardent in their behalf, we must naturally feel anxiety and uneasiness as long as their fortunes remain in suspence. The chances of war are varying; the events of our time are of a nature very different from those of any other period, and the man, who is the object of our disquisition, has so frequently confounded calculations founded on the most plausible inferences, that too peremptory an opinion on the result of the present contest might be supposed to imply presumption and want of judgment. Some of our readers, and, perhaps the great majority of them, whose expectations may not be so sanguine as ours, will not be satisfied with vague declamation on this momentous subject. Whatever difference of opinion we may however entertain, we are all equally interested in the result; and our wishes and prayers in favour of a cause, so closely connected with our own security, are not less sincere, though many, from an attentive observation of the occurrences of fifteen years, may be more inclined to portend a disastrous than a favourable issue. Those who see greater cause for despondency, than hope, have strong and plausible reasons on their side—The efforts of three successive coalitions, formed by the most powerful states on the continent, and cemented by the strongest incitement to union—a sense of mutual danger—did not oppose even a momentary impediment to the overwhelming torrent of Bonaparte's success and ambition; and their resistance to his power and encroachments produced no other effect, than the subjection of some, and the vassalage of all. These are alarming truths; and, however painful the concession, we are forced to acknowledge, that the result of the most unprecedented sacrifices and exertions, on the part of this country and of the continent, has been solely—the aggrandisement of the enemy, and the transferring the titles and possessions of his more obnoxious opponents into the hands of his family and dependents.

Besides these specious objections, which are considered by many as irrefragable and conclusive, such as entertain doubts of the ultimate success of the Spaniards, have others of equal force to justify their despondency. They find them in the extraordinary character of the French Ruler. His distinguished and almost matchless talents as a soldier; his perseverance and indefatigable activity; the wonderful versatility of his mind; the uncontrouled influence he exercises over his agents, military and civil; his great discrimination in the choice of these instruments; the terror inspired by his reputation and splendid successes; his profound, and almost inconceivable art in keeping alive the confidence and courage of his soldiers, under the greatest privations and fatigues; his impenetrable secrecy, the rapidity with which he executes, and the judgment with which he concerts, his projects; his indifference to the gratifications of the senses, and the incitements of pleasure; the unlimited controul he exercises over the lives and fortunes of sixty millions of individuals, who are ready, voluntarily or not, to second his wishes, and obey implicitly his commands;—These considerations, together with the number and discipline of his armies, the skill, services and reputation of his generals, and his sovereign indifference to the morality of the means he employs, are sufficient to excuse any degree of alarm and anxiety which the friends of Spanish independence may happen to feel.

Such, we know, are the character and resources of that dangerous individual; and they appear more alarming, when contrasted with the weakness, indecision, and want of cordial co-operation, in the members composing other governments; their eternal shuffling and shifting from one expedient to another; the flagrant and crying abuse in the distribution of the most ostensible places, in the state and army; the impunity shewn to cowards and traitors, and the preference given to boobies of fortune and family over genius and virtue;—these alarming symptoms of dotage and approaching ruin, when contrasted with the youthful vigour and activity displayed in the councils of the usurper, afford too much reason for not expecting any efficient resistance from states governed on such principles.—But we acknowledge also, it is not from governments conducted on such principles that we expect the liberation of Europe from the yoke of a watchful, enterprising, wary and intelligent usurper; for were the impending contest to be decided between them and the latter, we would be the first to advise them to instantaneous submission, in order to avoid an useless effusion of blood and treasure, without even a prospect of advantage or honour.

We have stated, we believe, fairly and conscientiously, the strongest and most serious objections that are urged against the probability of success, on the part of the patriots; and in doing so, we have carefully avoided every appearance of acrimonious language, for fear that warmth and invective might appear unfit and indecorous in discussing so solemn a subject. Our opinion, however, of the individual, who, without even the plea of advantage or provocation, is going to let loose two hundred thousand murderers among an innocent, unoffending people, is inalterable, and the same we have uniformly evinced. We will now proceed to examine the chances in favour of the Spaniards; and will do it with the same impartiality and coolness we treated the other side of the question.

Paradoxical as it may appear, the ignorance, incapacity and shameful negligence of the late government afford now the principal prospect of salvation to the Spaniards. Had Agriculture and other branches of internal industry received the necessary encouragement, and the roads being kept in a state of repair conformable to this state of amelioration, Bonaparte would find as little difficulty of subsisting his armies, and transporting them from one extremity of the country to the other, as he experienced in Germany, Italy and Poland: But, in consequence of this neglect, the effects of which are considerably increased by the present disorders and confusion, he is placed under the absolute necessity of drawing his subsistence from France, and keeping immense magazines in the rear of his army. This circumstance alone produces a total revolution in the mode the French have been accustomed to wage war, since the beginning of the revolution; and however productive they may represent their finances, deprived as they are of the resources flowing from external commerce, they will find it difficult to make them keep pace with this augmentation of expenditure. However, allowing them to be completely adequate for the purpose, we still see the impracticability of his carrying on offensive operations on a very active and vigorous scale, if he be reduced to the necessity of supplying his army in that manner. Every league they advance, considering the extreme irritation and aversion of the inhabitants, the magazines must be transported after them. For this service an extraordinary number of horses must be put in requisition; and if we are not misinformed in our information relative to Spain, it will be next to an impossibility to procure them the necessary forage; at least the cavalry and artillery will suffer a very great diminution; and when it is known how much they, particularly the latter, contributed to their former success, it is a subject of considerable consolation to think he will not be able to employ a third part of what he used in the war against Austria and on the Vistula. What renders this an incontrovertible fact, is, besides the scarcity of forage, the circumstance of the deep and almost impassable roads, in winter, which render it impossible, even with double the usual number of horses, to draw a piece of artillery ten miles in an entire day. If he has formed the plan of penetrating to Madrid this winter, he must either leave his artillery behind him; or his march thither will not be very rapid.

But supposing he has conquered all these difficulties, which appears to us insurmountable, and that he provides the necessary forage for a numerous cavalry, for ten thousand horses or more, which are indispensably necessary for transporting the quantity of artillery used by an army of 150, to 200,000 men, and for an equal number of horses to convey provisions, &c. is it probable he will have the temerity to penetrate to Madrid, with the Spanish Generals hovering on his rear, confining their operations to a mere defensive and harrassing warfare, the necessity of which the nature of their ground, the character of the enemy, and their celebrated precautions imperiously suggest. With all his audacity, we are very much mistaken, if he has the courage to undertake it. Nobody, we believe, will deny, that under every circumstance, he is reduced to the necessity of dividing his army into two, or three grand divisions each consisting of about 40,000; supposing his entire force, when he commences his march, to consist of 180,000; as he will be obliged to leave a very considerable force to awe the provinces he leaves behind him. This division of his strength, and the impossibility of taking with him sufficient artillery and cavalry, afford the Spaniards and English incalculable advantages; as it enables them to decide with the bayonet, should they find a favourable opportunity of attacking any of these corps separately.

We are willing to make another concession; and to grant, that, under all these difficulties, he may be able to reach Madrid, before next January. Every step he advances his army decreases from sickness, garrisons, engagements, and other incidents; and we have formed a very erroneous opinion of the Spanish character, if Castanos and the other Generals do not imitate the conduct of Dumourier, at the time of the irruption of the Prussians into Champaigne, and plant themselves between him and the Pyrenees. Their army is already equal in number, if not in discipline, to any he can employ against them; and though a General of his acknowledged abilities may risk a great deal, and the nature of the contest enforces it, for delay is fatal, it is certainly a question worthy of some consideration to know if the most imperious necessity will urge him to so rash and decisive a step. A single disaster occurring, and he and his whole army may be placed, at such a considerable distance from the frontiers, in so precarious a situation, that all the resources of the military art might not be able to extricate him.

We have made every possible allowance for his great talents; we have made concessions in favour of the practicability of supplying so numerous an army with the necessary provisions; the requisite number of horses with forage, and that in a country where the natives themselves are able to keep very few; we have granted even the possibility of employing a large park of artillery, which we equally disbelieve; and after all these concessions, favourable as the most ardent of his admirers could exact; and, supposing him even to arrive at Madrid, we do not see a justifiable pretext for desponding of the ultimate success of the Spaniards. On the contrary, could we lose sight of the atrocities, to which some of their provinces may be exposed, we would exult in the determination of Bonaparte to hazard all his fortunes in a country where every individual, who has an arm to move, is his sworn and implacable enemy. We exult, because this augmentation of danger will call forth a flame of liberty, and corresponding energy, which all the efforts of Europe, combined with the tyrant, will be incapable of smothering. Then commences the true era of Spanish regeneration; and it is unnecessary to tell any man, who knows to estimate that chiefest gift of heaven, that freedom produces effects beyond the range of ordinary calculation. On this ground we must stand, when we attempt to defend the sacred cause of the Spanish patriots; and, convinced of the necessity the councils of that country must be placed under, of giving a latitude to popular principles, armies will be formed in every province, and men suddenly emerge from obscurity, to direct them, which render the issue of the contest not very problematical.

We have expressly declined adverting to the position and interests of Austria, and to any change that may occur in other states; because we wished to take the worst; and to examine how far Spain is able to resist the undivided strength of the enemy. We believe the most biassed of our readers are convinced, that, as long as Austria maintains a menacing attitude, that event can never take place; nor will BONAPARTE, according to probability, penetrate too far into the interior of Spain. However, we will not calculate on this, nor on any other adventitious incident, however probable; and after the maturest reflection, and the statements we have laid down, which, imperfect as they are from want of sufficient room to dilate them, we consider as irrefutable, we see so very little cause for alarm or anxiety relative to the result of the contest, that we look to it with confidence, as the dawn of a fairer day for Europe, and the surest and boldest step made by any nation, towards rational and permanent freedom.

BONAPARTE'S SPEECH TO THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.

PARIS, OCT. 26.—Yesterday his Majesty the Emperor and King went in great state to the Palace of the Legislative Body, in order to open the Sitting.

His Highness the Prince Vice Grand Elector, having received permission of his Majesty to administer the oath to those Deputies of the Legislative Body appointed since the sitting of the year 1807, the names of these Deputies were called over by the Questor M. Despallieres, while each of them approached the foot of the throne to take the oath.

This ceremony being ended, his Majesty spoke as follows:—

"MESSIEURS, THE DEPUTIES OF THE DEPARTMENTS TO THE LEGISLATIVE BODY!

"The codes of law laying down the principles of property "and of civil freedom, which form the subject of your labours, "will be adopted as the sentiment of Europe. My people "already experience the most salutary effects from them.

"The latest laws have laid the foundation of our system of "finance. That is a monument of the might and greatness of "France. We shall henceforward be able to meet the expen- "diture which might be rendered necessary, even by a general "coalition of Europe, by our yearly income alone. Never "shall we be reduced to have recourse to the fatal expedients "of paper money, of loans or anticipations of revenue.

"I have, in the present year, laid out more than a thousand "miles of road. The system of works which I have estab- "lished for the improvement of our territory, will be carried "forward with zeal.

"The prospect of the great French family, lately torn to "pieces by opinions and intestine rancour, but now prosperous, "tranquil, and united, has affected my soul in a remarkable "manner. I have felt, that, in order to be happy, I should in "the first place be assured that France was happy.

"The peace of Presburg, that of Tilsit, the assault of Copen- "hagen, the plans of England against all nations on the ocean, "the different revolutions at Constantinople, the affairs of "Spain and Portugal, have, in various ways, exercised an in- "fluence on the affairs of the world.

"Russia and Denmark have united with me against England.

"The United States of America have rather chosen to aban- "don commerce and the sea, than to acknowledge their slavery.

"A part of my army has marched against that which Eng- "land has formed in Spain, or has disembarked. It is a distin- "guished favour of that Providence, which has constantly pro- "tected our arms, that passion has so far blinded the English "Councils, that they abandon the defence of the seas, and, at "last produces their army on the Continent.

"I depart in a few days to put myself in person at the head "of my army, and, with God's help, to crown the King of "Spain in Madrid, and to plant my Eagles on the forts of "Lisbon.

"I have only to praise the sentiments of the Princes of the "Confederation of the Rhine.

"Switzerland experiences every day more and more the bene- "fits of the Act of Mediation.

"The people of Italy give me grounds for nothing but ex- "pressions of satisfaction.

"The Emperor of Russia and myself have had an interview "at Erfurth. Our first thought was a thought of peace. We "have even resolved to make some sacrifices, in order to enable "the hundred millions of men whom we represent, if possible, "the sooner to enjoy the benefits of the commerce of the seas. "We are agreed, and unchangeably united, as well for peace as "for war.

"MESSIEURS DEPUTIES,

"I have ordered my Ministers of Finance, and of the General "Treasury, to lay before you an account of the receipt and "expenditure of the year. You will therein see, with satis- "faction, that I have not felt it necessary to increase the tarif "with any impost. My people shall experience no new bur- "den.

"The Members of my Council of State will submit to you "many plans of laws, and among others all those which have "relation to the criminal code.

"I rely constantly on your co-operation."

His Majesty's speech excited the most lively emotion, and the Sitting was closed under repeated acclamations of Long live the Emperor! The same rejoicings were manifested in the streets through which his Majesty passed.

PARIS, OCT. 28.—Yesterday, at noon, the Emperor being seated on his throne, surrounded by his Princes, Grand Officers, and Officers of his Household, the Ministers, Members of the Senate, and Council of State, received at the Palace of the Thuilleries a Deputation of the Legislative Body. The Deputation being admitted to the foot of the throne, his Excellency the Count De Fontanes the President, pronounced the following Address:

"SIRE,—The Legislative Body lay at your Majesty's feet "the Address of thanks voted by all the French people as well "as by them. The paternal sentiments contained in a speech "you have delivered from the Throne, have diffused through- "out love and gratitude.

"The first of Captains sees something more heroic and elevated "than victory. Yes, Sire, we have it from your own mouth; "there is an authority more powerful and permanent than that "of arms. It is the authority which is founded upon good laws "and national institutions. The codes which your wisdom "dictated will extend further than your conquests, and reign "without effort, over twenty different nations, whose benefac- "tor you are.

"The Legislative Body ought, above all, to celebrate those "peaceful triumphs, which are never followed but by the bles- "sings of the human race: Legislation and the Finance—it is to "that that our own duties are confined, and it is from you we "have received that double benefit. To you was it given to re- "discover social order under the wreck of a vast Empire, and "to re-establish the fortune of the State in the midst of the "ravages of war. You have created as you have every thing "besides, the true elements of the system of Finance. That "system the most proper for great Monarchies, is simple and "fixed as the principle that governs them—it is not sustained "by those artificial means which have all the inconstancy of "opinions and of events—it is imperishable as the riches of our "soil.

"If sometimes difficult circumstances render new taxes nec- "sary, those taxes always proportioned to that necessity, do not "exceed the duration of it. The future is not devoured before "hand. We shall see no more, after years of glory, the State "sunk under the weight of the public debt, and bankruptcy, "followed by revolutions, open an abyss in which thrones and "society itself are entirely lost. These miseries are far from "us.—The receipts equal the expenditure.—The present bur- "thens will not be augmented; and you give us this assurance "at the moment when other States are exhausting all their re- "sources. When you immolate your own happiness, the hap- "piness of the people occupies your whole soul. It was af- "fected with the aspect of the Grand Family; (for thus you "call France), and though sure of its utmost devotedness, you "offer peace at the head of a million of invincible warriors. It "is with this generous design that you saw the Emperor of Rus- "sia. Hitherto, when Sovereigns so powerful approached each "other from the extremities of Europe, all the neighbouring "States were in alarm. Sinister and menacing presages ac- "companied their grand interviews. The two first Monarchy "of the world unite their standards not to invade; but pacify "the world.

"Sire, your Majesty has pronounced the word sacrifices, "we dare say to your Majesty, that word completes all your "triumphs. Certainly the nation wishes no more than your- "self for those sacrifices that would injure their glory and yours; "but there was but one means of increasing your grandeur, it "was to moderate the use of it.—You have shewn us the spectacle of force which subdues every thing, and you reserve for us a more extraordinary spectacle, that of force subduing itself.

"A hostile people, it is true, pretend to retard this last glory. They have descended upon the Continent at the voice of discord and of factions. Already you have taken up your arms to march and meet them—already you abandon France, which for so many years has seen you but for so few days; you depart, and I know not what fear, inspired by love and tempered by hope, has disturbed all our hearts. Yet we know full well, that wherever you are you carry with you fortune and victory. The Country accompanies you with its regret and its wishes; it recommends you to her brave children who form our faithful legions—her wishes will be accomplished—all your soldiers swear upon their swords to watch round a head so dear and so glorious, where so many destinies repose,—Sire, the hand that has led you from miracle to miracle, to the summit of human grandeur, will abandon neither France nor Europe, which yet, for so long a time, stands in need of you."

His Majesty replied—

"Gentlemen, President, and Deputies of the Legislative Body. My duty and my inclinations lead me to share the dangers of my soldiers. We are mutually necessary. My return to my Capital shall be speedy. I think little of fatigues, when they can contribute to insure the glory and grandeur of France. I recognize in the solicitude you express, the love you bear me. I thank you for it."

PARIS, OCT. 30.—The Moniteur of this day states, that his Imperial and Royal Majesty set off yesterday at noon, on his journey to Bayonne.

The Journal de l'Empire says, that her Majesty the Empress accompanies her illustrious spouse as far as Rambouillet.

On the 28th the Emperor surveyed the public works which are going on, in pursuance of his orders, in various parts of this capital. His Majesty arrived at eight in the morning, at the Place des Filles de St. Thomas, in a very plain carriage, and without any retinue. After minutely inspecting what has been hitherto done there, and asking some questions of the workmen employed in pulling down the old buildings, the Emperor drove off in his carriage to the street of St. Denis, and alighted at the new conduit making in that quarter. His Majesty examined it from one end to the other, and seemed highly pleased with that superb work. His Majesty then visited several of the hospitals of Paris, and informed himself of the state of their internal management, enquiring into the minutest circumstances.

The capitulation of the island of Capri, which was concluded on the 17th instant, was scarcely signed when a convoy hove in sight coming from Sicily, with the regiment of Watteville on board, to the assistance of the English garrison. This reinforcement, however, came too late for the English, and could only witness their submission.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, OCT. 15.—They write from Buda, that the Crown of Hungary, which is considered by the Hungarian nation as the palladium of its independence, has been brought back to the citadel of that city on the 4th of October, after having been at Presburgh during 14 days.—It has been received, and placed in an apartment of the Royal Castle, with much solemnity.

OCT. 20.—We have received the following accounts of the disasters that have happened in the Port of Trieste: In the night of the 1st October a most dreadful tempest came suddenly on. The fury of the waves was such that the noise of them might be heard through the whole town. The next morning six Ships which had taken in their cargoes, in the whole or in part, were thrown upon the coast; three were stranded near the Post-Office, and three others at some distance. A great number of small Vessels, Boats, &c. suffered the same fate.—(Moniteur, Oct. 29.)

ITALY.

NAPLES, OCT. 19.—We have received the following additional particulars respecting the reduction of Capri:

"At the moment when the firing from the English batteries was at the hottest, Captain Levron, who commanded 100 cuirassiers, approached a very steep rock with his gunboat, and throwing up a ladder, exclaimed, 'Cuirassiers, we do not yet know one another; but if you only follow me, I think we shall soon get acquainted.'

"He instantly jumped out, climbed the rock with his cuirassiers, poured in a heavy fire on the English battery that defended the post on that side, and compelled the enemy, after an obstinate resistance, to abandon it. This brave officer was wounded in the hand, and lost one of his fingers, and 20 of his men were killed or wounded. On carrying this battery, all the English were forced to retreat successively from one post to another.

"Among the 900 prisoners landed here, are a Colonel and 18 Officers. The reinforcement of 800 Grenadiers, sent to support the landing party, were under the command of F. Nicoli, a Tuscan, who had ardently solicited the honour of assisting in this glorious enterprize.

"The action which took place on the 10th, between the English flotilla and ours, lasted until night came on. The fighting on the Island continued for nine days. The garrison was considerably more numerous than was at first supposed.

"It is impossible to form any idea of the fury displayed by our troops in the hottest of the battle. They scrambled up rocks so steep, that it is extremely difficult to climb them even where there are no obstacles to be overcome. An idea of their height may be formed from the fact that a reinforcement of 300 men took longer time to get up the landing-place, than the 1800 who climbed it in the heat of action, with their arms and accoutrements on their backs, and make 700 prisoners, was only the work of an instant. We have availed ourselves of all the enemy's works, and the island is now in a formidable state of defence. General Lamarque, who is the principal in command, writes that 15,000 of the English cannot expel him from it."

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, SEPT. 17.—The Grand Vizier, Mustapha Bairactar has caused 40,000 men to march to the Danube Besides these, there are 25,000 organized in the European manner. All the Pachas of Europe and Asia are setting on foot their contingents with all speed, in order to preserve their heads. To form the Turkish army according to the system of European tactics, the Grand Vizier employs an Officer formerly in the service of Austria, and who has now taken another name. The use of the bayonet is one of the novelties introduced into the Turkish infantry.—Moniteur, Oct. 30.

CONSTANTINOPLE, SEPT. 27.—In the memory of man we have not enjoyed so great tranquillity as at present reigns here, we are indebted for it to the Grand Vizier Mustapha Bairacter, who holds, with a firm hand, the reins of Government. He has enjoined all the Pachas to punctually execute his orders for the good and safety of the Ottoman Empire, and has given them to understand that in case they fail in it, they may expect most severe punishment. He is principally occupied in making the Janissaries submit to proper discipline, who, for many ages as well as lately, would arrogate to themselves the right of deposing the Sultans. The least insubordination, the most slight murmur, is punished with death, but they receive their pay on the exact day fixed.

The Grand Vizier is firmly resolved to put the whole army, as soon as possible, upon the same footing as those of Nizam Geddid. We know that this corps has been raised and exercised after the European manner, and that it cost the unfortunate Selim his throne and life for having formed it. The Grand Segnior has the greatest confidence in Mustapha Bairacter, who has placed him upon the Throne, and the Pachas of the Provinces obey the orders of the Grand Vizier, because they know the activity and firmness of his character. The political considerations between the Porte and Russia are still in the same state of indecision. We only know that the Russian army in Moldavia and Wallachia has received considerable reinforcements.—Moniteur.

FROM THE HAMBURGH PAPERS.

HOLLAND.

LETTER FROM M. GERLACH, ROYAL PRUSSIAN PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF WAR AND FINANCES, TO THE MEMBERS OF THAT BOARD.

In pursuance of a Letter received from the Royal Cabinet Ministers, I hereby give notice to the Royal Board, that the obstructions which hitherto obstructed the evacuation of this country, and the restoration of the management of the Royal Finances, by the competent Royal Prussian Boards, have been removed by a Convention concluded in Paris the 8th of last month, and ratified at Erfurth, the 8th inst.

According to the tenure of the said Convention, 1st, The revenue of all the provinces is to be received for his Prussian Majesty's account, from the 8th September of this year. 2dly, The evacuation is to take place, as soon as the necessary papers relative to the payment of the arrears of the contribution shall have been delivered to Mr. Daru, Imperial French Intendant. There cannot remain a doubt but that all the provinces will be evacuated by the 15th November. 3dly, The management of the royal finances is to be restored to the competent Royal Boards as soon as the evacuation shall have been effected.

Berlin, Oct. 22, 1808. GERLACH.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

CORUNNA, OCT. 27.—Yesterday morning disembarked 2000 of the British army, under the command of Sir David Baird. They consist of sharp-shooters, light troops, and artillery; all good-looking men, highly disciplined, and particularly neat in their clothes and accoutrements. It must be acknowledged that the British nation have, in every line, arrived at an admirable degree of perfection; and that the other nations are still a great way behind them. They formed their battalions to the sound of music of a very warlike description, and marched off in the best order to Pallosa.

VICH, OCT. 15.—A letter, from the camp at St. Geromino, of the 30th ult. says:—"At midnight the 3d regiment of Lerida marched along the strand of Barcelona, to the other side of St. Adrian, where the enemy had an encampment. The regiment of Manresa passed the Besos between Santa Coloma and St. Adrian. Three companies of Vich, and the 3d regiment of Lerida, formed the column of reserve. Before day-break, the 3d of Lerida discharged a volley into the enemy's camp, and without giving them time to fire a single shot, rushed on them with the bayonet. We do not know the exact amount of the enemy's loss; but as they had no time to prepare for resistance, and were surprised in their very huts, they were completely routed. The Miquelets of the 3d of Lerida and their bayonets were covered with blood, and each of them declared that he killed four, five, or six Frenchmen. The 3d of Manresa, on their side, discharged a volley at the advanced post of the enemy on the other side of the Besos; and the French behaved in so cowardly a style, that every man of them fled as far as San Martin, without firing a single shot. A company of Vich being ordered to assist the 3d of Lerida, they completely drove the enemy from their encampments, and the Miquelets have returned loaded with knapsacks, various articles of clothing, and biscuit. The enemy had from 18 to 22 men and three horses killed, and lost two millitary chests, and 15 muskets. We took two prisoners. Our loss consisted of three wounded, one of them so badly, that he is since dead. The enemy have completely disappeared. During the whole of the day there has been a firing heard in the direction of Monesda; and there also they have been driven from their camp, and their huts set on fire. It ought to be observed, that during the whole of the day the French were unable to make any use of their cannon."

It is mentioned in another private letter, that the enemy had made a sally, with the intention of pillaging the villages of S. Clemente and Villaclecans, and that they had been beaten and driven back with considerable loss.

A letter from Puigcerda, and another from Ampurdan, agree in stating, that the Miquelets who were raised in Roussillon, with the promise of three pesetas a day, and the booty of Catalonia, have been basely deceived, and conveyed to the north in chains.

VELASA DE MAR, OCT. 7.—With respect to the French we are now much at our ease; for 5000 Miquelets, encamped at San Geronimo de la Murta, under the command of the brave Col. D. Francisco Melans del Bosch, protect us against any attempt the French may make in this quarter. Their sallies now do not extend beyond the distance of a gun-shot and a half from the walls of Barcelona; and their videttes and advanced parties fly the instant a few Miquelets make their appearance. The reinforcements daily arriving at our head-quarters at Villafranca, among which are 6000 troops of Arragon, under the command of the Marquis de Lazan, and 280 of the Spanish Hussars who have landed at Tarragona, will completely hem in the Monsieurs, who now do little more than harrass with their iniquitous decrees the unfortunate and distressed inhabitants of Barcelona.

We have advice from Rousillon that there were 10,000 young conscripts under orders to enter Spain, but that they had been countermanded; and it appears that they will confine themselves to the defence of their own territory, in case of an invasion being attempted by the Spaniards. The inhabitants of Rousillon are dissatisfied with the infamous conduct of the French troops in Spain. They are determined not to submit to the terrible conscription demanded by Bonaparte; and assert, that if the Spanish troops should enter their country, respecting their persons and property, they will with the greatest pleasure submit to Spain. The inhabitants of the frontier towns are sending into the interior their money and moveables, being apprehensive of an irruption on our part. In the environs of Junquera, we have 12,000 men, consisting of Miquelets, and the second battalion of the Volunteers of Barcelona, under the command of Don Narciso Lavalete.

FROM THE GÖTTENBURGH MAIL.

GOTTENBURGH, NOV. 7.—The Armistice in Finland was broken by the Russians on the 27th ult. and a severe engagement ensued, the result of which is not yet known, but it is feared the Swedes have been worsted. The King is returned to Stockholm.

STOCKHOLM, NOV. 3.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Sudermanea has received the following report:—

"The expected large convoy was first discovered from the steeples of this town, the day before yesterday, at two o'clock in the afternoon. The gun-boats had been lying ready in the road since an early hour in the morning, but a hard gale springing up, the gun-boats were compelled to leave the road, and put into port. The men remained on board, and the gale abating at twelve o'clock at midnight, the gun-boats went out again to meet the convoy, which had not yet passed Dragoe. At break of day, the gun-boats formed a line off Dragoe, and dispersed some Danish gun-boats and small vessels, which had gathered around a ship of the convoy which had struck aground. The gun-boats were ordered to assist the above ship in getting off the ground, in doing which they were employed until yesterday at four o'clock in the afternoon, when the Danish gun-boats came out from Dragoe, Copenhagen, and other places, and formed in line opposite to ours, with the exception of twelve of them, which stretched along the coast to attack the Africa, an English ship of the line. I ordered our gun-boats to be cleared for action, but perceiving that five sail of the convoy were aground, without any assistance or protection, I resolved to sail to Malmae-road, in order to concert with the commander of the convoy measures to prevent them from falling into the enemy's hand. Having fortunately soon after fallen in with him, I returned to Dragoe, and rejoined our gun-boats; at the same time preparations were made to destroy such ships as could not be saved. I this day ordered the gun-boats, in consequence of the convoy having safely reached Malmoe, to return to port; as, had any contrary wind sprung up, they would have been exposed to the danger of being blown close in with the Danish shore.—Malmoe, Oct. 21, 1808.

PROVINCIALS.

Living Human Monsters.—On the most respectable authority we communicate the following particulars respecting two human monsters:—

"The first is living near Chirk, in Denbighshire, with its mother, a single woman, who supports herself and it by her labour. The gentleman who described it, says he never saw so wild and wretched a spot as the situation of the poor hut where they reside: the creature is about eighteen, as tall as a human being of that age, but he has very little human in his appearance: he is covered with long hair, and seldom stands upright, but usually grovels on the ground, where he digs holes with his nails in the floor of the cottage; he is not suffered to be loose, but is fastened to a post; and the part of the hut where he is in, is parted off from the rest by an open wooden railing; he is wild and ferocious to all but his mother. I do not recollect whether he can speak; the woman owns him for her son, but refuses to give any account of his father, alleging, that as she does not trouble the parish for his support, no one has a right to question her. A horrible mystery seems to hang over the whole.

"The other creature is a boy of nine years old, son to a farmer, near Market Drayton, in Shropshire; his head and breast are handsome, but he is in every other respect deformed; he has a third leg, which grows under the skin of his right leg, of the same bigness, but not so long, for the foot comes out at the instep. A third arm wraps round the body under the skin, and the hand comes out in the middle of the back: all the trunk is studded with excrescences resembling fingers and thumbs—the child has a most extraordinary appetite, and really consumes as much as two persons, and his voice is singularly deep-toned and loud: his capacity is extremely good, and he goes regularly to school in the village."

A boy about thirteen years of age fell into the river Sow, just above the flood-gates, near Stafford, on Sunday last. Some considerable time elapsed before the circumstance was known and proper measures taken to assist him. He was searched for in the bed of the river without success, but was at length discovered in a large eel-net, into which the current had drifted him, and which was set in the stream that flows through the gates into the pond below. By the proper applications of medical men, we are happy to learn that he is restored to his friends and to society.

The following melancholy accident happened at Golden Hill Colliery, near Lane End, in the potteries, on Wednesday last. An explosion of what is denominated by the colliers the wild-fire, took place about three o'clock on that day, by which six men were deprived of life, and two others so shockingly injured as to be left without hopes of recovery; four of the deceased were married, and by this awful event their wives, together with twelve children, are left without a pilot to struggle against the storms of life; the body of one of the sufferers was not found on Thursday evening.

Lately as a gentleman from Brighton was following the hounds of H. Campion, Esq. of Danny, his horse fell under him, in a field near Pyecombe, and suddenly expired. On opening the animal it was found that his heart had burst, although he had not proceeded more than a quarter of a mile; the gentleman fortunately did not receive any injury.

Sagacity of a Dog.—During the first day of Wrexham races, the family at Pentrebychan attended them, leaving only two maid-servants in the house; the family had not long been gone, when two ruffians made their appearance, and demanded meat, drink, &c. which being refused them, they proceeded to violence. The screams of the women reaching the faithful animal, (which was chained up in the yard behind the house,) he by a strong effort, broke his chain, and running round to the front of the house, attacked one of them with such fury, that it is believed he would have killed him, had not the women interfered and rescued him from his perilous situation. The other ran away.

A serious accident occurred to a shepherd of Mr. Kemp, at the farm, about a quarter of a mile north of the town, called New England, on Thursday. A carter at the above farm, provoked at beholding poor puss, who had made free with some fresh herrings, and who was stealing from the house with one of the savoury delicacies of the deep in her mouth, hurled a stone for the purpose of compelling her to drop it. The stone missed the cat, who escaped with her booty; but which unfortunately glancing from some wood-work, struck the shepherd above alluded to, who was feeding his dog in the cart-house, and completely cut out his eye.

On Saturday night, whilst a boy was running down a blunderbuss, which he had in the evening been discharging in the streets of Birmingham, to the great annoyance of passengers, the piece accidentally went off, when the iron ramrod pierced the corner of his eye, and lodged in his scull. He was taken to the hospital, with very little hopes of recovery.

A very unfortunate accident befel a family at Fairlie, near Greenock, one day last week. A boy of from five to six years of age, was amusing himself, hacking away with some kind of chopping knife upon a block of wood at the door of his father's house, when his little sister, about two years old, coming out, and chancing to put her hand upon the block, the upraised knife fell upon it and cut off the whole fingers by the knuckles or upper joint. The cries of the two children, for both wept equally bitterly, brought the father to the door, who had the melancholy task to perform of picking up the discovered fingers of his bleeding infant; but to rejoin them was beyond his power.

MIDDLESEX COUNTY MEETING.

Friday a Meeting of the Freeholders of Middlesex was held at the Mermaid, Hackney, to address his Majesty on the late Treaty concluded by the British Officers in Portugal.

The Sheriffs stated the purport of the Meeting, and the requisition signed by several respectable Freeholders.

Mr. Clifford, the Barrister, then made an Address to the Freeholders on the disgrace attached to the Convention, and having dilated on the right which the subjects of this realm had to petition the King, concluded by moving an address to his Majesty, praying that he would be pleased to direct a minute enquiry into the circumstances which led to the late Treaty, in order that those who had been instrumental in the disgrace of their country might be brought to punishment; also to express the sense of the Meeting, that those who advised his Majesty to return the late Answer to the Address presented by the Citizens of London, had acted in violation of the principles of the Constitution.

The motion was warmly supported by Mr. Waithman and Major Cartwright.

Mr. York then moved, as an amendment, That the County was sensible of the indulgence it had received on all occasions from the Throne, and the Freeholders respectfully petitioned his Majesty to give instructions, that such inquiry should be made into the late Treaty as might be necessary, at the same time thanking him for the Answer he had given to the City Address; calling upon him to do an act which he had already determined to perform.

Mr. Wells seconded the motion.

Mr. Mellish said, it was indecent at this time to address the Sovereign on the subject of the Treaty; his Majesty had given his gracious word to promote proper inquiry, and the Freeholders ought to wait until the Court of Inquiry, which would shortly be held, had decided. If justice should not be done by their decision, then the Freeholders might come forward, and he would willingly join with them in an Address to obtain the desired object.

Mr. Waithman next observed, that he was conscious the inquiry would not be made, unless Ministers were spurred on to it.

Mr. Byng rose and said, he had expressed his disapprobation from the first moment he heard of the Treaty in Portugal, because it had injured the honour of his country, and the cause which it was the glory of every Briton to espouse. He approved of the present Address, and he was anxious to explain his sentiments on the late reproof to the Citizens of London. Odious as the Treaty of Cintra was, it would be still more odious to be silent on the reproof alluded to. It was the right of subjects to petition the King; and said, if the people put their hand and heart in support of that right, our liberties would be for ever. He concluded by giving his support to the [illegible]

The question was then put, and after some [illegible] division, the Petition was carried.

Mr. Clifford then moved, that the Petition [illegible] and delivered to the Sheriffs, and that the latter should [illegible] of the Secretary of State when the same could be presented, in order that they might obtain a knowledge of the precise time, and publish it in the papers. This motion was unanimously agreed to.

The thanks of the Meeting were then voted to the Sheriffs for their liberal conduct in the Chair; and it was resolved that the proceedings should be published. The Sheriffs finally returned thanks for the honour conferred on them, and they expressed a hope, that the decorum which marked that assembly, would remain an example for similar meetings.

This publication, though dedicated to the most celebrated Satirist of the age, needs not his protection to usher it into the world, for since the pen of a Butler or a Churchill lashed the follies of the age, we have not met with so well-directed or cutting a satire on the fashionable follies of the day, as Chesterfield Travestie, equally abounding with attic wit and eccentric conceit." A Gentleman of Distinction, about fifty years of age, who has used the Russia Oil regularly this twelvemonth for dressing his Hair, has declared to the Proprietor, that his Hair is not only grown in thickness and strength, but it has also prevented it turning grey, which was before on the decline; it is therefore recommended to Ladies and Gentlemen, who wish to benefit from the Russia Oil, not to neglect using it regularly, as it cannot be expected of having the desired effect if only applied at intervals. The Royal Family, and Ladies and Gentlemen of Distinction and Fashion, use Prince's Russia Oil for moistening the Hair when dressing, which is a great a nourisher to the Hair, as to prevent it turning grey to all periods, promotes the growth, and making the Hair grow thick and long, prevents its falling off; and restores it on bald places, if the least roots remain.—Several Gentlemen that were bald, have declared, after using the Russia Oil regularly for three months, the bald places became nearly covered with Hair; promotes eye-brows, whiskers, and prevents them turning grey; at 7s. per bottle, or a bottle containing four small, at one Guinea. Sold wholesale and retail by the Proprietor, A. Prince, No. 9, John-street, Oxford-street; and, by appointment, by most principal Perfumers and Medicine Venders in England, Ireland, and Scotland.

Caution—As Impostors are travelling about, imposing noxious counterfeits on Shopkeepers, particularly on Hair dressers and Booksellers, purchasers will particularly ask for Prince's Russia Oil, and observe the label on the outside wrapper of each bottle is signed in Russian gold ink, "Mochikofsky and Prince:" any without that signature are counterfeits. Country Shopkeepers sending their orders to any Wholesale Vender they deal with in London, will receive liberal allowance.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

A Gottenburgh Mail arrived yesterday. It brought the important intelligence, that the Armistice in Finland was broken by the Russians on the 27th ult. A severe engagement is said to have been fought, the result of which was not known; but we entertain very strong apprehensions that the Swedes were defeated. The King had returned to Stockholm; and whatever the final result of this campaign may be, the honourable adherence of his SWEDISH MAJESTY to the engagements he solemnly contracted, and his perseverance in a cause, which offers him, at present, no other prospect but the consciousness and the honour of having sacredly perforined his duty; and of resisting strenuously, feeble as are his means, the encroachments and immorality of the present time, must ensure him the veneration and gratitude of every man, who has so far escaped the contagion of modern selfishness, as to feel a respect for virtue though in distress, and to refuse doing homage to successful villainy. When the calamities and wrongs of the present day have left no other trace, but the abhorrence of their existence, a more impartial and independent generation will do justice to his conduct and principles. Now that the very basis of moral right and public justice has been daringly undermined, and the frequency of acts of injustice has blunted the feelings of too many, relative to honour and equity, it will be easily accounted for that they should consider as quixotism, his exertions in support of the rights of his crown and the honour of his country. It is a revolting mark of levity and ingratitude on the part of Englishmen at least, should they attempt to depreciate the merit of a Sovereign who is contending, with a far greater risk, and consequently with more honour, for the maintenance of those principles, they have always avowed themselves, and for which they have made and continue to make so many sacrifices. If our conduct be right, in standing forward, as we do at present, in defence of those barriers which the wisdom of other times had erected against the encroachments of ambition; it is a new mode of reasoning to assert that the conduct of GUSTAVUS, for adhering to the same principles, is erroneous. We would deservedly incur a part of the blame attached to the unwarrantable censure of a few cotemporary writers, who seem to court an occasion of shewing the acuteness of their wit at the expence, as far as lies in their power, of what was formerly considered honourable and just. But new times produce new men and new sentiments; and what our forefathers and the most enlightened and revered of our Statesmen, thought it disgraceful to deviate from, is considered in our days as a mark of folly to adhere to. We have frequently had cause to regret that the philanthropy and tolerant spirit of these gentlemen overlook their friends and neighbours, and should extend only to the enemies of their country, and those of social order. Efforts are daily made to extenuate the weakness, and infatuation of those princes, who have sacrificed their independence and dignity in order to acquire a precarious security, subject to the discretion of a capricious and unprincipled despot; whilst those Sovereigns, who have too much spirit, and dignity to barter honour for interest, and their engagements for the degrading protection of an Usurper, are accused of exaltation and extravagance. Gustavas and Alexander of Russia—The former, as long as men continue to estimate actions according to their moral tendency, cannot fail to rank high among the worthiest asserters of order and public right; whilst the Russian Monarch, whatever his private character may be, will be held out as an example of an unthinking Prince, and a perfidious relative and Ally.

Some Spanish Papers were received yesterday to the 28th ult. but as intelligence down to the 31st had been previously received, brought by the Windsor Castle, they contained nothing relative to the operations of Gen. BLAKE's army, that had not been anticipated. We must therefore remain in suspense, relative to the issue of the grand engagement which was to be fought the day after the sailing of the Windsor Castle. A letter from Cork mentions, that a vessel put into Cove, the Captain of which had met with an armed brig at sea, bound from Spain for England, by which he was informed that a general action had been fought between the Spanish and French armies; in which the latter were totally defeated; and that General BLAKE was left in pursuit of the enemy. As no intelligence subsequent to the 31st has been received, we cannot take upon us to contradict this report formally; but we think that an account of such importance would long since have been officially received; and it is well known, that very little credit ought to be attached to the reports of Captains of ships, when they are not corroborated by some other testimony. —The Spanish Papers to the 28th, though three days prior to this rumoured engagement, speak very confidently of the intention of BLAKE to attack the army under NEY, who are represented as very much straitened in their positions by the Spaniards. We are happy also to observe in these papers nothing which seems to betray any apprehension of the tremendous force BONAPARTE is preparing to pour into Spain; on the contrary they speak, with a tone of confidence, bordering almost on contempt, of the enemy, and evince no litle hope of seeing them speedily expelled beyond the frontiers. These papers contain a very spirited address from Lieut.-Col. CARROL, one of the British Officers attached to the army of General BLAKE, to the inhabitants of Biscay. This address breathes the same confidence we have noticed in the Spanish Newspapers, that the enemy will not be long able to keep his present footing in Spain.

We are happy to perceive that the accounts from Catalonia are far more satisfactory than were generally expected. The enemy are almost entirely shut up in Barcelona, and dare not venture a league from that fortress. Skirmishes occurred almost daily under the very walls, in which the Catalans were uniformly victorious. Considerable reinforcements had already arrived, and more were expected. At the date of the latest accounts from that province, no accession of force to the French had passed the Eastern Pyrenees. A corps of 10,000 men, destined to penetrate from Rousillon into Spain, had made a retrograde movement, on finding the important post of Junquera occupied by a numerous body of Miquelets. Of this enterprising and very serviceable description of force there are upwards of 17,000 in Catalonia. The inhabitants of Rousillon, and in all the departments adjoining Spain, are said to manifest the greatest indignation at BONAPARTE's perfidious treatment of the Spaniards, and to have refused furnishing the number of conscripts required of them. They say that if the Spaniards, respecting their persons and property, should enter their country, they will gladly make common cause with them. All these accounts tend to corroborate the sanguine hopes we have uniformly entertained of the ultimate success of that gallant people; and that their base and treacherous invader will find more difficulty to overrun one of their provinces, than he did in the whole career of his crimes and success.

A report was circulated on Thursday, and continued to obtain some credit on the day following, that an Austrian Messenger had arrived in town from Heligoland, with the important intelligence of hostilities having commenced between Austria and France. This account was brought by a vessel, which sailed from Heligoland on the 7th inst. at that time a number of respectable persons are said to have arrived from the the Elbe, all corroborating this intelligence. Letters having been received from Holland of the 8th inst. they contributed to destroy a rumour, which could not be traced to any authentic source; and as it has been since discovered, that no Messenger has arrived no further credit is attached to it. We acknowledge we disbelieve it ourselves, but not from the circumstance of the Dutch letters being totally silent on the subject. It must be remarked that Hamburgh is at least 150 miles nearer than Amsterdam to Vienna; and should the Austrian Cabinet think it expedient, as is very probable, to acquaint our government with its intentions, it would not find it very difficult to send a messenger to this country, under the appearance of an ordinary traveller, who might travel unmolested, and very near half the way through the Austrian territories. It is therefore possible that this account might have been received at Heligoland, even some days before it arrived at Amsterdam, or before King Louis allowed it to transpire. This rumour has proably originated in some police regulations which have been lately adopted in Hamburgh, relative to the circulation of the Vienna Gazette, and letters arriving from the capital, as they contained a candid exposure of the occurrences in Spain; a circumstance rather alarming to the agents of BONAPARTE. These restrictions have probably occasioned this report; and as Austria continues her military preparations and her menacing attitude, it was natural to suppose that nothing but actual hostilities could justify so violent a measure, as the breaking open of private correspondence, which is done with all the letters arriving from Austria. Such is probably the source of this warlike report; and when we reflect how much the Hamburghers must desire any occurrence, which might give them a chance of having the former channels of their industry once more opened, by the departure of their troublesome and rapacious guests; it will be easily conceived that they seize with avidity any one thing holding out to them a prospect of safety. What was probably report in Hamburg, may have gained during the journey, and was converted into certainty before it arrival in Cuxhaven.

The Court of Inquiry upon the Convention of Cintra will positively commence its proceedings to-morow, at Chelsea. Most of the Members and witnesses are arrived in town. Sir C. Cotton and General Spencer are hourly expected from Portugal.

On Wednesday, General Kellerman's Aid-du-Camp sailed from Chatham, on board a flag of truce, for Calais; but the wind coming foul, the vessel was obliged to put into Dover yesterday afternoon. All communication with the vessel was prohibited, and sentinels placed on board to prevent any person from boarding her.

It is intended to send out more men to Spain, both from this country and from Ireland.—the transports that lately sailed from Portsmouth will return immediately to that place and to Cork, under convoy of two frigates, with a view to this object. From the circumstance of these being chiefly cavalry transports, it is likely that the new expedition will consist of that description of force.

In consequence of the high price of grain in England Ministers have made contracts for the supply of our armies in Spain and Portugal, as well as our troops at Malta and the garrison at Gibraltar, from Moggadore and the ports of Sicily. It is even believed that they have made arrangements for the supply of the West India Islands from the same quarter.

Thursday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the under-mentioned Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, viz.—

Capt. J. Eastfield, Admiral Gardner, Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.—Capt. P. Sampson, Dover Castle, Madras and Bengal.

The following ships were taken up in addition to those engaged this season, viz.—

Coutts, Metcalfe, Devonshire, Surrey, and Marquis Wellesley.

A very remarkable trait of swindling, deserves to be made public, not only on account of its great boldness and adroitness, but in order to put all merchants upon their guard against a similar occurrence. One of the first houses in Gottenburgh received a letter from London, in which they were requested to instantly make the most diligent inquiries to discover a young Englishman, who had just fled from the house of a rich banker, and who, they knew, had embarked on board a ship freighted for Sweden. The description of the young man was given in this letter, and he was declared the author of a robbery to the amount of 12,000*l.* sterling in Bank Notes. "If you should find him said the letter, as he belongs to a respectable family, confine yourself to the making him restore the plunder; and afterwards have the goodness to give him three hundred guineas in gold, which will take him to the Indies, where nothing more will be heard of him." The Swedish merchant to whom the letter was addressed, caused a thorough search to be made on all sides: at last being one day upon the Exchange, he perceived a young man whose figure and dress perfectly answered to the description. He addressed him, and seeing that he was an Englishman, invited him to follow him. The young man hesitated, reddened, turned pale, even shed tears; in a word, before he had arrived at the merchant's house, he had confessed all.—Arrived in his closet, he threw himself at his feet, begged of him not to deliver him up to justice, and gave him the 12,000*l.* sterling, which was still inclosed in a portfolio, having the seal of the banker. The Swedish merchant made many serious remonstrances to him, but, according to his instructions, gave him 300 guineas, and promised to procure him a favourable opportunity of going to Bengal. He made haste to inform the banker in London that his 12,000*l.* were recovered, who replied, that he did not understand what he meant.—The Bank-notes were all forged, but the 300 guineas given to the sharper were good.

A TRUE ANECDOTE.—As two rustic neighbours were talking together on a late market day, in Dromore, says one to the other, "Can you tell me, Paddy, what makes candles so dear this season?" "Why, the war," replies the other. "Lord bless us! (cried Pat), are they going to fight by candle light?"

CITY.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

At 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning the Lord Mayor arrived at Guildhall in the state-coach, newly adorned for the occasion, and drawn by a fine set of grey horses, richly caparisoned, preceded by his servants in liveries of uncommon elegance and richness of ornament. The man in armour was restored to this antient ceremony, after a lapse of some years, to the great satisfaction of the spectators.

At twelve, the whole procession moved from Guildhall to Blackfriars-bridge, when the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, and Sheriffs, and City Officers, embarked on board the City-barge: they were joined by the several Companies in their respective barges, and proceeded to Westminster in the most correct order. On the arrival of the procession in the Court of Exchequer, they were received by the Lord Chief Baron with the usual formalities. The late Lord Mayor delivered in the account of estreats, &c, which had taken place during his Mayoralty.

The Recorder then addressed his Lordship on the Bench, and stated, that the City of London had fixed upon Charles Flower, Esq. Citizen and Frame-work-knitter, to sustain the duties of Chief Magistrate for the ensuing year, and that the integrity of his conduct during the period he had filled the situations of Sheriff and Alderman warranted the Corporation in entertaining the most pleasing presage of his administration. The ample fortune which he had acquired by the pursuits of commerce, would enable him to fulfil the character he was about to support, with a munificence becoming the Metropolis of the Kingdom; and the Recorder trusted that the Lord Mayor, on the part of the City, would give further proofs of their attachment and loyalty.

The Lord Chief Baron, in reply to the Recorder, observed, that he entertained no doubt but that the Corporation had elected a person whose fortune and acquirements would enable him to fill the office of Mayor with dignity and advantage. His Lordship entertained the highest respect for individuals who had amassed fortunes by commercial speculation, as it was to the spirit of adventure that Great Britain owed her security and wealth, and by which she had excited the admiration and envy of the world. His Lordship was confident that the Mayor Elect would in every particular fulfil the most sanguine expectations of the City; and he was the more confirmed in his opinion, because during the sixteen years his Lordship had presided in that Court, he had never known an instance where the trust reposed in the Chief Magistrate had been violated. If, therefore, the Lord Mayor for the ensuing year pursued the honorable path so often trodden by his predecessors, his administration would redound highly to his own honour, and to the advantage of the City of London.

The Lord Mayor Elect then took the usual oaths, and withdrew, after inviting the Chief Baron to partake of the festivities prepared at Guildhall. His Lordship afterwards visited the other Courts, and invited the respective Judges to dine. The Procession returned in the same form to Guildhall.

About four o'clock Miss Flower, the daughter of the Lord Mayor, arrived as Lady Mayoress, in the private carriage, accompanied by Mrs Combe and her daughter, who, we understand, kindly offered to introduce her to her new and difficult situation.

At six o'clock, most of those to whom invitations had been sent were assembled, among whom we observed the following:

The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Portland, Lord Camden, Lord Hawkesbury, Lord Mulgrave, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Hon. George Canning, Lord Sandwich, Lord Erskine, Lord Grantley, Lord Kinnaird, Sir T. B. Thompson, Bart. Sir Andrew Hammond, Bart. Admiral Apodaca and the Spanish Deputies; the Swedish, Neapolitan, and American Ministers, &c. &c. &c.

The dinner was extremely well served, including every delicacy in season, and the ornaments were profuse and magnificent. The band of the Royal West London Militia played during dinner and evening some very grand and appropriate airs.

The Ball was opened by the Lady Mayoress and the late Lord Mayor.

Tuesday a Court of Aldermen was held at Guildhall, when Charles Flower, Esq. Lord Mayor Elect, was sworn for the due performance of the office of Lord Mayor for the year ensuing.

The price of bread was ordered to be continued the same as last week, viz.—1s. 3d. the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 1s. 2d. household.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

Last Thursday night was a night of contention. Both Houses appeared armed with new melodramas, not as usual, and as their nature seems to require it, placed in the rear, but in the very front of the performance. Thousands of spectators having assembled to enjoy the sport, and view the termination of the match, the combatants set to a little before seven o'clock, and as we were nearer the Drury-lane than the King's Theatre side, we will first describe what took place in that quarter.

An overture boasting the name, but not possessing the reality of originality, first assailed our ears. It was chiefly composed of fragments of old tunes. Suppose that a modern author, as those gentlemen think nothing so vulgar as the toil of composition, should tear a page from every play that has either been acted or printed, and should join them together, in the hope of producing the best piece that ever was written, and you will have a fair idea of this overture.

The melodrama opened with a tremendous discharge of claptraps, which brought down bursts of applause. The Spanish soldiers, reinforced by some English auxiliaries, under the command of two English Officers, Colonel Sir Leinster Kildare, an Irishman, and Captain Mac Intire, a Scotchman, gave us a singing account of all the grievances they had suffered, and their resolution to conquer or perish. Inspired, probably by anticipation, with the feelings which now justly warm the hearts of their brave descendants, they forgot that in the year 1557, when the siege of St. Quintin took place, then defended by one of the greatest and most unfortunate men of his age, Admiral de Coligny, the intention of their Sovereign Philip II. was to reduce France into a province of Spain; and therefore all their sentiments of vengeance, however consonant with the present, did not suit those times. In order to display his patriotism, or perhaps for want of having looked at the map of Europe, the author transplanted St. Quintin, a town of Picardy, and in the heart of France, which the Spaniards had then invaded, into Spain. These are tricks unworthy of a man of sense. To give the lie to history and geography in such an occasion, when so many really glorious passages in the annals of Spanish heroism might have been selected for the foundation of a play, would lead us to believe the author in a wolf in sheep's clothing, who wishes slily to wound, whilst he seems loudly to extol that highly-spirited nation, were we not perfectly acquainted with the source from whence all these inconsistencies proceed. "The mighty quirk hand at a translation" has been stretched forth again, and Mr. Theodore Hook, whilst loudly inveighing against the treachery of the French, who stab as foes those, whose houses they entered as friends, found that their works, if not their deeds, were at least worthy of imitation. As we are inimical to every sort of imposition, we rejoice at having it in our power to discover it whenever it dares to challenge public observation. Will the British public believe, that at a time when every British heart burns with zeal for the Spanish cause; when British blood is shed to support it against the threatening machinations of ambition, the author of the Siege of St. Quintin has so little participated in the general feelings of his countrymen, as not only to remain uninspired by his subject, but even not to compose the melodrama which he gives us as his own, but translate it from the French! About six years ago we had the pleasure of seeing the second representation of this very melodrama, on the theatre called L'Ambigu Comique, at Paris. It is true that it went there under a different name, we believe that of Jaqueline d'Oldenbourg, but the alterations made in the story are very trifling. The Spaniards only are substituted for another nation, and the fort of St. Quintin for that of Oldenbourg. How will many of the spectators be pleased, when they learn, that most of the compliments passed on the gallantry of the Spaniards, the generosity of the British Nation and Government, and which they have so loudly applauded, were the same, through the medium of translation, which a few years ago greeted the ears of our implacable foe? Is it not strange that the authors of our modern acting plays have so little inventive genius, that they cannot even reproach the French with their tyranny and deceit, without first stealing the sentence of reproach from a French work?

We have already remarked, that had the author intended to write against the Spaniards, he could not have chosen a transaction in their history which would have answered his purpose better. We will now shew that he has not had judgment enough to avoid the errors and improbabilities with which his original abounds.

Count Egmont, second in command in the Spanish army, was formerly the rival of De Courcy, the French Governor of St. Quintin, and married the lady whom both addressed. During the troubles of war, his wife and son have been betrayed by a faithless servant, Bertrant, into De Courcy's hands. The Spanish army lay siege to the fort, and Egmont, forgetful of his duty as general in chief, during the absence of the Duke of Savoy, repairs secretly at night, as a deserter, to St. Quintin, provided with a letter from Admiral de Coligny, which empowers him to claim the liberty of his wife and son, wheresoever he shall find them. He is, as might be expected, although disguised as a messenger from Egmont, discovered to be the real Count, and detained prisoner. Here we have a new string of escapes, vaults, and iron cages, sentinels asleep, and listeners who, though standing at the elbow of a man on duty, whilst he delivers the watch-word, having probably the faculty of losing at will their visibility, still retain that of hearing. But to do justice to Mr. Hook, we must acknowledge that his invention cannot be accused with having produced these repetitions of the tricks he has so often exposed to our sight in Tekeli, the Fortress, &c. for they are all to be found in the French piece. Even the machinery which conveys the prisoners into the vaults, is exactly the same as that employed on the Parisian Theatre. The improbabilities now begin to show themselves. It is well known, that Count Egmont and his son have effected their escape from the fort, through their knowledge of the watch-word, and it may be supposed they will try to profit by it, yet it is not changed. In every garrison it is altered every two hours, but here it remains continually the same. Owing to this neglect, a party of the enemy are admitted into the castle, commanded by Sir Lebanby Kildare, and when De Courcy orders them to shoot a young lady, called Rosa de Valmont, who had assisted the Count in his escape, and had been unfortunately detained with the Countess, he is instantly disarmed. The fort is attacked, and the most ludicrous battle we ever witnessed took place. The party who had gained admittance, were too wise to open the gate to their friends without, but remained running to and fro after one or two Frenchmen, who leaped down the battlements with astonishing agility. At last, Count Egmont's son wrenched a standard from a Frenchman, whom he killed, and though he was but a boy, about ten years old, and unarmed, defended it against two soldiers till his father came to his relief, and victory crowned the Spanish arms.

This melodrama contains several songs, one of which was taken from The English Fleet; the address to liberty was that of Bruce to his army, as written by Burns, which, when reduced into English, had lost most of its rhymes; the tune was of the same Caledonian origin. The most remarkable characters in this piece, were, an Irishman without wit, a Spanish commander who runs after his wife when he ought to fight the battles of his country, a sanguinary Frenchman, at the same time unsuspecting and improvident, a Spanish servant who betrays all his masters, a persecuted wife, a female jailor, who sacrifices her own life to free her prisoners. The dialogue is feebly written, the clap-traps numerous, and yet before the curtain fell a shower of hisses and cat prevented Elliston from being heard when he announced The Siege of St. Quintin for a second representation.

The exertions of the actors, especially of Elliston and Mrs. H. Siddons were so powerful, that they saved this piece from the condemnation it deserved. The duet, taken from The English Fleet, and sung by Masters Duruset and Hulmi, was rapturously encored; and deservedly so. The scenery was truly splendid, and with some curtailments this melodrama would make a good entertainment, which it is an insult to the public taste to bring forward as a first piece.

KING'S THEATRE.

We next turned our attention towards the King's Theatre, where we perceived Mr. Reynolds waving the signal of defiance. On the flag which he held in his hand, we saw "The Exile," written in large golden characters, and a short time after, we found ourselves transported; without any motion of our own, into the barren fields of Siberia, and surrounded with snow-crowned mountains. In this wild part of the globe, we perceived that filial piety and affection banished from the crowded haunts of society had sought a refuge. We began to wonder how Mr. Reynolds had dared to venture so far in search of such antiquated virtues, but soon discovered that he had only followed the steps of a French lady, Madame Cottin, whose imagination (we call to witness her novel entitled Elizabeth), had trodden that path before. As gallant knights we could not but approve of his conduct, and as dramatic critics, we do not find much to censure in his piece.

Unjustly pursued by the jealous ambition of a Russian Nobleman, Count Ulric, the former conqueror of Sweden, has pined many years an exile in Siberia. His wife Sidona, and his daughter Alexina, shared his fate. The latter having heard her father exclaim in his sleep, that should the Empress be made acquainted with his sufferings, she would relieve them and grant him liberty, resolves to set off on foot to seek her sovereign's throne at Petersburgh, and supplicate her mercy. Her mother opposes her design, but on the approach of hostile messengers from the Governor of Tobolski, who come to confine Ulric more closely, she allows her daughter to proceed on her journey, attended by an old servant of her father's. An Indian, Daran (or rather Romanoff, Alexina's lover and the Governor of Tobolski's nephew, who has assumed that disguise to watch over her safety, and is therefore unknown to all) protects her on the way against the snares of his rival Welzien. After a series of interesting adventures, she reaches Moscow on the eve of the Empress's coronation. Early the next morning, a procession of the Nobles, the Patriarch, the Czarowits, the Empress, and Natives of the different Provinces composing the Russian Empire, amongst which were a band of Poles, long before the conquest and partition of Poland had taken place, march towards the Palace. We are next admitted into the cathedral, where the cross and all the pompous insignia of the Greek religion are displayed before the altar.—The Empress, who, through anticipation too, perhaps, wears the order of St. Catherine, long before it had been created by one of her successors, is no sooner crowned, than Alexina's voice is heard begging her father's pardon. The Patriarch, brother to her father's foe, advises the Empress to reject her suit, when Daran, who had happily the day before saved the Czarowitz's life, without appearing to claim his proffered reward, now comes boldly forward to support her cause, and through his means about last obtains the longed-for pardon. Wild with joy, she returns to Siberia, without waiting for the written deed of pardon, and falls once more into Welzien's hands, who leads her to Tobolski. The governor of this city, in order to prevent at any future period, her marriage with his nephew, offers to grant her father liberty, provided she should marry Welzien. Daran then makes his appearance, and she consents to marry him, on condition that he will fly from her for ever. The marriage is celebrated, she seeks her father, and at the moment when her filial affection almost gives way to despair at the thought of having wedded another than Romanoff, the Governor brings them the royal pardon, and Romanoff having resumed his dress, claims his now joyful bride. Count Ulrick is restored to his former rank and influence, and his enemy Prince Lowenstern disgraced.

This melodrama is loaded, not adorned, with an underplot, which rather diminishes than increases its interest. It consists of the love of Count Calmar for Catharine, the Governor's daughter; the feats of Fawcett, as Servitz, formerly one of his servants, but now a gentleman, to further his suit; the captivity of Liston, as the "peeping traveller" and despised lover in a cabinet, in which Fawcett had found his way into the house, and Mrs. Dickons' excellent acting and singing in the part of Catharine. The taste of the age must be sunk very low, if we are to judge of it by the applause which two of the vilest and most nonsensical songs which we have ever heard, received. It is true, they proceeded from Fawcett's comic lips, which is the only claim, and a slender one it is, they possessed to the indulgence of the public.

The comicality of Liston's features was nearly done away by his whiskers, which gave a totally new expression to his countenance; but his acting was as good as usual. He danced very well, and was excellent in his duet with Munden.

Mrs. H. Johnston played the part of Alexina with judgment and feeling, but so much spirit, that it now and then burst into a more than human scream, and led her to embrace almost every performer who trod the boards with her. Thus Pope, naturally enough as her father; Young, even whilst he as yet appeared as an Indian; Mr. Murray, as a benevolent inhabitant of Moscow, and Mr. Chapman, as her old companion on her journey, successively and frequently received her embraces.

Mr. Young made his first appearance at the King's Theatre in the character of Daran. He did not disappoint the expectations which his performance at the Haymarket had excited. He was as great as his part, which did not open a very wide field to his abilities, would allow. His boldness, when he addressed the Empress was tempered with respect, his vindication of Ulrick's innocence was delivered with a manly and impassionate eloquence, capable of enforcing conviction in every heart. His tenderness was not affected, but natural, though dignified, and the only fear we entertain is, that he will not be permitted to fill parts equal to his genius.

Mr. Incledon, as usual, displayed his fine voice and want of taste. The songs were not suited to his style of singing, and we cannot but admire the probability with which Mr. Reynolds has introduced Spanish patriotism in the breast of a Siberian inamorato.

The Music by Mazzinghi, is worthy of his fame. The overture was a happy mixture of the solemn, tender, and lively, and its claims to novelty are not totally unfounded. The scenery is splendid and appropriate, and the processions and coronation present a truly grand spectacle.

In such pieces, the merits of the actors, composers, scene-painters, and mechanists, are in general superior to those of the author. Here they are nearly on a level. The story is well conducted, the style neither above nor below criticism, some of the songs are good and even poetical, others are wretched, and the sentiments not always unexceptionable. The introduction of the ridiculous traveller afforded a fair opportunity of punishing and scaring into silence the crowd of modern tourists who continually glut the public with affectation of sentiment, learning, and observation; and this opportunity was not neglected. Complete success crowned this piece, and we must own, that although not entitled to such unqualified applause, it in some degree merited the favourable reception with which it met.

DUBLIN.—The Theatre opened on Monday night with The Castle Spectre, and Love laughs at Lock Smiths. The great attraction of the evening was Miss Smith's Angela. She was received most favourably, and seemed fully impressed with the distinction with which she was honoured. Mr. Haddart played Osmond, and was well received. The performance went off with considerable éclat, and the House was one of the fullest we have ever seen at the commencement of the season.

ROBERT HAWKER, D. D.

VICAR OF CHARLES PARISH, PLYMOUTH.

CONFORMABLY with the practice I have been enabled generally to pursue, I wish it were now in my power to detail some particulars of the distinguished individual whose abilities I am about to appreciate. He is indeed no ordinary character. All, however, that I have collected concerning him, is—that he was formerly of Magdalen-Hall, Oxford; and that he has since been the Author of Various Sermons, and other Religious Publications. He is Vicar of Charles, Plymouth, where he has been long established; and, if I may so describe him, a Visitant Preacher, towards the close of each year, in the Churches of the Metropolis. I have heard that he was once intended for the Profession of Medicine; but this rumour I do not pretend to authenticate, whatever credibility it possesses.

Dr. HAWKER is variously estimated. He is followed by those who are called evangelical christians, avoided by those who seem denominated orthodox churchmen, and ridiculed by those who consider themselves free-thinkers. It is therefore no trivial task to determine justly of his public pretensions. Attended and admired as he is, and nurtured in the bosom of the national church, he has, even recently, been denied admission into some of our pulpits. While then I endeavour to investigate his merits, and balance these with his defects, viewing him as in the pulpit, let me hope that my observations may not be wholly unworthy of him by whom they are occasioned. His popularity is unquestionable; but the inquiry is, to what causes are we to ascribe the influence that he exercises over the minds of his almost innumerable hearers? I shall, however, first glance at the defects of this celebrated religious instructor.

It is difficult to discover his imperfections. They are rarely perceptible while he is addressing himself to his audiences, such is the animation of his feelings and the efficacy of his delivery; and, owing to the impression which real eloquence always retains in the memory, his faults are hardly discernible even in the calmness of solitary retrospection. He has, nevertheless, his defects. I find him sometimes so rapid, as to be hurried in his delivery; and his oratory can degenerate into colloquiality. Such expressions as—"Put it down as unquestionable true," or "Set it down for an unquestionably fact;" "Sir," repeatedly, instead of Sirs; "My poor Brother!" singling, as it were, one of the congregation; "It is lovely to remark," or "It is beautiful to observe," &c. &c.; these expressions are evidently the effects of negligence, however habit may have familiarised them to the minds of public speakers, or tolerated them among general hearers. The attraction of his sermons is also not unfrequently diminished by injudicious elongation. Nor do his apologies atone for this error. "Allow me one more observation!" or, "One remark more!" or, "I must add another observation;" or, "Another remark just strikes me." All these are awkward excuses, lame connectives; and are not required by the preacher I am here describing. I trust he will not mistake me, when I add, to these cursary strictures on his preaching, that his discourses appear too spiritualised for the mixed congregations of this metropolis; where many, who profess our most holy faith, and regularly attend the ordinances of devotion, are, notwithstanding, almost ignorant of the very elements of religion. His language is of the same description as his sentiments. It is true, indeed, that he is the ambassador of a "kingdom not of this world;" yet, though this divine commission ultimately refers to the church triumphant, I wish he would oftener remember that he is still offering his credentials in the church which is militant.

What, however, are the high qualifications of this eminent Minister of the Gospel?—Let it not be asked who has believed his report, but what his labours are calculated to accomplish.

Accounting all things, however otherwise estimable among men, but nothingness, when compared with the excellency of Christianity, he has, in the spirit of one of its most illustrious defenders, determined to know only "Jesus Christ, and him crucified!" Hence his reasonings, his illustrations, his exhortations, as in his published Sermons on the Divinity of Christ, all bear upon this "chief corner-stone," and unite to rear the only solid superstructure of religion. His manner is impregnated with his subject. Mark his whole deportment in the pulpit:—The awful humility, with which he presents himself at the foot-stool of Heaven; the ardour with which he enters into the singing of the congregation: his intercessional devotion of soul; the impressive distinctness with which he announces the subject of his discourse; the divine fervour, the animated dignity, with which he asserts the character of his Redeemer and his God; His very looks have language; and the primitive simplicity of his appearance gives to his person an indescribable seriousness.

When citing Scriptural Authorities for the opinions advanced by him, which he continually does, his emphases are absolutely elucidations of the passages he instance. His appeals to the heart are irresistable.

His gestures are not oratorical—they are natural. Dictated by his feelings, they are becoming as well as energetic.

I have candidly specified the defects of Dr. Hawker; and I have also endeavoured faithfully to represent his merits. Something there is, in the apparent state of his health, which does not authorise the hope, however desirable, that he will long be continued to benefit the religious public. His ministerial exertions, were he to reside in the metropolis, would rapidly destroy his physical constitution. He burns with the zeal of better times. He is not a preacher, but an apostle.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

A literal Copy of a Letter from a Seaman on board the Africa, relative to the action between that ship and the Danish gun-boats, so honourable to our gallant Tars.

"His Majesty's ship Africa, off Copenhagen, Oct. 20, 1808.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,

"I offer sincere thanks to Almighty God, for his infinite mercy in preserving my life this day, during a severe action with the Danish gun-boats. We sailed from Carlscrona, in Sweden, about a week since, with a convoy under our protection of near 200 sail of merchantmen, for Malmo. Our convoy got into the wished-for port, all, I believe, except one taken, and three on shore, which were burnt by our people, to prevent their falling into the hands of the Danes.

"The Africa kept between the convoy and the Danes, to cover and protect them. About one o'clock this day it was quite calm. We saw the Danish gun-boats rowing towards us, to the number of 32 boats: perhaps you do not know, but for your information I tell you, when a large ship is becalmed, she is quite unmanageable, a mere log on the water, which was our case. The Danes with their oars took the opportunity to come on our quarters and bows, where they knew we were weakest, and endeavoured to rake us. About half-past two o'clock they came within gun-shot of us, and we opened a brisk fire on them; from as many of our guns as we could bring to bear on them. They continued advancing, and stationed themselves some on the quarters, and some on the bows.

"These boats have, in a calm, much superiority over a ship; by means of their oars, they can pull round a ship to any direction, and being small, comparatively only like a speck on the water, they are no mark to aim at like a large ship. They amounted, in all, as far as we can learn, to about 1920 men, and 128 guns, 32's and 42's, with swivels. To do them justice, they shewed much courage in coming near us, for our shot went far over them.

"Their grape-shot could only be likened to showers of stones or dust thrown into the ship by shovels. The skreen round me was soon knocked away entirely, by splinters. A cartridge of powder, of 4lbs. which I held up over my head to the man above me, blew up, the lid of the cartridge-box being off, without hurting me, except a slight stroke on the eye.

"At half-past eleven, those that remained of the enemy began to pull away from us. I am informed by our people who were on deck, they supposed the Danes suffered extremely by our fire, as they saw several boats sink, and they were picking up the people out of the water. Some had not more than five men left in them. The darkness of the night finished the business.

"At the conclusion we find that we have eight men killed outright, and in wounded many badly. The total is 61.

"Our colours were twice shot away. The enemy supposing we had struck, huzzaed and pulled nearer; we huzzaed and pelted away at them; they drew back.

"Our boats are shot all to pieces, an arm-chest on the poop blown to pieces by their shells; but thank God we beat them off. We suppose their loss in men must be three times greater than our's, considering their numbers, and from what those on our decks saw. Those now in the ship, and who were in Lord Nelson's last action at Trafalgar, say, this surpassed it for hard fighting."

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER DATED RESISTANCE, FALMOUTH, NOV. 7.

"After a tedious and unpleasant voyage, we have arrived in an English port. We quitted Lisbon the 21st September, with Trompeuse sloop of war, and fifty-one sail of Transports, with the 2d division of the French Army on board; on the 24th, a severe gale of wind commenced; which lasted with little intermission, till the 28th: of course the convoy was very much dispersed, one transport was totally dismasted, we assisted her to rig jury masts, and sent her back to Lisbon; some lost fore and main yards and top-masts, and were very much disabled. After a deal of trouble, we succeeded in collecting 25 sail of transports out of the 51, and after experiencing foul winds and bad weather near five weeks, we reached the coast of France, near Rochelle; another gale commenced, and again dispersed the convoy; one was lost on the Isle of Rhe; but fortunately the crew were saved. The Resistance with difficulty beat off shore, by setting every stitch of canvas she could carry. On the 25th ultimo, we stood into Basque Roads, and came to anchor on Rochelle, and landed the French General Loison and suite, whom we had on board; after remaining four or five days there, we weighed and steered for Quiberon Bay to seek our dispersed convoy, which we heard had put into different ports along the French Coast, but got very little intelligence of them. We then finally bore up for England; but as the wind prevented our reaching Portsmouth or Plymouth, we stood in for this place, and came to anchor on the 6th instant.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Nov. 7.

Monday being the first day of Michaelmas Term, the Lord Chancellor and Judges came down in the usual state. Having entered the Hall in procession, they proceeded to their respective Courts.

WINTER v. MILES

This was a motion for a new trial. The Plaintiff brought his action against the Defendant, the late Sheriff of Middlesex, for a false return of nulla bona to a writ of execution, upon which the Defendant was to have levied of the goods of the Duke of Sussex. His Royal Highness had apartments in Kensington Palace, where there was a small quantity of furniture, such as a clock, a bed waggon, an old phaeton, and a little scrub poney, worth about 10l. These goods the Defendant had at first seized, but conceiving that the Palace at Kensington was privileged, he returned that there were no goods of which to levy. The cause was tried before Lord Ellenborough, and under his direction the Jury found a verdict for the Defendant, upon the ground that Kensington was privileged as being a Royal residence.

It appeared upon the trial, that a housekeeper was kept at Kensington, and there were apartments for the Lord Chamberlain. There was a throne there, a state bed, and state apartments, and a guard, but the King had never resided there. The inhabitants of the Palace had apartments there, merely by the licence of the King, and had no more interest in the place than servants have in their master's dwelling-house, or paupers in a poor-house.

The Attorney-General, Mr. Garrow, and Mr. Comyn, shewed cause against the rule for a new trial, which had been obtained upon the ground, that the King never having resided there, the place was no longer privileged.

They now contended, that the privilege of a Palace was not on account of the King's residence, but that being a Palace, and being so kept as a Palace, that the King might come there when he pleased to reside, that it was privileged from the process of the Court of King's Bench. They remarked upon the circumstance of there being a chaplain and a guard. And they observed, that it would be very indecorous if his Majesty, if his sacred person, were to enter the Palace at one gate, and the cart of the bailiff to go out at the other, with the goods of any of the persons having apartments there. Or if, upon sending upholsterers in to put up furniture, their persons should be arrested, and the furnishing of the King's apartments delayed.

Mr. Serjeant Williams, Mr. Marryat, and Mr. Barnwell, argued on the other side, and by the former, many ancient authorities were cited, chiefly out of Lord Coke's 2d institute, who, he said, with the rest of the old lawyers, studied the common law out of the ancient Original Records, and, from these authorities, he contended, that although a Royal Palace may continue to be privileged, notwithstanding the occasional absence of the King, yet the privilege being in respect of his residence, and his present most sacred Majesty not having resided there once in a long reign of 48 years, this was no more privileged as a Palace, than the King's house at Newmarket, which was called a Palace.

Mr. Marryat treated many of the arguments with levity, and said, if a chaplain appointed by the Crown would do to give a privilege to the Palace, there are now two dozen of parsons at Whitehall, which is no longer privileged; and if holding a Court, and dating a Proclamation were sufficient to privilege a place from arrest, Mr. Rose's house at Cuffnells, from which one of the late Proclamations is dated, might become a sanctuary for insolvent debtors.

The Court took time to deliver their opinion.

POLICE.

PUBLIC-OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

Thursday, at one o'clock, was the time appointed for the further investigation of the unprecedented charge of a mistress of respectability being charged by her own servant girl with robbing her. Miss P—— attended at the appointed time, with a number of respectable friends. The Prosecutrix also attended, by several friends.

Mr. Gurney addressed Mr. Reid at considerable length, and said he had very little doubt but he should be able to convince the Magistrate of the improbability of the charge, Miss P. being a person of property, and that the Prosecutrix was a needy person; and, from circumstances, could shew that she was not possessed of the property she said she had lost. He then, by permission of the Magistrate, entered into a long cross examination of Martha Keaf, the Prosecutrix. She acknowledged that she had purchased a pair of stays lately; that she was to have paid but nineteen shillings for them, if she could have paid for them at the time of purchase, and was obliged to agree for a pound, because she wanted credit; that she had purchased millinery goods during the last year to the amount of between four and five pounds, some of which she was indebted for till within these few days. One evening Miss Tolmash, who was on a visit to Miss P. asked her to go out to purchase some paper, and she excused herself from going, by observing that she had no shoes to wear, and no money to purchase any. A variety of other questions were put to her by the Learned Gentleman, and similar answers given, and they appeared to make out Mr. Gurney's statement: however, the girl explained them tolerably well. She said she had lived with Miss P. nearly six years, except for about two or three months; during which time she got a shilling a day and her board, and then saved money. She returned to Miss P's service a second time, and during all this time she had saved money; but her savings were principally from what she had given her by Ladies and Gentlemen who were backwards and forwards at her mistress's house, and named some of them, and the sums they gave her. All this she kept a secret from her mistress, as she was very backward in paying her wages, and she had a considerable sum owing her, and if her mistress had known she was possessed of any money, she should not have been able to get any wages, and this was the cause of getting into debt, that her mistress might suppose she was distressed. She was asked if any person knew she was possessed of a sum of money: to which she replied in the negative; but said the Cook must have known she was possessed of money, as she sometimes borrowed a pound of her. She denied having said she did not believe her mistress had taken her money, and that some one else in the house had; but acknowledged having said she could not swear her mistress had.

Mr. Reid here interrupted Mr. Gurney, and observed, that he was in some degree apprised of all that this examination tended to, as the girl told him, when the charge was first before him, that no person knew she was possessed of so much money, and that she had saved it from what had been given her by Ladies and Gentlemen; he should therefore consider the business in exactly the same state as at first, provided the girl gave him a satisfactory account, why she did not appear on Monday, and accordingly called upon her so to do.

The Girl stated, that on going from the Office, on Thursday night, the 3d instant, when she first made the charge, to her mistress's house, she was turned out of doors, with no clothes except those she wore, and no money, the sixteen guineas stolen from her box being her all, and it was with much difficulty she got a bed, at a person's she knew in Little Guildford-street.—On Friday she was informed Mrs. Johnson, the Matron of the Foundling Hospital, had been inquiring after her, and had something to tell her which would be of advantage to her. Accordingly, on Saturday morning, she went to the Foundling Hospital; as soon as she entered the yard, she saw Mrs. Johnson and Miss P——, walking under the Piazza; in consequence of seeing her mistress, she drew back, and remained in the porter's lodge till her mistress left. She then went to Mrs. Johnson, who had her up into her drawing-room. Mrs. J. began by observing that she had heard of the unfortunate business that had taken place between her and her mistress; that it was a shocking thing for them both, and hoped she would not appear against her mistress, as if she was to be transported, or any thing of the kind, she was sure she would never forgive herself. The girl replied she did not want to hurt her mistress, she only wanted her money and a character; although she thought her mistress had treated her very ill by turning her out of doors at a late hour. Mrs. Johnson replied, she must be a good girl, and forgive her mistress that, she being then in a pet and hurry, but was sorry for it now. The girl said she had no objection not to appear against her mistress if she should not come to any hurt, and was not doing wrong. Mrs. J. assured her she could not come to any hurt—that all that would come of it was, that if she did not attend at Bow-street, her mistress would be discharged: her mistress's friends would raise her money for her; but that would not be done at present; she gave her two shillings and some victuals, and told her to call again in the evening. The girl then went to call at Captain Foy's, whose place she was engaged to, some time previous to the unfortunate business with Miss P. Mrs. F. told her she had heard of what had happened between her and her mistress, and observed that if she came to her place, she should not go out to appear against Miss P. In the evening the girl called again upon Mrs. Johnson, at the Foundling, when she found Miss P. in company with her; she had brought her cloathes there, and delivered them to her. At this time Mrs. J. renewed her solicitations that she would not appear against her mistress, and the girl agreed to it, as in the morning, provided no harm could come to her for it. Mrs. J. assured her that would be the case; and all that would come of it would be, her mistress would appear at Bow-street, and as she did not attend, the business would be dropped altogether, as if nothing had happened, and appealed to Miss P. if that would not be the case, and she confirmed Mrs. J.'s statement. The girl took her clothes away to her lodging, and the same evening went to her mistress's house, as desired, and Miss P. paid her the wages that were due to her, and nothing particular passed, except Miss P. observed that she would recollect what Mrs. J. had said to her. Whether this alluded to her going to her new place, or appearing at Bow-street on Monday morning (the time appointed for her to appear at the Office), Miss P's cook took the girl in a coach to Mr. Smith's, chinman, in Tothill-street, Westminster, where they remained all day, and the coachman assigned as a reason for staying there so long was, to avoid the Bow-street Officers getting hold of her.

On Wednesday evening the girl called upon Mr. Lawden, Miss P.'s Attorney, to know if the business was to be settled, when he told her it was of too much consequence, and desired her to attend at Bow-street on Thursday.

Mr. Reid considered all the subsequent conduct of the prosecutrix, respecting settleing the business, to have followed from the proposition made to her by Mrs. Johnson, and accordingly sent Lavender for her. Mrs. J. attended and confirmed the statement of the girl, respecting what she had said, &c.

Mrs. Johnson said the girl was brought up in the Foundling, and she had recommended her to Miss P. and was extremely sorry for what had happened.

The Magistrate told her that her conduct had been strictly correct.

The Magistrate considering the girl to have properly accounted for her non attendance on Monday, said, he considered that there was sufficient legal evidence before him to send the case for further investigation.

Mr. Gurney applied for Miss P. to be admitted to bail.

Mr Reid under the circumstances, complied with the application, and she was admitted herself in 200*l.* and four sureties in 50*l.* each.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

SWINDLING.—Yesterday, Patrick Mac Mahon, who was examined at the beginning of the last week on the charge of defrauding Colonel Greville of a chaise and harness, underwent a second examination, the particulars of which is of the utmost importance in the commercial world. The prisoner requested that the room might be cleared on his first examination lest his character and that of other gentlemen should sustain injury by public report, but he did not succeed in stifling that report, which in this instance brought forward a host of fresh accusers, whose evidence developed such a daring system of villainy and fraud, which has seldom been heard of. The prisoner complained of it having been stated in the newspapers that he had represented himself as an Irish merchant, which he denied until he was reminded of it. To detail the various fresh charges would fill our whole space. The prisoner it was most completely proved by several witnesses, was a partner in the fraudulent firm at No. 12, Sherbone-lane. He was proved to have been a party concerned in the very taking of the supposed counting house, and was seen constantly in company with Geo. Chaters, not yet in custody, and another man of the name of Turvey, who had lodgings in a garret at No. 2, Tottenham-place, St. Pancras. The bills given by the prisoner for goods, &c. of almost every description, are incalculable, and most of them are for large sums of money. In some instances the prisoner was the drawer, and at other times the acceptor, but always the negociator of these fictitious bills, which purported to be payable at the firm of Ryan and Chaters. The plan resorted to generally was to purchase horses, chaise, &c. of gentlemen, coach-makers, and others, and the animals and articles so purchased, were immediately sold at repositories in half a dozen together. It was also contrived, in purchasing jewellery and other expensive articles, that the prisoner after pleasing his fancy, left one of these bad bills to be inquired into in the course of two or three hours, when he would call again, and during this interim, it was carefully observed, that some of the swindling fraternity should be present at the counting house, where the bill was payable, and to carry on the fraud the better, the ledger was handed down, and the bearer of the bill was informed it was a perfect good one. An opinion would not be hazarded to what amount these frauds have been practised, since August last, by various arts. A coach-maker, in the neighbourhood of Tottenham Court Road, was so pleased with the Prisoner for a customer, that he drove the Prisoner's horse in a chaise, which the latter purchased, to try it, and after paying for it with a Sherborne Lane Bill, the Prisoner informed the credulous tradesman, that in a few days he would give him an order for a handsome chariot. The swindlers, it appeared had also practised their arts so successfully, as to borrow horses from gentlemen to whom they had succeeded in introducing themselves, to convey away the very chaises they had obtained with these bills. The office was in an uproar with accusations, and the bad bills were innumerable. The Magistrate remanded the prisoner again for a future day. The prisoner conducted himself with impertinent effrontery during the hearing.

ROMAN FORTITUDE.

THE COURT OF INQUIRY.

w that the passions have subsided, which were raised sequence of the occurrences, that suggested the ney of this Court, and fomented by an appearance of g to stifle inquiry, we may without an imputation cipitance, or prejudging, revert to the Armistice and mediate consequences. Every subject in this realm, the lowest to the highest, is equally interested in it;
s the honour of the country was, almost universally, lered as affected by the transaction, it was his duty
s right to deliver his opinion on its merits, without e and without apprehension. We would not have ed this subject, did we not perceive an ill-disguised, ery inconsiderate, attempt to elude the demands of blic; for, whatever abhorrence we feel to foment po-indignation, we consider it as of the most serious perative consequence, to favour under existing cir-ances a relaxation of national discipline. It is unne-y to adopt any warmth of diction, in order to imeven on ordinary minds, the disastrous effects of ess policy; we need only cast our eyes about us one extremity of Europe to the other, to anticipate sequences. It is the more dangerous, as it conceals nder the specious garb of humanity and moderation;
e misuse of these attractive virtues, in screening a uent from justice, may involve the whole comy in one indiscriminate ruin. The increase of political y was formerly slow in its progress; the symptoms neither irregular, nor alarming from their violent ions; and the skilful statesman might, by an appliof judicious remedies obstruct their course, or era-the evil. But an alarming change has occurred a very few years; and the slightest deviation from ictest regimen, or an inattention to the most trifling aint, has been the precursor of instantaneous dissolu-

h such indications before us, it would be no mark of ent, or foresight, if we remained insensible to the ch of danger; and a sure sign of a depraved heart perverted understanding, if motives of momentary ience restrained us from conscientiously delivering inion. We may be accused—it has been invariably e of every man who stood boldly forward in defence
h and justice, in opposition to folly and egotism—ntions the reverse of those which actuate us; but, we weigh in one scale the ease of two, or ten, or individuals, with the destinies, in the other, of the generation and of myriads still unborn, we feel sensuperior to the fear of being misconceived, the patronage, or the judgement of the inconsiderate.
ping these motives in view, we may, in common her writers, render important service to the public a few honest notes, with souls that spurn at party, or selfish, motives, and with the press at their disposal, may form an insurmountable barrier to the encroachments of the executive and the inroads of faction. This object cannot be too fervently desired, or too strenuously pursued; as the character of our age implies too strong an inclination to sacrifice public to individual, and permanent to transactory advantage.

The fetters thrown on freedom of discussion, the mysterious sullen reserve, and the jealous enforcement of unprofitable pretensions, on the part of some governments rendered the subject indifferent to the welfare of the state; and the first invader, clearsighted enough to perceive this indifference, and sufficiently powerful to take advantage of it, found no resistance from men, who never saw in their government an inclination to acquire their confidence, conciliate their affections, or rely, in the moment of danger, on their exertions and loyalty. The state fell a victim to this wretched policy; whilst the bad advisers, who had been most ardent and zealous in recommending strong and violent measures against their fellow citizens; were the most dastardly in the moment of danger; and the first to abandon the Sovereign they misled, in hopes of acquiring the protection of the invader. This fatal depravity did not stop here; it made its way from the Cabinet to the Camp; and the gangrene had already laid hold on the noblest parts of the community, before a single state physicians had noticed the existence of the evil. For our age was reserved at the same time the monstrous contradiction, that confidential councillors were traitors, and soldiers cowards; whilst the people, whose interference in affairs of internal policy was punished as seditious; and whose complaints were received with animadversion, or contempt, felt no incitement to exert themselves in support of a cause they were never taught to consider as their own.

That this description is not forced, or extravagant, may be seen from the occurrences of the last fifteen years; and the fugitive, or captive, Monarchs of the Continent, bewail, now that it is too late, the folly of those measures, which, in the moment of peril, rendered abortive the resources of the state. These disasters might have been anticipated from the moment an Officer was suffered, with impunity, to neglect his duty, and to betray the trust reposed in him; for example, when favourable to selfishness, creates a dangerous precedent; and as the people were punished for interfering, or censured for prejudging, every traitor found security in the apathy, or constrained silence, of the public, and in the contracted, mistaken policy of the court. If the crime was so flagrant, so alarming in its consequences, that it was impossible to bring the culprit to trial, the whole power of ministerial trick and chicane, by multiplying the forms of justice, or introducing a new and unusual mode of trial, was exerted in order to screen their wretched agent from prosecution; whilst they kept in reserve, as the last resource, an appeal to the prejudices or mistaken humanity of the sovereign, whose interests they did not scruple to betray, or whose honour and that of his kingdom they felt no repugnance to sacrifice; by this rescuing a notorious delinquent from the justice of his country. Thence originated the disgraces and calamities of the Continent; and the cowardice, or treachery of Mack at Ulm, is now accounted for by the lenity of his sentence. But the people of this country were more impartial in their judgment of that transaction; and notwithstanding the successful efforts made by the Austrian Ministry to recommend their favourite General to the clemency of the Emperor, and the strong assertions made by Mack himself about the expediency of the surrender, they, loudly and unanimously, accused him of perfidy and pusillanimity, for surrendering himself, under any pretext, with an army of 36,000 men, to one of 150,000 Frenchmen. The people of this country were right; for there is no excuse for dishonour; and the soundness of their feeling, and their sense of the duties of a soldier, were justified by the subjugation of the Austrian Monarchy. In the same manner they indignantly rejected, in common with Europe, the miserable plea of General Kleist, Governor of Magdeburg; who, in palliation of his ignominious breach of trust, assigned as a reason for surrendering that fortress, his fear of a scarcity of provisions, and a reluctance to have the houses of the inhabitants burned, or their property destroyed. The base wretch! who, when the last fortunes and the honour of his country were at stake, could find any reason sufficiently strong to shrink from its protection, or despair of its safety. True it is, that every villain and coward have always some virtue or expedient in the background, which they impudently thrust forward as a justification of their misconduct. The fatal example he gave was followed by the Governors of Custrin, Stettin, Nieuburg, Hamela, &c. and a monarchy, founded on military virtue and heroism, and ennobled by actions and perseverance bordering on the incredible, fell through the cowardice of its Generals, and the selfish intriguing spirit of its Statesmen.

It is this tremendous example, with all its fatal consequences, which fills us with anxiety and alarm, when we perceive any thing in the conduct of our military commanders which may have a tendency to produce similar consequences; and we treat them with the same impartiality and justice, which induced us to condemn Kleist and Mack, in refusing to consider the pretended difficulty of supplying their army with provisions, or their affected repugnance to demolish some houses in Lisbon, as a defence for lowering the British character in the eyes of Europe. They were guilty of the unaccountable weakness of letting pass by the most auspicious moment for re-establishing our ancient military reputation, which had fallen from the conspicuous height, on which Marlborough and our ancestors had placed it, through the misconduct or incompetency of later generals. This is the irretrievable and discouraging loss; and when we reflect that not one of the advantages has been attained, which induced them to compromise the honour of the army, and the interests of their country, we feel a difficulty in accounting for the action in any other manner, than by imputing it to momentary madness or infatuation. However an access of this kind might contribute to convert the indignation of the public into sentiments of commisseration, it is not less deplorable, that the fortunes of the British empire, and the fate of a gallant army, should have been entrusted to men, whose understandings were not more regular and luminous.

We may be accused of rekindling the public indignation against men who are now answering at the bar of their country the charges preferred against them, and of acting inconsistently with the principles of humanity, as well as of justice, in strengthening the popular prepossession against them. We undertake the task with reluctance; but the independence of our country, as well as of Europe, in this momentous crisis, and the transmission of it unimpaired to the coming generation, impose a duty more sacred and comprehensive than that of not hurting private feelings and convenience. This indifference to the public interest, in favour of individual case, has plunged Europe into an abyss of misery; and we have already had three or four dreadful specimens that indulgence to incapacity in the conduct of our armies has been attended with no other consequence than to make the evil more alarming. If our Officers continue to disappoint and disgrace their country, we tremble to think of the fate which awaits us; for it must be remarked, that, in the short space of fourteen years, almost every expedition of magnitude, has been unsuccessful. At Dunkirk, the Helder, Ferrol, Buenos Ayres, and at Cintra, we saw prodigies of valour on the part of the soldier produce no other consequence than mortification and disgrace; and when we take into consideration the perfidy, inveterate animosity, and the talents of the enemy, we cannot be accused of unwarrantable motives in wishing to provide an effectual remedy against this accumulating evil. Further indifference would be criminal and dangerous in the extreme: let us now try what a reverse of conduct may effect; for it is absurd to think of reform, when the abuse accumulates, so as to render it impracticable.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

LEGISLATIVE BODY.

PARIS, NOV. 3.—In the Sitting of yesterday, his Excellency the Minister of the Interior, accompanied by Messrs. de Segur and Corvetto, Councillors of State, pronounced the following Speech on the situation of the Empire:—

"GENTLEMEN—You terminated your last Session, leaving the Empire happy, and its Chief loaded with glory. The year has passed away, and a multitude of new circumstances have added to the good fortune of the country, and increased our hopes of future benefits. This recital will bring us of course to this lamentable war, which we maintain against one single people. The glory of our nation wounds that people, our strength alarms them, the independence of our commerce, and our industry disquiets them.

"Among the arts of industry, we must enumerate the manufactory of tin. In two of our manufactories they have attained a degree of perfection, no ways yielding to that of the English.

"The mechanics, in their endeavours of simplifying their looms and introducing economy in their labours, have often also improved the quality of their stuffs. Those that are used in the weaving of cottons, have, for several years, been much multiplied; the spirit of invention has brought them to perfection. There is nothing now but what we can make, and very well. The machines best calculated for the manufacture of cloths, are already in wide circulation.

"The Conservatory of Arts and Handicraft is daily enriching by the requisition of new patterns, and is entitled to commendation for the information which the pupils receive, which frequent its school of drawing and descriptive geometry.

"The Consultation Chambers of the Manufacturers are hastening to present useful views, which will be taken advantage of. The Institution of Arbitrators for the purpose of deciding with celerity variances that may arise between the workmen and their employers, render to industry services which have been set forth. Since your last Session, Gentlemen, several towns have demanded them.

COMMERCE.

"The political events have been unfavourable to Commerce. It still was kept alive in the midst of the commotions that lost

d the Continent in blood, because those nations that were ed in the war preferred their neutrality—that right deemed en in our times inviolable. But the English Legislation, ly misled by the ambition of universal monopoly, has overn the ancient barrier of the Law of Nations, and trampled independence on foot, substituting in the room of them a aritime code.—The ordinances of his Britannic Majesty realised these innovations.

The Emperor, obliged to oppose just reprisals to this e legislation, gave out the Decree of the 23d of November, ing the seizure and confiscation of the ships which, after g touched in England, should enter the ports of France. now with what resignation these privations were endured; hey are become habitual, that they have awakened invenand produced a thousand resources in substitution of the s which we are in want of; we know, finally, that a Great n, essentially agricultural, can, by possessing in abundance ticles of utility, easily forgo those, which only form cor xuries or conveniencies of life, particularly when its independence and glory should be put at stake.

These circumstances have favoured one of the greatest es of Commerce, smuggling. But it has been strongly sed. The Government is preparing new means against ve to the public revenue and national industry; the great ments it procures excites the most ardent cupidity.

The Government, penetrated with the situation of the h commerce, has strove to mitigate the evils, to provide wants.

Abroad, a treaty with the Kingdom of Italy, secures to e all the advantages which are compatible with reciprosfice. In the interior, various sums, which have been ad d to manufacturers and proprietors of produce.

The Caisse d'Amortissement has interfered in the outfittings ventures.

A law has limited the bounds of the interest on money; s established at Lyons and at Rouen are prolusive to a system of facility in the circulation of the numerary and landine.

The Exchange and the Commercial Tribunal of Paris see for their accommodation a stately Palace, on the scite of umery of St. Thomas.

Conformably to the new code, and organization of the nals of Commerce of the Empire is preparing.

AGRICULTURE.

In the mean time one of the principal improvements of agriculture is capable, is daily effected by the re-organ on of our repositories for the breed of horses. Eight new itories of stallions have been formed this year. Premiums ent to the owners of the best horses brought to the fairs, ds decreed at the departmental races, are so many adal means of favouring the production of the most eligible s of this animal.

Two new sheep-farms have been introduced. Six hundred os, of the best breed, have been ordered from Spain, and are already arrived in France, notwithstanding the variety stacles that have occurred on their passage. They will be ed in two new establishments, as yet in embryo.

May it one day be so also with the culture of cotton. We ustified to augur well of the attempts on the syrups of the . The rich culture of tobacco is extending; that which is red in the vicinity of St. Malo, equals those of America. e will one day, to judge by appearances, not only supply rn wants with that production, but also export it to her bours.

THE PUBLIC TREASURY AND FINANCES.

Regularity, and a judicious administration, prevail in every tment of the Public Treasury. The national accounts are ed to a system the most scientific and luminous; it differs from the mode adopted by the most intelligent merchants. The Finances have been gradually brought by the Emperor a state of dilapidation and confusion, to a state of order rosperity unknown in the Governments the best administ. Since France generously consented to the adoption of ect taxation, the finances have really been consolidated, he utmost facility found in carrying on the functions of department of the public service.

The Finances of a State are not essentially and efficiently until they become independent of circumstances—until they e maintained independently of the ruinous expedient of ting to loans and excessive contributions—until, in fine, are so connected and identified with national prosperity, hey constitute a direct emanation from it.

"In a period of peace, 600 millions will be sufficient to defray the public expences, and will leave a large surplus for national improvements. The receipts, which amount at the present to 800 millions, will, according to this arrangement, be reduced one fourth.

"In time of war, it is not in the contemplation of his Imperial Majesty to resort to the illusory expedients of imposing taxes of a novel description, to be built on conjecture to raise new supplies. The contributions on the countries of war will be brought back to the war standard—i. e. 800 millions, and even then raised only by 100 or 150 millions at a time, in case of need.

"It remains only to look to the Survey or Register, without which the infinite progress of the scale of increase or diminution would be deficient, in proportion, and would continue to affect the proprietors of the lands actually surcharged; the making up of this Register, which ought to efface so much inequality, to repair so much involuntary and inevitable injustice, is pursued with so much constancy, that those who disbelieve the practicability of this immense work, no longer doubt of its speedy execution. I must not here omit, Gentlemen, the creation of the Court of Accounts to the establishment of which you co-operated in your last Session. We wanted a new institution, powerful in its unity, present to all the depositaries of the public property, by the rapidity of its action embracing all the responsibility of inferior Accountants connected with the public income and expenditure.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

"The same principles of order, and the same views for the acceleration of the services have influenced the general direction of the Commissariat, whose first essays justify the expectation that had been formed.

MARINE.

"Though during the present campaign the Government has limited its maritime operations, still a squadron armed at Toulon, as if by enchantment, and conducted with skill, has been able to defeat, by able manœuvres, the combinations of the enemy, by conveying to Corfu two years supplies of men, artillery, provisions and ammunition. After having thus rendered useless the expedition with which that barrier of the Adriatic was threatened, the fleet of Admiral Ganteaume returned safe through all the difficulties of a boisterous navigation, and all the dangers of continued tempests. The colonies have in like manner been successfully supplied with provisions, by squadrons of frigates and corvettes, which, while they fulfilled that important object, had, like the squadron that was in Corfu, the advantage of making prizes of a great number of the enemy's ships, richly laden. In India, prizes to the value of 15 millions have been the result of the cruises of our frigates, one of which only surrendered.

"Our cruizers in all parts of the world, and above all in the Seas of India and Guadaloupe, have proved themselves formidable to the enemy. Ten ships of the line, constructed in the docks of Antwerp, and fitted for sea many months since, are awaiting their destination. The flotilla of Boulogne, kept up and equipped, is still in readiness to undertake the operations for which it was originally created. Twelve ships of the line and as many frigates have been launched within the year, and twenty-five more, and as many frigates, on the stocks, attest the activity of our dock-yards. Our ports are preserved in perfect order, and the creation of that of Cherbourg is so far advanced, that its basin may be expected to be in a state to contain squadrons before the lapse of two campaigns.

"Spezzia is about to become a second Toulon. The union of almost all the coast of the Mediterranean to France secures to our arsenals and our ships abundant supplies of provisions, stores, and men.

THE PRESENT WAR.

"At the epoch of your last sitting, Gentlemen, every thing combined to deliver Europe from its long agitations; but England, the enemy of the world, still repeated the cry of perpetual war, and war continues. What then is the object, what will be the issue? The object of this war is the slavery of the world, by the exclusive possession of the seas. There is no doubt, that by subscribing treaties of bondage, disguised under the holy name of peace, nations may obtain repose; but this shameful repose would be death.

"The war which England has provoked, which she continues with so much pride and obstinacy, is the termination of the ambitious system which she has cherished during two centuries. Mixing in the politics of the Continent, she has succeeded in holding Europe in a perpetual agitation, and in exciting against France all the envious and jealous passions. She has extended her Colonies, and augmented her Naval Power; and, by the aid of that power, she hopes henceforth to enjoy her usurpation, and to arrogate to herself the exclusive possession of the seas.

"It is impossible to foresee what might have been the consequence of so much audacity, had not fortune, on our part, raised up a man of superior order, destined to repel the evils with which England threatens the world.

"He had always to combat the allies of that power on the Continent, and to conquer the rising enemies she succeeded in creating. Always attacked, always threatened, he found it necessary to regulate his policy by that state of things, and felt that to lay the contest it was necessary to augment our forces, and weaken those of our enemies.

"The Emperor, pacific, but armed by necessity, was not ambitious of aggrandising the Empire. It became necessary to relieve our ancient frontiers from the too near danger of sudden attacks, and to found their security on him is fortified by nature; it became necessary so to separate France, by alliances, from her rivals, that even the sight of an enemy's standard never could alarm the territory of the Empire.

"England, defeated in the disputes she so often renewed, profited, however, of them to increase her wealth, by the universal monopoly of commerce.

"The genius and the prudence of the Emperor have not overlooked this danger. Involved in the difficulties of the Continental War, he ceased not, however, to repel from his States the monopoly of English commerce. He has since compleated the measures of an effectual resistance.

"No one can now be deceived on this subject; since the English have declared this new kind of war, all the ports of the Continent are blockaded, the ocean is interdicted to every neutral ship which will not pay to the British Treasury a tribute which is meant to be imposed on the whole population of the globe.

"To this law of slavery other nations have replied by measures of reprisal, and by wishes for the annihilation of such tyranny.

"The English nation has separated itself from every other nation. She is smitten by the excommunication which she has herself provoked.

"The war will henceforth consist in repelling from all points the English commerce.

"France has energetically concurred in the exclusion of the monopoly of commerce; she has resigned herself to privations which long habits must have rendered more painful. Some branches of her agriculture and her industry have suffered, and still suffer, but the prosperity of the great body of the nation is not affected: she is familiarized with that transitory state, the hardships of which she beholds without fear. The allies of France, and the United States, sacrifice, like her, and with a resolution equally generous, their private conveniencies. England was on the eve of the moment when her exclusion from the Continent was about to be consummated; but she availed herself of the last circumstance to spread the genius of evil over Spain, and to excite in that unhappy country all the rage of furious passions. She has sought for alliances even in the support of the Inquisition. Unhappy people, to whom do you confide your destiny?—You have without doubt recovered from your error. You will groan for the new perfidies that are reserved for you. But how much blood, and what a quantity of tears will flow before this tardy return to your senses. The English hitherto, absent from all great conflicts, try a new fortune on the Continent. They ungarrison their Island, and leave it almost without defence in the presence of an enterprising and valiant King, who commands a French army, and who has already snatched from them the strong position of the Island of Capri. What then will be the fruit of their efforts? Can they hope to be able to exclude the French from Spain and Portugal? Can the success be doubtful? The Emperor himself will command his invincible legions. What a presage does the heroic Army of Portugal offer to us, which, struggling against double its force, has been able to raise trophies of victory on the very land where it fought to such disadvantage, and to dictate the conditions of a glorious retreat. In preparing for a new struggle against our only enemy, the Emperor has done all that was necessary for the maintenance of peace on the Continent. He must reckon upon it without doubt, inasmuch as Austria, the only Power which could disturb it, has given the strongest assurances of her disposition, in recalling her Ambassador from London, and desisting from all political communication with England.

"Still Austria had recently made Armaments, but they took place evidently without any hostile intention. Prudence nevertheless dictated energetic measures of precaution. The armies of Germany and Italy are strengthened by levies of the new Conscription. The troops of the Confederation of the Rhine are complete, well organised, and disciplined.

"One hundred thousand of the Grand Army leave the Prussian States to occupy the camp at Boulogne, while Denmark, henceforth safe from any English invasion, is evacuated by our troops, which are concentrating and centralising themselves. Before the end of January the battalions withdrawn to Spain will be replaced on the Banks of the Elbe and the Rhine.

"Those which quelled Italy last year return to their former destination.

"Such, Messieurs, is the external situation of France.

"In the interior, the greatest order in all parts of the administration, important ameliorations, a great number of new institutions, have excited the gratitude of the people.

"The creation of titles of nobility have environed the throne with a new splendor. This system creates in all hearts a laudable emulation.

"The Clergy have distinguished themselves by their patriotism, and by their attachment to their Sovereign and their duties.

"The Magistrates of all classes every where aid, and without their efforts, the views of the Sovereign and the People.

"Soldiers, Magistrates, Citizens, all have but one object, the service of the State; but one sentiment, that of admiration for the Sovereign; but one desire, that of seeing Heaven watch over his days, too just a recompence for a Monarch who has no other thought, no other ambition, than those of the happiness and glory of the French nation."

The Orator descended from the Tribune amidst the applauses of the Assembly.

The President,—Monsieur the Minister of the Interior, and Gentlemen Counsellors of State—

"You have painted the true greatness of the Prince, in retracing all the good he has done. The mutual pictures of his internal administration will one day be the finest monuments of his reign. Unhappy the Sovereign who is great only at the head of his armies; happy the one who knows how to govern as well as to conquer, who occupies himself incessantly with useful works, in order to rest himself from the fatigues of war, and whose provident hand sows in the midst of so many ravages, the fruitful scenes of public felicity. One single man has fulfilled these two great destinies. He has subdued powerful States; he has traversed Europe, as a Conqueror under triumphal arches, erected to his glory, from the bounds of Italy to the farthest extremeties of Poland. It was enough for the first of Heroes, but not enough for the first of Kings. In the fields of Marengo and of Jena, that indefatigable genius meditated the happiness of nations. All the ideas of public order—all these safe counsels which protect societies and empires, have always accompanied him in his warlike tent. It was he that re-opened the temples of desolated Religion, and who saved morality and the laws from a ruin which was almost inevitable. In one word, he has founded more than others had destroyed.—Behold that which recommends his memory to eternity.

"In the midst of the most magnificent of our squares, a column, worthy the age of the Antonines or the Trajans, has been elevated in opposition to the voice of the Hero that is above such things. Our exploits will be engraved on the glorious bronzes with which it is to be covered. Victory erect on this triumphal column will point to Italy twice subdued, to Vienna, to Berlin, to Warsaw, opening their gates; our standards floating on the Pyramids, the Po, the Danube, the Rhine, the Spree, the Vistula, stooping beneath our laws.—Frenchmen will stoop with pride at the foot of this monument. The day is perhaps not far distant, when we may be able to erect, to the pacification of Europe, a monument still more worthy of him. Let all the arts decorate him with the emblems of agriculture and industry; let the images of peace and abundance preside above; let there be represented with them, not cities destroyed, but cities rebuilt—not captive rivers, but rivers mixing their streams for the benefit of commerce—not fields of slaughter, but fields fertilised—not the war which shatters thrones, but the wisdom which re-establishes them. Let them engrave on them, in fine, as a substitute for all other inscriptions, these memorable words:—'I have felt that in order to be happy it was necessary for me first to be assured of the happiness of France.'

"This triumphal arch of a new description will never be beholden without emotions of respect and love. It is there that every heart will send forth, without effort, the most exalted eulogy of the great man who has been the Author of so much good. We cannot render him our homage in a better mode than by putting up vows; that his talents as a warrior may soon become useless. Secure is he of finding within himself other

SPAIN.

RUNNE, Nov. 8.—On the 7th, his Excellency Lord t, General of Cavalry, and Lieutenant-General in the sh Army, landed at this place. Yesterday came into our the first division of the transports, having on d 5,000 cavalry under the command of the brave er just mentioned. It consists of 70 vessels, and the r two divisions expected consist each of an equal ber.

dispatch has been received by the Junta of this king- from his Excellency General Joaquim Blake, Cap- General of Gallicia, dated Nov. 1, containing the cates of a dispatch which he had sent to the President e Supreme Central Junta of Government at Aranjuez, s as follows:

' MOST EXCELLENT SIR,

The enemy having received great reinforcements from ce within these few days, and having collected the whole eir forces into one body, attacked yesterday our troops d at Somosa, who fought with great bravery; but after an that lasted the whole of the day, they were forced by the 's superior number, who threatened to cut them off, to on their positions. I cannot yet inform your Excellency e amount of our loss, or of the particulars of the action, not g yet received the reports of the Commanders of the divi- engaged. A thick mist, which concealed the movements e enemy, favoured greatly his attack. Wherever I was nt, I witnessed the utmost bravery on the part of our Ge- , Officers, and Soldiers, and from the obstinate resistance they made to the enemy in every point where they were ed, I am persuaded that they have all behaved themselves rue Spaniards, and in this conviction, and in the belief that emy has suffered enormously, I am confirmed by his not pting to follow us. When I saw the troops falling back, e greater part of them taking the direction of the high I formed a junction of the different corps engaged in the , and led them to the Sierra of Viscargui, on the left flank enemy, from whence, after allowing them to rest for two hours, I marched them by Legama to the Heights of a, the rear guard of the army being covered in this retreat Marechal de Camp, De Nicholas Mahy, and this morning them at Bilboa under the command of that officer, while ceeded to take new positions for the army, adapted to its circumstances, availing myself for that purpose of the an troops, the army coming from the North, and the second n of Gallicia, which were not engaged in the action. I unicate the whole to your Excellency, for the information Supreme Junta.

" God preserve your Excellency many years.

Irandegui, Nov. 1, 1808. JOAQUIN BLAKE.

To his Excellency Count Florida Blanca."

S. I am this instant informed, that the whole of the army has appeared before Bilboa, in consequence of , and the orders given to General Mahy, that town will be ted, and the troops under his command will fall back to e rest of the army, the head-quarters of which I mean to sh at Valmaseda."

'LES OF THE 31st OF OCTOBER AND 5TH OF NOVEMBER.

following is the substance of the official account:— n the 31st of October, four divisions of General Blake's vere attacked by 25,000 French. After fighting as be- aliant Spaniards during the whole day, General Blake, er to prevent being surrounded, determined to fall back, orm a junction with the divisions of the Asturians and the is de la Romana. The retreat was conducted in the best order, without the loss of cannon, colours, or prisoners. They halted during the night of the 1st of November, at Bilboa. General Blake having resolved to take post at Valmaseda, the army marched on the 2d for another position, where it was joined by the Asturians, the troops of the North, and the fourth division of Gallicia; a small detachment having been left at Bilboa. On the 3d, the French appeared before that city in great force, and the few troops that were there evacuated it in good order, and fell back on Valmaseda.

" In the action of the 31st, all the divisions displayed the greatest gallantry, in maintaining their position against a very superior force during the whole day, with unexampled energy, and left the field of battle with reluctance; the enemy, notwithstanding his superiority, was unable to gain a foot of ground. The loss of the Spaniards was considerable, but that of the French much greater; so that they were incapable of molesting the Spaniards in their retreat, which was effected in the most orderly manner, without the loss of a single knapsack.

" The army being concentrated at Valmaseda, General Blake received information, on the 4th, that a division of the enemy, consisting of 10,000 men, was marching on the heights of Ostara, with a view of cutting off a division of his army posted in that place. He therefore put his troops in motion at day-break of the 5th, and at one o'clock attacked the enemy. After an obstinate battle, which lasted till dark, he completely put them to the rout, with great slaughter, and the loss of many prisoners, one howitzer, two ammunition waggons, and a vast quantity of provisions. Till 11 o'clock of the night of the 5th, when the dispatch was sent off, prisoners and baggage continued to be brought in. The number and rank of the prisoners cannot be exactly stated, as our troops continued the pursuit, and there was the best founded hopes they would be able to capture a great part of the French division, who, finding their retreat by the high road cut off, defiled by the edge of the mountains, skirting the vallies, in which direction they were closely pursued. On the morning of the 6th, all the army marched forward, and earnestly solicited permission to enter Bilboa at the point of the bayonet. We anxiously await the result of this enterprise; which, there is every reason to hope, will prove successful."

COPY OF A LETTER FROM A BRITISH OFFICER, SERVING UNDER GENERAL BLAKE, DATED SARNOSA, 26TH OCTOBER, 1808.

" On the morning of the 24th instant, General Blake proceeded from Bilboa, to attack the enemy, who were strongly posted at Sarnosa, three leagues from Bilboa, and two leagues from Durango.

" The Spanish army, destined for this service, broke into three columns and a reserve.

" The centre column, 5000 men, proceeded to occupy the heights of Arrisuriaga to the front of the enemy's centre, distant from the town of Sarnosa about a mile; this column gained its post about two o'clock P. M. on the 24th, without meeting with any opposition.

" The right column*, composed of the vanguard and part of the third division of the army, proceeded to get possession of the heights of Landaldey, with a view of attacking the left of the enemy's position. On approaching the heights of Landaldey, the right column were vigorously opposed to a body of about 600 of the enemy's light troops (Voltigeurs), who were most advantageously posted in some woods on the ascent of those hills. The Spanish light troops kept up a very smart and continued fire on the enemy, without however being able to make any impression on them, they being almost entirely covered by the woods. The first battalion of the Spanish Grenadiers came up to support the light troops, and on arriving in a parallel line with them, the entire charged the enemy with the bayonet through the woods, and obliged them to retreat in a most precipitate manner through three different woods into the town.

" This act of the grenadiers, which appeared almost rash, was performed in a most gallant and soldier-like manner.

" The right and centre columns of the army gained their posts, advanced their respective light infantry troops, and drove in all the enemy's out-posts. The enemy kept up a brisk fire from the town on their right column, which approached close to the bridge; but being defended by a howitzer, it was deemed imprudent to make any general attack until the third column should have gained its position on the heights of Guernica, and from thence attack the right of the enemy's position.

"On the night of the 24th the troops lay on their arms; during the night of the 24th, the Reserve arrived at its post about a quarter of a mile in rear of the centre column, and exactly to the right of the town of Sarnosa.

"On the morning of the 25th the extreme heavy rains and thick fog prevented the different columns of the Spanish Army from distinguishing their respective movements. About two o'clock, P. M. the weather cleared up, when the right and centre column moved closer to the town, with an apparent intention of attacking the enemy; however, as the third column which now appeared on the heights of Guernica, could not possibly obtain their object of out-flanking the enemy's right before dark, the general attack was deferred until day-light, on the 26th, thus affording an opportunity to the third column to turn the right flank of the enemy during the night, and thereby cut off their retreat by the valley leading from Sarnosa to Durango.

"On the night of the 25th, the enemy†, having perceived the advance of our third column, and foreseeing that the result must have been that all possibility of their retreat would be in a few hours cut off, immediately commenced a most precipitate retreat to Durango, at about two o'clock on the morning of the 26th.

"The loss in killed and wounded has not as yet been exactly ascertained; that of the enemy appears, from every information, to have been not less than 130 in killed and wounded, including three officers. The loss of the right column of this army, which was the only one actually engaged with the enemy, is supposed to be about thirty killed and wounded, amongst which number are two officers. Nothing could exceed the gallantry of the Spanish troops engaged with the enemy. Amongst a great number of acts of individual and conspicuous bravery of the Spaniards, I deem it but justice to relate one instance of the enthusiasm of the Patriots:—Pablo Martinez, of the regiment of Navarra, rushed on and attacked with the bayonet a party of eight of the enemy, and after a most desperate encounter, in which he wounded two of his antagonists, he fell covered with bayonet wounds.

"I cannot close this letter without mentioning a most interesting and gratifying sight, which I witnessed on the afternoon of the 28th instant. A battalion of the regiment of Catalonia, belonging to the Marquis of Romana's army, having joined this army on the night of the 24th inst. were ordered by General Blake to join their countrymen in the vanguard, who were then engaged with the enemy; upon the arrival of the Catalonians at the vanguard, there was a momentary cessation of firing, and those brave Patriots from the North were received by their old friends and companions with loud and enthusiastic huzzas; the Catalonians returned the cheer with "Viva La Espana y La Gran Britania," and "Long live George the Third and Ferdinand the Seventh."; The feelings excited in the bosoms of the Spaniards can easier be conceived than described; nor is it difficult to imagine what were the sentiments excited in the hearts of the enemy in the fore-front of whom this joyful meeting took place. The salutation over the regiment of Catalonia joined most cordially in the fire against the enemy."

† General Merlin commanded the enemy's force.

SIR DAVID BAIRD'S ARMY.

"Lugo, Nov. 2.—We arrived at this place on the 31st ult. after a fatiguing march of four days from Corunna, through a country bare and barren in the extreme, and of course little suited to supply the wants of a large army. The poverty of the natives appeared rather to claim relief from us, than to warrant us in looking for any supplies from them. The rains fall in torrents, and I fear some of the second battalions, which are made up of some very fine young lads, but not seasoned, will suffer much in consequence. The stores of our Commissariat will require to be renewed to a very large amount, in consequence of the immense and unexpected expenditure occasioned by the circumstances I have mentioned. To-morrow we march hence. Our route is through Constantine, Nogales, Herreria, Villafranca, Ponteferrado, where we stop some days, and then proceed to Bonavente, where we expect to meet the army from Portugal."

PROVINCIALS.

SINGULAR INSTANCE OF FECUNDITY.—Richard Jackson, of Yealand, has a tame rabbit in his possession, which upon a moderate computation, has produced the enormous quantity of 528 young ones in six years. She had 25 broods the first two years, and never less than ten young ones at each time. She suckled, at one time, in the second year, no less than fifteen, yet being her own, the other five wild ones, which were taken from their dam when but a few days old. She has at this time a brood of five young ones.

A ludicrous circumstance occurred on the night of the 25th ult. at Broomhill, near Whalton. Some villains attempted to rob the barn of Mr. John Pratt, of that place, but while they were breaking in, two chimney sweepers who were lodged there for the purpose of starting early in the morning with their work at the farmer's, were roused by the noise, and one of them calling out "I am coming," the depredators scampered off in great terror.

A few days ago, as the workmen employed in making the new turnpike-road on Odd Down, near Bath, were cutting through an embankment, they discovered a heap of human bones and skulls, some of the latter with teeth nearly in a perfect state; supposed to be the remains of the people slain in the Cromwellian wars.

The body of a man, quite naked, and a shocking spectacle, was found last week on the sea-coast of an unfrequented part of Gower, near Swansea, which had been thrown on shore by the tide. After an inquest had been held by J. C. Collins, Esq. Coroner, the remains of the unfortunate unknown was buried.

We understand that a most useful, portable, and ingenious contrivance for sharpening Razors, upon a plan, at once novel, simple, and unerring, and which has obtained (as we are told it deserves), the Encomium of some of our first-rate Mechanical Geniuses, is now offered for sale by the Inventor, J. E. Rigge, Perfumer, and Razor Strop Maker, No. 65, Cheapside, and 32, Park-street, Grosvenor-square; and is likewise sold by his appointment, at Messrs. Clarke and Sons, Cutlers, Cheapside:—The above Invention is particularly recommended to those, who cannot use a Hone with effect, or who have not opportunities of applying to Cutlers.

SATURDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, Nov. 19, 1808.

Copy of a Letter from Captain Seymour, of his Majesty's ship Amethyst, to Admiral Lord Gambier.

My Lord, Amethyst, Hamoaze, Nov. 15, 1808.

I have the most sincere pleasure in acquainting you, that his Majesty's ship the Amethyst, under my command, captured, the 10th inst. at night, the French frigate La Thetis, of 44 guns, and a crew of 330 men, who had served years together, and 106 soldiers, from L'Orient for Martinique. Being close to the N.W. point of Goa, she was seen a quarter before seven P.M. and immediately chased; and a close action began before ten o'clock, which continued with little intermission till twenty minutes after midnight. Having fallen on board for a short time, after ten, and from a quarter past eleven, when she intentionally laid us on board, till she surrendered (about an hour), she lay fast alongside, the fluke of our best bower anchor having entered her foremost main-deck port, and she was, after great slaughter, boarded and taken possession of, and some prisoners received from her, before we disengaged the ships. Shortly after, a ship of war was seen closing fast under a press of sail, which proved to be the Triumph, which immediately gave us the most effectual assistance that the anxious and feeling mind of such an Officer as Sir Thomas Hardy could suggest. At half-past one the Shannon joined, received prisoners from, and took La Thetis in tow. She is wholly dismasted, dreadfully shattered, and had her Commander, (Pinsun, Capitaine de Vaisseau,) and 135 men, killed; 108 wounded, amongst whom are all her Officers except three. The Amethyst has lost 19 killed, and 51 wounded; amongst the former is Lieutenant Bernard Kindall, a most promising young Officer of the Royal Marines, who suffered greatly; and that invaluable Officer, Lieut. J. S. Payne, dangerously wounded: the mizen mast shot away, and the ship much damaged and leaky. No language can convey an adequate idea of the cool and determined bravery shewn by every Officer and man of this Ship; and their truly noble behaviour has laid me under the greatest obligation. The assistance I received from my gallant friend the First Lieutenant, Mr. Goddard Blennerhassett, an Officer of great merit and ability, is beyond all encomium. Lieutenants Hill and Crouch, and Mr. Fair the Master, (whose admirable exertions, particularly at the close of the action, when the enemy was on fire the boarders employed, and the Ship had suddenly made two feet water, surmounted all difficulties), are happily preserved to add Lustre to his Majesty's Service. In justice to Monsieur Dode, the surviving Commander of La Thetis, I must observe, he acted with singular firmness, and was the only Frenchman on the quarter-deck when we boarded her.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Downing-street, November 18, 1808.

A dispatch, of which the following is a copy, was this day received by Viscount Castlereagh, from Lieutenant-General Beckwith, commanding his Majesty's troops in the Windward and Leeward Islands.

MY LORD, Barbadoes, Sept. 14, 1808.

Intelligence having been received here on the 27th of last month, that the enemy had hazarded a landing in Marie Galante, with a detachment of regular troops from Guadaloupe; three companies of the 1st West India regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Blackwell, of the 4th West India, proceeded from Barbadoes, as expressed in my dispatch No. 17, were landed in Marie Galante on the 29th, attacked the French troops, in conjunction with the naval garrison, on the 30th, and, after a series of operations in the fastnesses of the country, the enemy surrendered at discretion on the 3d inst. Colonel Cambriel abandoned his command the day before the surrender, and, it is imagined, escaped in a canoe to Guadaloupe.

The detachment returned to Barbadoes on the 10th, having had three men wounded, one of whom is since dead.

The perseverance and temper of the three companies was respectable; and the fatigue they underwent at this season of the year unusually great.

I inclose Lieutenant-Colonel Blackwell's report, and have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) GEO. BECKWITH, Lieut. Gen.

SIR, Grand Bourg, Marie Galante, Sept. 4, 1808.

I have the honour to inform you, that the troops which you were pleased to place under my command arrived here, in his Majesty's ship Captain, on the 29th of August; and finding, from Capt. Pigot, that the French troops were strongly posted within three miles of Grand Bourg, I was immediately landed with the three companies of the 1st West India regiment; and having obtained an increase of my force, of about 110 marines, and some sailors, together with a 6-pounder from the army schooner Maria, I lost no time in fulfilling the instructions I received from you.

I have now much satisfaction in reporting, that after a pursuit of the enemy for five days and nights, and having during that period had four engagements with him, in each of which he was repulsed, and obliged to make most precipitate retreats, leaving behind him arms, ammunition, &c. at every different post that had been attacked, and in one place in particular, nine mariners who had been taken prisoners on the first landing of the enemy, and at anchor, a brass six pounder, which had only arrived from Guadaloupe two days, and which was found spiked; by constantly marching and harrassing him, we found, on coming within one hundred paces of his front yesterday morning that he was willing to surrender, and sending out a flag of truce, I granted the following terms: "That the French troops might "march out from the ground they then occupied with the honours of war, but they should lay down their arms in front of "the troops, and surrender themselves as prisoners of war, and "that all prisoners taken since their arrival in the island should "be immediately returned." I was however much astonished to find that Colonel Cambriels, who had commanded the army was not present when they surrendered, but I have since understood that he had quitted it the morning previous, and had returned to Guadaloupe, but I have some reason to imagine he is still in this Island.

The field piece I had taken from the army schooner became useless after the first day, from the tract of the country the enemy led us over; I therefore sent it back to Grand Bourg, and at the same time I directed fifty marines to occupy the post at Desisses, three miles from town, which kept up the communication with the interior of the island.

In our several attacks, it gives me pleasure to say that we have had only two privates wounded, one of them since dead. The loss on the part of the enemy I have not ascertained, but imagine to have been considerable. I am sorry to mention to you, that that a gentleman from Antigua, of the name of Brown, being a prisoner of war, was in the rear of the enemy's picquet when attacked on the evening of the 2d inst. and received a mortal wound. The force which has been brought from Guadaloupe I have not yet exactly found out, but from all accounts must have been above two hundred rank and file.

From the return I send herewith, you will find that 162 privates have laid down their arms, and there are at present many who have been sick dispersed through the country. The Inhabitants that joined were very considerable. I believe their number amounted to from four to five hundred. To Captain Welley, of his Majesty's ship Captain, I am under great obligations; in every instance he has studied to assist me, and to his exertions I am much indebted for the success of the expedition. Captain Pigot, the Commander of the Island, was in the field the whole time with the troops; and from his knowledge of the country he afforded me the greatest assistance, for which I consider myself most particularly indebted to him.

I have likewise to return my best thanks to all the Officers non-commissioned Officers, and privates, who were under my command, for the cheerfulness with which they went through the long and harassing marches, and I think it a duty to mention to you their extreme good conduct since they have been in the field.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) NATH. BLACKWELL, Lieut.-Col. 4th West India Reg.

Marie Galante, at the Estate of Blanc Cadet, Sept. 3, 1808.

TERMS agreed upon by the Commanders of His Britannic Majesty's Forces with the French Troops in Marie Galante

Proposal.—The French troops shall surrender unconditionally to the British forces.

Answer.—The French will surrender; but propose that their Officers shall be sent on their parole, and their men exchanged, at Guadaloupe.

Answer.—The Proposal of being sent to Guadaloupe is positively refused, that being left to the pleasure of the Commanders in Chief of the Army and Navy. The French are permitted only to march out with the honours of war, and lay down their arms.

[The Gazette contains a letter from Capt. Chambers, of his Majesty's sloop Port Mahon, stating his having, in company with the Linnet brig, captured the French lugger privateer, General Puris; letter from Campbell, of the Unite, stating the capture of the Italian schooner Ortensia, of 10 guns, and 55 men; and a letter from Capt. Walpole, of the sloop Pilot, gives an account of his having captured, by boarding, the French privateer La Princesse Pauline. There is also a Proclamation for further continuing from the 31st of December next, until 40 days after the next Meeting of Parliament, the prohibition of the Distillation of Spirits from Corn and Grain.]

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Paris papers, received in the course of the week, contributed to spread no small degree of alarm and anxiety in the minds of the public These journals with their usual effrontery, announced a series of splendid victories, obtained over the Spaniards along the whole of their line; and the latter are represented to have fled, without even the honour of resistance, like a flock of sheep, before the tremendous Frenchmen. According to these accounts the defeat of Blake was complete and decisive; and his army effected its retreat in the utmost confusion, after having sustained a very great loss in killed, wounded and prisoners, with that of almost all their artillery. The left wing of their army under Marshal Moncey obtained equal advantages; and the poor Spaniards were represented as contemptible, as dastardly. Such is a summary of the French accounts.

Official Dispatches, received by Ministers from Lieutenant-Colonel CARROL, the British Officer attached to the army of BLAKE, have converted the gloom which the French accounts spread, into the most lively sensations of joy. These Dispatches confirm, it is true, the intelligence of the enemy having obtained a partial advantage on the 31st ult. but dearly bought and obstinately contested; and of such a nature, that if they acquired half a dozen of that kind, instead of reaching Madrid before the conclusion of the year, they would soon be compelled to make a retrograde movement beyond the Pyrenees. This battle of the 31st. is the most glorious for the Spaniards, that has been fought since the beginning of the present contest, and one of the most memorable in their annals. BLAKE was attacked early in the morning of that day; and a thick fog covered the operations of the enemy. The latter charged with the impetuosity peculiar to that nation; and though the engagement lasted till night, the French, notwithstanding the decided superiority in point of numbers, being 25,000, against 17,000, were unable to make the slightest impression on the Spanish line, though they made frequent attempts to break the centre, in conformity to their mode of attack. In this battle, where the enemy had a manifest advantage, not only in point of number, but in artillery and cavalry, the Spaniards did not lose a single inch of ground; and at the close of the engagement, they retired, in the greatest order, and without the loss of prisoners, or of a single cannon, or baggage waggon. The British Officer, who makes the report, describes the conduct of the Patriots, though more than half their number consisted of recruits, who had not seen four months service, as beyond all commendation. They displayed, during the whole action, the cool, steady courage of veterans, with the impetuous bravery, which marked their character in the early part of their history. It is a circumstance worthy of notice, how little the manners of some nations are altered by a lapse of centuries; the inhabitants of that very Peninsula, about two thousand years ago, the greater part of whom were afterwards exterminated by the Romans, the Visigoths and Vandals, displayed the same unconquerable attachment to their soil and institutions; and opposed more resistance to the Romans, than they ever encountered from any other people in the career of their victories and subjugation. For two centuries they maintained against these dangerous invaders a series of uninterrupted victories; and the most skilful of their generals carefully avoided giving the antient Spaniards an opportunity of displaying their wonderful prowess; and they were obliged to oppose all the resources of the military art, the most consummate prudence, with the strictest and most vigilant discipline to the irresistible impetuosity, and the proud courage of the gallant inhabitants. On reading the exploits of the Numantines, in particular, we feel veneration, blended with the strongest sympathy, for the generous barbarians. Their ungovernable abhorrence of slavery, their love of their country, their preferring death and the horrors of famine to surrendering themselves to the enemy, and the massacre of their wives and children before they rushed on their own swords, or immolated themselves on heaps of sacrificed Romans, excite sensations of pity and and interest unequalled in the the history of any other country. Such they were at that time; and the inhabitants of the same peninsula, after a series of centuries had elapsed, shewed an equal determination to resist the invasion of the Moors, who were little inferior to the Romans in ambition and in love of distinction and conquest.

To resume our subject. The dispatches received by Government enable us to contradict the rumour of a battalion of the North having been cut to pieces by the French; as none of that corps had reached General BLAKE's army till after that engagement. During the whole of this memorable day the Officers vied with the privates in actions of heroism, and General BLAKE acquired immortal honour by his conduct, displaying all the bravery of the soldier with the duty and prudence of the Commander. He continually exposed his person where the danger was most imminent, and the battle hottest; encouraging his men by his presence and his actions; and was the last man to quit the field, covering himself the rear of his retreating army. This distinguished Officer acquired, if possible, greater honour in the days of the 1st and 2d inst.; and a juster title to our esteem, and the confidence of his own soldiers. An extraordinary scarcity of provisions prevailed among his troops, who for some days had nothing else but a slight ration of bread; and to this privation they submitted without murmuring, and even with cheerfulness, when they saw their general, not only sharing their danger and fatigues, but likewise their coarse fare. He afterwards conducted his army without confusion to Bilboa, without the enemy making the slightest effort to harrass him in his march; a proof of the reception they had received in the battle of the 31st. In this place he left a small detachment, with injunctions to abandon it, should the enemy appear before it in great numbers. He afterwards fell back to Valmaseda, in order to effect a junction with 10,000 Asturians, the army of the North, and the fourth division of the army of Galicia. On the 4th. after he had concentrated his army, he received information, that a numerous body of the French was moving along the heights of Ontara, with an intention of cutting off a division of his army, stationed near Valmaseda. He put his troops in motion on the morning of the 5th, and at one o'clock attacked the enemy. After a most obstinately contested engagement, he completely routed the enemy, with great slaughter, taking from them a considerable number of prisoners, one howitzer, some ammunition waggons, and a great quantity of provisions. Till eleven o'clock at night, when the Dispatch was sent off, prisoners and baggage continued to be brought in. The strongest hopes were entertained that the greater part of the enemy would be captured, who were defiling by the edge of the mountains, in which direction they were closely pursued. Early on the 6th, the whole army marched forward; and they earnestly entreated their General to enter Bilboa at the point of the bayonet. We wait with the utmost impatience the result of this enterprise, and entertain the strongest hopes of its success.

BONAPARTE, who is stated to have arrived at Vitteria on the fifth, fortunately arrived in the very nick of time, in order to judge of the facility he will have to march to Madrid, and crown his brother King of Spain. What pleasing sensations the haughty Usurper spoiled by uninterrupted success, must have felt, at hearing of this reverse, the very day of his arrival at the army. However, in order to give our readers a more satisfactory idea of the difficulties he has to encounter, we lay before them the number and position of the different Spanish armies. The right wing is composed of the united armies of CASTANOS and PALAFOX, amounting, it is said, but which we do not credit, considering the great confidence reposed in the abilities of Castanos, to only 20,000; BLAKE's army, forming the left, consisted of more than 35,000, after his junction with the Asturians and the Marquis de la ROMANA's corps: whilst the British force under Sir JOHN MOORE, at least 30,000, and the army of Estramadura, amounting to 23,000, were to form the centre; and to these two corps the protection of the capital was to be particularly confided. RENOU was advancing with 16,000 to Catalonia; and the Murcian and Valencian Levies were computed at 20,000. The Supreme Junta is, in the mean time, neither dilatory, nor inactive in their preparations. They are making every effort which prudence can suggest or authority enforce, to increase the effective strength of the armies. They are said to have adopted the extraordinary resolution of placing all the horses in the kingdom, in a state of requisition, for the public service; and they have nominated one of their own members, brother to General PALAFOX, and invested with all the power of the Junta, to attend the Army as Commissary; in which capacity he is to concert with the Generals the most prompt means of repelling the enemy; and to produce in their operations a unity of sentiments and views.

We have given in another part of our Paper some of the Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry; and our Readers will see with satisfaction, that they completely refute an infamous calumny which some vile miscreants, in the hopes of acquiring the protection of a powerful family, got inserted in some of the Morning Papers, for the purpose of aspersing one Officer, in order to screen another. We cannot conceive how the Editors of these Papers could have consented to have their columns stained with these abominable paragraphs; and as there is no other manner of accounting for the levity of such conduct, than that they must have been grossly deceived by the wretches who gave these articles for insertion they are called on by every sentiment, of justice, by a respect for their own reputation, and by the consciousness of having we believe unwittingly, contributed to the circulation of the most injurious and defamatory charges against an absent Officer, to publish the names of those men who were the base Authors of these unjustifiable attacks, in order to expose them to universal and merited reprobation. Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY, in became a soldier and a man of honour rejected with indignation any share, either on his part, or that of his friends, in the base attempts made to throw all the odium of the Armistice and Convention on Sir HEW DALRYMPLE. In refutation of this atrocious falsehood, he expressly stated, "that he assisted in drawing up the 'treaty—having subscribed it by the desire of his superior 'officer, without being compelled, or even ordered, and 'most cordially concurring in the opinion that the French 'should be permitted to evacuate Portugal." Sir HEW DALRYMPLE likewise made a declaration in favour of the propriety of the Convention, and said, "that he scorned to disclaim the share he had in making the Armistice; which, 'the more it is considered, the more it will be approved." We admire this candour; there is something manly in such conduct; and when contrasted with the cruel and dastardly insinuations, foisted on the public by the protest-makers, we feel respect for the courage and rectitude of the man, notwithstanding our hearty detestation of the Armistice, as well as the Convention.

The distinguished action fought off L'Orient, between the Amethyst, of 36 guns, Captain SEYMOUR, and La Thetis, a French frigate, pierced for 44, though mounting 50 guns, is one of the most glorious on our naval records. Besides the extraordinary complement the French have, in general, on board their vessels, the Thetis had a hundred soldiers, who did, as may be expected, great execution among the crew of the Amethyst. But nothing could resist the intrepidity of our gallant seamen and their brave commander. The engagement was fought within sight of the French coast; a circumstance, which must have had great influence in exciting the courage of the enemy. We must do them also the justice to observe that they fought with the most obstinate perseverance, and did not strike until more than half their crew were killed and wounded. When La Thetis was taken possession of, she literally resembled a charnel-house; her decks were covered with the mangled bodies of the dead and dying, and the scene of slaughter and havock she presented, is indescribable. The fire of the Amethyst is said to have been tremendous. The action lasted three hours and a half, one hour and a half of which they were grappled by the anchor of the Amethyst sticking in the bow of the Thetis. The French Captain was killed; and we are happy to announce the pleasing intelligence that Captain SEYMOUR, who, during the whole of this sanguinary engagement, discovered the most imperturbable coolness and presence of mind, did not receive the slightest wound.

It is on splendid and decisive occasions of this kind that the British character displays itself to greatest advantage. In engagements on life and death, as this really was the cool, determined courage of a people shews itself; and we vauntingly say it, that no nation, antient or modern, possessed this kind of bravery in a more eminent degree than our own. With seamen and soldiers of this mettle, and there is a sufficient store of it, we may look at the occurrences of our time without dismay, and look forward to futurity with well-founded confidence. There is not a subject of the United Kingdom, whose heart does not swell with triumph, whenever he reflects on the character of our seamen. This unrivalled courage extends, through the different gradations of the service from the Admiral down to the cabin-boy; and there exists an esprit de corps, a sense of honour, a steadiness of courage, a consciousness of superiority, a contempt of danger and difficulties, so prominently in the naval service; that it were to be wished that some of our Generals had served the two, or three first years of their military apprenticeship on board our ships of war. The men, who command in the army and navy, are of the same stuff; there must be something extremely defective in the direction or administration of the former, which prevents them from rivalling the glory and success of the latter. We do not recollect, in the whole course of the present war, a single example where a naval commander had been accused of not having done his duty: one solitary exception, and that a very doubtful one. And alas! how many flagrant proofs have we had, during that time, of misconduct, to say the least of it, in the other quarter. The deficiency, nobody will dare assert, lies in our soldiers; if the regulations for the appointment of Officers in the navy be worthy of imitation, why is not their advantage extended to our land forces? This is certainly worthy of more consideration than has been as yet bestowed on this subject; in particular as the consequences appear every day more and more prominent.

We present our Readers with the following particulars relative to Captain SEYMOUR; as every thing that has any reference to that distinguished Officer, cannot fail to excite a warm degree of interest.

Captain Michael Seymour, of the Amethyst, is the son of a most respectable Clergyman, the late Rev. Mr. Seymour, of the city of Limerick, in Ireland. He has served in the Navy from his earliest years, and has been, with very little intermission, in active employment. He was a Lieutenant when he lost his arm in Lord Howe's action, in which he rendered such eminent service, that he was immediately promoted to the rank of Master and Commander, and appointed to the Spitfire sloop.—In the command of this vessel, Captain Seymour was a terror to the enemy's privateers, some of which he captured in every cruize, rescuing at the same time the British vessels of which they had made prize. He afforded such ample protection to the British trade, and gave so much annoyance to the enemy, that he was soon made Post; and after a short lapse of time, received the appointment in which he has now done so much honour to himself, and so essential service to his country. The conveyance of the supplies of provisions to the French West India Islands, which Captain Seymour has intercepted by the capture of the Thetis, is an object of first-rate importance with the French Government; as those islands, and particularly Martinique, which is the most valuable, must, unless it receives these supplies, be inevitably starved into a surrender to the British arms; the American embargo, and the war between Spain and France, in which the Spanish Colonies have so honourably taken part with the Mother Country, having cut off the supplies from all other quarters. Thus Captain Seymour has had the good fortune in performing one of the most gallant actions upon our naval records, to defeat a hostile enterprise of the greatest moment; an enterprise, to counteract which, it would have been advisable, if it had been necessary, to employ a large squadron.

We have given in our Paper of this day Carnot's Exposition of the internal State of France. We never read a report of a French Minister of the Interior, on a similar subject, with greater satisfaction and triumph. On referring to the different Expositions, for a series of years, and particularly since the beginning of the present war, we find the tone so completely altered, though the acrimony of the language and the hatred of the sentiments have suffered no diminution. To this ebullition of frenzied rancour we can have no objection; for we are conscious of having deserved it. We have, by our single exertions, weak and paralyzed as these Orators have been formerly in the habit of representing them, done more to stop the Enemy in their wild, eccentric career, than all the nations of Europe put together. The change we advert to consists in their present manner of regarding the strength and resources of this country. There is not one of our readers who does not probably recollect, that, in the preceding Report of this very Mons. Carnot to the Legislative Body, as well as in those of his predecessor, with the inspiration of folly, or madness, the immediate overthrow of the British Empire was prophetically denounced. Our invisibility to the accumulating danger of our situation was so very great, that these Seers pronounced us a nation devoted by the Heavenly Gods themselves to destruction! They considered our blindness as the surest prognostic of our approaching destruction; and that there was even no possibility of our resisting what Heaven itself decreed after we had filled up the full measure of our iniquity!—The French Statesmen could account in no other manner for the infatuation of our councils, or the madness of our projects. They were so convinced that our ruin was inevitable, that even in holding out to us the olive branch they could not refrain from that insolence, which the consciousness of security, joined to superiority, on the one side, and the belief of an approaching catastrophe on the other, naturally inspire. This insolent brutality was carried to such an excess, that the slightest communication was never made to our Government, that it was not preceded by a violent diatribe against our national character. They invariably appeared in the double character of messengers of fate, and of commiserating mortals. They pitied, from a sense of humanity, our infatuation; but, urged on by fate, they unceasingly and inexorably repeated the tremendous denunciation, "Delenda est Carthago." And had we had the weakness to listen to the suggestions of present ease and convenience, this menace had been sooner or later executed, and we should, like that ill-fated community of merchants, bewail our folly, in expecting from the deceitful promises and insidious friendship of an implacable enemy, the security which energy alone, on our own parts, could possibly have secured. But, thanks to our exertions and enlightened policy, all these fulminating denunciations have evaporated in smoke; and we are represented now, by the infuriated orator, in a strain of desperate, heart-gnawing conviction, as a community developing, all at once, the vast resources of two centuries of unabating preparations and accumulated energies. He may represent us, if he pleases, as the disturbers of the tranquillity of the Continent, as the lovers of the insurrection in Spain; we regret only, that our strength has not been more efficaciously put forth; that we did not use to greater advantage, the happiness of our position, in order to rouse effectually the entombed inhabitants of the Continent from their death-like swoon. It is, however, by no means too late; and much are we indebted to Cretet for the insinuation; if our Government has only judgment and energy enough to make use of the instructive hint, in the regulation of their future conduct. Our means are incalculable, if they are properly employed; but that has been unfortunately the gross defect in our policy, that we never had art enough, nor sufficient knowledge of our situation, to make the full display of our means, during the whole course of the revolutionary war. It is this ignorance, and unwarrantable diffidence in our strength, which have been the principal cause of French preponderance. We may feel as much repugnance as we please to make the humiliating confession; but what use have we made, until within these three months, of the inexhaustible resources of the state. We have remained, cooped up within our islands, spectators of the most sanguinary and decisive contest recorded in history; or when we interfered we did it in so ineffectual a manner, as only to excite contempt or irritation. This is not a moment for palliating language: the man who is a friend to his country, must not be ashamed, nor afraid, to speak boldly the truth. Placed as we are in the narrow isthmus of our fortunes—at the one extremity, permanent security; at the other—danger the most imminent—the slightest relaxation might plunge us into an abyss of misery, from which neither time nor subsequent exertions may be able to rescue us. A candid avowal of former mistakes is the surest symptom of reformation; and we may, therefore, indulge in the pleasing anticipation, that the future display of our power, on the Continent, will neither excite the distrust of our friends, nor the contempt of our enemies. It was not our expeditions that the enemy apprehended; it was unanimity of sentiment and views, on the part of the people of the United Kingdom. The most fortunate event has produced that auspicious result. The sacred flame of insurrection in Spain has collected in a common focus all the wishes of this country. No complaints are now uttered about the continuance of the war; no doubts are started as to its object and tendency; but every heart and every hand are open and ready to contribute to its vigorous prosecution. It is this manifestation of unity of wishes and views, which converted the menaces of an overbearing and inveterate enemy, into a deprecation of the consequences of our new resolutions. With the rapidity of the electric fire it will operate on the Continent. The enemy anticipate with all the convulsions of despair, the effects of this renovated energy in the people of this country. They formerly laughed at our menaces and faint exertions.—We were held out to Europe as objects of their derision; but this tone has suddenly altered; and we are now painted in the terrific character of a Colossus, whose mighty form overshadows both hemispheres.—Had we been before ignorant of the conduct we ought to pursue, this exposition of Cretet has removed every trace of uncertainty. It is not by confining our national strength to defensive cvations, that we can expect to recover the respect and epondcrance we formerly enjoyed in Europe: it is only sending out new reinforcements to our army in Spain, d raising fresh levies, that we have any right to claim is distinguished pretension. Bonaparte has frequently ven us a lesson in politics, as well as in the military art: a commencing a war, he frequently repeated to his Senate e necessity of employing the whole resources of France, d of augmenting the military force, in order to bring the ntest, not only to a fortunate, but a speedy conclusion! he line of conduct we ought to pursue at present is thus arked out to us. In order to relieve the country from ie accumulating burthens and sacrifices of this unprecedented war, let one bold and vigorous display of national nergy produce that desirable result. There is not a man Great Britain who will not give his hearty consent to so nlightened a line of policy; for it is as flattering to his lf-love, as to his ardent desire of future tranquillity. he present army we employ on the Continent, numerous nd respectable as it is, is not, however, of that imposing agnitude as to fix the fortune of the Contest: let us ouble the number, and the destinies of Europe cease to be roblematical. It requires only common comprehension o perceive the decided preference of the latter to the ormer policy; and had we in this moment an army of 00,000 men in Spain, we could say to the people of the nited Kingdom, "we shall conquer a durable peace before he end of the ensuing spring."

COURT OF INQUIRY.

FIRST DAY.

CHELSEA, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

The Members of the Board, convened by virtue of his Majesty's Warrant, under the Sign Manual, assembled this morning in the Great Hall, Chelsea Hospital, to enquire into the causes and circumstances of the late Treaty of Armistice, and Convention of Cintra.

General Sir David Dundas, on observing that all the Members were present, proceeded to the Chair appropriated for the President, and requested the rest of the General Officers to take their seats at the Board, which they immediately did, in the following order:—

PRESIDENT.—General Sir DAVID DUNDAS.

Generals..... Earl MOIRA. PETER CRAIG. Lord HEATHFIELD.

Lieut.-Generals ... Earl PEMBROKE. Sir G. NUGENT. OLIVER NICHOLS.

The Board being constituted without any formality, the Hon. R. Ryder, Judge Advocate, read his Majesty's Warrant, of which the following is a correct copy:—

"GEORGE R.

"Whereas, we were pleased, in the month of July, 1808, to constitute and appoint Lieut.-General Sir Hew Dalrymple, Knt. to the command of a body of our forces, employed to act on the coasts of Spain and Portugal, or in such other part of the Continent of Europe as he might hereafter be directed to, and the said Lieutenant-General did, pursuant to our instructions transmitted to him, proceed to Portugal, and did on the 22d of August, 1808, land in that country, and take upon himself the command of the said body of our forces accordingly. And whereas it appears that on the same 22d of August, and subsequently to his having assumed the command, an Armistice was concluded as follows:—[Here is recited the Armistice as stated in Sir Hew Dalrymple's dispatch.]

"And, whereas, it appears that on the 30th day of August, 1808, a Convention was concluded as follows:—[Here is recited the Convention as stated in Sir Hew Dalrymple's dispatch.]

"We think it necessary that an enquiry should be made by the General Officers hereinafter named, into the conditions of the said Armilitce and Convention, and into all the causes and circumstances (whether arising from the previous operations of the British army or otherwise), which led to them, and into the conduct, behaviour and proceedings of the said Lieutenant-General Sir Hew Dalrymple, and of any other officer or officers, who may have held the command of our troops in Portugal; and of any other person or persons, as far as the same were connected with the said Armistice and Convention, in order that the said General Officers may report to Us, touching the matters aforesaid for our better information. Our will and pleasure therefore is, and we do hereby nominate and appoint the General Officers of our Army, whose names are respectively mentioned in the list annexed, to be a Board, of which we do hereby appoint General Sir David Dundas, K. B. to be President, who are to meet accordingly, for the purposes above-mentioned.—And you are hereby required to give notice to the said General Officers when and where they are to meet for the said examination and inquiry, and you are hereby directed to summon such persons as may be judged necessary by the said General Officers, (whether the General Officers employed in the Expedition, or others,) to give information touching the said matters, or whose examination shall be desired by those employed in the said Expedition. And the said General Officers are hereby directed to hear such persons as shall offer to give information touching the same, and they are hereby authorized, empowered, and required strictly to examine into the matters before-mentioned, and to report a state thereof as it shall appear to them, together with their opinion thereupon, and also with their opinion, whether any or what further proceedings should be had thereupon; all which you are to transmit to our Commander in Chief, to be by him laid before us for our consideration; and for so doing this shall, as well to you as to our said General Officers, and all others concerned, be a sufficient Warrant.

"Given at our Court at St. James's this first day of November, 1808, in the 49th year of our Reign.

"By his Majesty's command,

(Signed) "JAMES PULTENEY.

"To our right trusty and well-beloved Counsellor, the Hon. Richard Ryder, Judge-Advocate General, or his Deputy.

The Judge Advocate next read an official Copy of the Armistice agreed upon between Lieut.-Gen. Sir A. Wellesley and Gen. Kellerman, the definitive Convention for the evacuation of Portugal by the French Army, and of the other documents which appeared in the London Gazette of Friday, the 16th of September last.

After a short consultation among the Members of the Board, the President observed, that in obedience to his Majesty's Warrant, it was incumbent upon them to proceed with all convenience to the examination of Witnesses, and in order to make the necessary arrangements, it would be proper for them to deliberate in private.

The President then turning to the auditory, intimated, that as it was probable there would not be any more business of a public nature transacted this day, it was the pleasure of the Board that strangers should withdraw. The Court was accordingly cleared.

Strangers were not re-admitted, and not half past one the Court adjourned till eleven o'clock on Thursday morning last.

SECOND DAY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

The Court assembled this day at half past ten o'clock. It was afterwards engaged for about three quarters of an hour in private consultation, after which the doors were opened to the public, but the mode of access to those parts of the Court where it was possible to judge with accuracy of what was going forward, was so badly arranged, that it was only by the utmost exertion, and indeed, even at the hazard of life, that any person could venture to approach them.

The business opened by the Judge Advocate reading certain letters which he had received from General Sir Hew Dalrymple, and from Sir A. Wellesley, relative to the future proceedings of the Court, and declaratory of their wish fully to meet the Inquiry, while, at the same time they craved certain evidence in the hands of Ministers to be produced to the Court.

These letters, and the answer of Lord Castlereagh, agreeing to the request contained in them, being read, the Judge Advocate said, that he was desired by the Court, publicly to state it to be their anxious wish, to state the necessity of refraining from the publication of any part of the proceedings of the Court, not only till their conclusion, but till his Majesty's pleasure should be known, if any further proceedings of a military nature were to take place, because, if any such proceedings were to be adopted, justice to those implicated, required that the publication should be kept back till such farther military proceeding as it might be proper to adopt had also been concluded.

The Judge Advocate then proceeded to read the various Official Correspondence between Lord Castlereagh, Sir A. Wellesley, Sir H. Dalrymple, Sir H. Burrard, Sir C. Cotton, General Spencer, &c. and between these Officers among themselves, down to the dispatches of the 21st of September. In this business the Court was occupied till three o'clock.

Sir Hew Dalrymple then came forward and addressed the Court. He stated, that before he gave in the narrative of his proceedings, which it was his intention to lay before the Court, he felt himself entitled on to say a word or two in vindication of his character, which had been grossly aspersed in the public papers, to serve, as it would seem, the cause of a more favoured Officer. The Convention had been very generally reprobated in this country, but he had no doubt that, in a short time, it would be more favourably, because more justly, appreciated. By the publications in question, however, be the Convention calamitous or otherwise, he was represented as the sole author of it; that from the moment of his arrival, he had had the stupid presumption to act in opposition to the plan of proceedings previously agreed on, and to order it to be changed; that he had dashed the laurels from the brow of the Victor! And that Sir A. Wellesley had protested against, or at all events had strongly disapproved of, the terms of the Convention! —For himself, he had carefully abstained from stating any thing in the Public Papers, although he was not ignorant that, previous to his quitting the army in Portugal, there were persons at work there with similar imputations to those thrown out against his character in this country! He had purposely abstained from any newspaper appeals, reserving himself for this day, when he could with confidence, and with the candour and openness becoming a British Officer, state his case. He now pledged himself to that Court, and to his country, that Sir Harry Burrard, Sir Arthur Wellesley and himself, were all present with General Kellerman when the Preliminaries of the Convention of Cintra were discussed and settled. Sir A. Wellesley bore that prominent part in the discussion, to which the important situation he held in the country, the glorious victory he had lately gained, and the important information, more particularly of a local nature, which he possessed, so well entitled him to assume. He, therefore, had discussed, and assented to, not only the principle of the Convention, but the general details of it; and so far from its being correct that Sir A. Wellesley had signed the preliminaries by the order, or rather by the compulsion, of him (Sir H. Dalrymple), as had been insinuated, the fact was, that he himself was stepping up, for the purpose of putting his own name to the preliminary articles, when he was put right by General Kellerman in point of form, who reminded him that he, as Commander in Chief, could not sign a Preliminary Treaty, where the Officer on the other side was only a General of Division! Sir A. Wellesley then signed the Preliminary Treaty, without any order from him, (Sir H. Dalrymple). The conversation, he agreed, was carried on in the French language, and it might be true, he believed it was, that General Kellerman took minutes of it. As already said, however, he had never inserted his own representations, or his own wishes, in the public prints. He had not, as was stated in his name, insisted on a Court Martial. He was happy that he should meet a Court like the present, where his case would be fully gone into, and would not be checked by the trammels of legal proceedings. He was not afraid of any inquiry, being convinced that his cause, and that of truth, would be found to go hand in hand. He assured the Court that he should not avail himself of the privilege of declining to answer any question, lest it should criminate himself; on the contrary, he should feel pleasure in the business being sifted to the bottom, and he himself should be ready to give every satisfaction which might be demanded of him, or which it was in his power to give. He had not, as already stated, demanded a Court Martial, and one reason for it was, because no charges of a distinct nature had been urged against him. If his conduct had been so called in question as to have rendered it necessary for him to insist on a Court-Martial, it would have been incumbent on him to have called in his defence of the Officers of note engaged at present to Spain and Portugal. He was happy to say, however, that, at present no Officer was absent from his duty on his (Sir H. Dalrymple's) account! These facts he had found it necessary for him to explain in vindication of his character, before he entered on the narrative of his proceedings, after he joined the army in Portugal.

Sir Arthur Wellesley begged to say a few words in answer to what he had just heard. He regretted exceedingly, that any thing should have appeared in any of the public prints, which could be supposed to have the effect of casting him at the expence of the conduct or character of Sir H. Dalrymple. He declared most sincerely, that no such statement had ever been inserted with his knowledge or approbation; and he could equally pledge himself, that none such had ever come through the knowledge or concurrence of any of his friends or relations. He agreed in what he had just heard, that he had been present at, and taken a part under the Commander in Chief, in adjusting the Preliminaries of the Convention. He had signed these Preliminaries in consequence of the desire of the Commander in Chief, but not in consequence of any command or compulsion exercised over him on that occasion. He had agreed with the Commander in Chief on the principle of these Articles, though he had differed from him in some of the details.

The publication of the above statements we conceive to be an infraction of the desire of the Court of Inquiry. These statements might, unquestionably, have been made by the parties concerned, extrajudicially. They can prejudice no party; as both Sir H. Dalrymple and Sir Arthur Wellesley are perfectly agreed as to the principle of the Convention.

Sir H. Dalrymple sat at the side of the Court. He was accompanied by General Sir Charles Green, and three Officers of his Staff. He looked extremely well, is a soldier-looking man, in the prime of life, and seemed to be in good spirits.

Sir A. Wellesley sat behind the President. He was accompanied by Major Tucker, and another Officer of his Staff.

The Duke of Cumberland sat within the bar. A number of Ladies were present, some of them very elegantly dressed. Among the auditory were Generals Sir T. Trigge, Phipps, Sir J. Craddock, the Hon. Capt. Legge, and many other Naval and Military Officers.

The Court adjourned till Saturday morning.

THIRD DAY.

SATURDAY, NOV. 19.

The Court took their seats in a few minutes after the opening of the doors.

Sir Hew Dalrymple and Sir Arthur Wellesley were present as on the preceding day, as were also the Dukes of Cambridge, Cumberland, Lord Kinnaird, and several Officers.

The business commenced by Sir A. Wellesley stating his wish to deliver in a paper confirmatory of his statement on the preceding day. Sir Arthur read the paper, which stated in substance the same as his declaration on Thursday, that he was not ordered, much less compelled, to sign the Armistice—that no authority was given by him or any of his relations or friends, to any of the Publishers of Newspapers, to make a contrary statement. He also repeated that he agreed in the principles of permitting the French to evacuate Portugal, only differing with the Commander in Chief respecting some points of detail.

The Paper containing this statement was delivered by Sir Arthur to the President.

Sir Arthur also expressed his regret that an expression in one of his letters read on Thursday, should have gone forth to the Public, as conveying a reflection upon the Commissariat employed in the Army in Portugal. He never meant to state that the individuals employed in the Commissariat were wanting in zeal or deficient in exertion—his only object was to shew generally the expediency of making some alteration in the mode of conducting the Commissariat Department.

A Paper containing this statement was also delivered by Sir Arthur to the President.

The Judge Advocate then read some dispatches from Sir Hew Dalrymple to Lord Castlereagh, one dated the 3d of September, which was published in the Gazette; others stating, that the terms of the Armistice had been communicated to the Portuguese General, but who had not objected to them until after the conclusion of the Negotiation, and the Convention had been signed. A letter in French, from the Portuguese General, objecting to the terms of the Covention, and an answer from Sir Hew Dalrymple, stating, that the good faith of the Country was pledged to carry these conditions into effect. Some other letters were also read relating to points of detail.

The Judge-Advocate having finished reading these official dispatches, another person commenced reading, in a very low tone of voice, a series of correspondence relating to several minor details connected with the army of Portugal.

A variety of Documents were read, written by Sir Hew Dalrymple and General Freire, principally relating to the plunder which the French had embarked.

In one of these letters Sir Hew Dalrymple expresses his surprise that so large a sum as 40,000l. mentioned in the protest, should have been carried off, and declares his intention of ordering restitution.

Then followed a Proclamation, signed by General Freire, against the Convention. It states, that there could not have been a measure entered into more favourable to the French, or more hurtful to the cause of Europe; that the English army was to be considered in no other light than as auxiliary to the Portuguese; that the stipulations therein contained were such as never could be agreed to, unless it were that Portugal was a conquered country. It concludes with protesting strongly against the conditions of the treaty.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, His Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor, where he was received by the Dukes of York, Kent and Cumberland. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, at which Sir Charles Brisbane was introduced, and sworn in Governor of the Island of St. Vincent.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, and the other Ministers present, and Mr. Ryder, who laid before his Majesty the proceedings of some Courts-Martial.

A Messenger arrived from the coast on Tuesday night; he came to town in consequence of a communication from Boulogne, said to relate to the exchange of prisoners. In the course of the last week no less than three communications of a similar kind were interchanged between Dover and Boulogne.

The report which so generally prevailed on Thursday, of an intention to assemble Parliament in the beginning of December, we find, on inquiry, to be void of foundation. No time is yet fixed, but we have reason to believe it will be convened before the middle of January.

A Meeting of the Freemen and Inhabitants of the City of Rochester was held on Tuesday evening, to petition his Majesty to convene Parliament, for the purpose of inquiring into the Convention at Cintra. The Address was almost unanimously adopted.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the undermentioned Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, viz.

Captain W. Campbell, Nottingham; and Capt. J. Carnegie, Baring, for Madras and Bengal.

Capt. J. Haliburton, Glatton; and Capt. M. Riches, Thames, for China direct.

Capt. Wm. Hamilton, Lady Castlereagh, for St. Helena and Bengal.

A Naval Action is reported to have taken place in the Mediterranean; but the report at present rests on no authentic foundation.—It is mentioned in a letter from Plymouth, which says—

"A Corunna Gazette of the 9th instant states an important circumstance, if true, viz. that our squadron and the Russian squadron had met in the Straits, and after a severe action, we had two seventy-fours sunk. The Russians had five sail of the line taken, four frigates, four brignntines, and one cutter. The Editor adds at the bottom of the paragraph, This is true."

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. XV.

REV. SIDNEY SMITH, M.A.

WHILE lamenting the decease of one who was designated for the Sacred Profession, and in the most affecting of his inimitable compositions, 'Lycidas,' our divine poet conceived himself authorised to advert to those characters who too often unworthily occupy the highest functions with which humanity is acquainted. Milton exhibits to us, in this instance, the sublime union of poetry with prophecy. The lapse of nearly two hundred years, far from rendering his reproof obsolete, has only illustrated the soundness of his views and confirmed the truth of his admonition. I fear there may still frequently be occasions, when this spiritual censure will forcibly recur to the recollection of my readers.

The REV. SIDNEY SMITH, preparatorily educated at Winchester, was formerly a Fellow of New College, in Oxford. He was intended for Physic, and studied, at Edinburgh, with reference to the medical profession. Turning his attention, however, to Divinity, he accordingly disposed himself for Holy Orders. I am not thoroughly informed of the early progress of Mr. Smith; but I know that, as Lecturer on Moral Philosophy, he attracted considerable admiration, during two or three seasons, at the Royal Institution; and I am assured that this fashionable popularity prepared the way for his ascending the pulpit of the Foundling Chapel, where he is still an alternate Evening Preacher. He is also Morning Preacher at Berkeley and Fitzroy Chapels; and he has lately, through the patronage of Lord Holland, become a beneficed clergyman in Yorkshire. This latter preferment, notwithstanding, has not prevented him from again repairing to the metropolis. He was called into Residence on his Living, by his diocesan; yet he found interest enough to be exempted from circumstances, to which his temper must with difficulty have submitted! To his talents, indeed, the south is infinitely more propitious than the north; and of him it will never be said, that > "Remote from towns he ran his godly race,

> "Nor e'er had changed, nor wish'd to change, his place!"

Who, after all, would desire to confine any preacher to the only sphere of exertion most unfavourable to his abilities? Mr. Smith is perfectly calculated for Berkeley Chapel, especially during what is called the winter of the town; but, how would his country auditors gape and marvel at "clanking chains," "hazardous privileges," "progress of society," "sublime morality," "stupendous prodigy," &c. &c. &c.? Look up they might, and doubtless would, "the hungry sheep," in amazement, to their spiritual shepherd!—As to their being "fed," if they hunger for the "food of life," I am fearful that they might "look up" in vain.

Never do I augur well of the preacher who appears to think well of himself. Lightly must that man estimate the priest's office, and deplorable is the situation in which he stands, who does not tremble to place himself, as it were, between his fellow-creatures and his God!—Long as he may have listened to the teaching of Gamaliel, yet if he has sat, for one hour, at the feet of his Redeemer, he will seriously know, and everlastingly feel, the awful responsibility attached to the Ministry of the Gospel of Christ. Conscious whose servant he is, and full of the importance of his commission, he will, heartily diffident of himself, he invariably imploring the assistance of that Holy Spirit, which, though by his ministration, can alone make his instructions effectual and beneficial! So impressed, his whole conduct will be consistent with his convictions. If custom compels him to join in the preparatory service of the sanctuary, he will, without affectation, exhibit an example of piety to the people. He will mingle fervently, yet unassumingly, in their devotions. Seen, he will not see; and even disturbed, he will remain undiverted. He cannot consider himself as the proper gazing-stock of his congregation; nor will he thus return compliment for compliment, and bow to one of his hearers with as much complacency as to the name of Jesus! He will not so demean himself. He will not disgust the feelings of others, and degrade his own dignity.

Sidney Smith's deportment did not dispose me to think very highly of his clerical character. He seemed as culpably indifferent to his situation, as he was sufficiently conscious of his own consequence. Perhaps, as he ranks among moral divines, he does not conceive it of any importance to supplicate spiritual succour in the discharge of his preceptive duties: for, when he enters the pulpit, he no sooner kneels than he rises from the cushion. He now rubs his hands, with due gracefulness; and, since he takes no part in the melody of devotion, he has leisure to look about, and survey his assembled auditors. This task, it is but justice to own, he performs with all possible complacency.

His person, however, is really imposing. He is tall, well built, comely in countenance, and striking in his manner. His voice is manly, though rather too powerful; and his delivery is commanding. His appearance is altogether pompous. If it be true, as whispered, that he aspires to become one of our ecclesiastical dignitaries, he will, should his wishes be accomplished, walk loftily enough under the mitre. I am not so censorious as to withhold from him this tribute.

Mr. Smith appears to be partial to the cannons of Ecclesiastes; but he is particularly addicted to the first verse of the second chapter,—from which he has delivered the same sermon not less than twice on the same sabbath!! When he lays old of some "Soliloquy of Solomon," he, as one desirous of wisdom, will hardly let it go. This choice, considering the complexion of his preaching, is far from being injudicious. I do not deny to him the praise of writing some fine sentences, as when, describing the miseries of irreverent old-age, he talks of persons, answering this description, "growing old without growing wise, and gathering nothing, from the lapse of years, but the outward symbols of decay;" yet, as his excellency discovers itself most in brilliant declamation, I certainly commend him for selecting such subjects as are best calculated to display his oratorical pretensions. Let him, therefore, keep to moral and prudential apotheghms. One of "the Masters of" our modern "Israel," he will do well to confine himself to human expositions.

Entitled, however, as he is to considerable literary distinction, I submit to Mr. Smith, from respect to his mental acquisitions, how far the use of "It is 'nt" and "Is'n't it," instead of It is not and Is it not, is reconcileable with true taste, or consonant with the principles of accomplished eloquence? I also wish to ascertain, why and in our Lord's Prayer (the whole of which Mr. Smith, by the way, delivers most indecorously!) is pronounced by him as un; when he says, "And forgive us our trespasses," &c. His pauses, during the progress of his discourse, are often painfully long; and the termination of it is so abrupt as to create the sensation of deficiency. Conciseness is not always elegance.

I have alluded to the circumstance of Mr. Smith's delivering the same Discourse twice during one Sunday. How far this practice is allowable on the part of preachers, I undertake not to determine. I shall simply observe, on this occasion, that it was an impeachment of Mr. Smith's judgment, or else of his justice. Either he possessed not discrimination enough to reflect that his evening would differ from his morning hearers, or he was too indolent to exert himself equitably. What he said, with propriety, to the people at Berkeley Chapel, was strangely misapplied, when addressed to the audience at the Foundling Chapel. He may benefit by this intimation.

Mr. Smith has avowedly collected and published, or caused to be printed, several of what he denominates sermons. These display the same qualities as are palpable in his pulpit discourses.

Pitiable, however, is the condition of the christian church—if its leading pastors are to be distinguished only as the disseminators of popular morality. If our ecclesiastical establishment demands such props, if it is in this tottering dilemma, its fall, its deserved desolation, is at hand. Judas will still betray his Divine Master. From discrediting the faith of the church, her scholars will proceed to dispute her authority; and Christianity will, once more, be fatally wounded in the house of its friends!

Largely as I have expatiated on the object of this criticism—and his pretensions called for particularization—I have yet two or three perplexing difficulties to propose for solution.

Has the Reverend SIDNEY SMITH, volunteering his services in hostility to the establishment by which he is protected, ambitiously enrolled himself among the Unity: or, in plainer phraseology, is he really the author of Squire Plymley's Letters?—If, as report asserts, Peter Plymley is only the alias assumed by Sidney Smith, and if, inauspicious as such rumour is, it remains formally uncontradicted by the party most concerned in its confutation, perhaps, and what is this perhaps, there then exists him to whom it might be objected, in the indignant lines of Cowper,

> Go! cast your Orders at—your Bishop's feet;
> Send your dishonour'd gown—to Monmouth Street!

Let my sentiments be fairly appreciated. I have no hostility to any religious ministers, or even minister, except as I discover, in the association of the individual, principles or conduct injurious to the great interests of the Christian Church. As to the REV. SIDNEY SMITH, I know him only with reference to his public character. Estimating him as a Preacher of the Gospel of Christ, I cannot, indeed, conscientiously approve him. Were it proposed, nevertheless, to make him Regius Professor of Moral Philosophy to the Royal Institution, in Albemarle Street, I could cheerfully tender him my warmest support. He would most admirably superintend the Morals of Fashion. Since I may not soon find another opportunity for commenting on THE FOUNDLING, as I am about to take a long, if not last, leave of this notorious institution, I desire now to record, in the most solemn manner, my unalterable protest against it! Contemplate it, either politically or religiously, it is alike discreditable to honourable feelings and legitimate principles. Consider it as any thing but the temple of religion; and let those, for such patrons there are, who extend their benevolence without exerting their reflection, pause before they hereafter permit themselves to proceed in the same career. They may do well to inquire whether, instead of promoting the purposes of genuine philanthropy, they are not actually countenancing a genteel asylum for genteel illegitimacy? And, carrying the investigation even further, still ask themselves, how far the system of fostering foundlings, especially as it is here conducted, may not essentially assist to deprave the virtuous energies of society?

When I look at this institution as affecting religion, I feel its existence to be disgraceful to the seriousness of our national character. Nothing, I confess, offers to reconcile me to this pious pest; where sing-song is substituted for psalmody, where chit-chat fills up the intervals of ceremonial devotion, and where

> "How oft, when Paul has served us with a text,
> "Has Epictetus, Plato, Tully, preached!—
> "Men that, if now alive, would sit content
> "And humble learners of a SAVIOUR'S worth,
> "Preach it who might."

It is impossible for me to be too serious on subjects of such magnitude as continually present themselves to my mind; while, feeling seriously, I am unavoidably compelled to write explicitly. If we must tolerate corporate chapels, I earnestly adjure the Prelacy minutely to ascertain the principles and practices of those who carry on the traffic of piety; and to discourage, to the uttermost, all Institutions, whose tendency it is to propagate serious frivolity, and, consequently, to weaken those impressions which eminently conduce to the preservation of individual integrity and public happiness. Let us therefore, if it be impracticable to retrieve past errors, more assiduously resist future abuses.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-SEVEN.

OUR ARMY AND MILITARY ARRANGEMENTS.

Transitory circumstances some times fix the conduct of communities; and what was useful only for a season, becomes the permanent rule of their policy. After having from custom, or unexpected success, felt a kind of prepossession in favour of some particular arrangement; self-love, together with the suggestions of present convenience and established habits exercise all their influence to persuade them that an undeviating adherence to what was adopted from temporary expediency, or momentary advantages, is the sure foundation of their safety, and the acme of political wisdom. This obstinate perseverance, in ordinary times, is unattended with danger; it is productive, on the contrary, of considerable advantages, as it concentrates the energies, talents and resources of the state; and this accumulation of powers gives this unity of object increased vigour and effect. But as soon as extraordinary events intervene, arrangements, which were before advantageous, might be ineffectual to meet the new occurrences; and, if pertinaciously adhered to, occasion disasters too urgent and unexpected, to be opposed with promptitude and success. This want of versatility, or this incapacity to accommodate itself to the fluctuation of incidents, has been, almost invariably, the cause of the disappearance of once powerful and enterprising empires. They fell, as soon as they had extraordinary difficulties to encounter, because their means of resistance were calculated only on the scale of ordinary chances.

Almost every page in history, ancient and modern, impresses this conviction; and the eventful occurrences of our time dissipate every doubt of the reality of the observations. However one state becomes a victim, and then another, to this blindness and obstinacy; and those who have the good fortune or the chance to escape, are insensible to the warning, or if roused for a moment to the necessity of a change of conduct, they are frightened, or disheartened, by the exertions and sacrifices it seems to require, or fluctuate so long between resolving and performing, that they are seized in the very act of deliberating; and overwhelmed before they had come to a determination how they shall act.

That this is no mere speculative opinion, unsupported by the evidence of facts, or formed only from remote deductions, we have too many proofs from what has occurred within the short, but instructive, space of the last 19 years; and there is not a state, that has yielded to the renovated energy and youthful policy of a neighbouring people, but ought to attribute its disasters to the infatuation of attempting to resist new and vigorous institutions, seconded by the force of opinion and the attraction of novelty, with constitutions weakened by age, and enervated by inveterate abuse. Every thing about them pointed out the insufficiency of their usual arrangements, and the necessity of adopting more vigorous measures; but incapacitated by some constitutional weakness, or restrained by the bias of long-established customs, they still persevered, with the pertinacity of dotage, or the presumption of folly in their fatal delusion.

States have not only suffered from an improper, or inadequate use of their strength; but likewise from the mode of displaying it: just as particular occurrences may induce a people to direct their attention to an augmentation of the navy, in preference to that of the army; as was the case with the Athenians, in the time of Themistocles. When the exigency of the service became less imperious, they still continued to cultivate it almost exclusively; because the brilliant success that attended the first experiment, together with the advantages flowing from an extensive commerce, the tributes of the adjacent islands, and the vanity of extending their influence from the shores of the Euxine to those of Sicily, convinced these republicans that an adherence to naval operations was the secret of their preponderance and security. These considerations powerful enough to seduce a less arrogant people, united with the superiority they acquired from experience over their rivals, prevented them from changing their policy, when subsequent occurrences rendered a change indispensably necessary. This is the irretrievable error of States, that they never see the necessity, or the fit season of innovation, till disasters have shewn its expediency; and they seldom grow wise, till wisdom is useless. Thus the delusion continues; and the Athenians were not sensible of the impolicy of their conduct, till the enemy were masters of their territory, had overturned their Government, and proscribed their principal citizens. This calamity solely originated in the mistaken idea they entertained, that from the land side their situation was impregnable; they therefore considered the army a secondary object, or it was wasted in remote expeditions. For 27 years that they contended with their rivals for the supremacy, fortune, it is true, seconded almost invariably their efforts; but the loss of a single naval engagement at Aegos Potamos, overturned for ever the dominion of Athens. The errors and fate of Carthage were similar; and both States serve to shew, that what was, at one time, expedient, and highly politic, may become, in consequence of new occurrences, ineffectual and dangerous.

The brilliant success of the Portuguese in the East, and the discoveries of the Spaniards in the New World, together with the immense riches accumulated by the Dutch, inspired the English and French with an ardent desire of participating in the advantages and reputation of these expeditions; and commerce and colonies engrossed, for more than a century, the attention of the most powerful nations in Europe. Our decided superiority in these pursuits, together with the splendour of our naval victories, and the peculiarity of our situation, induced us, as it did the Athenians and Carthaginians, to direct our attention, almost exclusively, to maritime affairs; and as long as our neighbours acted on the same principles, and had the same object in view, we acted in strict conformity to policy, as well as to interest. But the Revolution has made an alteration in this, as in many other circumstances, and the genius and activity of our neighbours have taken a different direction. We remained for a long time unaffected by this change, till one of the greatest of our Statesmen, and one of the strongest advocates for maritime pursuits, grew sensible at last that the navy alone was quite inadequate to our security, and the preservation of what we already possessed. But this conviction was felt too late, and operated too slowly; for whilst we were deliberating as to the necessity of deviating from our usual line of conduct; the enemy had already advanced us, with gigantic strides, in a career we are now reduced to the necessity of treading after him. But this is not the only inconvenience and disadvantage we have to labour against in the new pursuit: Whilst our adversary has, in the very beginning of his course, flung away every trammel and incumbrance, which might encumber him in the prosecution of his undertaking, we fondly retain a number of useless and embarrassing ornaments, which expose us, at every step, to the danger of tripping; and though we have a more considerable distance to run than the enemy, we still keep on the useless and cumbersome frippery; whilst he, divested of every impediment of the kind, has the advantage of ground, as well as convenience.

[As this subject is particularly interesting in the present moment, we intend to dilate it beyond the usual extent of our disquisitions, and to conclude it in our next.]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.

Corunna, Nov. 16.—The retreat effected by the army under General Blake from Valmaseda, after a continued engagement, from eight in the morning until nine at night, was as brilliant as a victory could have been. It is positively stated, that the enemy had upwards of five thousand killed.—Among the prisoners was a General. We must also necessarily have sustained some loss. It would be absurd to think otherwise. According to report, the 4th division were the principal sufferers.

They write from Catalonia, that the reinforcements sent from Portugal, Arragon, and Valentia, had already arrived in that principality, and that the troops under Signor Reding were on the point of entering it: that the alacrity and enthusiasm of the inhabitants were daily increasing, whilst it was evidently perceived that the confidence of the French troops, and even Lechi himself, was very considerably lowered; and that no doubt was entertained, that, within a very few days, Duhesme would solicit terms of capitulation.

Saragossa, Nov. 5.—All the Murcians have this day marched off for Navarre. The General set off last night for Tuleda, where General Castanos is. It is supposed that they will concert measures for an attack upon the enemy, and we are confident of success.

Madrid, Nov. 9.—Last night the posts from Castile, Galicia, and Burgos, came in a very late hour; for it appears that in the latter city there was some bustle among the inhabitants, in consequence of the French having sent to demand of them a great number of rations. It is certain that they will not come to fetch them, as the troops of Estremadura have already arrived in that city with their cavalry and an excellent train of artillery.

The Central Junta is expected to remove to this capital by the 16th instant.

Every preparation is making to attack the French at Logrono, before they have time to fortify themselves there.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM VIEJO, OCT. 30.

"I informed you in my former letters, that our advanced guards were every day engaged with those of the enemy, in which the advantage was always on our side. But still nothing was done on our part to take possession of the positions near the city (Logrona) such as Viana, Oyon, Montecorvo, Cerro, Cantabria, &c. and contenting ourselves only with placing some posts of 40 or 60 men at the utmost. At the same time I told you, that Pinteli had come as Provisional General of the Army, having taken the command from Equia, the brother-in-law of Godoy. It has since been apprehended that this has given rise to some infamous conduct, and that a treaty has entered into with the French for the delivery of Logrona, and also of our army into their hands. This, however, was happily prevented by the arrival, last Tuesday evening, of General Castanos. In the meanwhile our small advanced posts were furiously attacked by the whole French army, and driven into the town. While we were at our several posts, the enemy's troops took possession of the positions near the city, which we ought to have occupied, notwithstanding our artillery did some execution at the bridge and at Balbuena, against the enemy's cavalry. It was now evening, and the enemy's large fires, being seen near the city, we received orders to retire within the city during the night. As soon as day broke, we covered our posts before the city; and as soon as the artillery perceived the approach of some detached bodies, after four discharges, they retired. It was now noon, and we had not fired a gun, nor eaten any thing, when, from a battery which was raised between some olive trees very near the town, a heavy discharge of balls, bombs, and grenades, were made upon the city, but the artillery being pointed too high no damage was done to it. We answered this discharge from the batteries, and with more effect, for we dismounted one cannon, and killed all who were near it. At two in the afternoon, the firing having ceased for a time, we were ordered to fall back in good order. When we returned to the town, we found the gates shut, and a great number of persons wanting. General Castanos had also left the place, for when he discovered the treachery, and saw the positions which had been lost, he was in a great rage. He had learned, that the night before, the French had marched by torch-light to attack Lodosa, where his troops were. The General, therefore, ordered a retreat towards Calahorra, in order to unite the two armies, and commanded that the traitor should be transported to Soria. At three in the afternoon we effected our junction, and at midnight set out for Nalda, three leagues to the right of Logrona, through a horrid way. The principal inhabitants of the city, who were dispersed, joined us, leaving their houses abandoned. The bridge was destroyed, which had been undermined several days before.

"It is now three days since we have been marched day and night, without food, and through roads which seemed impassable. Yesterday we arrived at this place, which is three leagues from Calahorra, and five from Logrona. We are waiting the junction of the armies, when we mean to strike a blow at the enemy; hoping for good success in God, the Virgin, and the intrepidity and good disposition of Castanos. Within a week something decisive is to be done; for it is thought the enemy is to be attacked before he has fortified himself in the city.

Villafranca, Oct. 31.—On the 27th inst. arrived at the head-quarters, D. Juan Miguel de Vives, Captain-General of this army, and the principality of Catalonia. He landed the day before at Tarragona, and there and here met with the warmest reception. Two days before, there disembarked at the same port, besides the remaining part of the Spanish hussars, and other detachments from Majorca, the Spanish troops that have come from Portugal for this principality. The latter are under the command of Field Marshal D. Gregory Laguna, and consist of various divisions of provisional grenadiers of the two Castiles, the light troops of Valencia and Torragona, and the Santiago regiment of cavalry, and two companies of flying artillery. They have also brought with them 20,000 muskets, for arming the Catalonian troops.

On the 3d, the head-quarters will be transferred to Martorell; and we shall not be surprized if this movement should cause the enemy to retire immediately within the walls of Barcelona.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

"CORUNNA, Nov. 16.—It may not be wholly uninteresting to you to be informed that Sir David Baird moves the head-quarters to-day to Betanzos, about seventeen miles from this, and it is understood, proceeds with little delay to Benevento. The advanced corps of the 43d and 95th are at Astorga; the rest of the infantry are in full march, by two roads, the last of them consisting of the 60th and detachments landed on the 5th instant.

"The ships with the 7th and 10th Light Dragoons arrived on the 8th; those with the 15th Light Dragoons came in the day after. The two first are mostly landed, and ready to march; the latter is to disembark to-morrow. All the horse-ships return without delay to England, it is said for more cavalry. Extreme heavy rains ever since our arrival, on the 13th October, have greatly retarded the movements of the troops. Now the weather is fine, and frequent showers fall during the night. It is by no means cold: at the time of writing this, my thermometer stands at sixty."

"CORUNNA, Nov. 18.—The whole of our infantry have marched from this place, except a detachment of the 60th, to guard the depots, &c. Sir D. Baird, with the advanced corps, is at Astorga. Sir John Moore, with his advanced corps, is at Salamanca; the rest of their divisions are cantoned in the towns in the rear.

"Lord Paget, with the 7th Light Dragoons, marched forward yesterday. The 10th move to-day, and the 15th on Monday the 21st.

"On the 24th there will not be any troops in Corunna, except the above detachment; no farther advance of troops will take place in less than three weeks or a month.

COURT OF INQUIRY.

FOURTH DAY,

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

The Court assembled at ten o'clock precisely, and continued in private deliberation as before, for nearly an hour. As soon as the people without doors were admitted,

Sir Hew came forward and expressed his regret, that he should have adverted to the circumstance of the difference that appeared between a part of his original dispatch and the words of the Gazette. He had now reason to believe, that the dispatch had been correctly copied into the Gazette. He certainly never had the intention to convey any other meaning than that which he had before stated, and which appeared in the duplicate—namely, that the Armistice negociated between himself, Sir H. Burrard, Sir A. Wellesley, and General Kellerman, had been signed by Sir Arthur.

The Judge Advocate observed, that as the difference between the document before the Court, and the Gazette was very important, he had applied to the office of the Secretary for the War Department, and found that the original was correctly printed in the Gazette. The duplicate came some time after, and there it was stated, that the articles agreed upon were signed by Sir Arthur Wellesley.

The Judge Advocate asked the Court, whether they would wish to have the narrative of Sir Arthur Wellesley read again.

The Court having expressed their desire that it should, it was read accordingly.

The Judge Advocate next read a number of questions on the subject of the narrative, which had been sent in writing to Sir A. Wellesley, by the President, Sir D. Dundas, and which had been returned by Sir A. with his answers affixed to them. To a question, what were his orders, and what the objects of his expedition—he answered, the principal object was to attack the enemy in their positions on the Tagus; but he had a discretionary power to apply his force to other objects, in case he should consider them to be most material for the public service.

Lord Hulse then observed, that he hoped that whatever questions the Court might feel it their duty to put, they would be received in that spirit in which they were dictated—that of unfeigned respect for every Officer connected with the service in question.

Q. Had Sir Arthur Wellesley any communication at St. Andero, or any part of Biscay, as to any advantage which the common cause might have derived from his landing in Spain?—A. When at Corunna I received a letter from Sir Thomas Dyer, in which he informed me, that he had held out a prospect to the Junta that the troops under my command would be landed in Asturias; and he also mentioned that this communication had been received by the Junta with satisfaction—and he rather urged me to disembark at St. Andero, that we might attack the French corps which at that time was in possession of that city. I had no communication whatever with any constituted authority of Biscay, which province was not, as I understood, at that time, in insurrection against the French.

Q. Whether the inference is accurate, that you thought your own army sufficiently strong to drive the French from Lisbon and the forts of the Tagus, when you judged it advisable that Sir Harry Burrard should proceed to cut off the retreat of the enemy?—A. I did.

Q. You have stated that you could have supplied the Portuguese troops with provisions, had it not been for the defective arrangement of the Commissariat! did you think that the country could have afforded sufficient provisions, provided due means had been used to render the resources available?—A. The country afforded us no provisions, except beef and wine, and I believe from the time when I landed in Portugal, to the time when I left the army, on the 20th of September, the troops only received biscuit from the ships.

Lord Moira.—To what extent could wine and beef have been furnished by the country?—A. Wine and beef might have been furnished almost at every village occupied by the army, sufficient for one or two days consumption.

Q. Was the Junta of Gallicia averse to the landing of the British forces in Spain;—A. The Junta was not desirous of having the co-operation of the British army with their own troops, under General Blake. I also understood that the Junta of Seville and the persons in authority in Andalusia had no very great desire that General Spencer's corps should co-operate with Castanos, although they were desirous that General Spencer's corps should land at Port St. Mary's, and eventually cover General Castanos's retreat, in case he should have been defeated by Dupont.

Q. Did you receive communications of similar wishes from the Spanish Generals, and from persons in authority in other parts of Spain?—A. None.

Q. Was the expulsion of the French from Portugal essential to the interests of Spain?—A. I considered the expulsion of the French from Portugal as of the greatest consequence to the Spanish nation? and if the disposable force of Great Britain in Portugal had been removed, the French General might have moved a large proportion of his army into Spain.

Here the examination of Sir Arthur closed.

Captain Malcolm, of his Majesty's ship Donnegal, was then called.

Q. State in general if there were any difficulties in landing the troops, horses, ammunition, &c. and in what those difficulties consisted?—A. During the time I was on the coast, there were only four or five days on which a landing could be made without great difficulty in common boats, but on our coming to Mondego, we got a large supply of boats of the country, which facilitated the landing very much.

Sir H. Dalrymple then proceeded to read the paper given into the Court as the narrative of his proceedings from the time of his being appointed to the chief command of the British army in Portugal.

The instructions which he received were before the Court.

On the 13th he embarked, and afterwards had a communication with Lord Collingwood. On the 19th he arrived off the Tagus, and communicated with Sir C. Cotton. Sir Charles seemed to think that nothing serious was to be expected in Portugal. He (Sir H. Dalrymple) however, confessed, that he viewed the matter very differently. From the moment he had left Lord Collingwood had he reflected on the line of conduct he ought to pursue, and he saw no cause why he should take on himself an unnecessary responsibility, by interfering with the proceedings of an Officer purposely and specially selected for the particular business in hand, whom he knew to possess the confidence and special direction of Government, and who was by his military knowledge and experience highly qualified for the command. He had received a letter (he did not know if he could call it a private one) from Lord Castlereagh, instructing him in a particular manner to cultivate the confidence, and at all times to profit by the advice of Sir A. Wellesley. That he might expect much assistance, equally from his prudence and temper, as from his knowledge, courage and experience. On his landing he accordingly sent his Aid-de-Camps to inform Sir Arthur, that he was on his way to join the main body, but though he should wish to be informed of their proceedings, it was not his intention to interfere in the management of the operations which were going on.—He must here state though Sir A. Wellesley had addressed to him official accounts of his proceedings down to this period, they had never come to hand, and he landed without any information whatever on that head. On joining the main body on the 22d, he found them on the ground they had occupied the day before. He saw the necessity of removing from that spot; but why the army did not advance he knew not, nor did he feel any thing personal to himself on that subject. He found the state of matters to be something similar to what he had expected; and after making every allowance for the great advantages which the British forces had gained over the enemy in the battle of the preceding day, and the great additional loss of the enemy in killed, wounded, &c. he could not forbear from seeing, that these advantages were at least counterbalanced by the inferiority of the British cavalry. In the evening General Kellerman arrived. At this time he (Sir H. Dalrymple) knew nothing of the number and efficiency of the enemy, or of our own troops; and all the information he acquired on the subject was derived from Sir A. Wellesley in the observations made by him in the course of the discussion of the articles of the Preliminary Treaty, which immediately took place. The narrative proceeds to enter into the details of the Preliminary Convention, which it explains and vindicates in the particular circumstances of the contest. The words "private property" General Kellerman pledged himself at the time should be understood in their strict meaning, and should on no account be understood to extend to merchandize. The endurance of the armistice it had been his (Sir H. Dalrymple's) object to extend beyond the time fixed for it, to give time for the landing of Sir J. Moore's division. As to the Russian Fleet, he did not believe that General Kellerman was at liberty to give it up; but the total number of seamen did not amount to six thousand. Had he (Sir H. Dalrymple) however, been in possession of the letter from the Government of this country, stating that the property brought into Portugal by the French army, or the Russian property found in the Tagus, might be proper objects of capture by the British army, he would not have agreed to the article in question. The article authorising the French to carry away their private property, he knew had been viewed with the greatest abhorrence. The same words would be found, in similar circumstances, in the Convention of Alexandria. If these articles, however, had not been agreed to, the British army must have maintained its position till the morrow, or have advanced with not more than 16,000 men. Being once embarked in so dangerous a service, active movement was the only thing for the British forces. The artillery horses, however, were not sufficient for this purpose. Many of them were old, many of them lame and blind, and even the remainder were not altogether fit for such a service. In addition to this, if it had been resolved on to attack the enemy, the British army must have been confined to a position bordering on the sea, to ensure the junction of Sir J. Moore. Early on the 23d he was visited by a Portuguese officer, whose strongest objection was to the 6th article. The obvious answer, however, was that the Portuguese Government was then no where to be found. The Portuguese General, however, was asked to state his observations in writing, but this he failed to do. On the 24th Colonel Murray returned from the Admiral with the Article relative to the Russian fleet, and was afterwards sent with it to the French General, with a letter, seen and approved of by Sir H. Burrard and Sir A. Wellesley. He (Sir H. Dalrymple) seeing the appearance of guile in the conduct of the French General in Chief, sent for Generals Burrard and Wellesley to consult them on the subject, and Sir A. Wellesley had the goodness to frame a letter of further instruction to Colonel Murray on the subject. On the 29th, Captain Dalrymple returned with the terms of the Convention. Of some of the articles he disapproved, and assembled all the Major-Generals he could for their advice on the occasion. The Armistice expired the next morning, so that he must either have ratified it, or recommenced hostilities. With the approbation of Sir H. Burrard, Sir A. Wellesley, Sir J. Moore, General Hope, &c. he did ratify the Convention, and the terms of it were immediately communicated to the Portuguese Generals. The narrative then goes on to point out the difficulties which must have been felt in providing bread and other necessaries to the army, had it been encreased even by the addition of Sir J. Moore's corps, in consequence of which, and of the danger of the surf, it had been determined that these troops should be landed gradually, and that each division should bring along with it provisions sufficient for its own use. The determination of Sir H. Dalrymple not to supersede Sir A. Wellesley in the command, after the victory which he had gained, he communicated to the other Major-Generals who were senior to him, and they received it in a manner which did them honour. An application had been made by Admiral Siniavin to him (Sir H. D.) to know if the Port of Lisbon was to be considered as neutral in respect to the Russian fleet; but to this he had stated that he could give no answer. If hostilities had been to recommence, the different castles and strong holds in possession of the French must have been regularly besieged, one after the other—Fort St. Julian could not have been taken without battering cannon—as long as they remained in possession of the strong position of Almeida no ship of ours could approach the town—a battle must have been fought almost in the City of Lisbon itself, and the view of the campaign which he had originally formed, would at the last have been found to be the just one. The co-operation of the British force with the Spanish army, was, and had always been, the main and important object; the other was only preliminary to it. And it was of the utmost moment to afford to the Spaniards the earliest possible proof of the serious views we entertained of co-operating with them in the most effectual manner. Without entering into a calculation of the time which might have been occupied in reducing the forts on the Tagus, it was enough to say, that the heavy rains were approaching, when no marching into Spain could take place. He again wished that the Convention might be compared with other Conventions, and in particular with that concluded at Egypt, which it would be found to resemble, not only in its terms, but in its nature and qualities in other respects, particularly in the dangers of the service, and in the state of the army.—He submitted, therefore, that the Convention might be vindicated.—The Address of Thanks to Sir Hew, which had been read to the Court from the Chief Magistrate of Lisbon, in his own name, and that of the inhabitants, proved that, notwithstanding the protest formerly taken by him against certain articles in the Convention, he had on reflection come to see things in a different and more favourable light, and to estimate more truly the mercies which, through means of the British army they enjoyed.

The Addresses from the Bishop of Oporto, and other bodies, also proved, that they did not view the Convention in the light in which it had been treated by many persons in this country. A letter from General Castanos also shewed the necessity of a speedy co-operation in Spain, which from his instructions he (Sir H. Dalrymple) was led to suppose one of the chief, or rather main object of his command; and a letter from Lord W. Bentinck, who had since that period been in Madrid, shewed, that the Convention was thought adviseable, because it had rendered the army in Portugal disposable for this purpose.

Sir Arthur Wellesley hoped the Court would indulge him with permission to-morrow, to give in a statement explanatory of his proceedings before the arrival of Sir H. Burrard and Sir H. Dalrymple.

The letter from Lord W. Bentinck to Sir H. Dalrymple was read, and the Court adjourned.

FIFTH DAY.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

The Board sat this morning at a quarter before eleven.

The proceedings commenced with the Judge Advocate's reading the narrative delivered into the Board yesterday by Sir Hew Dalrymple.

Some documents were also read from the Commissariat Department, respecting the provisions, stores, and carriages at tached to the baggage and ordnance of the British army in Portugal; and also another document from the department of the Adjutant-General, stating the number of French who embarked after the evacuation, to be 24,735 men, 212 women, and 116 children.

Sir A. Wellesley then rose, and said notwithstanding Sir Hew Dalrymple considered the measures he had adopted previous to his arrival to be such as would not justify him in assuming the responsibility for any result which might follow, he felt confident that from the means he possessed with 13,000 British troops, and the aid he was taught to expect of 6000 Portuguese troops, he had strength enough to accomplish the purposes he had in contemplation against the army of the French, which he understood did not exceed 20,500 men; and that the line of march he proposed to pursue in furtherance of his objects, was in his opinion every way preferable to that chosen by Sir Hew. With respect to the Armistice after the battle of the 21st, he positively denied that he was the negociator; and although he certainly had signed it, yet he disclaimed all responsibility for its honour. He was present a great part of the time while it was in discussion; but the objections he made, and most of the suggestions he offered, were over-ruled by Gen. Dalrymple; He thought it, for instance, extremely desirable that the Russian ships should not by any means be included in a treaty with the French, but that any thing done with respect to them, should be the subject of a distinct treaty, and with themselves, as they had acted a neutral part while in the Tagus; and as means might be found to detain them there long enough to prevent their sailing to the Baltic, and sending their men to fight against Swedeu. He also distinctly understood that under the term of "all manner of property," used in the treaty, mere military baggage and private property were implied; but with respect to the Armistice itself, with all its conditions, Kellerman distinctly asked, during the conference, who was the ostensible negociator with whom he was treating, and Sir Hew Dalrymple answered, with himself. But after Gen. Kellerman had dictated to the officer who accompanied him as Secretary, the terms, for a fair copy, Sir Hew Dalrymple himself took the pen in his hand, and was proceeding to sign the instrument without reading it; but General Kellerman objected, that it was not regular for a Commander in Chief to sign a treaty concluded with a General of Division. Upon which, he (Sir Arthur) was called by Sir Hew out of another room to which he had retired; was told the objection of General Kellerman, and the pen handed to him by Sir Hew, to sign the treaty. He then read the instrument throughout; and after making the observation, that it was a most extraordinary paper, and drawn up in a most extraordinary way, he signed it, as he would have signed any other paper, at the desire of his superior officer, but without feeling himself at all responsible for its contents. He was willing, he said, to suffer any punishment or disgrace that his own conduct might be deemed to incur; but it would be a new and extraordinary principle, to punish or disgrace an Officer for a transaction in which he had no authority nor responsibility, but where both belonged to his Superior in Command. As to the main object of the Treaty, the Evacuation of Portugal, it was justified in the result; for while our Allies in Portugal were liberated from the oppressive burthen of an Enemy's Army in their country, and a large British Force enabled to march for a junction and co-operation with the Spanish Army, not a man of the French troops who had evacuated Portugal, and been sent to France, had yet reached the Spanish frontier. But as to the Armistice, such as it was, it remained a dead letter, and was never acted upon, except so far as it produced a cessation of hostilities. With respect to the subject of the subsequent Convention, the account given by Sir Arthur differed but little, and not materially, from that given yesterday by Sir Hew Dalrymple, except in that point which respected the discretion given to Colonel Murray, on his mission to Junot at Lisbon, for renewing the suspension of hostilities for forty-eight hours pending the discussion about the Russian fleet: for as Junot had threatened to arm the Russians in aid of his own force, in case the terms were not complied with, to which Admiral Cotton objected, he suggested that they ought not to be allowed forty-eight hours' suspension to equip the Russians, before the re-commencement of hostilities; and then at the desire of Sir Hew, he wrote the letter to Colonel Murray at Lisbon, desiring him, if the terms proposed by the British were not agreed to, then to declare the Armistice at an end on the 29th of August at noon, and depart immediately. As to the terms concluded with regard to the Russians, he thought them much more preferable for the object of the public service, than to have insisted on their unconditional surrender; for he judged, had as soon as the Portuguese colours should be hoisted at Lisbon, the Governmeat there would have claimed for the Russians the neutrality of the Tagus, which would have obliged Sir Charles Cotton to send home for instructions. This would have led to a protracted discussion between the two Governments, and have impeded the object of the Expedition. But there was one thing in the Treaty which he most decidedly condemned, namely, that no conditions whatever were stipulated for the five thousand Spanish prisoners in hulks on the Tagus, who were left entirely at the mercy and disposal of the French, when there might have been an exchange negociated for them, for as many French prisoners detained in their own country, and to which the Government of Gallicia would have readily acceded. As to the Convention of Cintra, he never saw it until his arrival in England.

Sir Hew Dalrymple observed, that with respect to the negociation of the Armistice, certainly Sir Arthur Wellesley discussed the point for a considerable time in the French language at the table with General Kellerman, and that in the mean time a Frenchman, who had accompanied General Kellerman, and whom he (Sir Hew) had seen in London some three years before, but did not immediately recollect his face or figure, took him aside to the window, claimed acquaintance with him, and in very bad English, asked him if he understood French? to which he answered, yes, as much as he had occasion for. Then this cunning Frenchman, under pretence of aiding him in understanding the words of General Kellerman, who was in conversation with Sir Arthur Wellesley, and to impress him with the idea that the Russians were friendly to the English, said that it would be imprudent to insist on any terms offensive to them: and that if the terms proposed by the French respecting them were rejected, they would be armed against the English. He repeated frequently, like a starling, after Kellerman, the words, dans vingt-quatre heures nous aurons six mille Russes (in four-and-twenty hours there will be ten thousand Russians). With respect to the intimation to Sir Arthur Wellesley of his intention not to supersede him in his command, he had forwarded it to him by an Aid-du-Camp, from on board his vessel, soon after his arrival on the coast, but he understood that Officer had not the good fortune to meet with Sir Arthur, to communicate the message.

Sir A. Wellesley then made some observations on the Articles, upon which he differed in opinion from the Commander in Chief. As to the Article which related to the French being allowed their baggage, &c. it was perfectly understood at the time, that property belonging to churches, to libraries, and museums, or galleries of pictures, did not come within the meaning or the letter of the article, as to property absolutely purchased, the Military Commanders could not interfere.

Sir Hew Dalrymple stated that he was convinced that a great part of the hostility, which appeared against him in Portugal, arose from this circumstance:—The Bishop of Oporto, with his Junta, wished to be considered as the actual Government of Portugal, and the Representatives of the Prince Regent. This was a claim which he conceived it his duty to resist, and he did resist it very early. He therefore had no correspondence with the Bishop of Oporto after the Convention, but he knew that Sir Arthur Wellesley had, because he himself received the answer to a letter which he had sent to the Bishop, from the accidental circumstance of the letter being directed to "the General in Chief of the British Forces." This letter he had now among his papers.

Sir Arthur said, that he always coincided in opinion with Sir Hew, about the claim of the Bishop and Junta of Oporto. He really could not recollect whether he had ever written the letter imputed to him or not. If he had the written letter, and the terms were such as the newspapers stated, he thought it might well be justified; for if he had said there was nothing extraordinary in the terms of the Convention, it was what might very fairly be said as applying only to the Portuguese. As far as respected the Portuguese, he would still say, that there was nothing extraordinary in the terms of the Armistice, except that article which related to the neutrality of the port of Lisbon.

Capt. Bligh was then examined, who confirmed the testimony given on a former day by Capt. Malcolm, as to the great difficulty of landing provisions, stores, or artillery, on the coast of Portugal during the months of August and September, on account of the swell and surf which is always upon the beach during these months.

General Ferguson was then introduced as a witness, but the President shewing him the written questions, put it to his option whether he would answer them, or take time to consider them, and send in written answers.

General Ferguson having read the questions with considerable attention, preferred taking some time to consider his answers.

The business of the day then closed, and the Board adjourned till to-day.

The Princess of Wales was in Court, attended by two ladies.

SIXTH DAY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 24.

The Board resumed its sittings this morning, a little after ten o'clock, and strangers were almost immediately admitted. The Dukes of Cumberland and Cambridge attended, as usual; and Sir Hew Dalrymple and Sir Arthur Wellesley, attended by their friends, occupied the seats respectively allotted for them.—The proceedings were opened by Sir Hew Dalrymple observing, that the only motive he had for wishing the correspondence between Sir Arthur Wellesley and the Bishop of Oporto, in the beginning of October, laid before the Board was, that the President and General Officers should see that the Bishop entertained a very different opinion as to the operations of the British army at the conclusion of that month from what he did at the commencement. But it was of little consequence of that correspondence could not be recollected or produced, as its effect was not very material to the issue of the inquiry, and the opinion the Board should ultimately form.

The Judge Advocate observed, that in consequence of the reference which had been made at the last sitting of the Board, to a letter said to have been written by Sir Arthur Wellesley to the Bishop of Oporto, he had applied at the Secretary of State's Office, to know whether they had obtained a copy of it in their dispatches from Sir Arthur Wellesley, and if they did, that he should be furnished with a copy; but in answer he was informed, that they were never furnished with such a document. The Judge Advocate again read the observations made by Sir A. Wellesley upon the narrative delivered in by Sir H. Dalrymple on Monday last, and stated in our paper of Tuesday.

This document being disposed of, Sir Arthur Wellesley proposed to call Colonels Torrens, Tucker, and Doyle, and Capt. Malcolm, in support of it. The President and Board assented; and Colonel Torrens was called in and examined as follows, by Sir Arthur Wellesley:—

Question—Do you, Colonel Torrens, recollect my having had a conversation with you in the evening of the 22d of August, or the morning on the 23d, respecting my having signed the Treaty of Armistice?—A. At day light, on the morning of the 23d, you mentioned to me the occurrences that had taken place the evening before, and informed me that you had signed the Armistice by the desire of Sir H. Dalrymple, although you totally disapproved many points in it; and also the tone of language in which it was drawn up.

Q. Did I state to you the points I disapproved of?—A. You principally stated, that you disapproved of the article which provided for the neutrality of the Russians, and of the forty-eight hours which had been given the enemy from the termination of the Armistice before hostilities should again commence.

Q. Do you recollect my having expressed great uneasiness on the 22d of August, upon finding that I did not possess the confidence of the Commander in Chief?—A. I do recollect that you did express, after having had a meeting with the Commander of the Forces, on his landing at Maceira, that you had to regret that it was apparent you did not possess his confidence, or words to that effect, I cannot charge my memory with the exact terms.

Q. Did I state to you my reasons for so thinking?—A. You did; if it is the wish of the Court, I'll state them.

The President.—Proceed in your evidence.

Colonel Torrens.—Sir Arthur Wellesley told me, that on Sir Hew's landing he waited upon him, to represent to him the necessity of the army's advancing, and that he had stated to him his reasons for thinking it was necessary. Sir H. Dalrymple replied, "that he had just arrived, and was consequently unable to form any judgment upon the matter." Upon which an Officer of the Staff spoke aside to Sir Hew, and then followed Sir Arthur, telling him, that it was the desire of the Commander of the Forces, that he should make preparations for the march of the army, and give what orders he thought necessary for that purpose.

Q. Was that Officer of the Staff Colonel Murray?—A. It was.

Q. Did you recollect that I told you that Colonel Murray had urged the Commander of the Forces upon the necessity of [illegible] of my having urged that necessity [illegible] after the Commander of the Forces had declined to attend to my recommendation?—A. I certainly did understand from you that Colonel Murray had urged the necessity of an advance to the Commander of the Forces, in consequence of having had a conference with you on the subject; but I cannot recal to my recollection whether or not you told me that you had this conference with Colonel Murray, after you had urged the matter yourself to the Commander of the Forces.

Sir Arthur said, he had nothing further to ask of Colonel Torrens, and Sir Hew Dalrymple declined any cross-examination.

Captain Malcolm, of the Donegal, was then called, and examined by Sir A. Wellesley, as follows:—

Q. Do you recollect my having recommended to the Commander in Chief to announce to General Junot the termination of the armistice in 48 hours, without reference to the detail which had been received, of the sentiments of the Admiral, respecting the article of the Armistice regarding the Russians; and with leave to General Junot, if he thought proper, to prolong the suspension?—A. Yes, I do.

Q. Will you state what passed?—A. On my going into the room, Sir H. Dalrymple informed Sir Arthur Wellesley, that the Admiral would not agree to that part of the Armistice that regarded the Russians. Sir Arthur observed, that he thought as much. Sir Hew then asked Sir Arthur what steps he thought most advisable to take? Sir Arthur replied, that he thought it would be best to send an Officer to General Junot, and inform him in general terms, that the Admiral disapproved of the Armistice, particularly of that article which related to the Russian squadron; and proposed further, that General Junot should be told that the suspension of arms would expire in 48 hours, and leave it to him to say whether that Armistice should be renewed or not.

Sir Arthur Wellesley said, he had nothing more to ask of Captain Malcolm; and Sir Hew Dalrymple, as in the former case, declined a cross-examination.

Sir Arthur Wellesley then read a copy of the general orders issued by Sir Hew Dalrymple on taking the command, expressing his admiration of the bravery and conduct of the troops in the recent actions, and observing that the nature of the service they had still to encounter, and the privations they were likely to experience, would require from them a repetition of that perseverance and firmness which had hitherto so eminently distinguished them, but added, that on the junction of the troops under Sir John Moore, their ultimate success was a matter of certainty.

The Judge Advocate then read the interrogatories given to Sir Hew Dalrymple by the Court to peruse and answer by their next sitting. In his answers Sir Hew stated, that he arrived on the 23d of August, and immediately sent dispatches to Government, apprising them of his proceedings up to that day. He also wrote to Sir H. Burrard, informing him of his arrival, and that he would assume the command. He then had a conference with Sir Harry, to learn the details of the battle of the 21st. He does not recollect that Sir Harry gave him any particular account of the state of the artillery, and he gave him no description of the country, or of its resources. Sir Harry estimated Junot's force at fourteen thousand men, from the appearance they made in the field, but of the number left in Lisbon, and other fortresses in the kingdom, he was not accurately informed. Sir Harry was perfectly satisfied with the behaviour and discipline of the army. He likewise had a conversation with Sir Arthur Wellesley, but he did not recollect that he gave him any further information than was given him by Sir Harry Burrard. General Burrard issued general orders, and directed that it should be announced, that he (Sir Hew Dalrymple) had succeeded to the Chief Command of the army. He (Sir Hew) then issued general orders to the troops to prepare for marching next day. General Kellerman arrived at the outposts of the army, and requested to be conducted to Sir Arthur Wellesley, supposing him to retain the Chief Command. He ordered him to be conducted to his quarters, however, and continued in consultation on the terms whereon to grant an armistice, from two o'clock in the afternoon till nine o'clock at night. He consulted with Sir Harry Burrard and Sir Arthur Wellesley during the negociation, Sir Harry Burrard had very little share in it, but Sir Arthur Wellesley assumed a very active part in it, and, when it was concluded, they both appeared to him cordially to approve of it. That Sir John Moore and his troops should be at liberty to proceed immediately to Spain, which the evacuation of Portugal by the French would permit him to do, was what he had very much at heart. He also considered that if General Mahrel's troops did not march for Spain immediately the inclement season would set in, and prevent their going for a long period. The Armistice was signed by Wellesley, because, as General Kellerman had said, it was not regular for the Commander in Chief to become a party to an instrument with an inferior officer in the opposite army. When Admiral Cotton refused his concurrence to the 7th article, he sent Colonel Murray to Junot's quarters, to inform him of the circumstance, and with powers to treat for a Convention on new terms. Whilst Colonel Murray remained negociating new terms with Junot, he was regular in his correspondence with him (Sir Hew), and his letters were shewn to Sir John Moore and Sir Harry Burrard.—They both proposed alterations occasionally, of which he made minutes; but when the Convention was concluded, neither of them expressed any disapprobation. He did not consider their deliberations on the articles to be in the nature of a Council of War, but took the opinions of the Officers on what they thought proper to be done for the honour and advantage of their country. He, however, did not wish to erect a barrier betwixt himself and the responsibility of the important command in which he was unexpectedly placed, as he would not servilely follow the opinion of any man, unless he was satisfied of its propriety. He also detailed the operations of the British army previous to the evacuation of Portugal by the French. He also described the situation of Lisbon, and the resources of the enemy. The castle completely commanded the town, and the new works which the French had lately erected were calculated for destroying the town. The French, when they surrendered, had abundance of every species of provisions furnished them by a Portuguese Contractor.

Lord Moira asked Sir Hew a few questions, which arose from his former answers, and the following is the substance of his answers to the latter questions:—He considered Junot's ultimate defeat certain, from the impending attack of the British, and the co-operation of the Spanish troops which remained in Andalusia and Estramadura. The aggregate of the British troops was thirty-seven thousand men. The last division of Sir J. Moore's army was landed on the 29th, after experiencing much difficulty and losing some men. Exclusive of the strong positions which the enemy held, they had it in their power to cross the river, and throw themselves into Elvas and its dependencies. The possession of the Castle of Lisbon in a great degree affects the whole country, as the French had it in their power to bombard and destroy the city, which General Kellerman threatened would be done. If that threat should not be executed, yet the fear of it would prevent the populace from molesting the French rear division when it should be crossing the Tagus. He intended to dispatch part of his army to Valladolid, where they might arrive in twenty-eight days, if no extraordinary circumstances should intervene and retard them. Being asked, whether he knew what progress General Moore had in fact made on his march to Spain? he answered, that he could not say. When he left Portugal, Sir John had advanced towards the frontiers; but he left Lisbon on the 6th of October. He thinks the presence of a British force will have great effect in rousing the patriotic efforts of the Spanish nation, and that in consequence an advantageous result may be expected to the common cause. This he said under the impression that the co-operation of the Spaniards was prompt and efficacious, without which no calculation could be made relative to the movements in Spain. He could not say what the estimated passage of the troops by sea was from Lisbon to the North of Spain, as the voyage of a fleet of transports on that coast, and at that season, was generally a work of uncertainty; besides, the means for the movement of land forces in the field had been already provided in Portugal, and must have been sacrificed, whilst much time would be consumed before the same requisites could again be procured. He could not say what time it would require the French to cross the Tagus, and pass into Alentejo, as the British army would have taken early steps to prevent them. The last position which they occupied was not ill calculated to cover their embarkation, and their actual passage might be accomplished in a day.

Sir Arthur Wellesley then put the following questions to Sir Hew:—

Q. Did you ever make any communication with me on the letter which was transmitted to you respecting me by Lord Castlereagh, and which you read to the Court in your narrative?—A. Never.

Q. What were the lines of communication, and the positions left in the enemy's hands, in consequence of my advancing inwards Lisbon by the coast?—A. I stated my opinion on that subject in a great degree, if not entirely, before; consequently, the Members of the Court, who are much better judges than I am, may well know what degree of weight to attach to the observation. Sir Arthur then asked whether he did give Sir Hew printed memoranda of a basis whereon Colonel Murray might treat for a Convention? To which Sir Hew replied, that he did not recollect it. After a short conversation, Sir Arthur said he would not press the question, as he could prove the fact by other evidence.

Q. Do you recollect that the first proposition which General Kellerman made was, that the Russian fleet should be at liberty to return to the Baltic?—A. I cannot at the moment say that such a proposition was made, but I am sure that it was not strongly urged, or long discussed, or it would have made an impression on my memory.

General Fergusson was then called to give his answers to the questions which the President had given him in writing on Tuesday. In his answers he stated as follows:—He joined the expedition on its sailing; was at Vimiera on the 21st. He did not know how the whole army was served with provision, but the brigade which he commanded was regularly supplied. From the position he held on the 21st, he had no opportunity of ascertaining the French force. Does not know whether the French expected any means of defence in the vicinity of Lisbon, but the ground afforded it. Does not think Lisbon itself could make much resistance. Has no reason to think that the French would surrender on any other terms than those granted them. He admitted the advantages of the evacuation of Portugal, stated by Sir Hew Dalrymple and Sir Arthur Wellesley, to the Spanish and Portuguese cause, and the Tagus had been opened to the British shipping, &c. He stated, that if General Moore had landed with the troops, the retreat of the enemy to Lisbon might have been cut off.

A General Report, dated 28th September, of the state of Fort St. Julien, and the other fortresses on the Tagus and neighbourhood, was then read, and the Court adjourned to this day.

SEVENTH DAY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER, 26.

The Court proceeded immediately after assembling, to examine Brigadier General Acland, or rather to the reading of his examination, the questions having been previously sent to him, and he having written his answers. A person for the Judge Advocate read over the questions, and Brigadier General Acland read his answers—The questions were the same as those sent to Brig. Gen. Fergusson. The answers of Brig. Gen. Acland were in substance that he did not think that the French would have surrendered prisoners of war on the 22d; nor if driven back upon Lisbon, would they without making further effort. To a question as to whether the Convention did not liberate Portugal from the French, put a stop to the ravages of war upon the Tagus, &c. and whether these advantages could have been secured by any other measure? The answer was, that all these advantages were secured by the Convention, and could not have been, he thought, by any other measure. He was of opinion that our army could not have prevented the French retiring across the Tagus.

In this latter opinion Major-Gen. Spencer concurred; who also thought that the French would not have surrendered prisoners of war, and that had an English army been placed in the same situation, they decidedly would not have surrendered. As to whether the same advantages could have been derived from any other measure from the Convention, he observed, that the result of military operations being necessarily uncertain, he could not take upon himself to assert what might have been the event. The artillery consisted of nine-pounders. The Convention was similar to that in Egypt, in 1801.

To a question from Sir A. Wellesley, whether Major-General Spencer was aware that it had been arranged that the Alfred should attend the movement of the army along the coast from Mondego, in charge of the victuallers and store-ships, that ship being armed with 24-pounders, and the ammunition expected from England being for 24-pounders? Major General Spencer answered that the Alfred was ordered for the express purpose of supplying whatever heavy ordnance the Commander in Chief might require.

To another question from Sir A. Wellesley, as to the situation of the army to attack any fortified place, Major General Spencer answered, that the Alfred joined a long time before the heavy artillery could have been wanted.

The Earl of Moira—Had you any heavy artillery mounted on carriages?—Major-Gen. Spencer—None.

Sir A Wellesley—Was there no heavy artillery?—Major-General Spencer—Mortars, but not guns.

Brigadier-General Nightingale was nearly of the same opinion as the other two Generals, that the French could not have been prevented from retiring across the Tagus—that they would not have surrendered prisoners of war; and as to the advantages obtained by the Convention, with respect to Portugal, and to making our army a disposable force, it was impossible to say whether any other measures would have produced the same advantages.

Captain Prival, of the Engineers, was examined, with respect to the defence of Lisbon. He stated, that Lisbon was better defended by its positions round the city, than by its works; that Fort St. Julien could not hold out a week against a storm; that the batteries of Cascais were very strong; and that Peniche was strongly fortified.

Sir Arthur Wellesley here proposed to put some questions to Captain Prival, as to the conversation which he had with certain French Officers; but as that conversation, as we understood, would affect Sir H. Burrard, they were for the present waved. Some questions were then put by the Court to Sir H. Dalrymple, the answers to which shewed that difficulties arose in landing the artillery—that it was impossible to land it at Masceira, and that there was no means of moving it from thence.

Sir A. Wellesley was then asked some questions, to which he replied—that the heavy artillery could not have been brought forward if landed at Mondego Bay; the roads through Portugal being very bad, and very narrow: that even if a large number of horses were employed to draw heavy artillery or travelling carriages, it could not be effected; but it was evident from his narrative and the questions put to him before, that the horses with the army were only in sufficient numbers to draw the field train.

Col. Torrens was again called in, and asked by Sir A. Wellesley as to his having delivered in a Paper to Sir Hew Dalrymple on the day the army marched from Vimiera, respecting the Russian fleet, which he recommended should not be molested, but allowed to evacuate in four days, and to embark within seven days.

Colonel Torrens replied in the affirmative.

The President said that there would not be any proceedings farther until the arrival of Sir Harry Burrard who was hourly expected.—Adjourned sine die.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

London,

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

A Mail, brought by the Lady Pellew Packet, arrived at Falmouth on Tuesday, from Corunna, which place she left on the 19th inst. The information communicated by the Spanish Papers, is briefly this:—the French have entered Burgos; and a division of the Army of Estremadura, consisting of 4000 men, which had advanced from Madrid in that direction, has been defeated. But the private accounts are of the most alarming nature. These all coincide in mentioning the total defeat of General Blake's army; and that it has been so completely routed and dispersed, that no hopes are entertained of collecting the scattered parts. Where this battle was fought, or when, no one account mentions; but to add to the unfavourable intelligence, it is reported, that the gallant and enterprising Blake has been severely wounded and taken prisoner. The dispatches received by Government, coincide with the former part of this account, but omit the latter. The previous intelligence left General Blake at Reynosa, to which place he had retreated from Valmoseda, and where he was on the 14th. During this retreat he was constantly harrassed by the enemy, engaged in pastial, but constant conflicts, and absolutely disputing every inch of ground as he fell back. It was after having quitted Reynosa, some leagues on the road to Burgos, in which line he was retreating, that he is said to have been totally defeated; and after this advantage, the enemy not only re-entered Burgos, but penetrated as far as Valladolid. It was said they had advanced to this place on their way to Madrid; but it is more probable that this movement has been made, in order to prevent a junction between our army and that of CASTANOS; or to attack that under Sir JOHN MOORE, before it is reinforced by that of Sir DAVID BAIRD. Sir J. MOORE is stated to be at Salamanca, which is about 60 miles from Valladolid, where the advanced troops of the enemy have arrived. It was thought at first he would effect a junction with Sir DAVID BAIRD's force at Burgos; but the rapidity and decisive nature of the enemy's operations, have disconcerted this plan, and it is now supposed they will join at Zamora. Private letters mention that our troops are pursuing the road to Benevento. Zamora, the supposed place of junction, is midway between Benevento and Salamanca; so that if the French have actually arrived at Valladolid, this rapid march has been made by NEY, to intercept a part of our force, or to prevent its junction. If the above information be true to its full extent, of which we entertain very considerable doubts, which we will afterwards explain, Sir J. MOORE will be placed under the necessity of falling back, in order to join the rear of his army, which, from want of magazines, has been obliged to follow in small divisions. This is a measure of prudence; and will facilitate his junction with Sir D. BAIRD. In whatever situation our army may be placed by these unexpected occurrences, they will do their duty, and in a manner worthy of their country and their deserved reputation. Some fears are, however, entertained, that the next intelligence may bring us some unpleasant accounts relative to the troops advancing from Corunna, as the cavalry under General HOPE, have taken a different route from that of the infantry. A fleet of transports, which sailed from Corunna on the morning of the 19th, had been recalled; and it was reported, that this order was given as a measure of precaution, should Sir D. BAIRD be unable to continue his march. The wildest and most extravagant reports prevailed at Corunna, when the Lady Pellew sailed, of treachery on the part of the Spanish Generals, and that several had been arrested by order of the Supreme Junta, in consequence of a detected conspiracy. The following letter from an Officer of the 60th Regiment, then at Corunna, contains a passage in confirmation of this rumour; "The Spanish Gen. CUESTA has been detected in a traiterous correspondence with the enemy, and is now in ignominious confinement."

Such is the substance of these unfavourable accounts, which rest, as well as the dispatches received by Government, on no official authority; and are no more than a recapitulation of the vague and contradictory reports prevalent at Corunna, when the Lady Pellew sailed from thence. It was the duty of the Agents of Government, to send over these reports in the form they received them; and, in general, their communications are as unfounded, and as little deserving of confidence, as those of private individuals. It is superfluous to observe, that we except the accounts transmitted to them officially; but, on every other occasion, they are as liable to error, and to be imposed on, as any other individual in the place where they reside. Because Government has received the substance of these rumours from their Agents at Corunna, proves no more in corroboration of these reported disasters, than a letter, which any broker, or merchant in the city, happens to receive on the same subject. It must be remarked, in like manner, that this intelligence arrived at Falmouth on Tuesday last; and since that day, though the wind has been constantly favourable, no subsequent accounts have been received.

Had official intelligence been received at Corunna, the day after the sailing of the Packet-boat, it is to be surmised that the Agent of Government in that city would not have dared neglect his duty, in deferring, even for a moment, to send off a vessel, in order to communicate to Ministers dispatches of such extreme importance. As no such vessel has arrived in any of our ports, nor any from St. Andero, which is nearer the scene of hostilities, and also nearer this country; and where several are at the disposal of our Agents, we ought, from this circumstance alone, to be extremely cautious, what degree of credit we attach to these rumours. That BLAKE has suffered very considerable reverses, and lost a deal of ground, we apprehend; but we make no scruple in rejecting the accounts in the exaggerated and gloomy form they have been presented to us. All the newspapers, with few or no exceptions, and the receivers of letters and dispatches from Corunna, have, in communicating to the public their intelligence, forgot a very material circumstance, viz. to inform us in what place, and on what day, this engagement has taken place, in which BLAKE himself is reported to have been severely wounded and taken prisoner, and his whole army routed and totally dispersed. But on these two material points, which are absolutely necessary to substantiate a fact of such vast importance, these accounts are entirely, and, we think, unaccountably silent. Until this extraordinary omission be cleared up to us, we must beg leave to refuse our assent to an account so alarming in its consequences and tendency, and which rests on no other authority—but reports prevalent at Corunna, unsubstantiated by subsequent accounts, or by any circumstance bearing the the stamp of official communication. That accounts, the most vague, contradictory, and alarming, must prevail among the inabitants of Corunna, who are interested in, so tremblingly alive to the events passing in their country, is natural, and expected by every man who had lived any time near the theatre of hostile operations. Every mind is kept in constant agitation, and consequently susceptible of strong and violent impressions. The first question put to every traveller that arrives, and to every acquaintance on meeting, is, "what news from the army?" And when we reflect on the interest, the avidity, the anxiety with which every account relative to that country is listened to here in England, we may form some remote idea of the ardent curiosity which the slightest circumstance connected with the fate of their armies, must excite in the breast of the Spaniards! Every individual in that Peninsula has so much at stake on the issue of the contest, is so personally interested in the occurrences of the day, that it is by no means astonishing, that, under such impressions, and with such motives for curiosity and alarm, the most extravagant reports should be in permanent circulation. As our Agents, however, have sent no subsequent dispatches, and defer making communications till the regular and fixed time of the departure of the packet-boats, we consider as a strong and presumptive proof, that they have received no confirmation of these extraordinary reverses. We cannot, therefore, for this extraordinary cause for despondency in rumours which the ingenuity of some, the malevolent curiosity of others, and the credulity of all, have greatly exaggerated. That BLAKE's army, far inferior in numbers, discipline, length of service, and in the requisites for carrying on offensive operations, should have yielded to the first impetuous shock of NEY's army, would have betrayed a total ignorance of the vast resources of the invader, not to anticipate. But our minds were made up for these first reverses; because we know, from an attentive observation of the invader's character, talents, impetuosity, and situation, that he would have collected all the resources he had at his disposal, in order to insure success at the commencement of a campaign he has opened himself. For had he been discomfitted in the first operations, not only would the fate of Spain cease to be precarious; but according to human calculation, the French army would not be able to maintain a footing, for six weeks, to the south of the Pyrenees: whatever opinion we entertain of the tyrant's principles and feelings, he has given us no cause to form a contemptible opinion of his understanding, prudence, and foresight. How is it possible then that any man of only ordinary comprehension, should have been inconsiderate enough to suppose, that BONAPARTE, after the prodigious success he has had, after the exploits he has performed, and the conquests he has achieved, purchased, it is true, with great crimes, but likewise, with talents of the first order, should be so improvident, so insensible to the consequences, as to neglect the first impression; as not to secure success at least, in the onset. The men, who judge that dangerous individual in this manner, are grossly mistaken; and their conjectures deserve very little weight or consideration in the scale of political calculation. It is curious to attend to reasonings on this subject, if one had patience enough to follow them up:—In the first place our political reasoners unanimously acknowledge that BONAPARTE is a soldier and statesman of the first-rate abilities; and that the most prominent features in his character are prudence and promptitude. After having established these premises, they then draw the very extravagant conclusion, that his first operations in Spain must betray imbecillity, negligence, and incapacity; for how could they otherwise be guilty of the absurdity as to imagine that with the immense accession he brought with him to reinforce the armies he had already in that country, he should not succeed against the Patriots in the first instance. Either BONAPARTE must be the greatest driveller, or the most consummate blockhead that ever intrigue or mismanagement placed at the head of an army (and this concession these Gentlemen are unwilling to make),—or the Spaniards must be more than men; and, whatever high opinion we entertain of the gallantry, patriotism, and magnanimity of that distinguished community, we are not so bewitched in their favour as to consider them in the light of Demigods. They have done much, however,—the generous people! and more than the most enlightened and ardent admirers of their cause could have ventured to anticipate; and considerably more than their new advocates, who are so easily disconcerted at the first reverse, had the courage, or the sanguine disposition to expect. We beseech them, however, to tranquillise themselves; for the cause in which the Spaniards are engaged, were it abandoned by this country, and betrayed by the universe, is not only able to resist any storms and hurricanes that may assail it from the side of France, but will afford one day, and that day is neither remote nor uncertain, shelter, protection, and freedom to the destitute and abandoned victims, who are now sighing, from one extremity of Europe to the other, over the loss of those privileges they had not magnanimity enough to defend. We blush at the pusillanimity and despondency manifested by newspaper-writers, and the public in general, at the receipt of these letters from Coruna; for a moments reflection would have shewn, that their contents were not only exaggerated, but ought to be received with caution and distrust. We cannot deny, however disagreeable it may be to our feelings, that the Spaniards have suffered some reverses, and fallen back considerably; but these reverses are neither of that calamitous nor decisive nature, as was imagined. We hope therefore the next intelligence will inform us that BLAKE's army, so far from being totally routed, and dispersed, is still able to maintain a series of obstinate, and ultimately successful conflicts, against the base and execrable invaders.

The more we examine the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, the more we are convinced of the necessity of an investigation into the conduct of the Generals who signed the Armistice and Convention. The recrimination made by the Officers against one another, and the almost indecent efforts used by each to clear himself from imputation at the expence of the other, leave no doubt as to the merits of the transaction. We are doubtful to what officer we should attach most blame; for no doubt can now be entertained, that both were equally active in bringing this stigma on the national character. Whatever we have read till now of the proceedings, we have not been able to discover a plausible justification of the affair itself, nor an extenuation of the conduct of those who signed it.

We give Sir A. WELLESLEY the justest praise for his skilful operations previous to the battle of Vimiera, and for his gallantry and judgment during that engagement. We are even willing to believe, that had he not been superceded in the command, he would have brought the campaign to a more auspicious issue; but we cannot conceive, after the success he obtained with so small a proportion of the British army, against the whole of the French, how he could possibly see the necessity of granting the enemy such favourable stipulations.—Both Sir ARTHUR and Sir HEW still insist on the necessity and utility of the Convention: in this they are consistent, but why then recriminate; or attempt to throw the imputation on one-anothers shoulders? In this they are perfectly inconsistent; for if the affair was a justifiable one, and suggested by necessity, as well as policy, they should spurn at evasion, and boldly acknowledge in spite of obloquy and prepossession, their participation in the measure.

LINIERS, who reduced WHITELOCKE to an ignominious capitulation at Buenos Ayres, and was, in consequence of this service, made Viceroy and Provisional Captain-General of La Plata Province, published an address, on the 15th of August, to the inhabitants of that province, in which he attempts to enforce the pretensions of BONAPARTE to the crown of Spain, and recommends to the Spaniards of the new world, to acknowledge the new dynasty. It was natural to suppose, that the Usurper should find in a Frenchman, though a naturalized Spaniard, and invested with the highest honours of his adopted country, a willing and obsequious agent. Subsequent accounts inform us that he was obliged to retract, or, at least, modify, this proclamation; and we have every reason to hope that the efforts of this traitor will be frustrated; and that the exertions of the natives will rescue that important Settlement from the loathsome vassalage to which this adventurer and his associates were willing to subject it. There are the strongest hopes entertained to that effect; and we expect the next arrival will inform us of the punishment of Linieres, and the triumph of the patriotic party.

The Gazette of last night contains a proclamation for the assembling of Parliament on the 16th of January next.

Portuguese Papers to the 16th inst. arrived yesterday. Sir Harry Burrard was to sail in a few days for England.—Private letters by this conveyance state, that the 5000 French troops who had retired from Barcelona to Montejui were surrounded by an army of 25,000 Spaniards, and that their unconditional surrender was daily expected.

A detailed account has been published in the Spanish Papers of the surrender of the battalion of Sharp-shooters of Cadiz. It appears they were sent under the command of La Cruz Mourgeon, on the 20th of October, to occupy the town of Leria. Between that day and the 25th, La Cruz employed himself in fortifying his position, as well as circumstances would allow. On the 25th, at five in the morning, he was attacked by the enemy with a force consisting of 2000 infantry, and 300 cavalry, his own force being little more than 500 men. He, however, repulsed the enemy, but the latter renewed the attack at nine, and at half past ten their force consisted of 6000 infantry, and from 6 to 800 cavalry. They summoned him to surrender; but he positively refused, and this small force defended themselves with the greatest bravery until half past three in the afternoon of the 26th, when their ammunition being exhausted, and there being no prospect of relief, they were compelled to surrender. The loss of the Spaniards, upon this occasion, amounted to between 50 and 60 killed, about 50 wounded, and 400 taken prisoners. This affair was mentioned in the Paris Papers, but the number of the Spaniards was exaggerated to 700 men, and they were represented as having laid down their arms, without a word being said of the gallant defence they had made.

Lord Viscount Deerhurst is appointed Lord Lieutenant of the County of Worcester.

Orders were on Wednesday last received for the 3d and 4th Dragoons stationed at Canterbury, to hold themselves in readiness for immediate embarkation for Spain. Eight troops from each of these regiments are made subject to this order, and they are, as we have before stated, to form the first heavy cavalry brigade under the command of Major-Gen. Payne. The 3d regiment it is expected will commence its march to Portsmouth in the course of the ensuing week.

THE COURT.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, their Majesties and the Princesses arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor, where they were received by the Dukes of York, Kent, and Cumberland. In a short time after her Majesty and the Princesses honoured Lady Charlotte Finch with a visit, at her apartments in St. James's Palace. At half-past three o'clock her Majesty, the Princess Charlotte of Wales, the Dukes of York, Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, and Sussex, dined with the Duke of Cambridge, at his apartments in St. James's Palace. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee at the Queen's Palace.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty —

Viscount Deerhurst, by Lord Hawkesbury, on his appointment to the Lord Lieutenancy of Worcestershire. His Lordship was attended by his son, Lieut.-Col. Coventry, who was also presented to his Majesty on the occasion.

Colonel Walker, of the 50th Regiment, upon his return from Portugal.

Captain Boyles, Royal Navy, upon his being appointed a Colonel of Marines.

Dr. Dampier did homage before his Majesty, upon his being translated from the Bishopric of Rochester to Ely.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, at which Viscount Deerhurst was introduced, and sworn into the Lord Lieutenancy of Worcestershire.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, and the rest of the Ministers present; also Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, who laid before him the proceedings of some Courts-Martial.

Soon after five o'clock the Royal Family left town for Windsor.

ACCIDENT TO THE KING'S CARRIAGE.

The Royal Family left town for Windsor, soon after five o'clock on Wednesday evening. His Majesty's Court at the Queen's Palace, it so happened, concluded just time enough for his carriage to precede Her Majesty's a short distance. When it came to Turnham-green, from the darkness of the night, and the great speed the horses were travelling at, one of the leading horses, on which the postillion rode, fell, threw his rider, and rolled upon him; this of course threw the other three horses into great confusion, and it was expected the carriage, with his Majesty in it, must have been overturned; however, by the exertions of the other postillion, it was prevented, and an inhabitant of Turnham-green, who happened to be on the spot, hastened to the assistance of his Majesty, and got him safe out of the carriage; his Majesty was, however, under the disagreeable necessity of wading through the mud, which was collected to a considerable depth, and remained till her Majesty's carriage came up, in which was her Majesty, the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, and Lady Aylesbury.

Princess Elizabeth, on hearing of the situation of her Royal Father, instantly jumped out of the carriage, and walked a considerable distance through the mud, to the other carriage, in which was the Princesses Mary, Sophia, and Amelia, and Lady Cranley. They then proceeded on their way to Windsor. His Majesty's carriage followed, empty, with a single pair; the fore horses being too much injured to proceed, and the rider was so much bruised that he was taken to the Pack Horse Inn, and put to bed.

SPANISH SHEEP AND SHEPHERDS.

The Spanish sheep, which have lately arrived in this country, came as a present from the Grand Junta to his Majesty. There were 2500 sent; 700 of them died on their journey; their skins have arrived within these few days. Those that have arrived alive, are at Kew and Richmond, and are thriving very well. Thirteen shepherds came over with them. His Majesty, with a princely munificence, has given directions for them to remain in this country as long as they like, at his expence. They are put under the care of Mr. Snarlet, his Majesty's principal Gardener, who has allotted to them a house, called the Call-house, situated at the upper end of the Queen's Garden, near Hyde-Park Corner, where they prefer sleeping upon straw to beds. Two labourers attend them, to procure their food, and assist in cooking, &c. They have a pound a meat a man provided for their dinners and suppers, and are not pleased if the meat is not very fat: they have it cooked in their own way, and, in general, eat the enormous quantity of a peck of onions at a meal. An old sailor, who knows the Spanish language, has been procured, for a companion and interpreter to them, and, by his assistance, after every meal, they stand up, join their hands, and put their toes together, while they sing God save the King. They also sing a Spanish national air. The old sailor is furnished with money to conduct them about London, and shew them such exhibitions and curiosities as may be most entertaining. They were highly amused and astonished with Westminster Abbey, and the curiosities to be seen in it. They walk the streets with their crooks in their hands, and their grotesque appearance attracts the notice of the passengers.

CITY.

REQUISITION FOR A COMMON HALL.

The following are Copies of the Requisition sent to the Lord Mayor, and of his Lordship's answer refusing compliance :—

Nov. 2, 1808.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD MAYOR.

We, the undersigned Liverymen of the City of London, request your Lordship to convene a Common Hall, on an early day, in order to take into consideration the late Convention in Portugal, by which the character, honour, and interests of the Country have been so deeply affected, and to adopt such measures as may be deemed advisable.

T. Reeve,	J. Hurcombe,	S. Stott,
J. Axford,	W. Rawlins,	J. Heppe,
R. Phillips,	G. Phillips,	J. Sparrow,
J. Turner,	T. M. Bardin,	J. Howell,
W. Robins,	E. Butler,	S. Miller,
R. Slade,	S. Nash,	R. Rosser,
T. Lett,	C. Sabine,	J. Gwennap,
J. Griffiths,	J. Gibbons,	T. Norton,
P. Fenton,	G. Beauchamp,	R. Waithman,
M. Gould,	W. Griffith,	W. Taylor,
E. Quin.

The following is a copy of the Lord Mayor's answer :—

"Mansion-House, Monday, Nov. 21, 1808.

"The Lord Mayor presents his compliments to Mr. Quin, and begs to acquaint him, that he has considered the requisition, dated the 2d of this month, which Mr. Quin presented to him on Saturday evening last, 'To convene a Common-Hall, on an early day, in order to take into consideration the late Convention in Portugal, by which the character, honour, and interests of the country have been so deeply affected, and to adopt such measures as may be deemed advisable.'

"The Lord Mayor cannot but observe, that since the date of the requisition, has been instituted by his Majesty's command, for investigating the causes which led to the Convention alluded to, and that the Court is now prosecuting such Inquiry.

"The Lord Mayor is of opinion, that a Meeting of the Livery of London in Common Hall on the subject proposed by the Requisition, pending such public inquiry, will be highly unnecessary, unseasonable, and improper, and therefore declines to convene a Common Hall as requested."

"Edward Quin, Esq.

The price of bread was ordered to be continued the same as last week, viz.—1*s.* 3*d.* the quartern loaf of wheaten, and 1*s.* 2*d.* household.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Tuesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the under-mentioned Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, viz.—

Capt. E. C. Bradford, Lord Duncan, for Madras and Bengal.
Capt. W. P. D'Esterre, United Kingdom, for St. Helena and Bengal.

The following times are fixed for the ships lately taken up, viz. Coutts, for China; Surrey and Medcalfe, for Madras and Bengal; the Devonshire, for Ceylon and Bengal; and the Marquis Wellesley, for Bombay.—To be afloat the 15th January; sail to Gravesend the 31st ditto; stay there thirty days; be in the Downs the 9th of March.

In our last number we had the pleasure of announcing to the public a new Invention for sharpening Razors upon entire novel principles; we find it is denominated a Magnetic Tablet, and from the respectable report we have heard of it we make no doubt of its universal adoption, as it is capable of entirely superseding the necessity of a Hone or an Elastic Razor Strop. It requires no oil or additional composition to give it effect, and is particularly recommended to those who cannot use a Hone with success, or who have not convenient access to Cutlers.—Sold at the Inventor's Warehouses, No. 65, Cheapside, and 52, Park-street, Grosvenor-square; also, by his appointment, at Messrs. R. Clarke and Sons, No. 62, Cheapside. Each Tablet will be sold with the Inventor's Signature.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Tuesday night the Opera of the Duenna was acted. Mrs. Sparks, with undaunted resolution, assumed Miss Pope's little hat and stiff feathers, but unfortunately left her judgment and spirit behind. We almost suspect that this was an act of wilful forgetfulness on her part, or rather an act of conscious dignity. She was not above imitating the dress of this unequalled performer, but evidently and wisely too, spurned at the thought of copying her acting. Where Miss Pope was natural, which even the deviations from nature which the part requires must be, Mrs. Sparks was so richly affected, that her face distorted with grimaces and her body with contortions, she gave a perfect picture of what ridicule would be, were it embodied in one single person, instead of being spread among a thousand.

We admire Mr. Dignum in a lover's part above any other performer we can recollect. Some people say that he is fit only to represent the fat monarch of the kitchen, singing a sweet lullaby over the lifeless frame of a roasting turkey. But we must positively declare this to be a libel on truth, and the evidence of our senses. Mr. Dignum's shape is elegance itself, his features expression, and his voice harmony.

Mr. I. Smith appeared for the first time in Ferdinand. Were he not to hold his head so high, as to present little more than his chin to the spectators, and to unbend a little the stiffness of his body, we should have no fault to find with him. And even these are but trifling defects, which it would be perhaps below the dignity of criticism to notice, did we not wish our remarks to be useful, and did we not hope Mr. Smith will profit by them. He sings with the greatest ease, and no small degree of taste and science; he acts with more spirit and judgment than any other operatic performer on the stage, to which he would prove a valuable acquisition as an actor, even did he not possess his vocal abilities. He never forgets the part which he fills after he has delivered a speech or sung a tune, to remain completely still like a piece of machinery, that has gone through its round of motion, and cannot resume its activity till its springs are wound up a second time. He shews by his looks, attention and gestures that he understands what is said to him, and takes a share in what passes.

Dowton was too excellent in the part of Isaac not to soar both above criticism and even praise. At the beginning of the third act he apologized for Mrs. Mountain whose melodious tongue was chained by a cold. The apology was received by a round of applause which proved that the British public do not lose the recollection of past services, when the person by whom they have been performed, is unable to continue them.

The opera was followed by the excellent farce of the Mayor of Garratt. Dowton has never been surpassed in Major Sturgeon, and we do not believe it is possible he ever should. Mr. Russell filled the part of Jerry Sneak. We have frequently been compelled by our impartial regard for truth, to apply the lash of criticism to the blind self-love of this gentleman, and now rejoice at feeling ourselves authorised to pour the balm of praise on the wounds we reluctantly inflicted. Would he confine himself to this cast of characters, he would always meet with the deserved approbation of the public. The vulgarity which always stains his performances of gentlemen, here becomes nature: his generally disgusting grin, characteristic, and save Elliston's Percival in the Three and the Deuce, we had never beheld Idiotism so well personated on the stage.

The Comedy of The Chances was performed on Wednesday night, for the first time this season. It required all the vivacity of Mrs. Jordan, and all the study of Mr. Elliston, to give life or character to a piece in itself so tame and insipid. The tedium, however, of the play was in a great measure relieved by an interlude, intitled, Love in a Tub, composed by Mr. D'Egville. The idea of this trifle is not unhappy, and it afforded a very favourable opportunity to Mr. D'Egville's pupils to display their own agility, and the taste and science infused into it by the skilful instructions of their master. Miss Gayton, particularly distinguished herself. A Scotch Reel, however, by Miss C. Bristow, was more generally applauded than the mere scientific efforts of the nimble heel; for what all affect to understand, all will admire. Laurent's exhibition in the Tub, was not happy, nor in its proper place. It only afforded a butt to the ridicule of the House. The music, by Bishop, is exceedingly pretty and appropriate; and there was also in the scenery what excited very general and well-deserved applause. The house overflowed before the dance began.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. XVI.

Yes, I am proud; I must be proud, to see
Men not afraid of GOD—afraid of me.
POPE'S 'Epilogue to The Satires.'

REV. ISAAC JACKMAN,

OF THE

PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY.

COMPELLED as sometimes I am, in the prosecution of these clerical criticisms, to animadvert on deficiences which, since they cannot escape my observation, demand my censure, it is with unfeigned pleasure that I approve, on any occasion, whatever I find to be equitably entitled to general support. Public duty alone dictated my observations on The Foundling Hospital, however severe they might seem to those who were unacquainted with the causes in which my remarks originated, or unpleasing as they might prove to those who understood the force of their application; but public justice now calls upon me to perform something infinitely more satisfactory to myself, and, let me hope, not less beneficial to others. I have now to speak of a civil establishment, which claims, and will authorize, my applause; and of a religious institution, as connected with it, which seems to deserve the encouragement it experiences.

The PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY was first formed during the year 1788, and was incorporated, by an act of the legislature, in 1806: its CHAPEL, one of the most spacious and elegant of modern edifices, was regularly opened towards the close of the latter year. Both the Society and the Chapel, I am happy to repeat it, are entitled to estimation. Without entering into the details on which this opinion is founded, and which would not properly assimulate, particularly as referring solely to the Philanthropic Institution, with the immediate object of my present pursuit, perhaps, incidentally at least, I shall yet sufficiently substantiate the truth of what I have just asserted. Scepticism itself would be perplexed in endeavouring to start one solid cavil against the views or conduct of this Society; and it becomes my province to ascertain in what manner it ought to be appreciated, as affecting the interests of Religion.

The REV. ISAAC JACKMAN, alternate Licensed Preacher at the PHILANTHROPIC CHAPEL, is from Catherine-Hall, in the University of Cambridge. He formerly preached in one of the most respectable chapels at Bath, I believe in All Saints'; where he was fashionably and numerously attended, and whence his pulpit fame ultimately introduced him to the metropolis. Mr. Jackman is also the alternate Morning Preacher at Berkeley Chapel, and promises, if report be correct, speedily to obtain other professional situations. It has been told me, that he was once designed for the Bar; and, unless recollection misleads me, I think he formerly attached himself to the cultivation of Literature, and was author of some publications which, however in their nature evanescent, reflected honour on his exertions without discrediting his abilities. He has since married, and has children.

If, as stated in my hearing, Mr. Jackman, when one of the candidates for the pulpit of the Philanthropic Society, was preferred before the Rev. Sidney Smith, the circumstance must be considered as complimentary to himself as it was creditable to the judgment of those by whom he was elected. Let him always recollect, however, what are understood to have been the grounds of this honourable preference. Let him never substitute morality for christianity. Never let the dread of being branded with hypocrisy, discourage him in the career of spirituality. While we supplicate its assistance, shall we, at the same instant, presume to dispute the operations of the Holy Ghost? Let us tremble profanely to deride what we affect religiously to desire. If the Lord be indeed God, then serve we him!

Mr. Jackman, as a preacher, is both intelligent and impressive; and it is because the value of these qualities strikes me in him, and also because he appears most laudably anxious to adorn the sacred profession in which he has engaged, that I am earnestly solicitous concerning his progress in the church. He has, indeed, evidently improved during the last four years. His preaching is highly respectable; and he is capable of making considerable advances towards perfection.

His person is interesting. His voice is good, yet susceptible of greater variety of intonation. His action is agreeable; and, when he is animatedly pathetic, is attractive and energetic. Sometimes, however, I have thought his manner of delivery too authoritative. He is accustomed often to address himself personally, or colloquially, to any of his audience,—a difficult attempt, in which, nevertheless, he generally acquits himself successfully. He knows the constitution of the human heart. Hence his descriptions readily excite attention, while his fervour communicates itself to his hearers.

There is a commendable negligence: I think Mr. Jackman would excel more, if he less laboured the attainment of excellence. He commences too high in voice; which not only weakens the effect of the subsequent parts of his sermon, but, towards the close of it, induces symptoms of exhaustion.

His language ought to be noticed. His words are select, without being pedantic; his sentences correctly constructed, and, with respect to length, judiciously intermixed; his stile is elegant without being affected, and elevated without being declamatory. He could satisfy the poor, without perplexing the peasant.

With so much to approve in him, I wish, while commending his sermons, as to their literary composition, that Mr. Jackman would abandon the phrase "By way of Exhortation," when he is proposing the arrangement of his subject. Preachers would gain in effect, I am persuaded, were they wholly to discontinue the practice of formally dividing their discourses under different heads, and announcing them to the congregations. If, however, they must retain this custom of distribution, let them keep the secret to themselves. It interrupts a good sermon, and renders a tedious sermon more tiresome. What is ably delivered from the pulpit, will always be retained in the closet; but it is painful, it is almost insufferable, to be roused, division after division, by the angry mouthing of some stupid pulpiteer, for the express purpose of hearing that he has merely gone through the first act of his miserable performance. Why do our Preachers persist in a practice that is discarded by every other description of Public Orators?

I would exhort the subject of my present paper, the Rev. ISAAC JACKMAN, to attend to the suggestions of his own understanding, and to consult the dictates of conscientious decision. He is qualified to reflect upon, and capable of estimating, the situation in which he is placed. Let him disdain the judgment of men. Humbled before the Creator, but bold before the creature, let him, as becomes his sacred office, and "knowing whose authority he beareth," let him "live, and move and have his being" and in and for the destination to which he is ordained! Providence has vouchsafed to him talents; let him, therefore, add to talents knowledge, to knowledge zeal, to zeal exertion; always mindful, that he is a subject of the "kingdom which is not of this world!" He is more---he is an ambassador of that kingdom.

If the Philanthropic Charity is commendable, so also is the Philanthropic Chapel. There is decency throughout the service of this sanctuary. It is not here that, in the satiric sarcasm of Pope, Light quirks of Music, broken and uneven,

Make the soul dance upon a jig to Heaven!

Here, indeed, the decorum of devotion is consulted. Those who are expected to join the Hallelujahs of Heaven, are here invited to augment the Chorus of Christianity.

The Committee of the Philanthropic has erected a noble chapel, a magnificent building; but there are things which seem to remain unaccomplished. Why is the Altar left, as it were, in its present destitute dilemma? Why is there suffered to exist a paltry pew, a sort of monstrous menagerie; anabaptist-like, immediately under the pulpit, hooving the clergy and disfiguring the chapel? These objections should be observed, these remissnesses remembered.

Chope, also, that the Gentlemen of this Institution will do away the invidious distinction of 'Free seats.' Without omitting the privilege of gratuitous admission, let them obliterate the superscription of poverty. I trust they will believe me when I assure them that letters of remonstrance have been forwarded to me on the subject to which I now allude. This intimation, as to Free Seats, is to be seen, I know, at Orange-street Chapel; but it behoves the members of the Church of England to surpass the liberality of Sectarists. Let the Philanthropic Society be the first to establish, in this instance, an example of genuine religious philanthropy.

HAMPSHIRE MEETING.

Nov. 23.—A County Meeting was this day held at the Castle of the City of Winchester, in pursuance of a requisition to the High Sheriff of the County, signed by several respectable Gentlemen, to consider of a proper person to be nominated to succeed the much lamented Sir Henry Paulet St. John Mildmay, Bart. one of the Members for this County.

The Meeting was very numerously and respectably attended. The Candidates were the Hon. William Herbert, one of the late Members in the short Parliament, and T. F. Heathcote, Esq. eldest son of Sir W. Heathcote, Bart. one of the old Members for the County in former Parliaments.

The Hon. Mr. Herbert was proposed by Sir T. Miller, Bart. seconded by Sir C. Mill, Bart.—Mr. Heathcote was proposed by Sir J. Pollen, Bart. seconded by Sir N. Holland, Bart.

After the necessary forms were gone through, the late Candidates, and Messrs. Portall, Brown, and Barham, addressed the Meeting. Mr. Cobbett then addressed the Freeholders, and after stating his disapprobation of the hasty and indecent manner in which the county had been called together, the late Member being scarcely buried, called the attention of the Meeting to the various places and pensions held by several Members of the House of Commons, the whole of which he distinctly enumerated, and, in particular, the great patronage given to the Right Hononourable George Rose, whom he was pleased to call the Dictator of the county of Hants, and who, as Mr. Cobbett stated, had by himself and family already received three hundred thousand pounds of the public money; and requested the Meeting not to give their votes to either of the Candidates, unles they had a distinct pledge from such Candidate, to oppose the growing evil of pensions and places, and to maintain to their utmost that most valuable of all privileges of the Constitution, viz. the right of the subject to petition the Throne. Mr. Cobbett declared he would never give his vote to any man who held a place, or who would not distinctly promise not to do so; and after most severely censuring the conduct of his Majesty's present Ministers, in the Answer given to the Address and Petition of the City of London, on the late Convention, he concluded with an address to the audience on the valuable privileges they were now about to exercise.

After which, the Sheriff desired the friends of each Candidate to hold up their hats, which was done. The Sheriff declared Mr. Heathcote to have a majority, and the Meeting was then dissolved. The day of election is not fixed.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

An Inquest was taken yesterday before Mr. Skelton, Coroner for the city of London, at the house of Mr. Newman, keeper of Newgate, on the body of Richard Neighbour, a capital convict, for a detestable offence, who poisoned himself on Thursday evening, in Newgate. The following is the substance of the evidence adduced before the Coroner. At about eleven o'clock on Thursday night, an alarm was given from the prisoner's cell by another convict of the name of Badcock, who had been put in with Neighbour to keep up his spirits, and on Clark and Suter, two of Mr. Newman's men, repairing thither they found the deceased violently afflicted with vomiting and purging. Mr. Box, a surgeon, residing in Ludgate-street, attended, and he quickly ascertained, by appearances on an earthen utensil into which the afflicted man had vomitted, that he had taken a quantity of arsenic. Mr. Box stated that on his arrival before twelve o'clock, the vomiting had ceased, although the deceased attempted in vain to do so. The Surgeon administered an emetic, with plenty of warm water, and more of the white powder (arsenic) was thrown up off the sick man's stomach. Mr. Box frequently asked the deceased what he had taken, and how he procured the poison, but he declined answering such questions. He was in a very weak state on the arrival of the Surgeon, and on the latter putting his hand on the heart of the deceased, he requested to be left alone, and seemed altogether desirous that he might be left undisturbed. On examining the body the next day, the Surgeon discovered that the stomach and the intestines of the deceased were very much inflamed, and from the quantity of arsenic which he had taken, part of his stomach was eaten away. Mr. Box had analyzed the powders, which the prisoner had vomited from off his stomach, and he was positive it was the arsenic which caused death. It appeared by the testimony of other persons, that after the prisoner had been locked into his cell at four o'clock, a pint of warm beer, with some gin in it, had been given into him by his desire, into which he had put the arsenic, part of the powders having been found in the bottom of the pot. Three men of the names of Thwaites, who resides in a court in Holborn, Hall and Kemp, and three women, who had visited the deceased on Thursday, were examined, but it was not ascertained by what means the arsenic was procured. It was proved that persons going into Newgate were diligently searched, but a small paper of powders might be conveyed to a prisoner so as to baffle all diligence. The deceased had been informed on Wednesday evening, at seven o'clock, that he was left for execution on the next Wednesday, when his fortitude failed him, and Badcock was put into his cell with him to cheer his spirits. He afterwards laboured under great depression of spirits, as was proved by his friends, but he enjoyed his perfect faculties, until he died at three o'clock on Friday morning. He asked of Jebb, one of the keepers who was left with him after Surgeon Box had departed, to place his head higher, and for some cold water, a pint of which he drank, and immediately expired.—Verdict Self-Murder.

The deceased will be buried in the cross-road at the corner of the Old Bailey, on to-morrow.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FORTY-EIGHT.

OUR ARMY AND MILITARY ARRANGEMENTS.

(Concluded from our last.)

Nothing can be more dangerous and criminal than attempting to commend; or palliate the defects of political establishments. There is, perhaps, no kind of flattery more pernicious; or execrable than this; because the prejudices, presumption, and obstinacy of communities, in proportion as they are more comprehensive, may be said to be, in almost the same degree, more inveterate than those of individuals. Where conviction is so difficult, and frequently painful, even offensive; where, consequently, reformation has so many impediments and prejudices to encounter, that even well intentioned, and ardent individuals, shrink from the duty, and almost despair of its practicability;

If this be adopted as a general maxim of political, as well as moral philosophy, equally referring to every age and country, it is peculiarly applicable to the present time, when only the full exercise of public virtues, the undivided and well-applied energy of sound institutions, are adequate to bear up the state against the storms that assail it.

In adverting, however, to the defects on vices of social and political institutions, or proposing remedies for their eradication, it is necessary to proceed with the caution and delicacy, shewn by physicians in the treatment of capricious and obstinate patients, labouring under habitual diseases; besides the whims of the sufferer, he has all the prejudices, scruples, and impertinence of supposed friends to encounter. Besides these difficulties, the political writer is constantly exposed to the misrepresentations of malignity, and the insinuations of selfishness; he is, therefore, obliged to devote a considerable portion of the time he would employ in the investigation of his subject, in endeavouring to acquire the confidence of his readers, in order to ensure a favourable reception to the truths he wishes to disseminate. Quitting our digression, which will appear, perhaps, displaced and unnecessary, we will resume the subject of last week's disquisition.

In no social establishment has the influence of genius been more immediately or directly felt, than in the military. From its extraordinary effects on the operations of armies, we were almost tempted to say, that perseverance, courage, bodily vigour, and patience under privations and fatigues, were almost nothing; we maintain, however, that these great attributes of the soldier, never produce any considerable result, unless they are enlivened and directed by genius. The justice of this observation will be instantly acknowledged, on recurring to the events of every war, both ancient and modern. The Greeks were invariably successful against their neighbours, because their institutions favoured the growth of talents; and that state had always the ascendancy among them, in which circumstances favoured that culture, or accident produced it spontaneously. As long as Athens retained, in any kind of vigour, the institutions of Solon, which were so favourable to the propagation of superior abilities, she maintained a decided preponderance over her rivals; but as soon as that period ceased; which lasted from the beginning of the first Median till towards the conclusion of the Peloponesian war, she sunk into insignificance and debility. From the epoch of the capture of that city by Lysander, Sparta exercised the most inconceivable influence recorded in the annals of nations. That small community, consisting of about 30,000 active citizens, though the laws of Lycurgus had lost considerably of their purity and effect, exercised the most unlimited controul over the Islands and the Continent; confirmed and displaced Kings on the Egyptian Throne, and meditated the subversion of the mighty Empire of Persia. During this interval of her greatness, her Councils were guided, and her Armies conducted, by Agesilaus;---one of those wonderful men, who, in whatever country they appear, are sure of raising it to distinction and superiority. However before the close of his splendid career, the apparition of a still more extraordinary mortal, in a state not remarkable for such appearances, destroyed in an instant the preponderance of Sparta; and the magic effects of her institutions, the fame of her virtues and exploits, the martial spirit of her citizens, and the distinguished abilities of their leader, were unable to resist the sublime ascendancy of Epaminondas. Thebes figured for some years after the death of her Hero, till Philip of Macedon and his son raised a new empire on the ruins of Greece and Asia. This observation is so general and true, that we do not find a single exception to it in the pages of history: even the military virtues of Rome could oppose no impediment to Hannibal, till she produced a citizen of equally superior abilities. After the decline of the Roman empire, down to our own time, the remark holds true; and it is only necessary to name Charlemagne, our Edwards and Henry, not to forget the Duke of Marlborough, Gustavus Adolphus, and Charles XII. Turenne, Peter of Russia, Frederick II. and lastly Bonaparte, to be convinced that the genius of a single individual is sufficient to raise even petty communities to greatness; and that the most powerful and opulent states, with armies remarkable for their discipline and courage, can effect nothing, unless their institutions, civil and military, offer encouragement and facility to the growth of intellectual superiority.

We may lay it down, therefore, as an axiom, that the resources of the most extensive and populous empires, together with numerous and formidable armies, are insufficient, in moments of extraordinary emergency, for their preservation, unless genius presides over the war department, and the direction of the military force be entrusted to officers of tried experience and abilities. Whilst we consider the above remark as an incontrovertible truth; we think, at the same time, no idea more erroneous, or illusory than the hacknied one, that a certain soil, or a certain climate, is more peculiarly adapted for the cultivation of talents than others. General maxims of this kind, as favourable to sloth and egotism, are, therefore, willingly believed and industriously propagated; but a little reflection would convince even a superficial observer, that it is not soil, nor climate, but good institutions. which give rise and encouragement to talents. After wishing to expose the sophistry, and detect the shameful source of the foregoing opinion, we are strongly inclined to believe that Providence has conferred on every age and generation an equal portion of abilities, and that incitement and opportunity are only wanting to call them into action. If this last observation be just, of which we entertain very little doubt, every government must impute, solely and exclusively, to its own incapacity, negligence, want of virtue and discrimination, any disasters which may occur from the inefficacy of the military force, or the misemployment of the national resources. This is a most important observation, and deserves to be carefully weighed and invariably attended to.

No political institutions, perhaps, ever existed, which offered a greater incitement to national emulation, or the display of individual exertions; and no country a greater proportion of active, intellectual power, perseverance, and enterprise, than our own. It would, therefore, betray a most unpardonable remissness and apathy, on our part, and be a sure symptom of the declension and irretrievable state of our affairs, if we thought further improvement impracticable, and progression impossible. There is not a branch of our internal economy that is not susceptible of amelioration; and if we have courage and virtue enough to set our hands to the work of reform, we may be certain of rising far beyond our present level. The consideration, that States have either a progressive or retrograde movement, and that repose is as unnatural in the political, as the physical, world, should encourage us to commence, without delay, the important operation.

The most striking defects in our military establishment, are the inefficacy, or incompetency of what may be called the Ministerial Department of the Army; the sale of commissions (a most revolting and pernicious abuse) the want of a sufficient number of military academies for the education of cadets, and, of a military order of knighthood, open to the private as well as the officer: lastly, the want of a sufficient provision for the families of such, as die a distinguished death in the service of their country.

That part, which calls most immediately and imperiously for reform, is, beyond all doubt, the ministerial department; for were it to take place there, a change would be soon effected in every other. Whilst that is defective, we may look in vain for the re-appearance of a Marlborough, an Argyle, a Peterborough, and a Wolfe; nor expect the return of such days, when, in the same campaign, our legions were victorious on the Banks of the Ebro, the Scheld, and the Danube. Here the reformation must first begin; and when that department is entrusted to a committee of officers of professional skill and experience, under the direction of a man of tried abilities, activity, and integrity, our army will recover its ancient splendour and superiority; and the Scheld and the Seine become again the theatre of its achievements. We shall then no more blush at the ignorance of our commanders; nor see our brave soldiers fly ignominiously from the scene of action; nor our generals sign dishonourable Conventions; nor a Whitelocke entrusted with an important service; nor behold a renewal of the disgraceful [illegible] at Ferrol, Dunkirk, and the Helder; nor [illegible] Harry Burrard, nor a Sir Hew Dalrymple be [illegible] an officer of distinguished merit, and render useless one of the most splendid victories in our military annals. When we reflect on our ancient reputation; when we consider that our army is incomparably the bravest upon earth; when we are convinced there is no greater deficiency in this country than in any other of those rare attributes which constitute the distinguished commander, we shall not certainly be accused of unwarrantable motives, in recommending measures, which might prevent the recurrence of the events of the last fifteen years.

The next change we would most ardently desire is in the nomination of Officers. The present mode of selling and purchasing commissions, frequently excludes humble merit and virtue from this honourable career, and may open it to the worthless and profligate. The Commaeder in Chief, who has, it is said, struck at the root of several abuses, could he contribute to effect a salutary innovation in this respect, would render a service to his country, which would infallibly secure him the gratitude and applause of the good and enlightened. This reformation, and the introduction of a simpler and less costly uniform, would open a wider field to emulation and genius; and our army become once more, as it has formerly been, the admiration and umpire of Europe. The foundation of new military academies, in which the sons of officers, who had been killed in fighting the battles of their country, might find a secure asylum and education, would serve as a nursery of heroes, and afford the soldier of fortune the pleasing conviction, that his sons would be secured against the pressure of poverty, should he have the fortune to fall in performing the duties of his profession. Were these advantages combined with the establishment of a military order, equally open to the private soldier as the General, under the name of the Military Order of St. George, we might then see an enthusiasm kindle in our armies, and a splendid period open in our annals, which would not only secure us against the alarming perils of the present moment and leave a bright and solid inheritance to the future generation, but place our beloved country above the region of storms, and at the summit of earthly grandeur. It is peculiarly adapted for the exercise of great virtues and the performance of splendid exploits; it would therefore be unpardonable degeneracy and pusillanimity in her sons, were they, in consequence of some difficulties and sacrifices, to renounce what policy and honour equally recommend.

We will make in our next Number some observations on the Edinburgh Review, and hope to prove the fallacy of its speculations on the issue of the Spanish contest.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SPANISH PAPERS.

The following is the official account of the operations of General Blake's army, as communicated by himself to the Supreme Junta:

SUPPLEMENT TO THE MADRID GAZETTE OF THE 15TH NOVEMBER.

ARANJUEZ, NOV. 14.—The Lieutenant-General Don Joaquim Blake has addressed the following dispatches, dated the 7th and 8th instant, to the Secretary of State for the War Department:—

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR,

"In order to effect the concentration of my Forces, important on all occasions, and particularly so under the circumstances of my being attacked by a force so decisively superior and to approximate the only road by which I could receive the requisite supplies—I, on the 3d, resolved to rally my division, including that of the North, which is just arrived near the village of Wayn. In effect, they were all united except the 2d division of Gallicia, and a part of the troops of Affaria, forming a corps under the commmand of his Excellency Don Vicente Acevedo, which was attacked on the 3d by the enemy with superior forces, between Llanteno and Menagarai; and though they were vigorously opposed, took a position between the said corps of Senor Acevedo and the army (in hopes of their receiving reinforcements according to information and appearance), to prevent the junction of that division with my army. This information I obtained early on the morning of the 4th, which placed me under the necessity of making an attack on the enemy to frustrate his design, and therefore directed the 3d division under the command of Brig.-General Don Francisco Riquelme, united to one of the Asturias, commanded by the Camp Marshal Don Gregorio Quiros, to meet the enemy, who were intercepting the pass to the corps of Acevedo, and to attack him; the fourth division and the van-guard I ordered to march to Valmaseda, for the purpose of fighting such detached forces as they should meet; whilst the first and the reserve were to remain with me at Cordejuela, to cut off the communication between the various French divisions; and finally, that of the north, and a general reserve were to remain stationed in the Beron.

"At the very moment my troops began their march, I received advice, that the corps under Senor Acevedo had succeeded in changing its position, taking one tolerible eligible between Gordejuela, Valmaseda, and Orvantia, though much overawed by a numerous host occupied in observing his motions. This change of position on the part of Senor Acevedo induced me to make some alteration in my own; and in effect, the troops under the Commanders Quiros and Riquelme received orders to attack that part of the enemy which appeared, and was by peasants reported to be at Arciniego, whilst the main body must have been at Orrantia, where I proposed to dislodge them with the first division, the van-guard, and the reserve; whilst the fourth, which provisionally is under the command of Brig.-General, Don Estevan Porlier, the Marquis del Portazgo being indisposed, was to follow its original destination to Valmaseda, with instructions, however, not to risk an attack, if they should be over-marched by force.

"I know not what motive to attribute to the resolution which the French took of removing their corps from Acevedo; but certainly in Orrantia and Arciniego we found only advice, that the French had effected their retreat from that place during the night, by which means the several divisions which it was our intention to liberate, were safely re-united with us: the fourth has been still more fortunate than the rest: for, arriving near Valmaseda, where the enemy was 7000 men strong, under the command of the General of Division, Villat, they attacked him with great vigour, dislodged him from the place, and pursued him to the distance of a league, where he stopped, the night having come on. Their flight was made in the greatest disorder, and they sustained a considerable loss in killed and wounded; we also took forty prisoners from them, among whom an officer. They also left in our possession a four pounder, two waggons with ammunition in a state of service; five cars with provision and equipage belonging to their General Officers, together with the papers belonging to them, and a vast quantity of other spoils. This brilliant action was chiefly due to the celerity and ardent zeal displayed by some Asturian corps, and by the second division of Gallicia, who poured down on Valmaseda the moment they saw the risk into which the fourth division had fallen, by which means they have acquired an indisputable claim to the public esteem of their countrymen, which, however, is no less due to all our inimitable warriors, who have ever since the 23d, endured with fortitude, privations of every description, and the intemperature of severe weather without great coats, in great part without clothes, and absolutely barefoot, and what is more, without having a morsel to eat for whole days, lending their services with ardour to extreme fatigue, and all along without one murmur of complaint or disgust.—All I can perceive in them is an unabated desire of washing the enemy's guilt in his blood at the hazard of their own lives.

"I recommend them all to the consideration of your Excellency, for the information of his Majesty:—Which may God preserve your Excellency.

Valmaseda the 7th Nov. 1808.

To his Excellency the Secretary of the War department.

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR,

"Without having any positive advice of the strength and situation of the enemy, and being under the indispensible necessity of procuring it, for the direction of my own operations, I yesterday marched with the first and second division forward to Guenes, and gave orders to the vanguard to advance over Gordejuela, towards Sodupe. The corps which I led on soon fell in with a division of four French regiments, 8000 strong, and a fire was opened on both sides, which lasted the whole day, without any advantage resulting from it to either side. At dusk the enemy fell somewhat back, and we suspended the movements from the right to the left, by which we had been preparing a fresh attack in a new direction.

"We should have begun it this morning, with strong hopes of a successful issue, if the excessive rigour of the preceding night and the endurance of hunger and incredible fatigue of the troops, had not obliged me to afford them some relief; in consequence of which I moved them to the present general quarters, a short time before day break.

"The enemy's strength we have learned from the declarations of some prisoners, as also that the action had been directed by Marshal Lefebvre. I know that the van-guard was attacked by 5000 men; and that after having with their usual gallantry, received them, the night put an end to the action.

"All this I communicate to you for the information of his Majesty, begging that you will recommend the gallantry, firmnes, patience, under fatigue, privations and singular enthusiasm manifested for the good of the country by the Generals, Chiefs, Officers, and troops.

"I must not omit, that among the wounded is Capt. Birch, in the service of his Britannic Majesty, an Officer of equal skill and zeal, who would not quit the field until he was obliged to follow the troops. The Lieutenant Colonel Carrol, who has been in our army these three months, was also determined to assist in all our actions, in which he signalized his intrepidity by example. May God preserve your Excellency—Quarters-General of Valmaseda, the 8th of November, 1808.

(Signed) JOAQUIM BLAKE.

To his Excellency the Secretary of the War Department.

CORUNNA, Nov. 26.—By letters received in the course of yesterday, we learn, that with commendable activity and address, the Lieutenant-Colonel Don Enrique Ganseco has preserved the artillery of the army of Estremadura; and in like manner that the Lieutenant-Colonel Don Miguel Valledor has conducted to Leon the artillery and ammunition from Reposa. Considering the activity and address necessary to these particular services, we cannot but highly praise these worthy Officers, and in general all those of the royal corps of artillery, who conduct themselves so gallantly, without meaning by this eulogium to deprive the other officers and soldiers of the army of the praise so justly due to them.

The retreat of our army to Leon has deranged all the plans of the enemy, who, the moment they shall know of our junction with the English army, and the reinforcements we shall send with the utmost dispatch, must abandon all the country he occupies, unless he would be cut off, and obliged to surrender. This point of re-union was the only one we ought to have chosen in case the enemy penetrate by Burgos, as we have not cavalry to enable us to engage in the plains. But when the two armies have joined, we shall have cavalry, and that very respectable. The organization and re-union will be effected without loss of time, and clearing the plains we will march immediately to dislodge them from all the country they occupy, from that to Biduena. Let us then have courage and constancy, and make every exertion that the reinforcements may not be delayed an instant. Corunna Diary, Nov. 26.

ARANJUEZ, Nov. 17.—A Spanish Cabinet Courier has just arrived here with the important news that D. Francisco Palafox, having learned that Castanos had prevented the army under his command from molesting the enemy, while they withdrew their troops to engage Blake, which they accordingly effected with success, has taken the command of the troops from Castanos, and passing the Ebro at three points, has forced the enemy's line, compelling them to several actions, that were disputed with much bloodshed, but in which the enemy were routed. The army of the centre will now form a junction with that of Blake, by which means the enemy's division that advanced to Burgos may be entirely cut off, besides a considerable number who had not reached that city. It appears that the son of Catslar is in Segovia, and that Blake is in Valmaseda. It is understood that this information is official, and that the President has ordered all intelligence, whether of a favourable or adverse nature, to be communicated to the public. Guesta gave orders this afternoon, that his travelling carriage should be in readiness, which I have already seen pass this way. It is also stated that he has been honourably acquitted respecting the dispute he had with Valdes and his nephews in the Council of war, and that he is soon to take the command of the Army of Estramadura.

P. S. MADRID, NOV. 19.—By letters from Navarre, written by some Officers, we learn, that our troops attacked the enemy on the 13th, took possesion of Caparroso and its heights, passed the Ebro at three points, on all of which the enemy has been defeated with considerable loss. When the Courier who has brought this intelligence left the army, the action continued on every point with the greatest vigour.

LETTER FROM AN ENGLISH OFFICER.

"General Blake was attacked by the French under General Lefebvre, near Durango, on the 31st ult. and after a very obstinate action of nine hours, was obliged to retreat, which he did in good order, through Bilboa and Valmaseda to Lava, where he was on the 4th instant. On the 5th, he made an attack on the French, and drove them, with considerable loss, from Valmaseda and Oransia, in order to effect the junction of the Asturian division, which was not engaged in the former action, (having been posted near Crolana,) and who had since been separated from the army. Having thus got together the whole of his force, he moved once more towards Bilboa, and attacked the enemy near Suenes, on the 7th. He made a good disposition of his troops, and had turned the enemy's left wing, but his centre giving way, he was obliged to retreat, in spite of his advantage, to Valmaseda. His rear-guard was engaged on the 6th. On the 10th, he was at Espinosa de Monteros, where he was attacked by the French; the action of doubtful success, or rather in favour of the Spaniards, continuing from one p. m. till night. Next morning the French renewed the attack, and as the Asturians, who principally composed the left wing, gave way, by which means the enemy got possession of heights that commanded the road, by which the army was to retreat, great confusion took place, and many of the troops dispersed. The Asturians, who are all peasants, officers as well as men, fought very well in the former engagements of the 5th, 7th, and 10th, but many officers being gone off, and of them three Generals, one (Guecios) being killed, and two wounded, their giving way this day is not to be wondered at.—General Blake was at Reinosa on the 10th. General Blake's intention was to retreat by Aguilar del Campo and Leon, upon the British army, but to remain in the mean time at Reinosa as long as the enemy left him unmolested. But on the 13th he received intelligence that the French were advancing to attack him, also that they had pushed a corps from Burgos to Aguilar Del Campo—so that he was obliged to retreat into the valley of Cabaerreiqua, in the province of Santander. He left Reinosa on the evening of the 13th, at sun-set, and next morning was at Gojo.

"Blake retreated from Reinosa, with little more than 7 or 8000 men; but on the night of the 11th, a division of his army was on the other side of the harbour opposite to Santander; many fugitives had entered that city. The provincial militia of Santander are reckoned 5000 men. The dismounted cavalry of the Marquis Romana are 2000, these may be armed as infantry, so that some sanguine persons suppose that the Marquis, who is at that place, may assemble 20,000 men. They also calculate, that, as the Asturians have a reserve in their own country, and many of the fugitives of the army that took the field went home, if the remains of the army of the left retreat into Asturias, they may possibly assemble 35,000 men. The peasants of the army, who dispersed, having all arrived with their arms and ammunition, it is inferred, that they will cheerfully come forward again. Between Reinosa and Astorgas, on the 14th, 15th, and 16th, there were French posts in several places. At Aguilar del Campo, on the 13th, they took the baggage and some guns of Blake's army. A Spanish park of artillery left Saldahna on the 16th, to retreat to Leon by way of Sahagun, at which place, on the same day, an alarm was given that the roads and avenues were occupied by patroles of French cavalry, so that it is probable the park of artillery was taken.

"General Crauford was on the 16th at Astorgas, and Sir David Baird at Villa Franca on the 17th. The first of nine divisions of cavalry was to be at a day's journey before Lugo, on the 21st, and the last was to leave Coruna on that and the following day. Lord Paget took the post from Lugo for himself and Aid-de-Camp on the 21st, to join Sir David Baird.

"Captain Jones, of the Engineers was in the action of the 31st. Captain Shiel, of the same corps, was in that of the 9th, and wounded in the thigh whilst encouraging the Spaniards to move forward."

Albuquerque, Spain, Nov. 1.

I wrote you on our leaving Lisbon for Spain, to which I refer you for the particulars of our strength, route, &c. I have at present very little left to say, only that we are arrived at this place, being the first town in Spain. We are certainly marching for Burgos, by Alcantara, Cindad de Rodrigo, Salamanca, and Valladolid. We are the advanced corps under Major-General Paget: our march is in the following order, 95th, 5/4, 20th, 2d Light Battalions, King's German Legion, and 1st Light Battalion King's German Legion. We march by battalions, each following the other, at a day's distance successively. The rest of the army, that go with us, are as follows:

UNDER LIEUTENANT-GENERAL FRASER.

The 18th Light Dragoons 3d Ditto King's German Legion	Brigadier-General Hon. E. Stuart.
The 4th 28th 42d	Major-General Lord W. Bentinck.
The 60th (5th Battalion, five Companies), 9th 43d (2d Battalion) 52d (2d Ditto)	Major-General Beresford.

UNDER LIEUTENANT-GENERAL THE HON. J. HOPE.

The 36th 71st 92d 60th (5th Bat. five Companies)	Brigadier-General Crauford.
The 2d 6th	Brigadier-General Auckland.
The 5th 32d 91st	Major-General Hill.
The 50th 79th 95th (2d Bat. four Companies)	Brigadier-General Fane.

UNDER MAJOR-GENERAL PAGET.

The 20th 52d 95th (5th Bat. five Companies)	Brigadier-General Anstruther.
The 1st Light Battalion K. G. L. 2d Ditto	Colonel Alten.

FROM THE LISBON MAIL.

LISBON, Nov. 15.—On the 13th of this month, the Merchants of this town having met by appointment at the Palace of Government, the Secretary of State, charged with the General inspection and direction of the Royal Treasury, pronounced a Speech, which seemed perfectly to meet the ideas and patriotic sentiments of the Gentlemen present. He exposed to them the present exhausted state of the Public Finances, and shewed the necessity of the public wants being speedily supplied by extraordinary means, and by voluntary contributions of the merchants of the kingdom, who, from their known patriotism and loyalty, would undoubtedly feel inclined to assist the public cause with such donations as their respective means would allow them to devote to that important purpose. He lastly declared to be expressly authorised by the Prince Regent, to assure the merchants of Lisbon that every six months correct lists should be published of the contributions received, and faithful accounts of the manner in which they had been expended for the maintenance of the Royal Army.

The Intendant-General of Police of Lisbon has lately issued a Decree, dated the 10th inst. by which he ordains all Portuguese subjects who shall have been found guilty of having endeavoured to seduce British subjects from their duty and allegiance to their Sovereign, and offered them opportunities to desert, shall be punished according to the utmost rigour of the law.

fell in with the Minerva frigate, Capt. HAWKINS, who informed her that the Marquis DE LA ROMANA gained a decisive victory over the enemy, near St. Vincent de la Barquera. The enemy, it is said, entered that place on the 19th ult. and, on the 24th, made a violent attack on the Spaniards, who were strongly posted in the vicinity of St. Vincent de la Barquera. No particulars respecting the engagement are given; but the result is supposed favorable to the Patriots. The Marquis DE LA ROMANA was left in pursuit of the retreating enemy; and we wait for, with an impatience we seldom felt, the confirmation of this cheering intelligence. Prior accounts, though of a very late date, mention, it is true, that a part of that army fell back upon Leon, with the intention, as was supposed, of effecting a junction with the British army. But these accounts are neither of that circumstantial, nor precise nature, as to induce us to discredit the reported success of the 24th. We are happy likewise to observe, that the sentiments of the Spanish people, relative to their affairs, completely harmonize with those we have invariably evinced; and so far from being dejected or intimidated at the advantages the enemy have already obtained, they speak with confidence of their ultimate success, and in a tone of enthusiasm perfectly coinciding with their spirited declarations when first they took up arms against their invaders.—Their late disasters seem to have no other effect, than to convert their former exasperation into the most deadly hatred of the enemy. We hear of the surrender of no large corps; on the contrary, the Regiment of Catalonia, amounting to seventeen hundred men, and which formed a part of the Army of the North, preferred to be cut to pieces to a man, sooner than accept quarter which the enemy offered them. The death of General RIQUELME, who had the rank of Admiral in the Spanish navy, is one of the finest traits of heroism and of generous devotion to his country, we ever remember to have read. Having been wounded in his leg, he refused to dismount or retire, but rode along the line, and made his men promise to die like him in defence of their country. This exhortation, at such a moment, and under such circumstances must have produced a wonderful sensation in those who heard him; and after such proofs of greatness of soul in the leaders and men, we see no reason for despondiug of their success.

Letters received from Madrid also speak of Gen. CASTANOS having obtained considerable advantages over the enemy. He is said to have crossed the Ebro at three several points, and to have dislodged the enemy from all their positions on that river. This advantage is likewise alluded to in the last accounts from Coruna. The Gazette of Madrid contains two important documents, addressed by the Supreme Governing Junta to all the Councils, and the other to the Spanish Nation. After detailing, in the first, the perfidy of the French, the abasement of the Monarchy for so many years, the Decree concludes with the following animated declaration:—"The Junta have taken the oath, in the most solemn manner, not to listen to, or accept any proposal for peace, unless their beloved Sovereign, FERDINAND VIIth, be restored to his throne; and unless the absolute integrity of Spain and her Americas be stipulated as an indispensable condition, without the dismemberment of any the smallest portion of her territory."

There was something so vague in the accounts of last week, and in such direct opposition with the proofs we had of BLAKE's prudence, discretion, and professional skill, that we had no difficulty in refusing our assent, even unconditionally, to the report of the total dispersion of his army. In doing so, we acted neither indiscreetly, nor presumptuously, but formed our judgment from the uncontested proofs we had of the subordination, bravery, and discipline, that prevailed in BLAKE's army, and the confidence we were justified to repose in the abilities of the leader. Had the army and their General not been previously tried; had not their former conduct excited the greatest admiration, our endeavours to discountenance the rumours of last week, though they might raise a favourable opinion of our affections, would not convey a very flattering idea of our understanding. But the enemy appear to have monopolized all the attributes of the soldier; and our politicians in this country, who affect to see beyond the vulgar, are too consistent, too independent, to renounce, in favour of popular prejudices, or from the delusive suggestion, that success ought to attend a good cause, their opinion of French superiority. It is so tickling to intellectual self-love, and the consciousness of superior penetration, as well as the infallibility of learned and political dogmatism, to expose the folly and weakness of expecting that the legions of France, conducted by the Hero, who so often led them to victory on the Po, the Danube, the Seal, the Vistula and the Niemen, should now yield, in compliance with the wishes, for sooth! of some enthusiasts in this country, to the impetuosity, and irregular attacks of Spanish peasants. There is something so incongruous, so drivelling, so national, in such quixotic speculations, that we are by no means astonished, that such writers, as direct the public opinion, through the medium of the Edinburgh Review, should, with the lash of magisterial and hypercritical authority, chastize these political visionaries. The sentiments of these Gentlemen are too enlarged, too cosmopolitical, to reject a theory supported on facts and political combinations, for the crude, unlogical speculations, and the national notions of those writers, who chatter, instead of reasoning, on the probability of Spanish success. Our time is not favourable, however, to the establishment of political axioms; and a chain of reasoning, the most ingenious, spun with all the accuracy of schoolmen, and rounded with the fastidious nicety of criticism, has only shewn the fallibility of reason, and the nullity of human wit; for the occurrences of this week have proved, that though the premises may have been right, their conclusions were absolutely erroneous. This is our consolation and defence, in daring to differ from these masters of the political school: and as the combinations of genius and science have been found so illusory, we are inclined, on this occasion, to trust to our feelings, and something like presentiment, which incessantly flatter us, that the cause of freedom and justice will ultimately triumph over usurpation and villainy. We may be mistaken; but for all the intellectual superiority and preponderating genius of these gentlemen, we would not abandon the fascinating illusion.—We, therefore, confidently trust, that a cause so dear to us, so connected with our own, and that of the universe, will still triumph over French intrigue and the dogmatism of political pedantry.

We received yesterday Hamburgh and Altona Papers to the 19th ult. Their contents are not interesting; we have made the following extracts:

CONSTANTINOPLE, OCT. 15.—AN English Minister, Adair, arrived at the Archipelago, and endeavoured to obtain leave of the Commandant of the Castles of the Lower Dardanelles to proceed to Constantinople, but by the order of the Grand Vizier, the said Commandant gave a negative answer to the English. The armistice with Russia still continues, and will, to all appearance, continue till next spring, when political affairs will most probably take a decided turn—(Correspondent).

VIENNA, NOV. 2.—By a Courier who arrived here two days ago from Constantinople, we learned that Mr. Adair arrived in the Dardanelles, and immediately proposed negociations between England and the Sublime Porte. It has been observed a long time past, that the English ships cruizing in the Archipelago, suffer the Turkish ships to pass unmolested, and have not annoyed the trade. The Turkish troops have approached the Danube from several parts, but the rumour of hostilities between the Porte and Russia having actually commenced, is unfounded.

We have seen a private letter received by a Gentleman of the first respectability in the city, dated Vienna, Nov. 4. This letter contradicts directly the statement in the Hamburgh Correspondenten, "that Mr. ADAIR was not permitted to proceed to Constantinople." It mentions on the contrary, that that active and intelligent Diplomatist, had opened a very successful negociation with the Ottoman Government; that there was no doubt of his succeeding in the object of his mission; and the strongest hopes were entertained of his being allowed to reside at the Sublime Porte in the capacity of Britannic Minister. This letter also states, that it was rumoured in the first circles in Vienna, that orders had been transmitted to Count METTERNICH, Imperial Ambassador at Paris, to quit that capital; and in order to avoid éclat, he was to assign private business as the pretext for his departure. This account is rendered very probable by an article from Frankfort, in the German Papers received yesterday morning, which state the arrival of that Minister from Paris, on his way to Vienna. The writer, at the same time, mentions the military preparations of Austria as truly formidable; and that the highest indignation was felt by every class of the inhabitants against BONAPARTE, for his treacherous conduct towards the Royal Family of Spain. There is no doubt, continues the writer, that war is inevitable between France and Austria; and the universal sentiment is, that hostilities will commence before the middle of December. Every means are employed on the part of Government to acquire the confidence, and excite the enthusiasm of the different provinces; and in its addresses a liberality is breathed, which did not appear in the official communications of that Court since the days of JOSEPH, &c." This is a good beginning towards the regeneration the Archduke CHARLES speaks of in his letter to his cousin, in adverting to the zeal and patriotiof thesm new levies.—Let the Austrian Cabinet only persevere in this enlightened course, and it will have little to apprehend from the menaces and overbearaing arrogance of France. There is not a more loyal people breathing than the subjects of that Monarchy. The Archduke CHARLES, and the more enlightened and patriotic statesmen invariably recommended a departure from that monkish system of policy which had been adopted by the Government, immediately after the first rupture with France; and that patriotic Prince was a zealous advocate for more liberal principles of government. The disasters of the monarchy, as well as the ascendancy of his genius and integrity, have, fortunately for that country, rendered his opinion and interference more effectual; and the ardent wishes of the German Patriots are now gratified in the commanding influence he exercises over the resolutions of that Cabinet. His exertions in re-organizing the army, after the disastrous campaign of 1805, have been indefatigable; and, if we consider the disorder of the finances, as well as the losses of private individuals, we have the strongest reason to admire the activity and zeal, which, in the short space of two years and a half, with such uncommon difficulties to encounter, had been able to raise the military force of that monarchy to a height it had never attained in the most flourishing period of its history. If the transactions of late years afforded too much cause to suspect the Austrian Cabinet of precipitancy and imprudence, we now behold manifest traces of a complete reverse of policy; and should it have the fortune to succeed in the resolution it has adopted of asserting its independence, in opposition to the tyranny of France, it will have well-founded cause to thank Heaven for those calamities, which first awakened it to a sense of its real resources. Like other besotted Governments, it had the madness to consider an appeal to the loyalty and affections of the subject, as an impolitic and dangerous experiment; but this monstrous delusion has ceased, and we have no doubt the state will soon display a vigour proportionate to its population and resources.

The Minstrel sloop of war arrived at Plymouth on Wednesday last, from Malta. She had previously sailed from Trieste; and it was confidently reported yesterday, that an Austrian messenger arrived with dispatches to Government. Though the latter account may not be true, there is every prospect that the former friendly and commercial intercourse is likely to be re-established between this country and Austria. This sudden change of policy, this open defiance of BONAPARTE, are strong proofs of the alteration of sentiment which the Spanish insurrection has effected in the Austrian Cabinet.

Letters brought by the same vessel, state that the Turkish and Austrian Courts had presented a remonstrance to the Court of St. Petersburgh, relative to its connexion with France; and if no satisfactory answer were obtained, they would declare war against Russia. We believe the latter account premature. However, it is confidently reported, that Mr. ADAIR arrived at Constantinople, and was received with distinction.

The American schooner James, arrived at Liverpool on Saturday last. She sailed from Norfolk, in Virginia, at two o'clock on the morning of the 9th inst. in violation of the Embargo. She mentions the arrival of the Hope at the Chesapeake, on the 26th of October, with dispatches from France and England, and a continuance of the Embargo was expected, in consequence of these two Powers having refused to accede to the proposals of the Government of the United States. It was even supposed that an Act would follow for the prohibition of every kind of intercourse with the two countries. A New-York Paper of the 4th inst. brought by this vessel, contains a Speech of the Governor of that State to the assembly, on the expediency of the embargo; and, in the very form and spirit of Mr. JEFFERSON, in his Answer to the inhabitants of Boston, declares it the only means of avoiding a war, which he says, would unavoidably ensue, were the American Trade exposed to the operation of the British Orders in Council and the French Decrees.

A Mail arrived on Sunday evening from Gottenburgh to the 14th instant. The letters brought by this conveyance confirm the account of the Rupture of the Armistice in Finland. The day after this event, the Swedes gained a decisive victory over the Russians; and Prince Dolgorucki, who had assumed so imposing a tone in the conferences with BONAPARTE, previous to the battle of Austerlitz, and whom the latter honoured with the title of puppy, though the particular confidant of ALEXANDER, was killed in this engagement.

The enmity of the people of Madrid to the French is such, that none of that nation dare to appear in the streets. One of Lord Bentinck's servants having been mistaken for a Frenchman by the populace, had nearly lost his life before the error was discovered.

THE COURT.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his Majesty arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor, where he was received by the Dukes of York, Kent, Cambridge and Sussex.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Captain Michael Seymour, of the Royal Navy, who so highly distinguished himself in the late engagement in the command of the Amethyst, upon his return to England.

Capt. Blennerhasset, who served on board the Amethyst, as a Lieutenant, in the action, upon his promotion.

The Rev. Dr. King, upon his promotion to the Bishoprick of Rochester.

Lord Clive by his father, Earl Powis.

General Despard, upon his promotion to the 12th Veteran Battalion.

Captain Cathcart, upon his promotion.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Duke of Portland and the rest of the Cabinet Ministers present; also Mr. Ryder, as Judge Advocate, who laid before his Majesty the proceedings of some Courts Martial. About six o'clock his Majesty set off on his return to Windsor.

It being St. Andrew's Dayd all those at Court who are Members of the distinguished Orders, wore their collars.

CITY.

The LORD MAYOR and the LIVERY of LONDON.

In consequence of the late refusal of the Lord Mayor to convene a Common Hall, a numerous Meeting of the Livery was held on Thursday last, in the Great Room of the New London Tavern, Cheapside.

Mr. Deputy Goodbehere having been called to the Chair, the following Protest, concluding with another Requisition for a Common Hall, was unanimously agreed to; and a Deputation of several Liverymen, with the Chairman, appointed to wait upon his Lordship therewith.

My Lord,

Having received your Lordship's answer to the Requisition dated the 2d November 1808, and signed by a number of Liverymen, requesting your Lordship

"To convene a Common Hall on an early day, in order to take into consideration the late Convention in Portugal, by which the character, honour, and interests of the country have been so deeply affected, and to adopt such measures as may be deemed adviseable."

In which answer you "decline to convene a Common Hall as requested," and assign as a reason, that, "Since the date of the Requisition a Court of Inquiry has been instituted by his Majesty's command, for investigating the causes which led to the Convention alluded to, that the Court is now prosecuting such inquiry," and that you are "of opinion, that a Meeting of the Livery of London in Common Hall, on the subject proposed by the Requisition, pending such public inquiry, will be highly unnecessary, unseasonable, and improper."

We, the undersigned Liverymen, beg leave to observe—

That the right of the Livery of London to meet in Common Hall, to deliberate on matters of public grievance, has been ever exercised, with very few exceptions, and that such exceptions have been uniformly stigmatized with the reprobation of the Livery:—

That if a Chief Magistrate is to grant such meetings only when they coincide with his own views of the propriety and utility of the measures to be proposed, his conduct must amount to a violation of the most sacred rights of the subjects, inasmuch as it necessarily deprives the people of the legal means of expressing their sentiments on all great questions affecting the common weal, and renders null the liberties so repeatedly asserted by their ancestors, and so clearly and emphatically declared by the Bill of Rights:—

That with respect to the date of the Requisition, we beg to state, that it is subsequent to the appointment of the Court of Inquiry, and that other Meetings have been held under similar circumstances, to which no such objection has been made:—

That since the Sheriffs of Counties, Officers appointed by the Crown, have not withheld from the people the exercise of the right in question under such pretence, we cannot forbear expressing our astonishment and displeasure, that the Chief Magistrate of the City of London should, by almost his first official act, deny it to those to whose good opinion, confidence and suffrages he has been indebted for his high situation:—

That without adopting your Lordship's notions respecting what you term a "Court of Inquiry," we trust we may be allowed to exercise our own judgment as to the institution of a tribunal unknown to the laws of this country; appointed by the Crown; unsworn; possessing no authority to compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, or to acquit or condemn the parties whose conduct is under investigation:—

That we cannot observe without real concern, the suspicion which your Lordship's answer evidently implies, that the great body of the Livery of London, to whom is entrusted the choice of a Chief Magistrate, of Sheriffs, of Members of Parliament, and of other important Officers, could so far forget themselves as to countenance or adopt any proceedings incompatible with the character they have ever maintained, or repugnant to the pure principles of public justice:—

That we presume your Lordship may safely confide these matters to the Livery themselves, who do not solicit your advice, but merely claim their undoubted right, and leave them to be the guardians of their own character and honour:—

"That, as the only ground of objection (to put the most favourable construction upon your Lordship's answer) appears to be a supposition, that since the date of the requisition, circumstances have arisen to preclude the necessity of such meeting, we beg to state to your Lordship, that several of the names have been signed subsequent to its date; and that the Liverymen who signed it were generally aware, that it could not be delivered until a late date, and that no material circumstances occurred to cause a change in their opinion as to the propriety or necessity thereof. For the purpose, however, of obviating every difficulty in that respect,

We, the undersigned Liverymen of the City of London, do hereby again request your Lordship to convene a Common Hall on an early day, in order to consider the late Convention in Portugal, by which the character, honour, and interests of the country have been so deeply affected; and to adopt such measures as may be deemed advisable.

Nov. 24, 1808.

To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, &c.

The above Protest and Requisition was signed by nearly one hundred Liverymen, and presented to his Lordship, last Saturday, by Mr. Goodbehere and the Deputation. The following answer was returned the same day by the Lord Mayor:—

"Mansion-house, Saturday, Nov. 26.

"The Lord Mayor presents his compliments to Mr. Goodbehere, The considerations which induced the Lord Mayor to decline convening the Livery of London in Common Hall, on the Requisition before presented to him, for the purpose of considering at this time the late Convention in Portugal, remain in full force, and induce his Lordship again to decline convening the Meeting requested by the renewed application, in the same terms, for the same purpose which has been presented by Mr. Deputy Goodbehere, this morning.

"The Lord Mayor greatly regrets to find himself obliged in the official exercise of his discretion, to differ from any part of the respectable Livery of London, on their view of the subject."

"Samuel Goodbehere, Esq. Deputy, &c. &c. &c.

On Tuesday last the Lord Mayor went in state to Guildhall, to hold his first Court of Aldermen, which was numerously attended. The thanks of the Court were voted to the late Lord Mayor. The Assize of Bread was ordered to be reduced an Assize and a half, or 3d. in the peck loaf. The quartern loaf, wheaten, is now now sold for 1s. 2d½. and household 1s. 1½d.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the following commanders took leave of the court previous to departing for their respective destinations, viz.

Captain T. Larkins, Warren Hastings, Bengal and China.

Captain W. Donaldson, Neptune, and Captain J. Kirkpatrick, Henry Addington, Bombay and China.

Captain Edward Balston was sworn into the command of the ship Princess Amelia, consigned to China direct.

Thursday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captain Benjamin Richardson was sworn into the command of the ship Albion, consigned to China direct.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

THE THEATRE.

DRURY LANE.

On Thursday night a new drama, in three acts, entitled Venoni, or the Novice of St. Mark, was acted for the first time at Drury Lane.

Promotion is no where become so frequent, and so fashionable as on the Stage. The promotion of which we intend to speak is not of men, and still less of merit and talents, but that of Melo-dramas!! Humble through necessity, they formerly crawled obsequiously, though not without betraying great symptoms of self conceit, and a bustling disposition, at the heels of our first rate tragedies and comedies. But of late, they have been raised to an equality with the first-born of the tragic and comic muse. They now impudently rear their heads as soon as the curtain is drawn, the nightly monarchs of the scenic boards arrayed in the borrowed majesty of their betters, which but ill disguises their native servility. Like an Eton boy, when after having long obeyed the commands of his fellow students, he not only starts at once into the fifth class and out of his fagship, but becomes the proud imperious Master of a fag; a melo-drama struts, sings, and dances on the stage, attended by a lowly but good humoured menial, who, by and bye, if the present system of promotion continues, will laugh his way to precedence, and most probably claim the pantomime for his follower.

According to the present system, therefore, if it be persisted in, and authors and managers suffer themselves to be carried away by the current of novelty, the theatrical prospects of the ensuing generation are these: tragedies, as being too serious and too long, and comedies, as requiring too deep a study, and too exact a display of nature, are now scarcely ever attempted by the authors of acting plays—they will be totally banished from the future stage. Melo-dramas, though they have not only usurped the place, but the very name of regular dramas, now enjoy but a fleeting hour of power, and will then seldom dare to show their heads; not more frequently, at least, than new tragedies and comedies now do. Farces will long reign supreme and triumphant, for the number of laughing fools is always so great, that were not Pantomimes to attack them with the still more powerful weapons of grosser and more senseless mirth, their sway would be endless. Broad grins, grimaces, the tumblings of a clown, the leaps of an Harlequin, and fairy trippings of a Columbine, will then be the only performances allowed on the stage, which will then most undoubtedly fulfill the great ends of its creation, the improvement of public manners by the correction of private vices and failings. Beyond this degradation of one of the noblest establishments formed by man, the stage, even imagination dreads to pierce.

The Scene lies at Messina. Celestino, the Prior of the Convent of St. Mark is a common character enough, an hypocrite. Josepha, daughter to a weak woman, the Marchioness Caprana, is his victim, and torn by his artifice from the arms of Venoni, a young Sicilian nobleman, still weaker than the Marchioness, whom she was about to marry, in order to be made an Ursuline nun, or rather to be forced to gratify Celestino's passion. On her refusal, she is plunged into a vault, where, when the piece opens, she has already resided more than a year. She is reported to have died, and Venoni, deprived of all sense, but that of grief, resolves to become a monk, and begins his noviciate at the Convent of St. Mark, which is separated from that of the Ursulines by a party-wall only. The Viceroy of Sicily, Count Benvoglio, undertakes in vain to combat his resolution, at the moment when he has conquered almost all his objections, the Prior names Josepha and points to her grave, and Venoni becomes his again. Father Michael, however, a young and benevolent monk, who during the conflagration that destroyed a wing of the Convent some time before, has discovered written proofs of the Prior's guilt, finds means to lay them before Venoni, and presses him to fly. Vengeance and not safety, is now the only wish of the youth; his loud exclamations put Father Michel to flight, and bring the Prior, whom he reproaches with his guilt, and in whose hands he imprudently places the letter which Michel has left. His death or captivity becomes necessary for the security of the criminals, and he is forced down some secret steps, into a vault, where a monk, after twenty years spent in captivity, had lately expired. Here we see the party wall that separates the two Convents, and a dungeon on each side of it. The one contains the falsely thought dead Josepha; and in the other Venoni is placed. Yielding to despair, he is about to dash his head against the wall, when he perceives these words, "hope and search," written upon it. He searches his dungeon, finds a scroll written with blood, which tells him that the wall is hollow, and an iron bar, with which, in a few minutes, he overthrows the barrier that divided him from Josepha, still unconscious of her existence. They know each other, and at that moment hear approaching voices. Venoni grasps his iron bar for defence, Josepha clings to him, and the dungeon is entered by the good Father Michael, the Viceroy, the Marchioness and attendants, whom he had informed of the danger of their friend. A tremendous shower of hisses caused the curtain to drop suddenly, and thus screened the wicked Prior from the punishment which he so highly deserved, and which but for this would have certainly proved unavoidable.

Any man who vents his contempt against a coward, when placed at the head of an army, would find no fault with him, were he to confine himself to the faithful discharge of his family duties or to industrious pursuits. By the same reason, although we protest against the promotion of melo-dramas to the first rank of the drama, we do not object to these in their proper place. Venoni, or the Novice of St. Mark, is partly taken from a French piece, entitled Les Victimes Cloitrées, which was first represented at Paris, but during the latter part of the first act, and the whole of the second, far surpasses its original. It teems with interest, and, although not free from numerous defects, also abounds with beauties. The style is chaste and animated, natural, and elegant; the sentiments are all good; and were it not for the ridiculous masquerade introduced at the beginning of the third act, and which interrupts unnecessarily the course of the action, no objection could be made to the conduct of the piece. Were something like comic spirit infused through the comic parts of this drama; were the Prior's libidinous speech reduced within the bounds of modesty; were the masquerade suppressed, the whole of the last Act moulded anew into a less reprehensible shape, and the character of the Hero throughout raised above the weakness of despondency, Venoni, or the Novice of St. Mark, would become, and deservedly so, one of the most popular pieces of the day.

No play ever received a more powerful assistance from the talents of performers than Venoni. Elliston's delineation of melancholy despair was, as all his performances, masterly. Brooding incessantly on the loss of his bride, the luminous faculties of his mind are obscured, but not extinguished. Frequent gleams of thought and memory flash across his gloomy sorrow, and to catch the fleeting expression of the soul in its momentary emersion from despair, is perhaps one of the most difficult imitations of nature which the mimic art can give. Elliston, whose genius seems to rise with difficulties, displayed so deep a knowledge of the human heart, so exact a portraiture of the play of human passions, that we think he has never betrayed more excellence in any of his former characters.—Wroughton, in Celestino, depicted hypocrisy with fidelity, especially its assumed mildness and humility, before his superiors, or those whom he has selected for his victims, and its bursting exultation in secret self congratulations on the success of his plans. Mr. H. Siddons, who, in general, is so unequal in his performance, was here uniformly great. He surpassed our warmest hopes, and in his interview with Venoni, in the convent, burst in all the splendour of truly Siddonian genius. De Camp, in Father Michel, displayed real excellence; as well as Mrs. H. Sid-

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL.

STOCKHOLM, Nov. 11.

His Royal Majesty has received the following report from the General in Chief of the Finnish army, including a report from Colonel Sandels, Chief of Brigade, touching a severe battle, which has been fought in the vicinity of Idensalmi :—

"Since the armistice concluded between the Swedish and Russian armies was declared to be at an end, arrived yesterday a Russian Officer from Lieutenant-General Tutschkoff, with the intimation that hostilities would be immediately recommenced.

"Soon after I received a report that my advanced posts had been attacked by the Russians, and compelled, by the enemy's great superiority in number, to fall back to Wirda-bridge, which was soon after broke down after the troops had crossed it. A violent cannonade was immediately commenced by the enemy from the neighbouring heights, which was vigorously returned from our side, and Prince Dolgoruski, who commanded the Russian vau, was mortally wounded at the beginning of the action, and expired soon after. In the meantime the enemy's chasseurs and infantry crossed the bridge, which they had repaired, formed in line, and advanced against our troops, notwithstanding the vigorous cannonade which was kept up from our batteries, which they attempted to carry, but were repulsed by our troops with the utmost intrepidity and valour, and pursued as far as Wirda-bridge. In this action the enemy's loss consist in 360 men killed and wounded, and 10 taken prisoners, among whom are two field-officers.

"According to the account of the prisoners, the enemy's force in the above affair, which lasted six hours, exceeded 6000 men, commanded by Lieut.-General Tutschkoff, and under him, by Generals Rackmanoff, Prince Dolgoruski, and Alexeijeff. At the close of the action, the Russian commanding General proposed a suspension of hostilities for 24 hours, to bury his dead, which I was the more ready to grant, as our loss was also considerable, consisting of 30 killed, and 250 wounded.—(Stockholm Gazette.)

"J. A. SANDELS, Chief of Brigade."

"Brigade-Quarters, Idensalmi, Oct. 28, 1808."

"STOCKHOLM, NOV. 17.—A few days since was published in this capital a French translation of the statement of Don Cevallos, wherein he exposes the treacherous conduct of Bonaparte towards the unfortunate Royal Family of Spain. It is read with the utmost avidity, and is likely to be circulated from hence through a great part of the Continent,

"The utmost activity prevails in all the Dock-yards, and several ships are on the point of being launched, and fitted out for immediate service."—Stockholm Gazette, Nov. 17.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The weather for the greatest part of the month, has been so very fine, that all the different operations of husbandry which are necessary at this season, have been carried on almost without any interruption. The late wheat grounds have been completely prepared, and the seed put in, in the best possible state. The early wheats now in many places almost wholly cover the surface of the island, and have a very fine, healthy, green, appearance. In particular instances they are perhaps too luxuriant and forward, but this only regards a few situations, where the circumstances are peculiarly favourable for their vigorous growth. Wheat averages 92s. 7d. per quarter; Barley, 45s. 10d.; Oats, 38s. 8d.

The taking up of the potatoe crops has now been every where completed, and these were perhaps, never, upon the whole, more full and abundant, in all the northern districts of the kingdom, especially Lancashire, and the neighbouring counties.

On thrashing out the oats and barleys, they are in general found to yield much better than was supposed at the time of harvesting them, affording, in most cases, a fair produce.

The completing of the fattening stock has gone on well since our last, and much meat has been brought to the different markets. And the bite of grass for the store stock has continued good unusually long, on account of the lightness of the season. This has probably been one cause of keeping up the prices in the northern parts of the island, though the demands of the midland graziers have not been so considerable this year as formerly.

The turnip, cabbage, rape, and other green crops, all promise well at present, for affording a full supply of that sort of food, which is so essential, especially in the northern districts, for the support of live stock.

The operations of repairing fens, and forming under-drains where the wetness of the land demands them, have in many cases been performed to a considerable extent, from the unusual openness of the weather, especially in the northern counties.

FOX CHACE.—On the 29th of October in the afternoon, a fox was seen crossing the fields of Campton, in Bedfordshire, followed by a shepherd's dog. The fox first made his way into the grounds of the Rev. Mr. Davies's boarding-school, at Campton, where the boys were at play. Reynard was no sooner in the midst of this juvenile assembly than a tumultuous uproar assailed him, from which, however, he hastened with all speed, through a border plantation into the road, and crossing to the Rev. Mr. Williamson's house, the minister of the parish, he bolted through the glass into the library. Here a female servant was cleaning the room, and who, by the sudden and unexpected appearance of the new visitor, was thrown into fits. On some of the family entering the apartment, Reynard was found skulking in a corner, and the poor girl extended on the floor; with some difficulty she was recovered, and the fox, who had been cut by the glass taking his leap, bagged by a person who saw him enter. When or where the chace commenced, is uncertain; but the dog is known to belong to a shepherd at Meppershall, the adjoining parish to Campton.

Early on Saturday morning a fire broke out on board the ship Devonshire, lying in Carts-dike bay, Greenock, but by the active exertions of Mr. Smith, pilot, aided by the crew and several other persons, it was soon got under, without doing any very material damage to the vessel. The fire, we understand, commenced near the magazine, in which there was a considerable quantity of powder, but which, fortunately it did not reach, otherwise the vessel must have been destroyed, and perhaps several lives lost, as the Captain and crew were on board and asleep at the time the alarm was given.

Last week, the workmen in cleansing some of the ancient sewers, near the Cross, Bath, met with a few Roman coins, amongst which is one of the Emperor Vespasian, in excellent preservation: the head and inscription almost as perfect as of modern date.

ECCENTRICITIES OF FASHION FOR DECEMBER.

THE recess of beauty, fashion, and elegance, from the micromosmic metropolis, is now nearly expired; whilst invention, guided by taste and accompanied by symetry, stands on tiptoe to produce her chefs d'œuvre to an admiring world. Midst such a crowd of good company, the conductors of a periodical work, who ought to be the harbingers, as well as recorders, of the various changes of the motley goddess, can scarce find room to walk in and "show the lions;" were we, indeed, only called on to say what ought to be, or were we even called on to specify all that has been, the task might be accomplished, but to foretel what will be, midst the varied whims and caprices of the fashionable and eccentric arbiters of the mode, would be a task for Œdipus, Cassandra, or even the witch of Endor; a task, whose cabalistic obscurity is so appropriately emblematized by the Sphynxes which decorate our boudoirs, drawing-rooms, and salles à manger. In the rapidity with which our fashions have been adopted, and in the pantomimic celerity with which they have been changed, Fancy has been obliged to ransack every region of the globe for variety. Our belles, in the course of a few short weeks, have been gipsies, witches, Paissannes, Grecian statues, and Egyptian mummies; in short, so often has Variety herself been varied, that nothing is left for Fashion but a bizarre union of incongruities, to produce the harmony of contrast; or, by the whimsicality of contrast, to excite wonder and surprise. To aid in this grand undertaking, the arts and sciences themselves must be called in, and surely nothing can be more facile in this learned age, when philosophic knowledge is not only supplied by wholesale in Albemarle-Street, and at the Surry Institution, but even retailed, in small quantities, at the dashing female seminaries of every degree, from Blackheath to the humble road-side mansion, where "young ladies" are boarded and heddicated. The statuary's art has indeed been exhausted, but not so the sculptor's. Architecture will supply a thousand novelties: thus the fair philosopher may take a model from the Caryatides, and glide into the drawing-room one half a woman, one half a pedestal; or she may adapt the five orders to her passions and pursuits. The prude, of course, will present the sober majesty of the Ionic; the chaste and elegant matron will assume the Doric; the buxom dame, who scorns to flinch her glass, will naturally adopt the Tuscan! The new importation from the Moors and Fells will at first appear in the rustic, the coquette will be composite, and the true woman of fashion will be corinthian!

Whilst expecting this new dawn of science, we may just observe en passant, that our early winter fashions are as yet unfixed; but the most seasonable, as resembling the fallen leaf, is a handsome yellow adopted in ribbands and other ornaments, and which associates equally well with the scarlet pelisse, and the dark brown mantle. In Paris this colour is distinguished by "à la peture d'oignons," but as our fair dames are not of so light a texture as the Parisian élégantes, that name would here be inappropriate. The single wrap mantle, and the India shawl have still their votaries, though superseded in some degree, by a most whimsical robe of dark brown Georgina cloth, cut all in one length, but doubled at a third, and thus tied round the neck; the ends which of course hang down unequally, are ornamented with a deep orange fringe, and the tout ensemble is as elegant as it is new. In the head dress, little variety is yet exhibited, except a new bonnet of twisted straw; but in full dress the hair is sported with but little adventitious aid from ornaments.

The increase of cold, or the increase of modesty, have prompted our hitherto generous fair ones, once more to adopt concealment; the dresses are now made to cover the bosom, and are buttoned up tight round the neck, and so far sloped off in front as to receive the addition of brilliant clasps, which reach from the breast to the bottom of the robe and produce a striking effect.

As Bond Street sports not yet its loungers, the marchands des modes have produced but little novelty; dark greens, and blues still preserve their ascendency, but in both sexes, it is expected that black until the spring will be considered as a full dress.

In carriages, simplicity will be the order of the day; the plain but elegant landau is all the rage, of a Devonshire brown, or rich yellow with brass mouldings; this kind of carriage is now much flatter on the top, and the circular swell of the panels and sides being laid aside, it hangs with much more neatness, particularly as the barouche seats have been withdrawn; a change we hail with pleasure, for when John was accustomed to sit cheek by jowl with his young mistress, or his old one, the natural distance was soon removed, and its consequences have in more instances than one been exhibited to the world. Where originality fails, imitation may step in, of course some of the dashing bloods of the whip anxious to put on some appearance of usefulness, and to shew their capability of serving government in some way, have been sporting their new equipages as a mail coach set out, but from the crash of pannels in the Edgeware Road, where those Jehus were surrounded by a string of country carts, the bumpkins not supposing them to be gemmen but really mail coachmen, it is supposed that the whim will drop, and that invention will again be at work for the benefit of the Architects in the Acre.

Of architectural ornament, the most brilliant specimen is a boudoir, in the Grecian style; this apartment is octangular, four of the pannels are of mirror, the others ornamented with pilastres embossed richly and relieved by gilding. Those parts of the walls not ornamented, are covered with a rich mazarine blue velvet; the ceiling is covered in eight compartments corresponding with the sides, and decorated with antique paintings copied from the finest specimens of Herculaneum, and the centre forms a dome from which the apartment is lighted.—Ottomans are placed in the recesses; and the chairs are Grecian with stuffed backs and seats of velvet; the whole forming a blaze of splendour, as elegant as unique. The gothic though exploded from our buildings is however still preserved in our furniture; we have heard of a "gothic state bed for an infant" who in course of a few months must have gothic batts and balls, or a gothic babyhouse!

ROYAL SOCIETY.

Wednesday, being St. Andrew's Day, the Royal Society held their Anniversary Meeting, at their apartments in Somerset-place; when the President, the Right Hon. Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. K. B. in the name of the Society, presented the Gold Medal (called Sir Godfrey Copley's) to William Henry, M. D. for his various papers communicated to the Society, and printed in the Philosophical Transactions.

Afterwards the Society proceeded to the choice of the Council and Officers for the ensuing year, when, on examining the ballots, it appeared that the following Gentlemen were elected of the Council:—

Of the Old Council—The Right Hon. Sir J. Banks, Bart. K. B.; Sir Charles Blagdon, Knt.; Henry Cavendish, Esq.; Humphrey Davy, Esq.; John Gillies, LL. D.; Right Hon. Charles Greville; William Marsden, Esq.; Rev. Nevil Maskeline, D. D.; George Earl of Morton; John Rennie, Esq.; William Hyde Wollaston, M. D.

Of the New Council—Edward Ash, M. D.; Frederick Augustus Barnard, Esq.; John Blackburne, Esq.; Samuel Goodenough; Lord Bishop of Carlisle; Thomas Earl of Chichester; Henry Hugh Hoare, Esq.; Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart.; John Lord Selsey; William Sotheby, Esq.; Sir John Thomas Stanley, Bart.

And the Officers were, the Right Hon. Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. B. B. President; William Marsden, Esq. Treasurer; William Hyde Wollaston, M. D.; and Humphrey Davy, Esq. Secretaries.

Afterwards the Members of the Society dined together as usual, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND THE PUBLIC.

The Proprietors think it proper to inform the Public that a COMPREHENSIVE INDEX, to complete the FIRST VOLUME OF THIS PAPER, will be published on the commencement of the ensuing Year; and that a PORTRAIT OF HIS MAJESTY, from a Painting by SIR WILLIAM BEECHY, will be distributed GRATIS. It is the intention of the Proprietor to have the Portrait engraved by that able Artist, SCRIVEN; and therefore the Public may expect a Print worthy their acceptance, and which they trust will supply the imperfections of the Portrait which was GIVEN soon after the commencement of the NATIONAL REGISTER.

Extraordinary and unprecedented applications having been made during the last fifteen days, for some of the former Numbers of the NATIONAL REGISTER; it is therefore necessary to apprise the Purchasers of this Paper, who may be desirous of completing their Sets, that immediate orders must be given, to prevent disappointment.

LE BEAU MONDE MAGAZINE.

The Proprietors of LE BEAU MONDE; or LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE, now offer the Twenty-ninth Number of that highly interesting Miscellany to particular attention. As they are entering on the FIFTH VOLUME of their Work, the Proprietors conceive themselves authorised in again appealing to the Public, confident of having spared neither exertion or expence to gratify the wishes of their Subscribers, and entitle their Undertaking to the most liberal, enlightened, and extensive patronage. Determined to deserve the success which they have already so uniformly experienced, and, by this line of conduct, to augment the number of their public friends, the Proprietors of LE BEAU MONDE, feeling kindness as an incentive to activity, confidently anticipate the moment when this truly LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE, will secure a circulation almost unprecedented. Whether it be considered with reference to the opulence of its Literature, or the splendour of its Embellishments, whether as to gratify Taste, or to promote the discussion of amusing and instructive Topics, the present Proprietors are assured that their Miscellany may challenge comparison, and defy competition, as a Monthly Magazine.

The EMBELLISHMENTS of the Twenty-ninth Number of LE BEAU MONDE consist of a highly-finished characteristic whole-length Portrait of Mrs. Liston (formerly Miss Tyrer) as MADGE in the opera of Love in a Village; of BRITISH REMAINS or an original and striking Representation of the Monument erected by Parliament in St. Paul's, to the Memory of Captain Faulkner; and of an authentic and animated Likeness of the Rt. Hon. Lord Sidmouth. With reference to LITERATURE, the Proprietors immediately call the mind of the British Public to the papers denominated The Arbitrator and the National Varieties of the Drama, to their Review of Literature and Critical Opinions, to their account of the Public Pleasures, and to the extraordinary article entitled a Monthly Retrospect! They would finally point out the Dramatic Memoirs and Criticisms.

 Correspondents are requested to forward any interesting Communications for Le Beau Monde, to the Proprietors, J. B. Bell and J. DeCamp, No. 11, Catherine Street, in the Strand.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE accounts from Spain, during the course of this week, have been as chequered, as during the former. The same uncertainty, the same fluctuation prevailed; and the public were favoured on Monday last, with the particulars of a splendid victory obtained by General BLAKE over NEY's army. This engagement was reported to have taken place on the 18th ult. near Reynosa. The intelligence was brought by the Mediator of 36 guns, from Santona; from which place she sailed on the 17th. But the public were cruelly disappointed. However, the enthusiastic pleasure they displayed on the occasion is the finest panegyric of the British Character. This display of generous participation afforded us a pleasure almost equivalent to a confirmation of the intelligence, because it shewed in the most honourable point of view the hearts and understandings of Englishmen. From the rapid increase of luxury and opulence, there was reason to apprehend the effects of political indifference and moral profligacy, but the heartfelt satisfaction displayed in consequence of this report, leaves no doubt of the prevalence of public over selfish feelings.

The foregoing report was, however, totally destroyed by the arrival of Spanish Papers on Thursday last. The most important article they contained, was an Official Report from BLAKE to the Supreme Governing Junta, detailing the operations of his army from the 3d to the 8th, which he concludes in the following affecting language:—"Our inimitable warriors have, ever since the "23d, endured with fortitude privations of every kind, "and the intemperature of severe weather, without great "coats, in great part without clothes, without hats, and "absolutely barefoot; what is more, without having a "morsel to eat for many days; lending their services "with ardour to extreme fatigue, and all along without "one murmur of complaint or disgust.—All I can perceive in them is an unabated desire of washing the enemy's "guilt in his blood, at the hazard of their own lives."—

It would be almost superfluous to add a word to this simple and heart-rending narrative; but after such sublime proofs of devotion to the cause of their Sovereign and country, it would be base and dastardly in us, could we indulge, even for a moment, in the pusillanimous or despondent anticipation, that such sacrifices, such patience and heroic perseverance, should terminate in the subjugation of that magnanimous people. Our Readers will probably believe us when we declare that it is not our opinion. The Spaniards possess constitutional qualities of mind and body, which peculiarly qualify them for the most daring enterprises, as well as the fatigues and privations of protracted warfare. Their provinces may be over-run and plundered; their families dispersed, and the face of their country fundamentally changed; but their will remains inflexible, and calamity will only tend to multiply their moral resources. They have lost of their primitive character less than any other people in Europe; and the Pyrenees served as a moral, as well as a political barrier against the innovations of their neighbours. This is the basis of our hopes in their favour; and the fastidious pretensions to superior penetration, on the part of cotemporary writers, are not sufficient to overturn the scaffolding of our belief, or to sacrifice to their cold, heartless speculations, our ardent anticipation of their ultimate success. We do not pretend to any infallibility of opinion; but we would not, for all the superiority of penetration these dogmatists attribute to themselves, renounce the favourable sentiments we entertain in favour of a just and honourable cause. Our opinion in this respect is subject to no fluctuation; it has imbibed a strong tincture from the character of the people whose cause we advocate. It remains unalterable; no reverses, which may still lie in the womb of time, will prevent us from crying out to our countrymen, to persevere in their honourable and politic exertions.

Spanish papers and letters arrived yesterday to the 27th ult. by the Bonne Citoynne, which sailed from Corunna on Saturday last. Soon after she departed from Corunna, she dons in Josepha. Mrs. Powell's Marchioness employed the voice of nature to express her feelings.

The music, by Mr. Kelly, was a good selection, rather than a good composition; and Masters Dourouset and Huckel's vocal powers were once more called forth into in a charming trio with Mr. Smith.

The scenery is most splendid: especially the scenes which represent the garden of the convent, the lighted monastery, and the tomb of Josepha.

The opposition to this drama was great, but certainly unjust. It could not be expected that the friends of the disappointed authors of The Mysterious Bride and The Siege of St. Quintin, would suffer a piece written, it is said, by Mr. Lewis, to receive the applause which it deserved, without attempting to crush it at its first representation. We hope their envious designs will be disappointed, and that the Managers, by a few curtailments and alterations, will raise this interesting melo-drama so far above the reach of disapprobation as to secure its success.

REV. BASIL WOOD, M. A.

BENTINCK CHAPEL, LISSON GREEN.

IT is not easy to explain the causes to which some characters owe their celebrity. Without any commanding claims on public attention, without paramount pretensions to popularity, without the irresistability of superior genius, there are persons who, nevertheless, rise high into reputation among their contemporaries, and consider themselves established in the estimation of mankind. Description, however, has anticipated this species of merit. Of the companions of this order of excellence, it may be assumed, at least, that they are "giants among pigmies." and "the one-eyed monarchs of the blind." They shine by contrast, if not by comparison. These constitute the softer satellites, the lesser luminaries, of the intellectual hemisphere. They serve us in the absence of meridian effulgence. If they cannot challenge our admiration, still they are deserving of our gratitude. If they do not attract our astonishment, they sometimes attach our affection. While they fail to excite wonder, they may still communicate delight.

The Rev. BASIL WOOD, descended from respectable and religious parents, was by them sent to the University of Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of A. M. He is now proprietor and Minister of Bentinck Chapel, on Lisson Green, the Afternoon-Lecturer of St. Peter's, at Cornhill, Rector of Drayton, and Chaplain to the Most Noble the Marquis Townshend. The sphere of his duty is evidently extensive, and he certainly fills it with fidelity. It is something, then, to be accounted a faithful Minister of Christianity; but it is more, to be estimated as an able and pains-taking Servant of the Gospel of Jesus Christ! Oh, for more of those "burning and shining lights," which, having "turned many to righteousness," shall shine for ever and ever, as fixed stars, in the galaxy of an immortal glory! Let us know to appreciate, and earnestly implore, fresh examples of ecclesiastical excellence; of that almost indescribable union, in the same individual, of divinity and humanity,—of solid learning with religious ardour—of the deepest information of mind, with the holiest enthusiasm of heart! If an Agrippa is to be confounded, if a Felix is to tremble, let but a Paul appear. Give us fervour, without frenzy; boldness, without bigotry; reasoning, without presumption. Let Christian Ministers devoutly aspire to adorn the great vocation unto which they are called, and they will find that the eternal Spirit of Truth is not without its witness in the consciences of men! I feel that it is impossible to insist too much on the necessity of cultivating those qualities which alone render the pulpit invaluable.

It is of the Rev. BASIL WOOD, however, that I have principally to speak. His outward appearance is gentlemanly. Always remarkably clean and neat, he, indeed, uniformly reminds me of some lines in the Satires of the celebrated Dr. Donne.—

So in immaculate clothes and symmetry,
Perfect as circles, with such nicety
As a young preacher, at his first time, goes
To preach, he enters——.

With such commendable solicitude as to his vestments, it seems to me surprising how Mr. Wood can conceive himself at liberty to stop, while ascending the stairs of his pulpit, and chat, for some seconds of time, with his Reader in the desk below! This practice is positively most reprehensible. I have since observed, as relating to this particular, one of the most distinguished of divines; and, instead of endeavouring, even by pompousness of gait, to procure notoriety, he steals, as it were, into the pulpit, of which he is so illustrious an ornament! Not thus, however, Basil Wood. He, at present, goes to his pulpit indecorously; and he enters it with as much injudicious complacency. Scarcely has he condescendingly bowed his head down upon his cushion, when he very abruptly assumes an erect posture, and contemplates, with sufficient self-satisfaction, his assembled auditors,—sometimes adjusting his band, or, occasionally, stroking his chin with his hands. Can I help it, if Mr. Wood, by his misbehaviour, compels me to pursue this strain of criticism? I have nevertheless here to remark, and I remark it with sincerity, that his Prayers before his Sermons are concise, appropriate, and generally excellent. These are of his own composition.

Mr. Wood is undoubtedly an instructive teacher, and a correct speaker; but his sentiments exhibit little of the profound or striking in theology, and his elocution is not entitled to the praise of oratory. He is respectable, but he is not eminent. He has nothing about him deserving the epithet of action; his delivery is formal and undistinguishing; his cadences are measured and monotonous, and, towards the conclusion of his sentences, he is continually inaudible. His magnificence is, therefore, without majesty. His manner, on the whole, is not decisively impressive; and his voice, which never rises into dignity, is sometimes painfully equable. He is also given to whining, though he appears anxious to be considered as pathetic.

This preacher desires to be reputed as delivering his discourses extemporaneously; and, because he manages to speak without incessantly consulting copy, he has obtained the reputation to which he aspired. He affords another example of the defects incident to attempts at extempore eloquence, in verbal repetitions, and in sentences introduced with "It is worth our observation," or, "It is worthy observation;" but he founds no truly legitimate right to the honors of extemporary oratory, since from his notes, which are rather concealed between the leaves of his little bible, he may be perceived to read whole passages of his sermon. I think, also, his sermons are too long. The times are passed, when hearers estimated the value of religious harangues by two or three turns of the hour-glass; and, were it otherwise, Mr. Wood is not the preacher who should venture wantonly to weary the patience of public audiences.

Notwithstanding the observations here made on Mr. Wood, I am far from imagining that he will be at all affected by them in the opinions of those who constantly attend his chapel. Such persons have been so long accustomed to his style of preaching, and his private virtues have so fortified him in their estimation, that they will, in all probability, consider my present remarks as dictated only by the captiousness of critical feelings. I do not even wish, as far as this preacher is individually concerned, to lessen him in the minds of those who have uniformly sat under his ministry.

Consistently with my own convictions, however, I cannot accord with those who have described Mr. Wood as an uncommonly splendid pulpit character. The injudiciousness of our friends is sometimes as injurious as the malignity of our foes. I therefore submit it to the patrons of this preacher, whether, in claiming for him the highest distinction, they may not diminish the effect of those impressions of respectability which his sermons really create in the minds of impartial men?

Mr. Wood, it should be mentioned, is the author of numerous Pious Tracts, of which utility and beneficiality are the prominent objects. His humanity deserves to be distinguished, and his liberality to be universally imitated. Of him it will be honourably said, when his talents have long ceased to be the topic of human discussion, "that he went about doing good."

His principles and manners are equally entitled to encomium. He is orthodox in his religion, and loyal in his politics: his temper is benevolent, his manners are conciliating, and his whole character is winning. Providence, however, has been signally bountiful to him; and it would be strange if, constitutionally happy and circumstantially prosperous, his general conduct did not excite both esteem and affection.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Nov. 20.

JOHNSON, v. COOKE.

This was an action to recover damages for an assault committed under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff is a soldier, the defendant also formerly belonged to the army. On the 23d of October last the parties met at a public-house, the Black-Horse and Windmill, Whitechapel. They were seated in the parlour among several inhabitants of the neighbourhood, and the conversation turned upon the Convention in Portugal. Johnson expressed himself like many other great men, very much displeased with the conduct of the British Generals; and having some knowledge of the arts, drew two figures on the table with chalk one he described to be Sir Hew Dalrymple, and the other Bonaparte throwing guineas into Sir Hew's mouth. This caricature caused the plaintiff's loyalty to be questioned, chiefly by Cooke, who discharged a copious shower of porter in the face of Johnson, and rising from his seat at the same time knocked him down. The plaintiff was described to be a little man compared with Cooke: and after he had recovered from the blow, he complained that he had been degraded as a soldier, and requested Cooke to procure a couple of Swords, or sticks at least, that his wounded honour might be defended upon equal terms. It did not appear that the combatants afterwards met in the bloody field of battle, and the plaintiff brought the present action to heal the breach which the defendant's fist had made in his valliant face. After witnesses had proved these facts,

Mr. Serjeant Cockel said he was sorry this action had been brought into Court, because it was a pot-house quarrel. If the plaintiff had been contented with the blow he had received, he would have been better off than he could be with the law at his back. The plaintiff considered himself as much entitled to make a speech upon the Convention of Cintra as the learned Members of the Common Council of the City of London (a laugh) and he intruded upon the company by boasting that he had mounted the deadly breach, (although he had seen no more than Major Sturgeon,) and by abuse compelled the defendant to knock him down. The learned serjeant recollected that the present Lord Chancellor once tried an assault cause in the Common Pleas, in which the plaintiff by provoking language, had received a blow from the defendant which, knocked out one of his teeth. The Jury gave sixpence damages. Lord Eldon called the plaintiff before he left the Court, and observed to him, I recommend you, if you value your teeth, to keep a good tongue in your head, for if you do not, you will not have a stump left. The plaintiff in the present case stood in the same situation; he had provoked the defendant by abuse, and the Jury ought not to think of giving damages.

Sir James Mansfield prevented the Learned Serjeant from calling witnesses in support of the defendant's case. He told the Jury that they were the best judges of the case which ought not to have been brought into a Court of justice. An assault had, however, been proved, and by law the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, which was all he could expect.

The Jury instantly found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages One Shilling.

SITTINGS AT GUILDHALL, LONDON, Nov. 30.

COTTERELL v. WELLS, KNT.

This was an action against a late Sheriff of London, by the Sword Bearer of the Corporation, to establish a right which he claimed of having three bottles of wine per diem, for home consumption, during the continuance of the Old Baily Sessions. To establish this claim the City Butler was called, who proved it had been the practice, with very few exceptions, for the last twenty years, that the Sword Bearer, beyond the wine drank at his table, should take home three bottles per diem for home drinking.

For the Defendant, Mr. Garrow said, although this practice it was true had obtained, it was mere matter of curtesy, and not of presumptive right. The Sword Bearer was an Officer of the Lord Mayor, and not of the Sheriffs, and therefore could have no right or claim against them. During the Sessions there was a plentiful table kept for his use. At the beginning of every Shrievalty a list was presented of all the Officers entitled to privileges, and in this list the Sword Bearer's three bottles were not included. The custom had arisen when wine was not a third of its present price, and was then overlooked as being too trifling to notice. During the Shrievalty of Sir W. Staines, he chose rather to dine at the Sword Bearer's table than at the Lord Mayor's, and finding jellies, tarts, trifles, &c. he reformed the table to plain joints of sirloin and rounds, observing, that the remains would better suit his large family in the gaol, than the less substantial, but more decorative parts of the table.

Lord Ellenborough thought that the Plaintiff had proved no prescriptive right, and under his advice the Jury found a verdict for the Defendant.

OLD BAILEY.

Wednesday the Old Bailey Sessions commenced before Mr. Justice Grose and Baron Graham.

FORGERY.

John Stow Lundie, alias Captain Lundie, was brought into the dock, to take his trial on an indictment, which charged him with forging Bank of England Notes. The Keepers had much difficulty to get the prisoner into Court, and the instant he appeared, he conducted himself like a maniac; he not only interrupted Mr. Shelton, Clerk of the Sessions, while he was reading the indictment, but uttered oaths and execrations against the Juges. Looking steadfastly at Mr. Justice Grose, he exclaimed, "D—n you, who are you, Sir;" He then turned to Mr. Newman the Keeper of Newgate, whom he took by the hand, and said, "You are the only friend I have." While the Court and the spectators were struck with astonishment at the prisoner's apparently frantic insanity, Mr. Garrow, as Council for the prosecution, addressed the Judge, and stated, that the prisoner stood charged with a capital offence, namely, that of forging Bank-notes. He was ready to proceed immediately with the trial, but having understood that the prisoner's mind had been deranged since his com-figement, the persons concerned in the prosecution were willing, from humane motives, to remand the prisoner until the real state of his intellects could be ascertained by the Faculty.

Mr. Justice Grose here remanded the prisoner, who was led from the Bar, cursing and uttering the most indecent language.

Mr. Garrow then applied to the Court to order a Jury, to try whether the prisoner was in his right senses, at the ensuing Sessions.

Mr. Justice Grose observed, that the Learned Council for the prosecution had been lenient in permitting the prisoner to defer his trial, and he complied with the application. The prisoner will not of course be tried next Sessions.

BIGAMY.

Robert Fenton was indicted for feloniously marrying Mary Wainright, while his former wife, Mary Coule, was living.

John Turner produced a marriage certificate, by which it appeared that the prisoner was married to Mary Coule at Hawkhead, in Lancashire, on the 22d of March, 1797, by whom he had two children.

Mary Wainright, the second wife, stated, that she was married to the prisoner at St. James's, Clerkenwell, on the 19th of February, 1803. She lived with him about two years, when he left her after taking away all her cloaths. She afterwards applied to him for assistance, and he sent her a letter from Great Romford, in which he stated, that she could make no demand on him, because she was not his lawful wife. He had deceived her and himself, as he had a wife and two children when he married. The facts were clearly made out against the prisoner, and the Jury found him Guilty.

The prisoner stood charged on a second indictment with a similar offence; but the Court considered it unnecessary to put him on a second trial. It appeared that he had married three wives.

Thursday Thomas Wright, an old man of 64, was indicted for ravishing his own grand-daughter, a child 13 years old. Mr. Pollock stated the case, which was proved by the Prosecutrix, a very pretty little girl, as follows:—that on the 29th day of June, she was ordered by her father to carry some nails to her grandfather's, who was a shoemaker, and lived near her father's at Tottenham. When she got to the door he forcibly pulled her into the room and threw her upon the bed, when he perpetrated the crime. She cried out, but no one came to her assistance. On cross-examination, she said, she did not cry out so much as she should have done, nor did she tell any body for three weeks, because her stepmother used her so very harshly she was afraid. On the 6th of July, her grandfather had ravished her in like manner, in passing through a field, which she concealed for the like reasons.

The learned Judge in summing up spoke with great indignation of the conduct of the Prisoner, but he thought the evidence of the Prosecutrix ought to acquit him of the rape, as it had always been a rule of evidence in these cases, that the Prosecutrix should make immediate disclosure, and all possible resistance, to entitle her to credit. The Jury withdrew for half an hour, and then returned with a verdict of Guilty.

Friday Thomas Cannor was indicted for a highway robbery, by extorting money from Joseph Rutter, under a threat of accusing him of unnatural practices.

The evidence as given by Butler the prosecutor, was as follows:—That he was a shopman to Mr. Wergman, the jeweller. On the evening of the 9th of August last he took a walk in the Park, between nine and ten in the evening; having seated himself on one of the benches, the prisoner Cannor came and sat himself beside him; he addressed him in conversation, which the witness wished to decline, but he became more obtrusive; he told him that he was a Gentleman's butler, and invited him to go home and drink a glass of wine with him; the witness declined, and rose to walk away; the prisoner followed him some little way, and then he told the witness that he saw enough of him to know he was guilty of unnatural propensities, and that the prisoner was Sayers, the Bow-street Officer, and must take him into custody. The witness began to expostulate, but the other said he had better behave handsome, and give him something to be quiet. He would take 50l. and say no more about it. The witness said he was not worth 50l. He then lowered his demand to 40l. 30l. 20l. and at length to 10l. He said if he had not the latter sum he might pawn something to make it up, and, induced by his threat, the witness pawned his gold watch, and made up 10l. which he gave the prisoner. During this conversation the witness had disclosed his residence. The next day the prisoner came to him with another man, whom he said was Wilkinson, and told him that the affair was known at Bow-street, and he had been obliged to divide the 10l. and therefore he must give him another 10l. This the prosecutor also complied with. He came again on a third day, and got two guineas more. At length he went to Bow-street, to know whether he was really Sayers, the Officer, or not; he then learnt that the whole was a fiction. He was directed the next time he came to detain him in conversation until he sent to the Office; he did so, and by that means the prisoner was apprehended.—The Jury found him Guilty.

He was tried on a second indictment with James Coddington, the person whom he had represented as Wilkinson, and they were both found Guilty.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

ASSAULT WITH AN INTENT TO RAVISH.

THE KING v. BENJAMIN DEACON.

This was a case of unparalleled atrocity, the particulars of which are so base and so abominable, as well as indecorous, that we are necessarily prevented from giving it in detail. From the evidence of the innocent and injured individual, who was not more than eight years old, and a relative of the culprit, there was more than enough from whence to elicit the crime charged in the indictment, for had the offender been charged before another Court for a capital offence, his fate, perhaps, would not have been doubtful. As it was, there was abundance of proof, in addition to his own confession when taken before the magistrate, to fix him with the crime charged. His counsel, one of whom was Mr. Alley, urged every argument, and every observation than ingenuity, or the reasoning faculties upon such a case could display. But a discerning jury, considering the evidence before them, under the cautious and impartial summing up of the learned Chairman, found him Guilty, to the satisfaction of the whole Court, and of a numerous auditory. Judgment deferred.

Friday a Medical Gentleman, of great respectability in his profession, was indicted for an assault, with an intent to commit an abominable offence. A private soldier, of the 3d regiment of Foot Guards, named Alsop, was the Prosecutor

The offence was alledged to have been committed when he was on guard in St. James Park, about half past eleven o'clock on a rainy night in the month of July last; but in his testimony he exhibited so many instances of prevarication, and the Defendant having adduced a character for the most unimpeachable morality and respectability, from a long list of professional and other gentlemen who had known him for many years, the Jury found him Not Guilty.

DIED.

Monday last, Sir Richard Hill, Bart. at his seat at Hawkstone, Shropshire, in the 76th year of his age. For several years he was one of the representatives of that county. Sir Richard is succeeded in his title and estates by his second brother Sir John Hill, who has 13 children, and several grand-children. General Rowland Hill, who commanded the 90th regiment in Egypt, with such signal bravery and success, and has now the command of a brigade in Spain, is the second son of the same family. The Rev Rowland Hill, well known as a preacher, is, we are informed, a sixth son of the late Sir Rowland Hill.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION:

NUMBER FORTY-NINE.

STRICTURES ON THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

We promised in our last number some observations on this periodical publication, on that part particularly where the chances of the Spanish conflict are discussed. In acknowledging the merit of the writers, we feel the most sensible regret, at their employing the ascendancy of their talents to discourage the hopes and exertions of British freemen, in support of a cause, on the success or miscarriage of which the freedom or slavery of Europe, perhaps of this country, unquestionably depends. What renders their conduct more unaccountable and contradictory, they affect, and manifest a kind of peevish asperity in consequence of their sincerity having been called in question, to interest themselves warmly for the success of the Spaniards; and every line in their elaborate article betrays despondency, and an ill-disguised triumph at the probable accomplishment of their portended disasters. This glaring inconsistency has struck us most forcibly in the perusal of their remarks; for we cannot possibly reconcile the idea of ardent zeal for a cause, with a despondent anticipation of its consequences, much less with endeavours to discountenance its support. In discussions on mere speculative points, or on subjects of trifling importance, the fretful arrogance of imagined superiority, or the petulant irritability of party-feeling, may render a writer more attentive to the success of his argument than to the promotion of truth and justice; but when the subject is so comprehensive and useful as to command the affections of the heart, our understanding rises superior to ostentation, and spurns at the evasions of sophistry, or the pretensions of selfishness. The writers of the Edinburgh Review acknowledge themselves the cause of the Spaniards to be indissolubly connected with the happiness and liberty of the universe; how shall we account then for their luke-warmness in its support, or explain their efforts to counteract its success? They may make whatever professions of attachment they please; their professions are but a poor compensation for the manifest injury they do it, by impressing on the minds of their readers the probability of its miscarriage, and consequently doing every thing to relax their exertions in its behalf. Had they, from ignorance of the consequences, or from levity, committed themselves in so glaring a manner; their conduct, though not less deplorable, might admit of extenuation: but a justification on these grounds they are as unwilling to offer, as the public to admit; but, for the honour of human nature, we will not attribute to them the extreme perversity, however strongly the tendency and the spirit of their writings may justify suspicion, of being biassed by prepossessions equally unfavourable to Spanish, as to British, independence.—Let the injury they inflict proceed from arrogant vanity, or from systematic malice, the effects are the same; and whether they promote the subjugation of the Spanish people, from the silly, pittiful desire of irritating the feelings (in their vocabulary prejudices) of their countrymen; or from sentiments favourable to the invaders, their motives are equally criminal and worthy of abhorrence.

In the first burst of a great, worthy, and, at the same time, unexpected occurrence, the writer, who, in the contemplation of its consequences, cannot forget his little passions and animosities, who adverts to it only for the purpose of gratifying his selfishness, is cursed with more than cynical indifference; and whilst he bewilders half-thinkers by the boldness of his paradoxes, he fundamentally subverts the vacillating morality of those soi-disant philosophers, whose notions of society and government are as incoherent and impracticable, as their ethics are unsocial and unintelligible. On the minds and feelings of those weak individuals, the virus of their opinions operates with alarming effect, and they propagate a moral and political contagion which no subsequent efforts can totally eradicate.

These are the reflections we made on reading the former number of the Edinburgh Review; and we waited with no inconsiderable share of anxiety and impatience, to see if they would, in their next, by a solemn recantation of their error, and by a voluntary acknowledgment of the profligate tendency of their doctrines, endeavour to efface the painful impression of their revolting and brutal indifference to the heroic exertions of a community, struggling at the risk of life, fortune, and every thing dear to men, for that very freedom those writers affect so much to venerate. But how great was the astonishment and indignation of the public at seeing, instead of this recantation suggested by candour, as well as commiseration, for the unprovoked sufferings of an innocent and brave nation, these Reviewers employ the basest insinuations, rendered doubly offensive by a mixture of taunt, sarcasm, and the vilest ridicule, in noticing the exposition of Don Pedro Cevallos. If we did not feel it a duty incumbent on us to point out their indiscretion as well as criminality, we should feel decided objections to give, through the channel of our Paper, a further circulation to their cruel and atrocious aspersions. We select the following paragraphs, among many, of a character equally offensive. "With regard to himself, it is "enough to say, that, after all his pretended protestations "against the unprincipled violence and insulting usurpa- "tion of the French Court, he was asked to accept the "place of first minister to King Joseph Napoleon—and "that he accepted of that offer. It is useless, after this; "to attend to his humiliating equivocations, or to enter "into any discussion of his prior apostacy from the cause "of Charles to that of Ferdinand. There is no honest "man to whom his own statement of the two leading "facts we have now mentioned will not be quite satisfac- "tory, and perfectly conclusive indeed, as to personal "character of Don Pedro Cevallos." . . . . . "There "is something not only incredible, but ludicrous, in the "story which Don Pedro tells, of the free and affectionate "resignation of this unfortunate monarch, whom he re- "presents, like some sentimental old gentleman in a Ger" man comedy, taking his elderly consort by the hand " and addressing her in these touching words:—Maria " Louisa, we will retire to one of the provinces, where we " will pass our days in tranquillity; and Ferdinand, who " is a young man, will take upon himself the burden of the " government. The innocence of the galleries might perhaps tolerate this trait of Bucolic sublimity; but there " is no pit in Europe that would endure it even in a play." Such are the sensations which the simple unaffected narrative of Don Pedro Cevallos produced in the writers of the Edinburgh Review—a narrative, which, to the honour of Englishmen, excited such universal pity and indignation in this country—this narrative, which exposes the successful machinations of a dark, intriguing, remorseless ruffian, against the unfortunate Royal Family of Spain, by which they were deprived in a moment of throne and liberty, and their lives placed at the discretion of a capricious sanguinary tyrant; by which they were flung from the summit of earthly grandeur to the lowest stage of human misery and degradation. This narrative excites no sympathy, no indignation, no horror in the Reviewer; but with the most sovereign defiance of moral and social obligations, with the most supreme contempt of what others thought or felt on the occasion, he notices it with no other intention than to gratify the worst and basest passions of the human heart, and to expose the excesses, rancour, infatuation, and inconsistency of mere party-writers. A little reflection might have taught them that their sarcastic insinuations tended to repress the zeal of the public in support of a cause, which they acknowledge themselves is so closely connected with the security and happiness of this country. This acknowledgment points out, in the clearest light, their total want of principle, and their indifference, not only to the ultimate success of the Spaniards, but to the future security of the British islands.

They could not certainly have the cause of the Spaniards at heart, when they resorted to the most unwarrantable and unfounded allusions, to render the principal and most ostensible actors odious and contemptible, and the sanguinary catastrophe itself a subject of derision and pleasantry. Let us suppose even that their attack on the candour and integrity of Cevallos and his associates were as just as it is unprincipled and iniquitous, and we will entreat them to explain their motives for making it; for they must have known that it injures the common cause, and contributes, however minutely, to weaken the confidence existing between the two countries. The triumph of virtue, or the promotion of the reciprocal advantage of the two countries, could not have been their object, for they cannot be ignorant that facts might exist, the exposition of which could offer the most vital blow to the interests of society. This was unquestionably one of that kind, and when we consider that the men they have been calumniating are now flying before a ruthless, savage invader, we cannot but execrate the cold unfeeling pride, and the dogmatic obduracy, which induced these Reviewers to deprive, as far as lay in their power, these generous fugitives of the only stay they will perhaps soon have under Heaven—the sympathy and veneration of Britons. Unprincipled and unfeeling dogmatists! while you are ranting and declaiming, without exposing your property or persons, about freedom and rights, those men, whom you basely asperse, are risking fortune, life, and country, in their defence. This is fact, and the best refutation of your malevolent imputations.

We cannot close this article, without adverting to the disastrous intelligence received on Thursday last, of the severe defeat sustained by Castanos. Without entering into any details of this loss, or hazarding any conjectures as to its extent or immediate consequences, we will only give our decided opinion, that were it as true as rumour represents it, it would be far from extinguishing the sacred flame of liberty which has burst out so spontaneously, and will still continue to glow in every province of Spain. The remorseless ruffian, who is now deluging that country with the blood of her children, has perhaps before now executed his menace of placing the crown of the unanointed Ferdinand on the head of his brother; but the ceremony of the coronation, performed amidst the execrations of the inhabitants of the capital, is far from securing his brother the possession of the peninsula. Not a tenth part of the work is performed. The spirit of the Patriots is not yet broke down. Their mountains offer now, as it did against the Romans and Moors, a retreat to persecuted patriotism. The invaders may ravage the country from one extremity to another, and the inhabitants be reduced to forced submission, as long as the whole force of the invaders occupies their country. But their hatred is too inveterate, the injuries they sustained too grievous, to admit the possibility of their being reconciled to the usurpation, or submitting, in despondent apathy, to the subjugation of their country. The seeds of resistance and insurrection are so deedly planted, to be eradicated; and the immense fund which the constrained submission of Spain will secure, gives Austria an advantageous opportunity of making new efforts for her own preservation and that of Europe. The Spaniards have already furnished a great example of patience, under privations the most cruel;—The Nobles, the Priests, the Members of the Provincial Juntas, and those of the different Councils, have taken too decided a part to hope for pardon or reconciliation;—They have all compromised themselves too much to expect security from submission; and when we reflect on their numbers and influence; when we take into consideration the desperate state of their fortunes, and the impossibility they are placed in of retrieving it but by the most heroic courage and perseverance, we feel no difficulty in declaring that the subjugation of that country is absolutely impracticable. We will make here no professions of the profound horror we felt on receiving the account of the reverses sustained by Castanos; but our opinion of the ultimate success of the Patriots is unalterable. It is not to the military force on the Ebro that we looked for this result; it was from the unconquerable spirit of the whole male population that we expected it. The operations of the inexorable conqueror will be bold, rapid, and executed with his usual ability, but the Spaniards have offended too much, to trust to his clemency or moderation. The distrust on both sides is too profound and too just, the abhorrence of the tyrant himself too inveterate, to leave an opening for reconciliation. The gates of mercy and pardon are shut for ever to the inhabitants, in their own opinion; and, for six months, the towns and villages, the pulpit, and the bar, have resounded with execrations and cries of vengeance against Bonaparte. To remove from their minds this impression, neither promises nor intrigue will avail; and when all have transgressed, to use the language of their oppressor, they will seek, in their own courage and perseverance, the safety they despair and abhor to receive from the invader.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH AND DUTCH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

FIRST BULLETIN OF THE ARMY IN SPAIN.

VITTORIA, Nov. 9.—Position of the French army on the 25th October.

Head Quarters at Vittoria.

The Marshal Duke of Conegliano, with his left wing along the Banks of the Arragon and the Ebro. His Head Quarters at Rafalia.

The Marshal Duke of Elchingen is with his Head Quarters at Guardia.

The Marshal Duke of Istria has his Head Quarters at Miranda, with a garrison at Fort Pancorba.

The General of Division Merlin occupies, with one division, the heights of Durango, and presses upon the enemy, who seem disposed to attack the heights of Mondragon.

The Marshall Duke of Dantzic, having arrived with the Divisions of Sebastiani and Laval, the King was pleased to order the division of Merlin to return.

The enemy being in the mean time in force at Leria, and having occupied Viana, and several posts on the left bank of the Ebro, the King ordered the Duke of Conegliano to advance against the enemy. General Wattier commander of the cavalry, and the Brigades of Generals Habert, Brune, and Razout, preceded against the enemy's posts. On the 27th of October the enemy were defeated at all points. Twelve hundred men who were surrounded in Lerin, at first shewed a disposition to defend themselves; but General Grandjean having made his arrangements, defeated them completely, making prisoners, one Colonel, two Lieut.-Colonels, forty Officers, and 1200 soldiers. These troops formed part of the camp at St. Roque before Gibraltar. At the same time Marshal the Duke of Elchingen, marched from Lougrono, passed the Ebro, took 300 of the enemy prisoners, pursued them several miles, and re-established the bridge of Logrona. In consequence of this event, the Spanish General Pignatelli, who commanded the Insurgents, was stoned by them.

The troops of the traitor Romana, and the Spanish prisoners in England, landed by the English in Spain, with the divisions of Gallicia, making together a force of 30,000 men, threatened from Bilboa, Marshal, the Duke of Dantzic, who, lead on by a noble ardour, advanced upon them on the 31st of October, and drove them at the point of the bayonet from all their positions. The troops of the Confederation of the Rhine, and particularly the corps of Baden, distinguished themselves.

The Marshal Duke of Dantzic closely followed up his pursuit of the enemy, the whole 1st of November, as far as Guenes, and entered Bilboa. In that city considerable magazines were found. Several Englishmen were made prisoners. The enemy's loss, in killed and wounded, was considerable; but we took very few of them prisoners. Our loss consists of only 50 killed and 100 wounded. However praiseworthy this action was, it was to be wished that it had not taken place. The Spanish corps was in a situation to have been completely cut off.

"The corps of Marshal Victor having just arrived, was detached from Victoria to Orduna. On the 7th of November, the enemy, re-inforced by fresh troops from St. Andero, occupied the height of Guenes. The Marshal Duke of Dantzic advanced against them, and broke through their centre. The 58th and 82d regiments distinguished themselves upon this occasion.

Had these events occurred in the plains, not a man of the enemy would have escaped; but the mountains of St. Andero and Bilboa are impassable. The Duke of Dantzic pursued the foe during the whole of the day in the passes of Valmaseda.

In these various affairs, the enemy have lost, in killed and wounded, from 3500 to 4000 men.

The Duke of Dantzic particularly praises the Generals of Division Laval and Sebastiani, the Dutch General Chassey, Col. Lacoste, of the 27th Regiment of Light Infantry, Col. Raco, of the 82d Regiment of the Line, and the Cols. of the Regiments of Baden and Nassau, upon whom his Majesty has conferred rewards.

The army is abundantly supplied with provisions, and the weather is very fine.

Our columns are marching forward, and combining their movements. It is supposed that the Head Quarters will move forwards to night from Vittoria.

SECOND BULLETIN OF THE ENEMY OF SPAIN.

BURGOS, Nov. 12.—The Duke of Dalmatia entered Valmaseda, in pursuit of the foe.

On the 8th General Sebastiani discovered the rear-guard of the Insurgents posted upon a high hill to the right of Valmaseda; he immediately advanced against them, defeated them, and took about 100 of them prisoners.

In the mean time, the city of Burgos was occupied by the army of Estremadura, consisting of three divisions. The advanced guard was composed of Walloons and Spanish guards; and the students of the Universities of Salamanca and Leria, divided into several battalions, and some regiments of the line, with other corps raised since the insurrection of Badajoz, made the whole of the army amount to little short of 20,000 men. The command of the cavalry of the army was given to Marshal the Duke of Istria; and the Emperor confided the command of the second corps to Marshal the Duke of Dalmatia.

On the 10th, at day-break, the latter Marshal marched at the head of the division of Mouton, to reconnoitre the enemy. On reaching Gamnah, he was received with the discharge of thirty pieces of artillery. This was the signal for advancing at the pas de charge; the infantry of the division of Mouton attacked them, supported by the artillery. The Walloon and the Spanish guards were defeated at the first onset. The Duke of Istria, at the head of his cavalry, attacked them in flank. The enemy were completely routed, 3000 of them being left dead on the field. We took twelve pair of colours, twenty-five pieces of cannon, and three thousand prisoners. The remainder were completely dispersed. Our troops entered the city of Burgos, intermixed with the enemy, and the cavalry pursued them in all directions.

This army of Estremadura, which had come from Madrid by forced marches, whose first enterprise was the assassination of their unfortunate General, Count Torres, and which was completely equipped with English arms, besides being in the pay of England, is no longer in existence. The Col. of the Walloon Guards, and a considerable number of the superior Officers, are prisoners. Our loss was very inconsiderable, consisting only of twelve or fifteen killed, and at most fifty wounded; only one Captain was killed by a cannon-ball.

This affair, which we owe to the excellent dispositions of the Duke of Dalmatia, and the intrepidity with which the Duke of Istria led on the cavalry, does the greatest honour to the division of Mouton; though the corps composing that division consists of corps whose name alone has for a long time been a title of honour.

The castle of Burgos has been occupied. It contains in good condition, in cannon and ammunition of all sorts, wine, and grain.

On the 11th the Emperor reviewed the division of General Bonnet, and immediately detached it towards the entrance of the passes of St. Andero.

The position of the army this day is as follows:

The Marshal Duke of Belluno is in close pursuit of the remains of the army of Gallicia, who are flying in the direction of Villarcayo and Reynosa, towards which points, the Duke of Dalmatia is also marching. They can have no other resource than that of dispersing in the mountains, with the loss of artillery, baggage, and every thing that constitutes an army.

THIRD BULLETIN OF THE ARMY IN SPAIN.

BURGOS, Nov. 13.—The army of Gallicia, which fled from Bilboa, is pursued by the Marshal Duke of Belluno, in the direction of Espinosa; by the Marshal Duke of Dantzic, in the direction of Villarcayo, and at Reynosa is surrounded by the Marshal Duke of Dalmatia. Important events must take place in that quarter.

General Milhaut, with his division of cavalry, has entered Palencia, and has sent off detachments towards the outlets of Reynosa, in pursuit of the park of artillery of the army of Gallicia.

The young students of Salamanca, who thought to accomplish the conquest of France, the fanatical peasants, who already dreamed of plundering Bayonne and Bourdeaux, and imagined themselves led on by all the Saints, being misled by the treacherous Monks, are dispossessed of their foolish fancies. Their despair and dismay are at their height. They deplore the misfortunes of which they are become the prey, the lies which they have been made to believe, and the struggle, without an object, in which they are involved.

The whole plain of Castile is already overspread by our cavalry. The zeal and ardour of our troops enable them to perform marches of fourteen or fifteen miles a day. Our piquets are on the Duero. The whole coast of St. Andero and Bilboa completely swept of the enemy.

The unfortunate city of Burgos, a prey to all the miseries of a town taken by storm, tremble, with dismay. Priests, monks, inhabitants, fled upon the first news of the battle; terrified lest the soldiers of the army of Estremadura should attempt to defend themselves in the houses, which resolution they probably made known beforehand; first plundered by these, and afterwards by our soldiers, who entered the houses, in order to drive out their enemies, and found there no inhabitants.

Such men as M. Von Steine, who, from want of troops of the line, which our eagles could not oppose, form to themselves the exalted idea of raising the people in a mass, have become witnesses of the misfortunes which they have brought upon themselves, and of the small obstacles which such auxiliaries can oppose to regular troops.

At Burgos and in its neighbourhood, wool to the value of thirty millions has been found, which his Majesty has caused to be sequestrated. All of it that belongs to the Monks, and to those persons that have formed a part of the insurrection, shall be declared forfeited, and shall be first set apart for the indemnification of the French, for the losses which they have sustained; for in the City of Madrid, Frenchmen, who had been settled there even for forty years, have been robbed of every thing, and the Spaniards who were true to their King have been declared emigrants. The property of Azanza, a most virtuous and intelligent minister; of Masseredo, a most experienced seaman; of O'Farril, the best soldier in Spain, has been exposed to public sale. The property of Campo Alanje, respectable for his virtues, his rank, and his fortune, the proprietor of 60,000 Merinos, and of three millions of income, has been the prey of these infuriated men.

Another measure determined upon by the Emperor, is the confiscation of all the goods of English manufacture, and of all the colonial produce which has been disbanded in Spain since the period of the insurrection. The merchants of London have thus done very well in sending their goods to Lisbon, to Oporto, and to the Spanish ports. The more they shall send, the greater will be the contributions which they will pay us.

The city of Palencia, governed by a worthy Bishop, has received our troops with affection. That city suffers none of the miseries of war. An honest Bishop, who, animated by Christian charity, fulfils the precepts of the Gospel, and from whose lips nothing but honey distils, is the greatest blessing which Heaven confers upon man. An intemperate, odious, and infuriated Bishop who preaches up nothing but rebellion, uproar, disorder, and war, is a curse whom God in his anger gives to mankind, to mislead them in the very source of morality itself.

There is a great number of Monks confined in the prisons of Burgos. The peasants throw stones at them---"Wretches!" said they to them, "it is you who have plunged us into this abyss of miseries. Perhaps we shall never again behold our unfortunate wives, our dear children. Wretches! a just God will punish you in Hell for all the miseries which you have caused to our families, and our native country."

FOURTH BULLETIN OF THE ARMY IN SPAIN.

Burgos, Nov. 15.—Yesterday his Majesty reviewed the division of Marchand, filled up the vacancies with the most deserving officers, and distributed rewards to the soldiers who had distinguished themselves. His Majesty is extremely well satisfied with those troops who have cheerfully marched, without halting, from the Banks of the Vistula.

The Duke of Elchingen has marched from Burgos. This morning his Majesty reviewed his guards on the plains of Burgos. His Majesty afterwards inspected the division of Dessolles, and made appointments to all the vacancies in that division. Important events are at hand; all the troops are in motion. Nothing can be done in war without following a well concerted plan. Among the prisoners there were some who had engraved on their buttons a fallen eagle, pierced by two arrows, with the inscription—"To the Conqueror of France." In this ridiculous gasconade the countrymen of Don Quixotte may be recognized.

Worse troops cannot be found, whether employed on the mountains or in the plains. Clownishly ignorant, foolishly obstinate, cruel towards the weak, mean and cowardly towards the strong. Such is the spectacle they exhibit to us. The Monks and the Inquisition have bewildered this nation.

Ten thousand light cavalry and dragoons, with 24 pieces of cannon, [illegible] on the 11th, to fall upon the rear of the English [illegible] was said to be at Valladolid. These brave [illegible] two days, but our expectations were frustrated. We have entered Palencia and Valladolid, and have pushed on six miles further—still none of the English, but prospects and assurances of finding them.

In the mean time, it appears certain, that a division of their troops have been disembarked at Corunna, and that another division entered Badajos in the beginning of this month. The day on which we shall meet them, will be a festival for the French army. May their blood die that Continent which they have desolated by their intrigues, their monopoly, and their horrible selfishness. Would they were, instead of 20,000, 80 or 100,000 strong, then would the English mothers learn what are the miseries of war, and the English Government would no longer continue to sport with the blood and the lives of the people of the Continent. The grossest falsehoods, the basest means are practised by English Machiavelism to mislead the nation, but the great body of the people is good. Biscay, Navarre, Old Castile, and even the greatest part of Arragon, are animated by an excellent spirit. The nation in general views with profound sorrow the abyss into which it has been endeavoured to plunge it, and will therefore curse the cause of so many evils.

Florida Blanca, who was at the head of the insurgents, is the same who was Minister under Charles the Third: he has always been the sworn enemy of France, and a zealous partizan of England. It is to be hoped that in his last days he will acknowledge the errors of his political life. He is an old man, who, to the blindest attachment to England, joins the most unbounded religious superstition. His confidents and friends are fanatics and stupid Monks.

Tranquillity is restored in Burgos and its environs. The first moment of fury has been succeeded by confidence. The peasants have returned to their villages and resumed their labours.

His Majesty the Emperor is with his guard at Burgos.

General Milhaud is marching with his division upon Palencia. General Lasalle has taken possession of Lerma.

Thus, in an instant, have the armies of Gallicia been defeated, dispersed, and partly annihilated, notwithstanding that all the corps of our army have not yet come up. Three-fourths of the cavalry, and almost one half of the infantry, remain behind.

The army of the insurgents exhibited the most singular contrast. In the pockets of the Officers who were killed were found lists of companies, having some of them the name of Company of Brutus, and some of them Company of the People. There were Companies of Students, and others that had the names of Saints. Such were the military bands that composed the insurgent army of the peasants. Anarchy and confusion—these were what England sowed in Spain. What will she reap from them? The hatred of this brave people, when they are once enlightened, and under a good Government; for the rest the extravagance of the leaders of the insurgents is every where notorious.—Among the standards that have fallen into our hands are some bearing a representation of the Lion of Spain tearing in pieces the Imperial Eagle. And who are they that have indulged in such emblems? The worst troops that are in Europe.

The cavalry of the army of Estremadura could not even so much as face us. The instant the 10th regiment of chasseurs came in sight of them, they were put to the rout, and were no longer to be seen.

The Emperor reviewed the corps of the Duke of Dalmatia previous to its marching from Burgos in pursuit of the rear of the army of Gallicia. His Majesty has made various promotions, distributed rewards, and is extremely well satisfied with the conduct of these troops. He has expressed his satisfaction to the conquerors of Medina, Rio Seco, and Burgos, the Marshal Duke of Istria, and Generals Merle and Mouton.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE FROM SPAIN.

Corunna, Nov. 27.—Yesterday the Minerva frigate arrived here from St. Andero. She sailed on the 23d inst. previous to which her crew, by the orders of their Captain, and with the consent of the inhabitants, destroyed the batteries, after having spiked and dismounted the cannon. At five o'clock on the morning of 23d, the Bishop of St. Andero, with the whole of his family, embarked on board the Minerva. Several other families of distinction in that town were also received on board, and landed at Gijon. Yesterday the Hebe frigate arrived here, and shortly after she had dropped anchor, a Spanish brig came in with the Bishop of Gijon; Mr. Hunter, the British Consul at Gijon, and family; also several other residents, who had left Gijon under a belief that there was no e are still in a state of suspence respecting the situation of ral Blake and his army. It is, however, ascertained that as suffered severely, in consequence of the baseness and rdice of many of his Officers. General P——li, in parti-, is accused of having betrayed the trust and confidence re- in him. He was unfortunately entrusted with the com- in the centre of the army, and shortly after the battle ienced, he treacherously made an opening for the French s to march through, which they did, to the astonishment neral Blake, and the confusion of his men. The discom- of the whole army is attributed to this act of treachery. ard against such conduct, General Blake has superseded l General Officers and others of inferior rank, who have ucceeded by Serjeants and Corporals of military capacity, merit, and experience. The appointment of these men k in the army appears to meet with general approbation. n afraid the fate of Spain is decided, and that the French e in possession of Madrid before Christmas. If Bona- should gain another battle, the consternation which will duced, I am afraid, will be attended with very serious . I am persuaded there never were so many of Bona- spies in any place since the commencement of his career, e are in this town at present. It is filled by foreigners. Italians have arrived here before and since Sir David s expedition, who are suspected by many, and a number se persons came from England. There are no vigilant officers here for the detection of such characters, and it is ny man may practise the part of a spy with perfect im- . This is a very fine populous country; the men are robust, and strong, notwithstanding which the recruit- s on very slowly. There is no stimulus; the men want agement to join the armies of their country. The recent ls are sufficient to dishearten them, for however deplor- eir present condition may be, they are unwilling to ex- it for danger, nakedness, and starvation.

ANOTHER LETTER.

UNNA, Nov. 28.—A division of the French army has quest of the forces under Sir D. BAIRD, who, in conse- has thought fit to fall back upon Lugo. The British vere joined by 4 or 5000 Gallicians, and, I am sorry to t many of these have conducted themselves improperly, rs have deserted. an Moore's army is 25,000 strong, and is falling back in on of a visit from the enemy in considerable force.— Moore has with him about 10,000 Portuguese, in whom he can place little confidence.

ANOTHER LETTER.

NA, Dec. 1.—Advices are this instant received of the Castanos by the French, and of the total dispersion of He was completely surprized, for he was induced to ross the Ebro from false information of the weakness under Marshal Moncey, and was drawn into a trap, l upon his rear, as soon as the army of Blake had d of, and the result was fatally dreadful. Sir John Moore is at Salamanca, without General Hope is at Madrid with horse, but without foot; and General Baird is at Astorga with his horse, in a condition totally unfit for service. They are dying daily in numbers, and the highways are strewed with their carcasses.—Nothing can equal the dismay which prevails here. God knows how our armies will get off! Certainly our artillery must be left behind, for the poor beasts of horses that remain alive are unfit to drag the guns through the execrable roads."

ANOTHER LETTER.

CORUNNA, DEC. 1.—The neglect and inattention among persons of influence in this province has been highly criminal One hundred thousand men might have been found with convenience in Gallicia alone, but the efficacious means for such an important purpose have been disregarded. A decree of the Central Junta has passed, by which 550,000 men are to be raised, under which dignitaries of the Church, Religious Orders, Bachelors, Doctors, and Professors of Divinity, are not to be excused. The nobility are also included, and by such resolute means, the end will ultimately be attained. Some pecuniary contributions will also be necessary until matters are arranged, and until the precious metal can be received from America.

"There a variety of opinions as to the utility of the Provincial Juntas, and as to the policy of dissolving them. It is thought that the gentleness and sang froid of Blake's disposition has been in some degree prejudicial to us. The general opinion is, that as soon as he had led his troops to the mountains, and had obtained some advantages over the French, he should not have admitted the latter to rally and obtain re-inforcements, but should have complied with the wishes of his army, to follow them up to the point of the bayonet. He also took many spies, and, contrary to the practice in war, he did not hang any of them. Besides this it is thought he kept his line too much extended, by which means, the divisions could not operate, and they were too weak to act alone.

In the affair of Reynosa, it is not true that we lost a great number; for those that are put to flight, have generally much nimbler heels than their pursuers. General Romana, who was on that occasion four leagues nearer to Leon, succeeded to the command of the army; and is now endeavouring to restore it. From this Officer much is expected. They say that he has deprived several of commissions they did not know how to employ, which he has conferred on serjeants and others much inferior in rank, but much superior in merit."

After touching on the expedients which had been adopted to obtain reinforcements in Corunna, Ferrol, and Vigo, the letter proceeds:—

The 10,000 English infantry, and 1790 cavalry, which disembarked here, are already at Astorga, and no doubt will unite with the army of Romana. Those which are come to Salamanca, it is said, have obtained an advantage over a body of French, composed of 8000 men, which were endeavouring to penetrate into Portugal; but this wants confirmation. In Portugal there is much roguery; but my friend writes me, under date of the 16th ult. that matters were likely to be placed on a better footing, and that considerable reinforcements were prepared. They write from Madrid, that in Catalonia we go on well; and that brave Province, no doubt, will give sufficient employment to the French rascals who infest it. Report says, that we have taken Rosas; I wish we had got possession of the capital of Catalonia, and then prodigies would be performed in that neighbourhood!

No doubt the French will make a pompous display of their successes, and will tell the world that their victorious troops are next to crush Castanos and Palafox, whom may God protect from their perfidy and violence.

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL.

STOCKHOLM, Nov. 24.—His Royal Majesty has received the following report from the General in Chief of the Finnish Army:—

"My last report was dispatched from hence on the 31st of October, by Lieutenant-Colonel and Adjutant-General Marthean.

"On the 27th of October, an action took place between the fourth brigade of your Majesty's army, and a Russian corps greatly superior in number, in which the loss was very considerable on both sides, without any signal advantage having been obtained.

"Colonel Sandels, Chief of Brigade, has found it advisable with the main body of his division, to fall back to Salanis, th miles on this side of Idensalmi, leaving, however, his advance posts in Wierima, by which to cover the environs of those places; but, it is to be apprehended, that the want of forage has obliged him by this time to retreat to Nassila.

"On the 5th instant, the enemy attacked our posts at Sippoberg, in the vicinity of Koligocki, and forced our troops, by a cannonade kept up with a great vigour, to fall back; the enemy thereupon threw a bridge into the river, and formed another attack on our advanced position, which he forced to make a retrograde movement and join the main body of our troops posted near Kalajocki river. The Russians continued their attack the two following days, without making the least impression on your Majesty's troops. In the mean time the enemy constructed a bridge across that river near Alawieska, and crossed it with a strong detachment of infantry. As soon as report of this movement had been received, orders were given to attack and repulse the troops, who had passed the river. Although this attack proved successful, yet the extreme want of forage compelled the army to take up another position near Pyhajocki, whence it will fall back to Pakilla; and I have strong reason to apprehend that, considering the superiority of the enemy and the want of forage, it will not prove possible for your Majesty's army to maintain that position for any length of time. In addition to the above want of forage, which it will be hardly possible to supply at the present season, the dampness of the weather, and the severe fatigues, sustained by your Majesty's troops under my command, almost continually obliged to be on their arms, have greatly increased the number of the sick, who exceed 6000, and whose transport and removal increase our difficulties in a very considerable degree. But in spite of all these difficulties, I shall strenuously endeavour to impede and obstruct the enemy's progress, as far as circumstances shall, in any way, permit.

C. N. De Klerker, General in Chief of the Northern Finnish Army.

Head-quarters, Brahestad, Nov. 10, 1808.

Stockholm, Nov. 22.—Major-General Morner, who in absence of Field-Marshal Baron Toll, commands the Southern Finnish army, has transmitted to His Majesty the following report of a naval action which took place on the 10th inst. off Helsingbourgh.—"This afternoon four sail hove in sight, which soon after were ascertained to be two English cutters and two merchantmen, which they had under convoy. When the said four sail had reached the altiude of Hillarp-reef, six Danish gun-boats and two armed vessels put off from Elsineur, and attacked the headmost cutter, which had parted company with the rest that were standing with the Swedish coast. The English cutter fought most gallantly, but could hardly have escaped being taken, had not our battery opened upon the enemy, which our fire seemed to do much execution. The Danish gun-boats thereupon left the latter, and stood towards the other three sail which immediately began to cannonade them although at some distance, and three English gun-boats heaving in sight soon after the Danish gun-boats stood off, and retreated with all possible haste under the guns of the fortress of Oronenburgh, which commenced a heavy cannonade, most vigourously answered and kept up by the English until all the ships had cleared the Danish coast.

One Danish gun-boat was considerably damaged, and one of the enemy's armed vessels is stated to have foundered. The loss on the part of the English is very trifling.

G. R. Cederstrom.

PROVINCIALS.

Last week was held at Hetling-House, Bath, the Anniversary of the Bath and West of England Society for the encouragement of Agriculture, Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, which was most numerously attended by Nobility, Members of Parliament, and the principal Gentlemen of the Society, from various parts of the West of England, and of the nation at large. His Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester being present, and condescending to be appointed an Honorary Member, gave peculiar felicity to this Meeting. The exhibitions of Live Stock were more valuable than numerous, and deemed better than for several years past. The samples of manufacture in broad cloth, kersimere, corduroys, shawls, stockings, &c. were numerous and most excellent, evincing the growing importance of the Anglo-Merino wool, from which they were made, and which, so far from degenerating, evidently increases in firmness of pile, to the great satisfaction of the Society, and with every prospect of permanent advantage to the community. Carcasses, also, of this mixture of sheep were exhibited in a slaughtered state, the mutton of which was beautiful. Several useful implements in mechanics were produced for the Society's approbation. On the whole this Meeting was highly important. The Members, with their President, dined together at the White Hart on the principal days and much interesting discussion was maintained till the final close of the sittings.

A Sporting Bet.—On Saturday last several Gentlemen met at Great Baddow, to decide a very singular bet, that a dog, (between the hound and spaniel) the property of Mr. William Bridges Wiggins, of Little Sir Hugh's, should without the assistance of any other dog, run down a hare which was to be found for him. The hare was started in the presence of upwards of twenty horsemen, when Tatler immediately set about his work, and after an hour's hard running, during which time the dog and hare crossed two rivers, the dog won the bet, never losing scent during the chase. The bets were universally in favour of the hare, but to the astonishment of every sportsman present, the dog performed what was thought almost impossible, being eight years old and nearly blind. The same bet has been made again, and is to be decided to-morrow, at Great Baddow—the hare the favourite.

Charge of Witchcraft.—Ann Izzard, an elderly dame, of Great Paxton, in Huntingdonshire, was lately accused by her neighbours of having bewitched three persons of the names of Alice Brown, Fanny Amey, and Mary Fox. The supposition was so strongly confirmed by the overturning of a cart, drawn by a restive horse, the property of a grocer in the village, that her neighbours resolved without delay to inflict upon her the summary punishment they thought she so justly merited. The cottage in which Ann lived with her husband, Wright Izzard, is at some distance from the body of the village at Paxton. Thither they marched in the silence of night, and having reached the door of the poor man's house, they broke it open, and inhumanly dragged his wife out of her bed, and threw her naked into the yard, where her arms were torn with pins, her head dashed against the large stones of the causeway, and her face, stomach, and breast severely bruised with a thick stick, that served as a bar to the house. In about five days after this, finding the old lady still alive, they paid her a second visit, and treated her with the same cruelty as before. Learning that she was not dead the next morning, they resolved to see whether she could not be drowned at night, but fortunately for all parties, this experiment was frustrated by the timely removal of the poor object to a neighbouring village, where, under the protection of a worthy clergyman, she now is free from the further persecution of her barbarous and ignorant neighbours.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

London,

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Dispatches were received on Thursday last from Sir D. Baird, dated Astorga the 29th ult. They refer to a severe Defeat, sustained by General Castanos on the Ebro. Sir J. Moore, who received the intelligence of this disaster from Madrid, had enjoined Sir. D. Baird to retreat to Vigo, with the force under his command, and embark there for the Tagus, where they were to unite. The heavy artillery and the stores which were in the rear of Sir David Baird's position at Astorga, were directed to fall back upon Corunna, and to be instantly re-embarked.—A part had actually been embarked when the last accounts came away.

Sir John Moore was to begin his retreat on the 30th; it is doubtful whether he would return by the way he came, and take up a position at Lisbon, or whether he would take the route from Salamanca to Oporto.

According to private accounts from Corunna, the defeat sustained by the Spaniards, has been of a most decisive nature; but the place and the time where and when the battle was fought, we are left to conjecture. The accounts circulated last week of advantages obtained by Castanos, appear to be well-founded; for he was induced in consequence of a retrograde movement of the enemy, whether a stratagem or not on their part, we are ignorant to pass the Ebro, in order to pursue them in their retreat. Whilst he was engaged in this pursuit, Ney, who was before engaged against General Blake, was detached by Bonaparte for Burgos, and is supposed to have crossed the Ebro in the rear of the Spanish General. The army under Castanos, which was looked to with the greatest confidence by the Spaniards, was thus taken between two fires, and is said to have been totally routed and dispersed. A disaster of such extent and consequence has totally changed the aspect of military affairs in that country, and there is reason to attribute to it the retreat of the British forces.

It was stated in prior accounts that the Marquis de la Romana had a force of 20,000 men at Leon; but it now appears, that he had, at the date of the last dispatches, no more than 6000 there; but he expected a reinforcement of 16,000 men. The enemy were baffled in their attempt to intercept his artillery, for he has a park of 30 pieces at Leon. This intrepid officer is said to have expressed much dissatisfaction, and remonstrated strongly against the retreat of Sir David Baird's force.

We know nothing of the Army of Catalonia; nor of General Palafox, nor of the further progress of the French. It is, however, reported that they entered Madrid on the 27th ult. and thus Bonaparte has executed one part of his menace. The second is "that not a British soldier will be in Spain at the end of the year".—Our Ministers will answer for that.

The disastrous intelligence, received from Spain on Thursday last, has excited praise-worthy sympathy in the breasts of Englishmen; but it is not by lamentations, nor by effusions of regret for the disasters sustained by that brave people, that we can repair their loss. A louring despondency began to cloud almost every brow, because General Castanos was severely beaten on the Ebro. But the particulars of this engagement, and the time when it was fought, we are totally unacquainted with. Ministers have only had the condescension to allow one sweeping sentence of their alarming account to transpire; for fear, we suppose, the account, in all its horror, might have too shocking an effect on the weak nerves of their countrymen. Do they entertain this paltry opinion of British vigour and constancy? for shame! let them know to appreciate better the character of this country, and in fact of every other; for when men possessed of energy direct the affairs of a people, the latter are energetic, and are not to be beat down by one or two reverses. The unaccountable, and ill-advised silence, maintained by Ministers on the occurrences in Spain, has been the cause of the extreme uneasiness manifested by the public for the two last days; and we advise them, as they regard their own reputation, and the promotion of the common cause, to be more communicative for the future of the dispatches they receive, and not to allow a thousand alarming rumours to agitate the public, and to magnify the reverses. To this want of common prudence, to this diffidence in the magnanimity of their countrymen, they must attribute so many rumours disadvantageous to their own character, patriotism, and courage, which have circulated since Thursday last. For otherwise not the most inveterate of their antagonists, not the most personal of their enemies, would have dared accuse them of the baseness and pusillanimity of their in-countermanded orders for the sailing of transports with artillery and other reinforcements for Spain. Such imputations of incapacity, want of spirit, and ignorance of the simplest principles of policy, are only a trifling consequence of this imprudent reserve. The public, when they hear buzzed about, that the men who have the best means of ascertaining the extent of the calamity, begin already to despond, will think the state of affairs desperate. Is this, then, the result of all our fond hopes? Is this the promised dawn of a happier day? Is this the use made of the resources and energies of Great Britain? are those the blustering promises of salvation to Spain, independence to Europe, of a check to the inroads of ambition, and of permanant prosperity to this country? We blush for shame and indignation at the base and dastardly reports circulated at present; which, if verified, throw an eternal stigma on our name, justify the most violent imputations of the enemy, and leave the fortunes of Great Britain a prey to folly, and fluctuating between fear and despondency. No man, who is a friend to the honour and independence of his country, could have heard these reports without blushing at the credulity which believed them, and execrating the folly and cowardice which suggested them. They went so far as to advance that our whole army was to quit Spain, and to abandon that gallant community to the gripe of its remorseless invaders. The Minister, who would have the pusillanimity to sign or consent to a similar order, deserves to be impeached, and may be certain of not escaping the punishment due to his cowardice. It is not for the purpose of parading an army of 35,000 men from the Tagus to one of the frontier provinces of Spain, or marching another of 15,000 from Coruuna to Astorga, that the public left them at unrestrained discretion to wield their energies and employ their resources. But they confided to their prudence and abilities the honorable task of repelling the French from Spain, and liberating her brave inhabitants. Should they have the weakness, in a moment of surprise, to debate on the expediency of recalling our troops ignominiously to our own shores, scouted at their departure by the enemy, for not daring to face them, and execrated by the Spaniards for abandoning them to their merciless invaders; we implore them to renounce the ill-fated resolution, to entertain a juster opinion of their country, and of the bravery of a British army; not to despond so easily and in so unwarrantable a manner, of the noble cause we have embarked in. We will exclaim to them as the Spartan Hero did to the desponding Lacedemonians, who fled from the protection of their country:—"Gentlemen, you are mistaken, you have taken a wrong post." The English shores are not the places assigned our army; fly and seize the Sierra Morena, pour a large additional force into Andalusia; instead of countermanding the force ready for embarkation, double, treble their numbers; and, before the expiration of four weeks, let an army of seventy thousand men form in the South of Spain an impregnable bulwark to the encroachments of the enemy, and a rallying point to the Patriots who will crowd to our standards from every province of the peninsula. Act with the same energy, and employ the same means, as if the enemy had landed at Portsmouth. Fight for the liberties of Great Britain on the plains of Andalusia. Let new levies be raised; let our patriotic army be constantly reinforced. Appeal with confidence to the arms and purses of Englishmen. Ask them if they are afraid of encountering the enemy, and they will immediately tell you they are not. Why should you then fear, or relax? This is not the result you promised the country three months ago, and what you led the Spaniards and Europe to expect. Or do you despair of retrieving the state of affairs in Spain? You should have anticipated all this last Summer; because you know the enemy is neither remiss, nor inactive. If you acted imprudently, if you have miscalculated the means of the invader, retrieve your imprudence and miscalculation by your subsequent conduct. Fly not from the scene of action, which a most unexpected, a most unhoped for occurrence pointed out to us. We thanked Heaven, six months ago, for its happening; and, since that period, we never ceased congratulating one another, that this glorious opportunity had occurred for liberating the Continent. Shall, then, one unfortunate event blast all our hopes, and confound all our projects! Were we, for a single moment, ignorant or doubtful of the means, activity, and talents of the invader? We knew them to their full extent; they were even magnified; they are so in this very moment; and now, after all our promises, all our hopes, after a vast expenditure of money, which was willingly granted, after every man in the country had united hand and heart in support of the measures adopted by the Cabinet, we shall resort to the dastardly, impolitic, and irretrievable resolution of abandoning the Spanish Patriots to themselves; and consigning our national character, and the reputation of our army to eternal disgrace and abhorrence. Curses seize the Statesman who is base enough to advise it; and traitor enough to perform so abominable a treachery. But no, an English minister cannot be so base, so forgetful of his own reputation, and that of his country, as to consent by one act to rivet the chains of Europe for ever, and ultimately, should that event occur, of our own islands. Let the orders, then, if they have been imprudenly issued, for recalling our troops, and countermanding the embarkation in our ports, be instantaneously recalled; and let future energy and the appearance of 80,000 British soldiers in Andalusia, convince the Spaniards and Europe, that this country is as incapable of violating its engagements as of fearing her enemies. Let military stores, let provisions, let arms be thrown profusely into the Southern Provinces, and the Patriots will rally there in such numbers, that the invaders will soon repent their temerity. Every port in Spain is still open to us; let flying squadrons, along its extensive line of coast, contain arms and men sufficient to keep the enemy on the alert; distract his attention and force. Let us collect the Patriots in every province; arm and encourage them in the sacred cause; and there is not a province of the Peninsula, where the enemy will not have the whole male population to encounter. But if we depart; if we ignominiously abandon the cause;—the idea is distraction, and we shall one day have cause to execrate our pusillanimity.

Dutch Papers arrived on Monday and the day before. They contain four Bulletins, or official reports of the operations of the French armies in Spain. The word official, as referring to the former communications of the government of the Thuilleries on similar subjects, has been synonimous with brutal insolence, perfidious hypocrisy, and extravagant exaggeration. On perusing these Bulletins, our readers will perceive they have lost none of these characteristic marks; they are, on the contrary, more prominent than ever, blended with a base mixture of irreligion, contempt of social obligations, acrimonious irritation, and savage triumph at the result of this unprovoked aggression. In reading the Bulletins, we are at a loss, through the frippery of new titles, to discover the names of the principle actors. There is not a horde, or a subdivision of one that is not conducted by some mushroom Duke or Count of the new Empire. In running over these titles, our imagination hurries us back through a series of ages, and fixes us in that dreadful period of history, when ATTILA, at the head of a hundred barbarous tribes, which emigrated in search of plunder from the immense forests of Germany, Poland, Russia and Tartary, overturned the remains of Roman legislation and policy, and distributed the titles, possessions, and persons, of the long-established and civilised settlers, among his barbarous followers. He rushed, with the devastation of the whirlwind, over the fairest provinces of Europe; and the modern ATTILA, more savage, more unrelenting, and more rapacious, has joined to the vices of the barbarian, all the refinement of modern villainy. How often did our imagination start back with horror from the picture which historians left us of that direful period; and we are condemned, in an age which vaunted its philanthropic institutions, to see all its horrors and atrocities acted overagain. The same oppression of innocence, the same violation of property, the same insults offered to conjugal rights and virginal purity, the same moral confusion, and the substitution of force and violence for the mild restrictions of laws and morals. This is only a faint and ill-sketched picture of the deplorable consequences that will ensue, should BONAPARTE succeed in his system of plunder. But what other communities have suffered, or may still sustain, is no more than parental chastisement, compared with the outrages the vindictive bosom of that callous monster has in reserve for this country.

The second Bulletin is perfectly in the strain of the first. The ruffian indulges in a little pleasantry in this report, and attempts to animate the sombre tints of his horrid picture by some sportive allusions to what was found in the pockets of the Spanish Officers his ambition had murdered. A celebrated ancient, in observing the progress of a distinguished adversary, exclaimed, "The wonderful man!" When we see this individual indulging in sarcasm and pleasantry over the mutilated remains of his murdered victims, we are bewildered in attempting to find an epithet to mark his callous indifference.

But the third and fourth Bulletins, which are likewise dated from Burgos, and describe the occurrences down to the 15th ult. surpass any thing we have ever read from the head-quarters of BONAPARTE, for impiety, want of moral feelings and humanity, or for perversion of social obligations. But we are disgusted at making the nauseous recapitulation; and will notice only that part of the fourth, which has reference to our own army. It says: "The day "we fall in with them will be a day of festivity to the "French army. May they moisten with their blood "that continent which they have desolated by their in-"trigues, their monopoly and their selfishness." The ruffian! who is desolating Spain in this moment; and covering it with the carcasses of its inhabitants?—He then proceeds: "May they, instead of 20,000, be 80, or 100,000 strong," &c. Would to Heaven they were!

The Russian and French Messengers, who arrived in town on Tuesday last, returned to France on Friday; but the object which BONAPARTE has in view, whatever may be the intentions of the EMPEROR of RUSSIA, in keeping up this farce of negotiation, is unquestionably the insidious desire of giving the opponents of Ministers some new weapons for a parliamentary attack at the approaching Session. This may induce the wary intriguing Tyrant to assume a tone of moderation in his overtures; but his inveterate hostility to this Country and its commercial prosperity, is too well known for such arts to excite any persuasion of his sincerity. It is superfluous to add any thing further on the subject, for the lowest, as well as the highest individual in this country, must now be convinced that no concessions would appease his animosity; and it would be madness to look to sincere reconciliation on his part.

A mail arrived yesterday morning from Gottenburgh. We received by this conveyance a report of General KLERKER to the King of SWEDEN, detailing several actions in Finland. We are sorry to add, that the Swedes, on account of the superiority of the enemy in point of number, and from want of forage, together with the inclemency of the season, have been obliged to fall back considerably. What object ALEXANDER can propose to himself in the continuation of this nefarious and impolitic aggression, we are at a loss to discover. Whilst France is hastening with gigantic strides to universal monarchy, this weak Sovereign is wasting his force and his reputation, in squabbling with his brother in law, about the possession of Finland.

We turn away, from the disastrous reports of the day, and from the more disastrous projects said to be in contemplation, to record an act which is truly British, and affords the most cheering contrast to the contracted and pitiful policy we attempted to discountenance in the preceding observations. It is superfluous to inform our Readers, that we advert to the meeting held on Friday last at the New London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-street. The object of this meeting, and the enlightened patriotism which suggested it, will, we trust, save the British public, in the estimation of the present generation, and in the judgment of posterity, from an imputation of indifference, or want of zeal in support of the last efforts for expiring freedom. Mankind will soon be enabled to judge if the measures of Government were proportionate to the ardour and generosity displayed by the great body of the people in this great and necessary conflict. Heartfelt thanks, however, to the patriotic individuals who gave this necessary example, in a crisis when only the display of great virtues offers a prospect of salvation. When no traces of the calamity of our time remain, when the rumours and pusillanimity of modern Statesmen are consigned to oblivion, or, if recorded, stamped with abhorrence, the meeting on Friday last will receive a due tribute of praise, and serve to prove, that even in our age public virtues were not wanting. The future historian will be at a loss to account for the disasters and disgraces of the present day, when he finds so many marks of zeal, patriotism, and disinterestedness in private individuals, and will be embarrassed to reconcile the devotion of individuals with the weakness and apathy of governments. This contrast will appear to him the most striking apparition in our days; and he will not conceive how public measures could be stamped with folly, remissness, and want of system, when the mass of the people were so willing and ardent in supporting a more vigorous mode of conduct. Whatever fate may still await us—whatever is the ultimate issue of the alarming occurrences of our time, the generosity manifested by private individuals on Friday last, leaves neither excuse nor extenuation to those to whom the fortunes of the country are intrusted, should their zeal and efforts be not proportionate to the alarming crisis we are placed in. If any pusillanimous policy was in agitation; if a momentary thought was harboured of relaxing the vigorous measures adopted for the assistance of the Spaniards, we hope this Meeting will convince Ministers that the sentiments of the nation did not justify a dereliction of a vigorous as well as honourable policy, or an abandonment of the obligations we had contracted with the Spanish people. Should our armies fly from the scene of action when their assistance is most necessary? Should Ministers, in a moment of infatuation, or terror, stamp this opprobium on our national character, and blast its fair fame in the estimation of Europe? We would ask them if they have maturely weighed the consequences? If they are aware of the alarming danger to which Ireland would be exposed, should the enemy obtain quiet possession of Spain and Portugal. Let us entreat them to reflect seriously on these circumstances, and then we trust that the orders sent to disembark the troops at Portsmouth will not only be recalled, but new reinforcements sent to our army in Spain. The following extract of a letter, dated Dec. 9, from Portsmouth, shews that our apprehensions were not unfounded:

"Such is the vicissitude of human affairs, that the troops which were yesterday looking most anxiously to every shift of the wind, in the hope that it may come fair, are now coming on shore again, at the moment, that the wind is come favourable for them to sail.—Orders came to-day for this purpose, and the bustle to clear the transports of them is even greater then it was to embark them. The 3d and 4th Regiments of Dragoon Guards are the only troops embarked. Several ships are ordered to Spain, to protect our transports, in bringing off our troops; they will sail to-morrow.—Sailed the Coquette, 18, Capt. Forbes, on a cruise.—All the outward-bound ships will now sail, as the conveyances to Spain will be as speedy as could be wished. The wind is come to the N. E. and likely to stand at that quarter.

The long expected trial of Mr. ALEXANDER DAVISON has been at last decided; and the Defendant has been found guilty. The investigation lasted from nine o'clock in the morning till half past seven in the evening. The charges brought against Mr. DAVISON, were unquestionably, of the most heinous kind; and the public must feel a proportionate satisfaction at the result of the trial. It is revolting to think of the alarming abuse in the expenditure of the Public Money, and of the disgraceful practises that came out in the investigation of this business. With the highest degree of integrity and disinterestedness, on the part of the first ostensible Officers of Government, abuses of the same flagrant kind, as those proved in the present trial, must continue to accumulate, unless a watchful eye be kept over the conduct of the subordinate agents. Every man, therefore, who feels the weight of the Public burdens, and who submits to their pressure, not only without murmuring, but with alacrity, in consequence of the urgency of the times, must rejoice that measures are adopted to bring notorious delapidators to justice.

Œconomy in the higher departments is of no service, as long as the malversations of secondary agents are permitted to exist. This trial evinces the imperious necessity of a severe scrutiny into all the branches of the public expenditure; for were the resources of the country four times greater than they are, as long as contractors and agents may, with impunity, commit the malversations proved against this Mr. DAVISON, it would be impossible to supply the urgent demands of the State. The conduct of Ministers on this occasion is commendable, and highly to their credit; and as they have once begun the cleaning of the Augean Stable, we hope they will zealously persevere in the urgent and honourable task. But to bring only one criminal to justice, and to allow fifty others to fatten and riot on the vitals of the community, would be a poor compensation for the Public. However, the operation is commenced; and we hope the prosecution of it will be as advantageous to the nation as honourable for his Majesty's Ministers. We will follow them with our vows and our wishes in this commendable career; and should their ardour not abate, their labours will be crowned with the approbation and gratitude of their countrymen. They have much to investigate, and we fear much to reform; but the impediments which selfishness or rapacity may throw in their way, are slight, when compared with the advantages the operation secures to the Public.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, their Majesties and the Princesses arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor. At two o'clock his Majesty held a private Levee at the Queen's Palace.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Lieutenant-General Sir Harry Burrard, upon his return from Portugal.

Captain Wheatley, Sir Harry Burrard's Aid-de-Camp, upon his return from Portugal.

General Norton, upon his being appointed Governor of Charlemont, in the room of the late Lord Dorchester.

Viscount Boljemo, by his Excellency the Portuguese Ambassador, upon his leaving England for Portugal.

Mr. Thornton, our late Ambassador at Sweden, upon his return to England.

Lieut.-General Sir John Doyle, upon his promotion, and resuming his command at Guernsey.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers present.

Parliament was on Thursday prorogued in the usual form to Monday the 16th of January next, then to meet for the dispatch of business. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Montrose and Earl Bathurst sat as Commissioners.

On Friday afternoon the Purser of the Sarah Christiana, Captain Mackison, came to the East India House with the agreeable intelligence of her safe arrival off the Isle of Wight on the 8th inst. Sailed from Bengal the 19th June, in company with the Ceylon and Northampton, under convoy of his Majesty's ship Terpsichore; the Ceylon parted company the 4th of July.

The Sarah Christiana, with the following ships, arrived at St Helena, the 28th September, and sailed from thence the 22d October under convoy of St. Fiorenzo.

Walpole, Captain Sandelands; Duke of Montrose, Captain Paterson; Northampton, Captain Sanders; from Bengal.

Worcester, Captain ———; Sir William Pulteney, Captain Christopher; Union, Captain Gaillard; from Bombay: with one transport, three whalers, and one brig (Fly.)

On the 2d December, the Sarah Christiana, having the brig in tow, parted company with the fleet in lat. 43. long. 29. 10.

The ships Tigris, M'Dougal; Experiment, Logan; Glory, Beevor; Ann, Masson; and Diana, Marshall, were left in Bengal.

List of passengers per Sarah Christiana from Bengal:

The Lady of Major Robert Greene and daughter, Miss Catharine Williamson, Captain John Ludlow, Lieutenant John Fagan, Mr. James Williamson, assistant Surgeon.

THE LOAN.—Mr. Hase, from the Bank, on Thursday acquainted the Gentlemen of the Stock Exchange, that the redemption of the advances on the Loan 1808, should be made as follows, viz.

30*l.* per Cent. on or before Friday, 27th January 1809.
30*l.* per Cent. on or before Friday, 3d Feb. 1809. And 40*l.* per Cent. on or before Friday, 17th ditto.

The Proprietors of the Receipts to pay the Instalment of 15*l.* per Cent. which is to be made on the 19th Jan. 1809.

Accounts from Vera Cruz state, that a French gallion having arrived there with dispatches from Joseph Bonaparte to the Governor, the inhabitants rose in insurrection, burnt the dispatches, and the vessel which brought them. The French Messenger and the crew of the gallion were put into prison, and it was with great difficulty the Governor protected them from the violence of the people.

Lisbon Papers to the 23d of November were received yesterday. They contain no intelligence except accounts of the celebration of masses and Te Deums, with processions, fire-works and bull-fights, for the expulsion of the French, and the restoration of the legitimate Government. They contain long lists of the voluntary donations of individuals to supply the exigencies of the State.

COURT OF INQUIRY.—The Court met at ten o'clock on Tuesday morning, deliberated for a short time, and then adjourned till Tuesday next.

On Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be reduced three pence in the peck loaf.

CITY.

Thursday the Lord Mayor went in state to Guildhall, and held the first Court of Common Council in his Mayoralty, which was numerously attended.

THE LATE LORD MAYOR.

Mr Deputy Hallier, after a short introductory speech, moved the Thanks of the Court to the late Lord Mayor, enumerating, among other things, the zeal, ability, and integrity with which he had always discharged the duties of his high office, his hospitalities, and the ready access which he gave to those who visited him on business connected with his office.

Mr. Quin could not agree in the vote of thanks which had been proposed. When votes of thanks were given to other Lord Mayors, it had always been on the ground of their having maintained with proper spirit the rights and privileges of the City of London. There was a remarkable instance, however, in which the late Lord Mayor had suffered those privileges to be invaded. It was in the case of Christie, a Liveryman, who had been impressed, and to whom the late Lord Mayor had not only refused to give the protection to which he had a claim, but had even been assisting to invade those privileges to which he was entitled as a free Citizen of London. The person, however, to whom he alluded, obtained his liberation by the laws of the country, after having been obliged to contract expences at law to the amount of 50l. This case had been referred to a Committee of the Court, and their report had been hardly short of a vote of censure against the late Lord Mayor. They had recommended to the late Lord Mayor to pay the damages; but he, although confessing that he was mistaken, and had been guilty of an error, still refused to pay a farthing; and the expence which had been incurred by his mistaking his duty, was obliged to be paid out of the funds of the City. Although he (Mr. Quin) was obliged to the late Lord Mayor for personal civilities, his sense of public duty would not allow him to say that such conduct was worthy of praise for zeal, abilities, or integrity. He did not wish to move a vote of censure, and therefore preferred moving the previous question.

M. Jacks thought that votes of thanks were of no value, unless they were conferred with some discrimination. They would be worth little, if they were passed in the way that thanks were given to the Lord Mayor's Chaplain for a sermon that very few of the Members had heard. He had been informed that the late Lord Mayor had often been absent for days together from his residence, and that persons who had business before him had been delayed much beyond the usual time for transacting such business. As to facilities of access, he had called upon him once, and had been received with almost as much hauteur, as if he had presented himself in forma pauperis.

Mr. Vandercomb excused the late Lord Mayor, on the ground that his decision in the Court alluded to, proceeded purely from an error of judgment, and ought not to be visited by so severe a punishment.

Mr. Alderman Birch thought the Court would be acting inconsistently now, to censure the proceedings of the late Lord Mayor on this circumstance, when it had been generally understood at the time the City paid the money, that the business was finally settled. He conceived that it would have been more fair and manly to have brought forward such a motion in the presence of the late Lord Mayor than in his absence.

Mr. Waithman declared that he was perfectly sensible of the personal civilities he had received from the late Lord Mayor, and upon that account it was painful to him to be obliged, by his public duty, to oppose the vote of thanks. He could not think error in judgment was so trifling an offence in men who aspired to the high and arduous situation of Chief Magistrate of this great City. He thought that the candidates for such an office, ought to be men of understanding and ability, and that their errors of judgment should not invade the liberty of their fellow-citizens. It was true that he had known other Lord Mayors guilty of still greater faults. Some of them had been guilty of the capital error in judgment of setting up their own private opinion against the opinion of the Livery, and even preventing public meetings being convened on occasions when it was of the most importance to the country that they should be convened. Some Lord Mayors had lent themselves to Ministers, to devise the means of imposing taxes upon the City of London; and he believed the oppression which was felt in the Income Tax, was in a great degree owing to this cause. It was he who first brought the case of Christie before the Court, and he could not, consistently with the feelings which he always entertained upon that case, vote for thanks to the late Chief Magistrate.

Mr. Quin agreed to withdraw his Motion for the previous question, and said he, should meet the vote of thanks with a direct negative.

The question was then put, and the vote of thanks was declared by the Lord Mayor to be in favour of the Vote of Thanks.

A division, however, was called for, and it appeared that the vote was the other way. The numbers were:—

For the Vote of Thanks, 9 Aldermen, 36 Commoners, 2 Tellers	47
Against it, 57 Commoners, 2 Tellers	59
Majority against the Vote of Thanks	12

SUBSCRIPTION TO ASSIST THE SPANIARDS.

A numerous and respectable Meeting of the Merchants and Traders of London, was yesterday held at the City of London Tavern, for the purpose of instituting a subscription in aid of the Patriotic Armies in Spain.

The Lord Mayor was called to the Chair, who, on taking it observed, that the cause for which they had met together, was of so glorious and meritorious a nature, and spoke so powerfully for itself to the hearts of all present, that little or nothing was left for him to say, further than to express the pride he felt in presiding over so highly respectable a Meeting, and the interest which, he was persuaded, every true Englishman took in its success.

Sir Robert Wigram did not think it necessary to make use of any arguments, and should therefore submit to the generous feelings of the Meeting his first resolution, "That a subscription be entered into, to aid the Exertions of Spain."

This motion having been seconded,

Mr. Rowcroft thought it necessary to inform the Meeting of some circumstances which had occurred relative to it. Those who had proposed to call it had, in the first place, considered the popular feeling which prevails so strongly in favour of Spain, and which would, he trusted, be made manifest by the measure which was now recommended. They had also ascertained that Government would see with pleasure such a manifestation of the public mind respecting the Spanish cause, and that such a measure would be very pleasing to the Spanish Deputy in this country, Admiral Apodaca, who would thankfully receive and speedily transmit to his own country whatever sums should be subscribed for its use. Due notice was then given of the Meeting, which had drawn the attention of Ministers, who were anxious that every appearance should be avoided which would seem like a reflection cast upon them, for omitting any exertion that it was in their power to make in aid of the Spanish cause. This feeling had induced Mr. Perceval, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to write a letter to the Lord Mayor (which had been received only a few hours) explanatory of the aids which Government had already furnished, or were now furnishing. He then read the letter, which was to the following effect:—

"My Lord,—Understanding that a Meeting is to be convened under the sanction of your Lordship, for the purpose of promoting a subscription for the purchase of shoes, clothes, and other necessaries for the Spanish army, I feel it necessary to furnish you with the fullest information of what has been already done, and what is now doing by Government for those objects. I hope I shall not be so far misunderstood, as to be supposed desirous of repressing any proof which the City of London may be disposed to give, of that sentiment which is felt so generally in this country; but I feel apprehensive, that unless great caution be used, some injury might be done to that cause which it is the object of the Meeting to promote. I therefore think it necessary to inform you, that as to the purchase of shoes, which is stated as the first object of the subscription, Government have taken every means of procuring an abundant supply. From the orders they had given, not only in England, but in Ireland and Scotland, they expect to be furnished with 40 or 50,000 pair a month, for the British and Spanish armies. If the zeal of individuals were to go further, there would be great danger that it would create a competition, which would raise the price, and be otherwise injurious. The same observation would also apply to a Subscription for the purpose of buying uniforms or clothing. With regard to arms, ammunition, and field equipage, it is unnecessary for me to make any remark, as I understand that such articles are not within the contemplation of those Gentlemen who are about to promote the Subscription in view. The money, however, which may be subscribed, might be applied to the purchase of other articles which could not interfere with those which Government are occupied, and which would have the advantage of manifesting unequivocally to Spain, that besides the Government of this country, she has with her the strong wish and general feeling of the people.

Mr. Rowcroft thought it was absolutely necessary to follow those cautions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had suggested, and to form a Subscription and appoint a Committee for managing it; and he trusted that the example of the City of London would be followed by the whole country.

The Resolution for a Subscription was then put and carried unanimously.

On the question being put on the second Resolution,

Mr. Quin in making some observations as to the reports of great disasters having befallen our Allies, expressed a confident hope that no calamities that might befal those brave men, struggling for their national independence, would repress the spirit of Englishmen in defending the freedom of their own country.—With respect to the amount of the subscription, as the country had before contributed so nobly for the fund at Lloyd's, he hoped they would be equally liberal on the present occasion. The stimulus was now much greater, as the tyrant with whom we were contending had since that time greatly increased his force, and now wielded the whole power of the Continent. As to the present situation of Spain, if the cause was even far gone, still the expiring exertions, and the last convulsions of a people contending for their independence and against Bonaparte, should be accompanied by every proof of British feeling and sympathy. In the Spanish cause, we felt not only sympathy for that nation, but that our own most important interests were connected with that struggle. The City of London once set on foot a subscription, which was liberally filled up, for the unfortunate Poles; but what was Poland then to this country in comparison to what Spain now is? No country was ever more bound to us by sympathy and common interest. He hoped, under these considerations, that the subscription would be liberal, and worthy of the country.

A Committee was appointed; and several lists of Subscriptions were read by different Members of the Committee.

The Thanks of the Meeting were voted to the Lord Mayor.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. XVIII.

——— Art thou one whom new opinions sway?
One who believes as Tindall led the way;
Whom virtue and a church alike disowns,
Thinks that but words, and this but brick and stones!
Fly then, on all the wings of wild desire,
And be whate'er the maddest can admire!—Pope.

REV. LAURENCE GARDNER, M.A.

AS long as it is permitted to me to continue my investigation of the merits of our popular preachers, so long must I persist, according to the plan first promulged by me, to expose error and testify truth, unswayed by interest and undaunted by intimidation. It is upon this feeling that I have hitherto endeavoured to proceed in the career of criticism. My aim, however, was not to scourge but to correct, not to ruin but to reform; and, accordingly, I have almost seized every favourable occasion for speaking propitiously of the objects which successively presented themselves to my attention. Why am I to deviate from this system of conduct? I am open to candid conviction, and should be thankful for generous admonition; but, if it is destined me to cease to write honestly—let me cease to write any thing!

It happily falls to my lot, on the present occasion, to announce ability, to extol eminence. No man is displeased to find himself fairly praised; and I therefore commence my task, having nothing to dread, in the execution of it, but from the cavils of those who may happen to envy the very excellences which demand their imitation.

The Rev. LAURENCE GARDNER early distinguished himself at the University of Cambridge, where he was elected Fellow of St. John's College. His name was originally Panting, which he exchanged, for that of Gardner, agreeably to the testamentary condition by which he enjoys his present fortune. Repairing to the metropolis, long before the acquisition of the estate he now holds, his abilities speedily raised him into reputation. He became Minister of South-Lambeth Chapel, being the first clergyman who was invited to officiate in it. About the same time, he was chosen Evening Preacher at the Asylum, and Lecturer of St. Magnus at London-Bridge. He continued nearly eleven years with the congregation at South-Lambeth, whose number increased rapidly under his ministry; and of whose attachment he experienced the most decided proof, when, having exchanged his fellowship for matrimony, they voluntarily augmented his income, in order to atone, to him, for the forfeited produce of his college promotion.

Mr. Gardner, hitherto Mr. Panting, was however, in 1803, called upon to resign his early professional engagements; to settle on the estate now bequeathed to him, and discharge the duties of his living, as Rector of the Second Portion of Westbury, in Salop. Circumstances have, notwithstanding, since induced him to alter the resolution that he took as to residing wholly in the country. He now purposes, it seems, to divide his year between Shropshire and London. He has, therefore, accepted the appointments of alternate Morning Preacher at the Asylum, and at Fitzroy Chapel; and he is also Clerk in Orders at St. George's, near Hanover-square.

Fortunately enabled to act independently of pecuniary considerations, and personally attached to the cause of the Asylum, Mr. GARDNER, if my information be correct, declines receiving any compensation from the funds of that institution.

This gentleman, considered with reference to his sacred calling, must be accounted one of the most distinguished ornaments of our ecclesiastical establishment. His sermons are not the ostentatious vapourings of meagre morality, but edifying, and almost evangelical, discourses. They exhibit very considerable information on the sublime subjects they are expected to illustrate, and are delivered with feelings suitable to the duties they are designed to enforce. Their author, never ordinary, is always instructive, often animating, and sometimes powerful, as a preacher. Conceded, however, as are the discrimination of his mind, and the solidity of his judgment, he has been censured for delighting in the subtilties and refinements of theology; but, for one, I do not feel disposed to condemn him upon this accusation. There seems no danger to be apprehended from too rapid an increase of the number of our profound polemics.

While the pulpit confers dignity on the person of this preacher, his person gives additional dignity to the pulpit. Tall and erect in his figure, and of an interesting countenance, his appearance is becomingly prepossessing; his action is generally impressive, without diverging into impropriety; and he has the talent of uniformly attaching, and of occasionally commanding, the attention of his hearers. He presents, in every respect, a fine contrast to "The things that mount the rostrum with a skip,

"And then skip down again; pronounce a text,
"Cry—'hem!' and reading what they never wrote,
"Just fifteen minutes, huddle up their work;
"And, with a well-bred whisper, close the scene!"

Few of these, whom the poet so contemptuously calls "things," let it be hoped, are now found within the circle of the church. The period of pulpit frivolity seems to have passed away. It occurs to me, indeed, that our present concern is vigilantly to guard against the prevalence of pulpit parade. Either of these abuses alike demand our resistance.

With all the merits which I find in the public character of Mr. Gardner, I discover in him, at times, something that is objectionable. He now and then strikes me as being too studied: too anxious accurately to accomplish his professional duty. There is sometimes management about his manner. If he were less solicitous, perhaps he would be still more satisfactory. There is the possibility of being over-excellent, as well as the penance of being over-righteous. I wish this consideration may attract his notice. Many preachers are sparing enough of exertion; but I am much mistaken if, especially as affecting bisphysical strength, this preacher is not too prodigal of his pulpit powers.

Mr. Gardner has nothing of the stenterian stamina. His voice is rather pleasing than powerful, rather easy than energetic, rather mellifluous than masculine. Generally, therefore, his tones seem judiciously regulated by the nature of his voice; and perhaps, after all, it is this circumstance that casually attaches to his delivery the appearance of its being premeditated.

His language is excellent, his deportment exemplary; and, what cannot too frequently be pointed out for imitation, his delivery of the Lord's Prayer is deserving of particular commendation. I am far from wishing to see preachers become performers; but I do desire to impress upon their minds the necessity of attending to those proprieties which are peculiar to their situation; and the neglect of which, on their part, is often seriously injurious to the best interests of the religion they are ordained to promote!

I wish now to obtain attention to one or two remarks immediately connected with the ASYLUM CHAPEL. What I have to advance may, should it excite proper regard, prove beneficial to this place of religious worship. I allude to the professional conduct of the organist of the Chapel, who, in the direction of the Organ, betrays the most culpable inattention to the melody of devotion. He seems to run a race against the voices of the children; and he plays so loud, that, being females, he frequently overpowers their singing altogether. His "hallelujah chorus" is absolutely the rumble and jumble of sounds, the very discord of concord! Dr. Calcot, who, if memory does not mislead me, was the predecessor of the present Asylum Organist, might give him some lessons for his advantage. It is the business of the Organ, in churches, to direct and assist the Singing, but not to govern and subdue it. Organs, owing to popular misconceptions as to this point, have, in many places, nearly superseded Psalmody.—Surely, however, it is not the organ, but the people, that is exhorted to "sing to the praise and glory of God!" Let this error be rectified,

December 6, 1808. ONESIMUS.

THE THEATRE.

HAY MARKET.

On Monday night a new Farce, intitled, The School for Authors, was acted at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, where the Covent-Garden Company have at last cooped up their overflowing numbers.

To trace effects to their first causes, has always been deemed the business of philosophers, and politicians, but why should it not also become that of the critic? We may be told that we start out of our proper sphere, but undaunted by such misrepresentations we will for once follow the footsteps of the above mentioned Gentlemen through their usual maze of arguments, only applying them to a different purpose.

Who would imagine that the late revolution in Spain, is the probable cause of the composition (partly translation) and production of The School for Authors! Yet that such is the case, no one, we hope, will dare to doubt, after we, professed Critics have asserted the fact, and supported it by an unbroken chain of reasonings. The struggles for liberty with which Iberia's mountains are shaken, have like the convulsions of bursting Volcanoes, spread devastation at their foot, and caused earthquakes in other lands more or less violent, according to their distance from the scene of ruin. None has felt the shock more powerfully than our little island; it has passed with the rapidity of electricity through every rank of the social world, and kindled in every soul a spirit of independance, which unhappily for us, professed Critics, has at last incited authors to take up arms against us, and attempt to shake off the yoke of our tyranny. To this sudden impulse, this unexpected consciousness of power, we are persuaded this piece owes its origin, and yet we have some good reasons to believe it is a natural child; for some of its features bear so much resemblance to Foote's Farces, and others to a French Proverbe, intitled, L'Amateur; that we cannot vouch for the validity of its claim to originality.

The Plot of The School for Authors is simple. A rich Citizen has formed his character to deep thought. A tragedy, the fruit of his nightly inspirations has been accepted, and the evening of its performance is arrived. Doubtful as to its fate, he engages a young man his protegé, to pass for the author of it, and promises to further his suit with his niece, provided he can give some proof of genius. Mr. Wormwood, a professed Critic, and one of the young lady's admirers, is then introduced. He, as it is frequently the case, and as Cleveland expresses it, "condemns the piece before trial, and dissects it before its execution;" and being informed that his rival is the author of it, forms a party with a reviewing footman and some livery servants to damn it. The awful hour approaches, the Citizen remains at home in trembling expectation, when his foreman suddenly bursts into his presence and informs him that all is lost, that his uninsured warehouse, in the Minories, is on fire, and that the engines cannot play upon it. "How he frightened me," exclaims the rejoicing Author, "what do I care for such trifles now?"—In a few moments Cleveland returns loaded with the still more melancholy intelligence, that the tragedy is completely damned. Mr. Wormwood then rushes in triumphant, whilst Cleveland retires, and congratulates the Citizen upon the condemnation of a piece, which he himself had represented as ridiculous. He then reveals the share he had in hurrying its doom, and adds, that without his exertions and those of his friends, it would most probably have continued to disgrace the Stage for a month or two. Cleveland re-enters, and astonishes his rival, by replying to his taunting condolance, that his piece is not yet condemned. The Citizen's niece then appears and informs them, that Cleveland's comedy, that was acted at the other house, has been crowned with complete success. She is united with her lover, Mr. Wormwood is turned out of the house, and a severe lesson to malevolent Critics, rather than to Authors, proves the morality of the piece.

This afterpiece, though partly taken, as we have already remarked, from the French, and from one of Foote's farces, is not quite devoid of novelty. It is written with spirit and ease; the language is chaste and good; the wit which now and then flashes in the dialogue, is natural and pure; the situations well imagined; the plot well conducted; the incidents probable and well linked together, and the characters, though painted with the high colouring which a farce requires, still evidently appear faithful copies from nature; as the rouge which actors wear on the stage only serves to heighten the expression without disguising the shape of their features.

To particularize the merits of one performer would be an invidious task where all displayed equal abilities. The names of Miss Norton, Mrs. Gibbs, Munden, Farley, Bruton, and Beverley, will in the minds of those who have seen this piece, start no other idea than that of excellence; and though the judgment of the public be always formed from that of a few, should our evidence be discredited, we have only to refer the millions of unbelievers to the numerous spectators, who have bestowed as much applause, unmixed with a single hiss, upon The School for Authors, as it really deserved.

The author of Venoni has quieted our fears—yielding to the representations of newspaper critics, who, for once in their lives, perhaps, have not differed in opinion from the community, he has wisely suspended the representation of his play, till to-morrow, in order to compose a third act, the chief part in which his piece was deficient. We would point out also the first scene of the first act, as deserving of alteration. In its present state it is extremely long and uninterestingly cold. If it be necessary for the elucidation of the plot, it may be made more tolerable by the introduction of wit in the dialogue, which is remarkably poor.

LAW REPORT.

THE KING v. ALEXANDER DAVISON, ESQ.

This was an Information filed by the Attorney-General against the Defendant, charging him with fraud in his character of Agent to the Barrack Master-General, in furnishing supplies for that department of the public service. The information, in specifying the precise nature of the fraud, set forth, that the Defendant, by an agreement entered into with General Delancy, in the year 1795, stipulated to purchase stores for the Barrack Department, and to see them packed and forwarded to their place of destination; he being allowed for his agency two and a half per cent. upon the charges and expences so incurred; that he continued to act in the character of Agent, consistent with the terms stipulated in the agreement, till the year 1798, when, instead of purchasing the supplies from the merchants as he had been accustomed to do, he furnished them from his own stores, assuming to himself the double character of seller as well as buyer; and, having caused fictitious bills of parcels to be made out in the names of two of his clerks (Watson and Allen), and taken from them receipts, as if they had been dealt with on their own account. These accounts were returned to the Barrack-Office, and the commission charged and allowed upon the transactions, the same as if the Defendant had actually been the purchaser on the part of Government, and not the seller. By these fabricated bills and receipts, the Barrack Master General was deceived, and the Government defrauded, and the Defendant obtained a commission which he was not entitled to under his agreement, in addition to his profits on the supplies furnished.

The Attorney-General, Mr. Garrow, and Messrs. Abbott and Richardson, who were employed on the part of the prosecution, substantiated this charge in evidence. The original agreement between General Delancy and Mr. Davison was proved, by which the latter was expressly prohibited from supplying the Barrack Department on his own account, and a compensation of two and a half per cent. allowed him for his skill and agency in making the requisite purchases on account of Government, as applicable to the Barrack Department. It was also proved, that this agreement was expressly abided by till the year 1798, when the Defendant first began to furnish the supplies of bedding, &c. from his own warehouse in Bedford-street, the business of which was conducted by Mr. Mungo Sheddon, and the accounts rendered to the Barrack Office, with the accompanying bills of sale and receipts, as vouchers, led to a conviction that the stores so supplied were purchased of two individuals, of the names of White and Allen, and not furnished by the Defendant on his own account; by which means he was enabled, in addition to his profits as a seller, to charge his commission as an agent. This course of proceeding continued till 1802, when the practice was discontinued, in consequence of some investigation into the accounts of that Department, and ultimately brought to light by the Military Commission, appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the abuses of the several Public Departments under Government. The particular instance of fraud imputed, amounted to somewhere about 1500*l.* being the commission charged upon 15,000*l.* together with some other minor items.

Mr. Dallas made a most eloquent appeal to the Jury in behalf of the Defendant. He said, the charge imputed to his client was a fraud, committed from a mean and sordid desire to put into his pocket a small sum in breach of his contract, and in defiance of every principle of honour or honesty. It was impossible, he said, not to feel that such a charge involved every thing that was dear to the Defendant, and the magnitude of the stake must impress the Court and the Jury with the greatest anxiety. Mr. Dallas having thus introduced the subject, adverted to the way in which General Delancy became acquainted with the Defendant, and his motives for appointing him. He found him in the Offices of Government, and understanding that he was a gentleman of approved skill and confidence, he pitched upon him as the fittest person to be entrusted with the agency of the Barrack Department. He (Mr. Dallas) thought proper to mention that fact, as most injurious and calumnious statements had gone forth to the public respecting that appointment, and he would repeat, that General Delancy finding Mr. Davison engaged in extensive business, generally known to the merchants of the country, and recently before employed in situations of great trust and confidence by Government, thought him the properest person to be entrusted with the agency in supplying the Barrack Department with stores, &c. Till then he was unacquainted with him. He accordingly wrote to him, and the Defendant's answer of the 19th of January, 1795, was the basis of that agreement, with the fraudulent breach of which he was now charged. He would admit, by that agreement, he was employed merely as an agent, at a stipulated commission, and that he was bound to deliver in bills of parcels from the parties he dealt with, as vouchers for the purchases he made on the Barrack account; and he would ask if it was likely, after four years of honourable conduct, diligent and faithful in the discharge of his duty, and accurate and punctual in his accounts he should all at once deviate from that line of propriety, and be guilty of a fraudulent breach in the execution of his contract. Mr. Dallas again remarked on the shameful prejudices that had been raised against the Defendant, and the calumnies circulated to prevent him obtaining a fair trial; which, instead of being diminished, he said had been increased, as the hour of trial approached. He did not allude to the Reports of the commissioners which had found their way to the Public, but the unauthorised calumnies and abuse daily and hourly vented in publications, calculated to injure the defendant in the public estimation, and as they were false and scandalous, he hoped the Jury, should they have seen them, would dismiss them from their consideration. After a variety of other topics, the Learned Counsel came more immediately to his client's defence, which he said would prove a complete answer to the charge preferred against him?—Between the years 1795 and 98, Gen. Delancy found considerable difficulty to obtain supplies from the merchants, and knowing that, by the first agreement, Mr. Davison was prohibited from furnishing supplies from his own stores, entered into a fresh agreement with him, and, to benefit the public service, agreed that that stipulation should be done away, and that he should be allowed to furnish the supplies himself. The second agreement was therefore let in upon the first, the restrictive clause was done away, and the defendant was authorised to become a seller, as well as an agent, so that as soon as he should prove the fact, there would be an end to the allegation of the defendant's having clandestinely furnished supplies from his own stores. As to the circumstance of making the bills of parcels out in the names of his two clerks, it was a mere formality to do away the singularity that would otherwise have happened, namely, that of appearing as the seller to, and the purchaser for, the Barrack Department upon the same instrument. As to the commission, it was charged inadvertently, and when he discovered the error, had endeavoured all in his power to get back the accounts from the office to correct them, but they were passed, and the thing impracticable.

General Delancy was then called, who admitted that he agreed to the defendant's furnishing the supplies from his own stores, but not to his charging commision upon them. Had he done so, he should have considered himself as guilty of a flagrant breach of his duty to the public. He never knew the commission was charged, though he had no doubt Mr. Davison might have laid a case on that head before the Barrack Board, that would have called for consideration.

Mr. Bowring proved that the defendant wished to correct some inaccuracies in his accounts delivered into the Barrack Board, but they were passed, and he was recommended to do it in a supplemental account. He also accounted for the substitution of the names of Watson and Allen in a manner similar to that which Mr. Dallas stated in his speech.

Mr. Stainbanck, of the Barrack Office, also proved that an application was made by the defendant to get back his accounts to correct some inaccuracies, and that he was told he must do it by a supplemental account.

The Attorney-General made an able reply, insisting that the defence had contributed to substantiate the fraud. The inaccuracies the Defendant wished to correct were not relative to the commission, they respected other errors in his accounts.

Lord Ellenborough summed up with great accuracy and precision; he observed with strong emphasis upon the fabricating of the bills of parcels and the receipts, and said it seldom happened that deceit was necessary to produce an honourable or honest purpose.

The Jury, after consulting for some time, found the defendant Guilty. The trial lasted from 9 in the morning till 7 at night.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FIFTY.

SPAIN AND BRITISH CO-OPERATION.

The subjugation of Europe, after the peace of Tilsit, seemed to be accomplished. The most enlightened men of the last century considered such an event as impossible. However, after the science of war and government had been carried to a point of perfection they had never before attained, this chimera, which had disturbed so much the imaginations of our countrymen during the reign of King William, and was considered only as a political bug-bear during the greater part of the last century, has received form and existence in our days. Those who attempted to prove the impossibility of such an occurrence, made no difficulty, however, in acknowledging, that were such an event to occur, it would be one of the greatest evils that ever befel society; as nothing could produce it but some violent concussion in the moral and political world. This part of their prediction has been justified! And the French revolution, which changed a community devoted to habits of peaceable industry, into a nation of armed men, preceded and prepared this system of subjugation.

This revolution, which gave birth to so many crimes, and engendered such distinguished talents, produced, at last, a man, who united in his own person all the atrocities and genius generally produced by such memorable occurrences. His prudence, his ambition, his dissimulation, his profound knowledge of the military art, his indifference to religious or moral restrictions, his plausibility, were only inferior to his good fortune. Such an individual in any country, or any age, at the head of a government restricted by laws and salutary customs, would afford the neighbouring states just cause for terror and alarm; but at the head of a community violently transformed into a nation of soldiers, over whom he exercises the most unlimited controul; whose collected will, talents, mental and personal strength, are absolutely and unconditionally at his disposal, whenever he wishes to employ them;—such a man, sovereign arbiter over the lives and fortunes of such a people, is, unquestionably, the most portentious apparition ever recorded. The utmost range and exertions of public and private virtues, are scarcely adequate to protect the most powerful states from sinking under his ascendancy; and for one that has the fortune or virtue enough to escape, ten are sure to succumb.

An universal monarchy, with all its excesses and tyrannical restrictions, was considered by even the most ardent and independent spirits as unavoidable, long before the peace of Tilsit. They drew this conclusion from the monstrous apparition we have alluded to; and nations, in consequence of reiterated disasters, and fruitless attempts to oppose any resistance to this overwhelming torrent, thought only of averting its rage by timely and voluntary submission. Then the situation of Europe became truly desperate; and any attempt to rouse it from its degradation, was resisted by men most averse to this monstrous debasement, because they despaired of finding in any modern community, virtue or energy enough to do it with success; and failures rendered the evil more comprehensive and irremediable.

Such was the discouraging and desperate aspect of public affairs at the commencement of this very year. The despondency of the good and the patriotic in every part of the Continent excluded even a faint ray of salvation; and excommunicated by the arrogant conqueror within our insular limits, we thought only of protecting ourselves. Then occurred, in the midst of the universal gloom, one of those unhoped for events, which baffle calculation; and, as if to prove the weakness of political reasoning, it happened in a country where, from two centuries of mal-administration and the most inveterate abuses, regeneration and vigour were considered impossible. This sacred insurrection of a people, so long sunk in natural decrepitude, to revenge the insult offered to their national independence, is too sublime an occurrence to require elaborate commendation. It is enough to say, it shook to its very foundation that colossal system of spoliation, whose duration and stability, were thought superior to ordinary resistance and modern energy. The clash was heard on our shores; and we answered it with mingled shouts of astonishment and applause.

The insurrection of the Spaniards was spontaneous as well as unanimous; and the people of this country displayed an union of wishes for their instantaneous support, which proves how highly sensible they were to the reciprocal advantages it secured. Parties forgot their animosities, ambition its selfishness, and sectarists their prejudices, and the subjects of the United Kingdom hastened to the throne, to assure his Majesty of their perfect acquiescence in the most vigorous and efficacious measures in support of so profound and good a cause. The sympathy and enthusiasm spread through all the orders of society; and if any one appeared, so dead to moral feelings, and indifferent to the happiness and dignity of his species, as to attempt to damp this ebullition of national patriotism, he was indignantly reproved for his selfishness and apathy.

The first efforts of the Spaniards justified the warm interest we manifested in their behalf; and in less than three months they exterminated one half of their invaders, and drove the remainder, who fled like miserable fugitives to the foot of the Pyrenees. These great exertions, this glorious success against a formidable army, who arrogated, in consequence of former exploits, the title of invincible, begat in the conquerors too much confidence, and, consequently, a momentary relaxation; though their high principles lost not a particle of their first energy. The removal also, of the most distinguished members of the provincial Junta's from the immediate scene of their influence, and the ill-advised resolution of depriving those who remained, of their political weight, unfortunately retarded the efforts of that high-spirited community. The former.

in consequence of this miscalculation, had time to draw together his scattered forces from the extremities of Europe, and pour them into their country, before their means of defence were completed. But that very event has occurred, which we anticipated; for the exertions of a people, in a popular cause, become proportionate to the dangers that menace it. If prosperity tends to relax, adversity, by maintaining a constant irritation, and converting what was before only a keen sense of injury into abhorrence and the most deadly hate, makes every citizen a soldier, and transforms the simplest tool into an instrument of death.

We have been invariably tenacious in support of this opinion, and we did not retract a single iota from it, when accounts most unfavourable to its solidity and justice were received. It still continues unalterable; and, notwithstanding the insolence, the flippancy, and the confidence of the French Bulletins; notwithstanding the defeat of Blake, of Castanos, and the army of Estremadura; notwithstanding the entrance of the enemy into Madrid, the retreat of our own troops, and the unwarrantable despondency of Ministers; notwithstanding the errors we have committed in our military arrangements, the insufficiency of our assistance, and the lamentable tardiness of our co-operation, after all these discouraging appearances, we still confidently believe that the Spaniards will ultimately triumph. We do not give this opinion from a tenacious adherence to support what we once advanced, or from pretensions to superior penetration, or from an affectation of singularity, but from the strong conviction we feel, that the Spaniards have displayed, and continue to display energies far superior even to the formidable means the invader can bring against them. This opinion is far from being a mere speculative one, uncorroborated by experience and corresponding facts; the examples of America, Holland, and Switzerland, where the people also took upon themselves their own defence, justify the most sanguine wishes in favour of the Spaniards. We will not wait for any objections that may be made us, but will anticipate them; and, in acknowledging, in compliance with the obstinate admirers of the means and abilities of the Corsican, the superiority of his resources and perseverance over those of Philip the Second, and his excellency as a General when compared to the Duke of Parma, (which, by the bye, we do not believe) it must also be recollected that the means of the Spaniards are much greater, their antipathy more profound, their motives for resistance more urgent, than even those of the Dutch had been at that time.

We are happy to perceive that the persons, best capable of appreciating the Spanish character, of knowing their resources, and who are most interested in the issue of this great conflict, manifest as little despondency as we do; and any man, who has read the oath taken by the Members of the Supreme Junta, when the enemy was approaching the capital; and saw the resolution they adopted after their worthy President received a letter from those abominable traitors, who prefer to their country and Sovereign the countenance of a Bonaparte; any man we say, who can still despond, and communicate to his family, relatives, and acquaintance, his base fears, and thus tend to weaken the hopes and efforts of the community, we neither approve of his principles, nor do we envy him his feelings. The cause we love, we trust in; and the individual, whatever be his rank, who is continually coming forward, on every reverse of our allies, with a triumphant sneer, we have no difficulty in pronouncing him, no friend to his country, or to civil liberty.

As no one has yet dared to dispute, however averse he may be to the success of the Spaniards, the vast advantages that event would secure to this country; and as the opinion is as universal, that their subjugation would considerably increase the resources of the enemy, and consequently the difficulties and dangers of our own situation, we have every motive, which an enlightened sense of our interests dictates, exclusive of the sympathy which struggling virtue inspires, and an abhorrence of villainy suggests, to encourage us not only to preserve in the co-operation we promised, but to act in a manner as if our existence was connected indissolubly with theirs. By adopting this resolution, we have a certainty of success; for were this country to display its full strength, its pressure would bear down any efforts which the enemy can make beyond the Pyrenees: Whereas if we confine ourselves to puny exertions, the contest becomes not only doubtful; but, if we are able to maintain it, will be spun out to an indefinite time.

We have frequently alluded to the exaggerated estimate of the enemy's force, which our own Government, in common with others, seems most unaccountably to believe; or otherwise they would have endeavoured to collect a sufficient force in Spain, to overwhelm the invaders, before they are able to reinforce their present number, by means of the conscription, or by draining their armies in Germany. A single vigorous exertion, one grand display of national strength, would not only place the destinies of Spain beyond the effect of accident, but raise our own country to the summit of grandeur and veneration. A measure which policy as well as humanity recommends, should not be slightly rejected; and if we had a particle of spirit, we would have, before the end of next month, an army of 80,000 men on the peninsula. It is certainly a great and hazardous stake; but let us recollect, that nothing great is acquired in our world, without risking much; and if a hazardous game was, on any one occasion, imperiously urgent, it is, undoubtedly, on the present. Ministers should not be afraid of risking their reputations against the fortunes of Europe; and if they knew the character of their countrymen, they would feel, that a signal reverse sustained by our army, would fire the national character to exaltation, and furnish the cabinet with resources more than adequate to avenge and repair the disaster. If mistaken religious zeal formerly drove Myriads to Palestine to rescue the Holy City from the pollution of Infidels; how much more powerful motives to a crusade in defence of the Spaniards, do honour and interest offer the present generation. It is honourable to bleed in such a cause; and death in support of justice and innocence cannot be a calamity. Government should not sink below the feelings of the public; and we hope that their future energy will make up for the momentary consternation they had the weakness to betray.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

FIFTH BULLETIN.

Burgos, Nov. 18.—The fate of the Army of Estremadura has been decided on the plains of Burgos. The Gallician Army, beaten in the battles of Durango, Guenes, and Valmaseda, has been dispersed in the battle of Espinosa. This Army was composed of the ancient Spanish troops which were in Portugal and Gallicia, and which quitted Porto towards the end of June; the militia of Gallicia, Asturias, and old Castile; of 5000 Spanish prisoners, which the English had cloathed and armed at their expence, and disembarked at St. Andero; of the volunteers of Gallicia, of regiments of artillery, and of the troops which the traitor Romana had carried away from the North. This Army had the presumption to attempt cutting off our communication with Biscay. For ten days it was driven from post to post: at last, on the 10th of November, it arrived at Espinosa, where in order to save its artillery, magazines, &c. it formed in order of battle, as it believed itself in a situation not to be forced.

At three o'clock in the afternoon, Marshal Bellune arrived in front of the enemy. General Pacthod was ordered to carry a small battery occupied by the troops of the traitor Romana. This position was excellent, and defended by their best troops, but General Pacthod, with his corps, fell upon these troops who had abused our confidence, and violated their oaths. In an instant they were broken and precipitated down the precipices. The Prince's regiment was destroyed. The enemy made several attacks, in all of which they were defeated. During the night both armies remained in their positions. Whilst this was taking place, the Duke of Dalmatia marched towards Reynosa, the only retreat of the enemy. At break of day the enemy were attacked both on the right and left by the Dukes of Dantzic and Bellune, while General Meuron advanced against his centre. The enemy fled, throwing away their arms and colours, and abandoning his artillery. The Duke of Dantzic took, at Reynosa, their artillery, magazines, and baggage, and made some prisoners. Thus the enemy have been turned, not only at Reynosa, but at Palencia. Sixty pieces of cannon have been taken, 20,000 men killed or prisoners, two Spanish Generals killed; all the succours in arms, &c. sent by the English, have fallen into our hands. Blake saved himself by taking to the Asturian mountains. Romana, with a few thousand men, is marching towards Santander. Our loss is trifling in these contests, not exceeding eighty killed and three hundred wounded. We have not lost any Officer of distinction.

SIXTH BULLETIN.

BURGOS, Nov. 18.—Of the 40,000 men who composed the army of Galicia, part has been killed and taken, and the rest is dispersed. The remaining arrive daily at our posts. The General of Division, Debelle, has taken 500 prisoners in the environs of Vasconcelles.

The Marshal Duke of Istria, who commands the cavalry of the army, entered Aranda on the 16th, at noon. Our advanced parties of horse go on the left, as far as Soria and Madrid, and on the right to Leon and Zamora.

SEVENTH BULLETIN OF THE SPANISH ARMY.

BURGOS, Nov. 20.—On the 16th the van of the Marshal Duke of Dalmatia entered St. Andero, and found there a large quantity of flour, ammunition, and English goods.

The Bishop of St. Andero, animated rather with the spirit of the devil, than that of the gospel, always marching with a cutlass by his side, has taken shelter on board the English frigates.

The cavalry of General Lamalle has posted its advanced posts as far as Torno Sierra.

The regiments of Zamora and of the Princess which formed part of Romana's division, are entirely annihilated."

EIGHTH BULLETIN OF THE ARMY OF SPAIN.

BURGOS, Nov. 22.—The Duke of Dalmatia is following his successes with the utmost activity.

The 7th corps of the army of Spain, commanded by General Govion St. Cyr, has also began preparation. On the 6th November, the place of Rosas was invested by Generals Reille and Peno, and the heights of St. Pedro were carried by the Italians—a large number of Miquelets and English occupied the part of Silva; they were attacked by General Fontana, at the head of three battalions of light infantry, and driven into the sea, with the loss of ten 24-pounders, four of which were English, which they had not time to embark.

On the 8th, the garrison of Rosas made a sortie in three columns, protected by the guns of the English ships. General Mazuchelli killed 600 of them, and repulsed the rest.

NINTH BULLETIN OF THE ARMY OF SPAIN.

This Bulletin refers to the positions and strength of the different Spanish armies.

TENTH BULLETIN.

This Bulletin refers to the same subject as the ninth, and concludes thus:—

The Emperor has come to the resolution to annihilate the armies of the centre and left, and then to serve in the same manner that of the right commanded by General Castanos. When the plan shall have been executed, the march to Madrid will be only a walk (promenade). This grand design ought now to have been accomplished."

ELEVENTH BULLETIN OF THE ARMY OF SPAIN.

ARANDA DE DUERO, Nov. 27.—His Majesty on the 19th sent off the Marshal Duke of Montebello, with instructions for the movements of the left, of which he gave him the command.

The Duke of Montebello and the Duke of Correggiano concerted measures together at Lodosa, on the 20th, for the execution of the orders of his Majesty.

On the 21st the division of General Lagrange, with the brigade of light cavalry of General Colbert, and the brigade of dragoons of General Dijon, set out from Logrono by the right of the Ebro.

At the same time the four divisions composing the corps of the Duke of Correggiano, passed the river at Lodosa, abandoning the whole country between the Ebro and Pampeluna.

On the 22d, at the break of day, the French army began its march. It took its direction to Calahorra, where, on the evening before, were the head-quarters of Castanos; it found that town evacuated; and afterwards marched upon Alfaro; the enemy in like manner retreated.

On the 23d, at break of day, the General of Division, Lefebvre, at the head of the cavalry, and supported by the division of General Morlet, forming the advance guard, met with the enemy—he immediately gave information to the Duke of Montebello, who found the army of the enemy in seven divisions, consisting of 45,000 men, under arms, with its right before Tudela, and its left occupying a line of a league and a half; a disposition absolutely bad. The Arragonese were on the right, the troops of Valencia and New Castile in the centre, and the three divisions of Andalusia, which General Castanos commanded more especially, formed the left—40 pieces of cannon covered the enemy's line.

"At nine in the morning, the column of the French army began to deploye with that order, that regularity and coolness, which characterise veteran troops. Situations were chosen for establishing batteries with sixty pieces of cannon; but the impetuosity of the troops and the inquietude of the enemy, did not allow time for this. The Spanish army was already vanquished by the order and movements of the French army. The Duke of Montebello caused the centre to be pierced by the division of General Maurice Mathieu. The General of Division Lefebvre, with his cavalry, immediately passed on the trot through this opening, and took a circuit by a quarter which enveloped on the left the whole right of the enemy.

"The moment when half of the enemy's line found itself thus turned and defeated, was that in which Gen. Lagrange attacked the village of Cascante, where the line of Castanos was placed, which did not exhibit a better countenance than the right; but abandoned the field of battle, leaving behind it its artillery and a great number of prisoners. The cavalry pursued the remains of the enemy's army to Mallen; in the direction of Saragossa; and to Tarracona, in the direction of Agreda. Seven standards, 80 pieces of cannon, with all their furniture, 12 colonels, 300 officers, and 3000 men, have been taken; 4000 Spaniards have been left dead on the field of battle, or driven into the Ebro. Our loss has been trifling: we have had 60 men killed, and 400 wounded; among the latter is the General of Division Lagrange, who has received a bullet in the arm. Our troops found at Tudela a number of Magazines.

"The Marshal Duke of Correggiano has begun his march upon Saragossa; while a part of the fugitives retired to this place, the left, which had been cut off, fled in disorder to Tarracona and Agreda.

"The Duke of Elchingen, who was on the 22d at Soria, ought to have been on the 23d at Agreda, not a man would have escaped. But this corps being too much fatigued, remained at Soria the 23d and 24th of November. He arrived at Agreda on the 25th, still sufficiently in time to seize a great number of magazines. One named Palafox, formerly a garde du corps, a man without talents, and without courage; a kind of insignificant monk, the true head of a party which acquired him the name of General, was the first to take flight. This is not the first time he has acted in that manner—he has done the same on all occasions.

"This army of 45,000 has been thus beaten and defeated, without our having had more than 6000 men engaged. The battle of Burgos had struck the centre of the enemy, and the battle of Espinosa the right. The battle of Tudela has struck the left. Victory has thus struck our foe as with a thunderbolt, and dispersed the whole league of the enemy.

[This Bulletin concludes with the journal of the operations of the siege of Rosas, who is long and unteresting.]

TWELFTH BULLETIN.

This Bulletin states that "General Maurice Mathieu arrived on the 28th ult. at Baya, pursuing the enemy, and taking every moment fresh prisoners, the number of which is already 5000. The soldiers gave no quarter to armed peasants. The number of pieces of cannon taken is 87."

GERMANY.

VIENNA, Nov. 25.—The Court Gazette has published the following article respecting Turkey:—"The Great Camp of Daud Pacha, near Constantinople, is now occupied but by the particular troops of Mustapha Bairactar, and by the Seymens which he has organized with inconceivable promptitude. All the others are gone to the grand army of Romelia, or returned into their provinces. Of this number the troops of the Beys and Ayans of Asia, form the greater part. These, before their departure, engaged themselves by a most sacred oath before the Grand Vizier, to sacrifice all their personal animosities, and to appear at the first signal to defend the Mahometan religion and the Empire. Ismael, Bay of Seus, Kari Asmanu Oglu, and Kali-Angli Oglu were the first who set out: they were followed by the celebrated Ciapin Oglu. Mustapha Bairaitar is incessantly occupied in augmenting the Seymens, which he will raise to 160,000 men; they are to have red, green, and white uniforms. These troops will be divided into 100 buluks of 1600 men each. There will be for each buluks a Cinbaschi, a Muhlahzin (two Staff Officers), 16 Jubaschi, and 160 Ousbaschi (Captains and Lieutenants). The Grand Vizier has entirely done away the obstacle which resulted from a difference of religion, and which the Porte has hitherto so inviolably respected; Turks and Greeks are to serve indiscriminately in the corps of Seymens. Mustapha has already at Rudschuck, many Greeks among his best troops, and on the 12th of October, his confident and banker made their entry under an escort of sixty Seymens, who were all Armenians. —The Grand Vizier caused in the month of October a great number of Cackgis (rowers and fishermen) to come to the environs of the capital, in order to make them serve on board the fleet. The antient corps of Janissaries loses every day its consistency. The Grand Vizier has just caused to be executed, two of the most powerful supports of that corps, and who were the most powerfully opposed to Nizami-Gudid, the ci-devant Siemen Baschi, and the inspector of arsenals Khwegi-Oglu Mustapha Aga; this last, on his being arrested, having called to the 25th Cohort of Janissaries, to which he belonged, for assistance, Mustapha immediately killed him with a blow of the sabre. The executioner afterwards cut off his head, as well as that of his unfortunate companion. The Grand Seignor has by a decree given to the Grand Vizier, unlimited powers for the augmentation of the forces both by sea and land. This Minister completely paid the new troops before the commencement of the fast, and, what is very important, has established a chamber of finances, particularly for the Seymens, at the head of which he has placed the former treasurer Bedidsch Effendi. He has replaced the Minister of Finances by the antient Crouschdschie, Marshal of the Court Tahsim, Achmet Effendi, who has for his successor, Harnand Mehmesch Effendi, formerly president of army accounts. Thanks to the indefatigable vigilance and energy of Mustapha Bairactar, all these important changes have been peaceably effected—Egypt continues to enjoy the most perfect tranquillity. The Pacha of Bagdad pursues with vigour the important advantages which he has lately gained over the Wechabites.—(Moniteur, Dec. 5.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct 25.—The Grand Vizer has caused Bachi Aga, Commandant of the Marine, the fanatical enemy of every thing that was Turkish, to be beheaded. This event has caused a great sensation in the capital. We have been equally astonished at learning of the disposition of Haggi Pacha, Commandant of the Castles of the Dardanelles, who has been sent into exile. He has been replaced by Rahib Pacha, who is considered as a zealous partisan of the Porte. M. Bosgoiwick has presented his credentials as Charge d'Affaires from Russia. —Moniteur, Dec. 6.

COURT OF INQUIRY.

NINTH DAY.

CHELSEA COLLEGE, TUESDAY, DEC. 13.

The proceedings commenced by reading a letter from Sir H. Dalrymple to Sir C. Cotton, stating the operations of the British army up to the battle of Vimiera, and the terms of the subsequent Armistice and Convention.

Sir Harry Burrard then placed himself beside the President, and read his narrative in substance as follows:—

"Mr. President, and my Lords and Gentlemen,—On July 28 I received notification from the Commander in Chief, that his Majesty had been graciously pleased to appoint me second in command under Sir Hew Dalrymple, and with that notification [illegible] of my instructions, and a list of the Staff, and [illegible] army to be employed. On the 29d, I received [illegible] from Lord Castlereagh; on the 27th I embarked [illegible] and on the 31st, sailed from that port, it [illegible] ly stated to me by the Under Secretary of [illegible] ment were extremely impatient for my sailing. I also received a letter, previous to my leaving Portsmouth from Lord Castlereagh, intimating a wish, before I proceeded to the South of Portugal, that I should touch at Oporto, or send some confidential agent there to collect what information I could upon the matters connected with the service. Having experienced baffling winds in the Channel, I went on board the Brazen sloop, and arrived at Oporto on the 16th of August, where I learnt that Sir A. Wellesley, having been reinforced by General Spencer's division, had debarked at Mondego Bay. I proceeded immediately on my voyage, and arrived at Mondego Bay on the 18th. It was my intention to have disembarked at that place, and to have sent Sir John Moore to the Tagus with his division, with a view to take the enemy in the rear, but I found a variety of obstacles opposed to me. In the first place, Sir A. Wellesley had swept the country of every species of conveyance, and though the people were disposed to assist the British arms, they had not the ability. Carriages we could find none, the streams were all dry, and with respect to provisions we should have been in a very precarious state. I made all possible inquiries after the 150 mules, promised by the Bishop of Oporto, but none had arrived, nor could any account of their speedy arrival be gained. It was equally imprudent at that time to have landed part of the reinforcements; for had Sir John Moore's brigade been disembarked it would have taken time to equip that brigade, with a view of marching into the interior, and would besides have placed the columns at such a distance, that a want of co-operation must necessarily have been felt. I therefore resolved on proceeding to some other point of destination.—On the 19th, at night, we spoke a dispatch-boat, which informed us that Sir Arthur Wellesley had had a smart action with the enemy on the 17th, and had sustained some loss, but not adequate to that of the enemy. I directed Sir John Moore to return, and land at Mondego Bay, in order that he might be enabled to support Sir A. Wellesley, should he be obliged to fall back, or to assist him to prosecute further advantages. By the same boat, I gained information that Peniche was in the hands of the enemy, and that it would be impracticable to land with safety South of that fort. Under all these circumstances, as I have before stated, I thought it prudent that the army should halt, and felt great satisfaction that my brother Officers, whose talents and experience were unquestionable, concurred with me in the propriety of that opinion. On the morning of the 21st, I landed, and presently heard a firing towards Vimiera. I was convinced the enemy had forestalled the necessity of the British army's advancing, by commencing an attack themselves. I understood Sir Arthur Wellesley was on the left of the army, and I shortly after joined him on the heights. I had a few words of explanation with him, and I had such reason to be satisfied with the dispositions he had made, that I directed him to go on, and complete the business he had so successfully and so happily began. By thus directing him to proceed, I imagined I was exercising one of the functions of a Commander in Chief, and I held myself responsible for the issue. Soon after the French gave way, and in less than two hours they were every where repulsed. At this moment I was informed that no advantage could be expected from the Portuguese cavalry; and on Sir Arthur's suggesting the propriety of the troops advancing, I answered that I saw no reason for changing my first opinion, and that it was better the army should wait the arrival of reinforcements before they proceeded to advance. During the engagement, I had observed the inability of the artillery horses, and a want of celerity in their movement. I also observed large bodies of the enemy's cavalry moving in different directions, and a body of infantry to the left which had not been engaged. These, and other circumstances, formed my determination, and Generals Murray and Clinton, said I had well determined. On 22d, Sir A. Wellesley came to me from Peniche, and informed me that Sir H. Dalrymple had arrived. I went to the outposts, and found the French General, Kellerman, was advancing with a flag of truce; and of the transactions subsequent to that, the Board, he presumed, were already in possession."

Sir H. Burrard having finished, the Deputy Judge Advocate read a string of questions which had been previously sent to Sir H. Burrard, and to which the latter read his answers in writing. The first question related to the account of the state of the army which Sir H. Burrard had received on his arrival. Sir H. Burrard's answer described it as particularly deficient in cavalry, while the artillery carriages were rather deficient, and there was a want of horses for drawing them.

Q. Did Sir A. Wellesley express a wish to pursue the enemy immediately upon the battle of the 21st?—A. He did.

The Question was then put by Lord Moira:—Does Sir H. Burrard not suppose that the French troops had undergone as much fatigue in advancing to the attack, and during the action?—A. Certainly there was reason to suppose so.

Sir A. Wellesley then rose, and put a variety of questions to Sir H. Burrard.

Q. Has Sir H. Burrard heard of the standing order, that the army should cook one day's provisions previous to a march; and would not the troops have had such provisions in their haversacks?—A. Certainly, if they received orders to march.

Q. Did I not inform Sir H. Burrard, on the 20th, that I had given orders for the army to march on the following morning?—A. Yes.

Q. Does Sir H. Burrard recollect, that I twice proposed to him, on the field of battle, that the army should advance in pursuit of the enemy?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect, that I proposed to pursue the enemy with five of the brigades; leaving General Fane's and General Anstruther's brigades in the positions which they occupied?—A. I do remember the proposal; but I understand that the advance was to be made on the left, where the ground was very advantageous to the enemy, who were much superior in cavalry. I also thought that General Ferguson's brigade was advanced so far, as to be in considerable danger.

The Deputy Advocate General then put a variety of questions to Sir A. Wellesley.

Q. Was there any probability, in your opinion, that had our army immediately followed up the success obtained on the 21st, the defeat would have been rendered complete?—A. The enemy's left, which was engaged with our right, retired by a road which leads along the heights towards the vineyards. Their troops were thrown into confusion by the attack of our cavalry, and had we advanced at that moment, there was a great probability of their being completely routed.

Q. Was there any opportunity, in your opinion, of intercepting and cutting off a part of the French army?—A. Certainly, I think there was; if the left wing had followed up the plan which I suggested to Sir H. Burrard, I believe that many prisoners would have been taken both on the enemy's right and left.

Q. When did you first propose to Sir H. Burrard, that the army should advance?—A. When the enemy were beaten on the left, I went to Sir H. Burrard, and proposed to him that our troops should advance. Soon after my first proposal to Sir H. Burrard, General Ferguson sent his Aide-de-Camp, Captain Mellish, to inform me of the great advantages which he conceived would arise from the advance of his brigade, in order to follow up the success which they had obtained. I immediately took Captain Mellish with me to General Burrard, to endeavour to prevail upon him to permit us to continue our advantages, but he would not comply.

Sir H. Burrard then asked Sir A. Wellesley, what reason he had for supposing that the French reserve had been engaged in the battle of the 21st?—A. I myself saw them engaged; I collected from the information of several wounded prisoners that they had been engaged; and General Kellerman, who commanded the French reserve, told it me, and that Junot attributed the loss of the battle to the impetuosity of the reserve.

General Spencer was then called and examined.

Sir A. Wellesley.—Q. Did General Spencer, as my second in command, consider the defeat of the enemy so decided as to warrant our pursuing them?—A. I considered the enemy to be completely beaten in the centre, and I could, with my division, have supported Sir A. Wellesley in the pursuit.

General Fergusson was next examined by Sir Arthur Wellesley.

Sir Arthur W.—Does Gen. Fergusson recollect that after he received an order to halt, he sent Capt. Mellish with a message to inform me that if I would permit him to advance, he could gain an important advantage?—A. I did send such a message.

Sir Arthur W.—Describe to the Court your reasons for sending it?

General Fergusson.—A column of the enemy's infantry, consisting in my opinion of from 1500 to 2000 men, was completely broken, and in confusion had got into a hollow, and thereby placed in a situation of being completely cut off from the main body by an advance movement of the corps under my command.

Q. Did General Fergusson consider the enemy so beaten on the 21st, as to render a pursuit of them advantageous?—A. I did.

Q. Did General Fergusson perceive any part of the enemy's troops at the end of the engagement to consist of cavalry?—A. I did not.

Q. When and where did you see the enemy's cavalry?—A. Their cavalry were the first troops that shewed themselves to our line. In answer to a question put by Lord Moira, he stated, that the enemy made their last stand at the village of Braganza, whence they were dislodged by the 71st regiment, who were the battalion most advanced of the British troops. They then went off in the utmost confusion.

Lord Burghersh was next examined by Sir A. Wellesley.

Q. Was his Lordship present on the evening of the 21st, when I recommended to Sir Harry Burrard to pursue the enemy, and follow up the advantages we had gained that day?—A. I was.

Q. Does your Lordship recollect my having on the 21st urged Sir Harry Burrard on the field to continue the pursuit, and my referring to our discussion of the preceding evening?—A. I recollect that he urged him to advance our right nearer to Torres Vedras that evening, and that if his opinion was taken, a part of the enemy who had been engaged would not be able to reach Lisbon.

Sir Arthur Wellesley then said, that he would call other witnesses to prove further, that he recommended to Sir Harry Burrard to pursue the enemy after the battle; but after a short conversation amongst the Members of the Board, it was adjourned to Wednesday.

TENTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Examination of Sir A. WELLESLEY by Sir H. BURRARD.

Q. Do you think it was possible for the British army, consisting of 16 or 17,000 men, to have commenced their march, when the French cavalry so far out-numbered the English, without the enemy's knowing immediately of the movement?—A. I think, under the circumstances of the country, and of position, it was possible for the army to march without the knowledge of the enemy, at nine miles distance, for at least two or three hours.

Q. If the French at Torres Vedras had known of the march of the British army, could not they have reached Mafra first, and have gained reinforcements from St. Julien and Cascaves?—A. I conceive not.

Q. If you meant to attack Cascayes and Fort St. Julien, how did you propose to get heavy cannon?—A. It had been settled before I left England, that I should have the use of what heavy cannon I wanted from the ships of the fleet, and ammunition for 24-pounders; and mortars, with ammunition, were sent from England in a store-ship, which joined the fleet before we were in a situation to undertake any siege.

Q. How many days did you think it would have taken to reduce Cascayes and St. Julien by siege?—A. I never made up my mind. Neither of them is strong.

Lord Moira then, in the name of the Court, put the following questions to Sir H. Burrard:

Q. If General Junot thought that the Convention was more advantageous than protracting the campaign, what are the motives that you suppose to have induced him to such a decision?—A. I am not prepared to say what they were. I do not believe that the Convention would have been signed, if the French Officers had not laid their hands upon their hearts, and declared in the most solemn manner that nothing should be carried away.—This was a thing which could not appear in print, as it might cost the French Generals their heads when they came to Paris.

Sir A. Wellesley examined by the Court.

The same question was put to Sir A. Wellesley.—A. When I conceived it expedient to allow the French to evacuate Portugal by sea, my opinion was formed from a consideration of British interests and British objects, and also of the interests and objects of those allies acting in concert with Great Britain. I thought that the French army, having the military possession of the country, had a fair military right to withdraw their army from Portugal by sea, and to carry with them their arms and baggage. I do not think myself at all accountable for the reasons which determined General Junot.

Sir H. Dalrymple examined by the Court.

The same question was put to Sir Hew.

Answer.—It must also be recollected that I had particular instructions to take care in expelling the French from Lisbon, that they should be prevented from retreating through Spain.—Without presuming to say how far it might have been the intention of the enemy to attempt their retreat through Spain, I must again state, that according to my opinion, and that of all my Officers, I had no other means of executing that part of my instructions, or preventing their retreat through Spain (if such had been their intention), except by signing the Convention. I cannot be answerable for the motives which induced General Junot to agree to such a Convention.

Sir Arthur Wellesley then read to the Court a written statement of his reasons. On the 20th, when we proposed moving forward, he had an army of from 16,000 to 17,000 brit troops in high order and spirits, and well equipped, and he had no reason to doubt of the issue of a battle with the enemy, who was so much beaten, and who was retreating in the utmost confusion. On the 21st he did all that he could to prevail upon Sir Harry Burrard to allow the army to follow up the advantages it had gained. As to the armistice which he had approved of, it by no means followed, that that which would not have been right on the morning of the 21st might not be right on the evening of the 22d. On the 21st the enemy were in the utmost confusion. On the 22d they were no longer in that state. The situation of the French army had been much improved in consequence of the British army not having followed up its advantages. There was no longer any chance of preventing them from crossing the Tagus if they had been so disposed.

Sir A. Wellesley examined by Sir H. Burrard.

Q. Was not there the same facility of advancing to Mafra on the 23d that there was on the morning of the 21st.—A. There was certainly the same facility, but there was no longer the same object, as there no longer remained a chance of bringing the French to another action.

Sir H. Burrard then read from a paper a short summary of the reasons which induced him not to follow up the advantages of the 21st. The extensive line of the British was against an advance—the army had been long engaged, and under arms an hour before day light—the enemy had a great advantage in point of cannon and cavalry. He was well aware that his determination could not be agreeable to a British army which had so nobly signalized itself; but he thought that determination the best under all the circumstances. He acted to the best of his judgment. He particularly regretted the want of those Gentlemen who were with him on the 21st, and adverted to the unusual predicament in which he stood from that circumstance. He had decided on what he saw and knew, and had not thought it wise to risk much, when a great reinforcement was at hand, which would render the operations certain, which might otherwise have been doubtful.

Sir H. Burrard, when he sat down, after making these few observations, appeared to be much distressed.

Sir A. Wellesley.—Though I did differ, and do still differ most completely from Sir H. Burrard as to the propriety of our advancing after the defeat of the enemy on the 21st, yet I may be permitted to take this opportunity of declaring to the Court, and to the public, that I am fully convinced that Sir H. Burrard acted from such motives as an Officer ought to feel; and that his conduct was such as, in his judgment, appeared best calculated to promote the interests of his country.

Sir H. Burrard was much affected at this declaration of Sir A. Wellesley, and EVEN SHED TEARS.

Sir H. Dalrymple.—He was happy that his dispatch of the 27th Aug. was in evidence, as it was a record of the thanks which he had given, and which were justly due, not only to the value of the corps, but to the energy and talents of the General who commanded (Sir A. W.) at the battle of Vimiera. He must say, however, for himself, that his landing and taking the command had no preponderating influence on the only question then under consideration in the army—the Armistice which was preparing, and which ended in the Convention. The general principle of the armistice was agreed to by all the other Lieutenant-Generals, and he made it subservient to the purpose of landing in safety the whole of Sir John Moore's army. The general principle of the Convention had the sanction of all the other Generals; and if his opinion was not overturned by the opinion of the Court, he could submit with patience to whatever he had suffered in his feelings from other opinions, which he could never persuade himself to consider well-founded, unless the Court were to adopt them by their sentence.

The President then stated that the whole of the evidence had been gone through, and every thing that was of public interest. What remained would be matters of arrangement, and of private consideration for the Board.

The Public are, therefore, no more to be admitted.

[This Gazette contains a dispatch to Lord Castlereagh from Sir John Stuart, commanding his Majesty's forces at Sicily, which is in substance as follows:—Sir J. Stuart having been apprised that a number of coasting vessels, said to be charged with contributions in kind from the two provinces of Calabria to the Neapolitan Government, were assembled at Diamente, under the gulf of Policastro, under the protection of four gun-boats and heavy batteries on the shore, he detached Lieutenant-Colonel Bryce, of the Royal Engineers, with the troops of the regiment of Malta, commanded by Major Hammill; 150 rank and file of the 58th regiment, under Capt. O'Brien; 50 men of the German Legion, a detachment of artillery, with two six-pounders and one howitzer, under Capt. Campbell; to co-operate with the Halcyon and Weazel; and a small naval equipment of his Sicilian Majesty, in the endeavour to take or destroy them. The result of which is the capture of a flotilla of 38 sail of the enemy's vessels, of which four are large gun-boats besides a considerable quantity of ordnance and ammunition, and which was performed, after first attacking and taking the town of Diamente, which covered the vessels ranged on the right and left of it, and which was nearly inaccessible on three sides. The whole was performed with coolness, judgment, and intrepidity. No loss was sustained on our side, although the town was defended by 400 men of the Civic Guard, and some French troops, which speedily took to the mountains, and left our troops in possession of the ships, &c. &c.]

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

An express arrived on Friday morning from Falmouth, with dispatches from Spain. They were brought by the Cheerful Cutter; which sailed from Corunna on the 9th inst. The following Bulletin was issued yesterday by Government:—

"A ship of war has arrived with dispatches from Corunna, which she left on the 9th inst. Accounts are brought by it that the greatest enthusiasm had burst forth at Madrid, and that the people were determined to make every effort to defend the Capital. General Hope had joined Sir John Moore, at Salamanca, and Sir David Baird was at Villa Franca on the 7th, and had suspended his retreat.

"Bonaparte was at Aranda de Donoro; his advanced corps had made itself master of Soma Sierra, and a French corps had reached Segovia."

The following article contains some farther particulars:—

"It appears by letters received from Salamanca, dated December 5th, that Sir John Moore was still at that place; and determined not to proceed in his retreat, as the most vigorous measures were adopted by the Government to arm the people en masse, and to occupy and defend all the strong posts. The inhabitants of Madrid had all taken arms, and were incessantly employed in barricading their streets and in making every preparation for a desperate defence.—Saragossa, provided with a garrison of fifteen thousand men, would oppose an obstacle to the enemy's progress much more formidable than any he had yet encountered. The armies of Andalusia and Arragon, which are composed of the prime troops of Spain, had suffered very little from the late engagements, the loss falling principally on the corps of Valencia and Murcia, which consisted of new levies. The general aspect of affairs was much more favourable; and the result was, a determination in both the British Commanders, to remain in their positions, in order to take an active part, if the resistance about to be made should prove as firm as it appeared animated. The retreat of Sir David Baird is of course suspended, as well as that of Sir John Moore. Gen. Hope has lately joined Sir John Moore at Salamanca with his whole brigade.

But we are sorry to observe that the joy excited by the foregoing intelligence, is dissipated by the last accounts from Paris. Mr. Shaw, the Messenger, who arrived in town yesterday morning, from Paris, brought papers to the 16th inst. they contain the following article: "The city of Madrid has capitulated: Our troops entered it to day at noon." This article is dated, Camp at Madrid, 4th Dec. 1808, and is contained in the Moniteurs of the 13th and 14th inst. The Capital made some defence; for the Duke of Istria appeared before it on the 2d, with the cavalry: and the infantry arrived on the following day. This intelligence we derive from the following Bulletin.

"THIRTEENTH BULLETIN OF THE ARMY OF SPAIN.

SAINT MARTIN, NEAR MADRID, DEC. 2.—"On the 29th ult. the head-quarters of the Emperor was removed to the village of Boreguellas. On the 30th, at break of day, the Duke of Belune presented himself at the foot of the Somosierra. A division of 13,000 men of the Spanish Army of Reserve defended the passage of the mountains. The enemy thought themselves unattackable in that position. They had entrenched the narrow passage called Puerto with 16 pieces of cannon.

"The 9th light infantry marched upon the right, the 96th upon the causway, and the 24th followed by the side of the heights, on the left. General Senarmont, with six pieces of artillery, advanced by the causway. The action commenced by the firing of musquetry and cannon. A charge made by Gen. Montbrun, at the head of the Polish light-horse, decided the affair; it was a most brilliant one, and this regiment has covered itself with glory, and proved it was worthy to form a part of the Imperial Guard. Cannons, flags, muskets, soldiers, all were taken or cut to pieces. Eight Polish light-horse were killed on the cannon, and sixteen have been wounded; among the latter is Captain Dzievanoski, who was dangerously wounded, and lies almost without hopes of recovery.

"Major Segur, Marshal of the Emperor's household charged among the Polish troops, and received many wounds, one of which is very severe. Sixteen pieces of cannon, ten flags, thirty covered chests, 200 waggons laden with all kinds of baggage, the military chests of the regiments, are the fruits of this brilliant affair. Among the prisoners, which are very numerous, are all the Colonels or Lieutenant Colonels of the corps of the Spanish division; all the soldiers would have been taken if they had not thrown away their arms, and dispersed in the mountains.

"On the 1st of December the head quarters of the Emperor were at St. Augustin, and on the 2d the Duke of Istria, with the cavalry, commanded the heights of Madrid.

"The infantry could not arrive before the 3d. The intelligence which we hitherto received led us to think that this town was suffering under all kinds of disorders, and that the doors were barricaded.

"The weather is very fine."

This news is distressing, nobody will deny it; and the more so in consequence of the prior intelligence received on Friday from our army in Spain. If the strongest sympathy and the profoundest regret could avert the misfortunes of our allies, their future destinies would be secured against further reverses. Demonstrations of sorrow on our part, will neither nerve the arms of the Patriots, nor mollify the ferocious heart of their unprincipled invader. But have we done what we could, or what we promised, or what it was our duty and interest to perform in their behalf?—no, no, and distraction almost fires our brain at the idea, that our assistance was ineffectual, was comparatively—nothing. Complaints and expostulations are useless; and this is not a season for reproaches, when only perfect unanimity and great virtues can hold out any prospect of retrieving what we have spoiled by our remissness and mismanagement. We were sometimes inclined to dispute even the authenticity of this Bulletin; as the last accounts from Sir J. Moore are of the 5th, [illegible] of the arrival of the enemy at Madrid. The Duke of Istria appeared before that capital with the cavalry on the 3d; the event might therefore be easily known at Salamanca on the 5th, the date of Moore's dispatches; as the distance is not more than 150 miles. The enemy is capable of every art, in order to relax our exertions, or retard our reinforcement; but we dare not indulge in the pleasing delusion. In great calamities men should take the worst, and collect courage to resist, to surmount them. We have the means, Heaven knows, to overcome greater difficulties, if there were men capable of wielding to advantage the great resources of this country. Let us speculate no further on that despondingsubject; but rather examine what may be still done for a people whose cause we have so strongly and ardently advocated. We feel their anguish; we are not callous to their sufferings; we follow with execrations the barbarous invaders who are persecuting, who are driving from their homes, separating from their families, robbing of their property, and setting a price on the heads of the worthiest and most respectable characters in that country. We sympathise in the sufferings, and share the indignant feelings of these generous fugitives; but their resources are still great; and the occupation of the Capital has no more influence on their cause, than that of Burgos had. The invader is playing a desperate game; the more he advances, the more hazardous it becomes. Actions of éclat are necessary, on his part, to impose upon Austria, and discourage vigorous exertions on our side. His troops do not occupy a fourth part of the Peninsula, and the whole of the southern and eastern provinces remain unsubdued.—They offer stronger and much more formidable means of resistance; and the success of the enemy will decrease the animosity of the natives. Though the tyrant may advance to the very camp at St. Roch, the subjugation of Spain is however, far from being effected. We should, nevertheless, neglect nothing, and always have shipping enough to transport the Patriots to a place of safety, where they might be embodied again, in order to rush, as soon as a favourable opportunity offers, on their oppressors. This is not a fit season for economy; no expence must be spared, if they only contribute to keep up a single spark of that divine fire, which has so ardently glowed in the breasts of the Spaniards. Ceuta, or the Belearic Islands, would afford most eligible places of arms for the refugees; and in case of extreme emergency, we might collect there an army sufficiently formidable to effect, a second time, the expulsion of the enemy from the Peninsula. Our fleets should keep up an unceasing communication with the land, to encourage the Patriots in their attachment to the noble cause, to hold out to them a prospect of salvation, and to transport such as were willing to embark, to the great body of the fugitive Patriots. But Heaven be praised, these desperate measures are not necessary; and we propose them only in case of extreme emergency. The cause is still strong; we have only the French accounts as yet: those which arrive through another channel, betray neither despondency, nor evince a wish to conciliate the tyrant by submission.

The French Papers contain a very long account of the late occurrences in Turkey, and positively assert, that the proposals of Mr. Adair have been rejected: and that he was refused permission to proceed to the Capital. This we totally disbelieve; and the last accounts from Malta speak of his arrival in Constantinople, where he was received with the greatest distinction. He had several conferences with Mustapha Bairactar; and the strongest hopes were entertained, that this intelligent and active negociator would succeed in his mission.

We have frequently alluded to the folly and dangerous tendency of listening to the overtures of Bonaparte. Every man, who feels a similar conviction, in common with us, must have felt a proportionate pleasure in perusing his Majesty's Declaration. We regret that the spirit of parties in this country, and the generous, though Quixotic, notion, of reclaiming the Emperor Alexander, did not permit Ministers to adopt this resolution as soon as they received Bonaparte's Address to the Legislative Body. The character of the Usurper is a strong composition of dissimulation, remorseless villainy, profound hypocrisy, supported by considerable talents, astonishing versatility, uncommon perseverance with the most sovereign indifference to the means he employs to attain his object. It is deplorable, therefore, that the abuses of party spirit should reduce Ministers to the mortifying embarrassment of prostituting the word Peace, by appearing to listen to the pacific proposals of a monster, whose every action, word and gesture, betray the most inveterate animosity, and the most consummate thirst of vengeance against every one that bears the name of Englishman. Who does not even affect to conceal it; the rancour of which has so strongly blended itself with his existence, forms so prominent a part of his impressions, that he never alludes to this country, directly or indirectly, whether in offering us the olive branch, or unsheathing the sword of vengeance, that he does not express a degree of animosity, which neither sacrifices, nor submission, nor the lowest debasement could appease;—extermination, and the destruction of every vestige of our greatness and freedom, could alone satisfy his unextinguishable hate. It is, therefore, folly of the most dangerous species to oppose meekness to arrogance, and moderation to the most insulting brutality. We disclaim and strongly condemn the pusillanimity of returning polite and measured enmity, for the most savage hatred. The man abhors us; we know it; and if we had a particle of the proud, unyielding spirit of our ancestors, we should exult in his abhorrence; for the detestation of a man stained with the most enormous crimes, and capable of committing, without compunction, atrocities of the blackest dye, should afford matter of triumphant satisfaction to a people, proud, and conscious of their integrity and humanity. A most barbarous and criminal abuse of the word toleration has been prevalent of late years; and which, if not repressed, will corrupt the stamina of our feelings, and substitute the glare and the sentimental cant of pseudo-humanity, for the sublime virtue itself, which is as inseparable from justice, as heat from fire. Better men and better times knew nothing of this distinction; but, with bold integrity, and an unerring knowledge of men, opposed censure and energy to incorrigible depravity. Were any person to propose taming the old tyger, who weltered for years in blood and carnage, or to appease the cravings of his ravenous appetite by soothings, and was guilty of the folly of approaching him, in order to try the dangerous experiment; there is nobody who would not condemn his folly and rashness, and pronounce him, without hesitation, a lost man. Has not Bonaparte, in every action of his public life, betrayed as instinctive an appetite for blood: and, can a single example be produced, where the misery and carnage of whole provinces checked him in the career of his ambition. Have friendship, services, concessions, humiliation, virtues, or supplication, been able to move his savage heart, when he marked out a victim for destruction. Forsooth! he assists his family and followers; so does the tyger take care of her young ones; but the human savage, more ferocious and unnatural, would immediately murder the most fostered of his dependents and family, were they to thwart him in his ambition.

The Gazette of last night contains an order for the further prorogation of Parliament to Thursday, the 18th of January, instead of the 16th of that month, as was first intended.

Favourable intelligence we understand has also been received by Lord Collingwood. It mentions the complete failure of an attack made by the enemy upon the fortress of Rosas. His Majesty's Ship Excellent has affored the most effecual assistance to the garrison; she approacher so near the shore, as to have been able to rake the assailants with grape shot. Some of oor intrepid Marines contributed also to tepel the attack of the enemy, who were beat back with very great loss.

The rumour that the Earl of Chatham being appointed to the commaud of the British troops in Spain is positively contradicted.

The last letters from Lisbon state, that the people in many parts of the country had manifested an increased refractory disposition towards the Regency; that secret meetings were frequently held, and that many of the disaffected are well armed. The utmost precautions, however, had been taken, and hopes were entertained that the public peace would not be disturbed.

Free Trade with Hayti.—Mr. Fawkener presents his compliments to Mr. Peltier, and acquaints him, that an Order in Council has this day been issued by his Majesty, declaring, that those ports and places of the island of St. Domingo which are not in the actual possession of France, and from which the British flag is not excluded, shall be considered as not being in a state of hostility with his Majesty, and that his Majesty's subjects and others are at liberty freely to trade thereat in the same manner as they may trade at neutral ports and places.

Mr Shaw, the English messenger, now in Paris, is directed to bring a Lady with him from that capital in exchange for three female relations of Talleyrand, so handsomely released by Mr. Canning, who set sail for Boulogne along with the Russian and French Messengers.

The homeward-bound East-India ships have encountered some heavy gales of wind since their arrival in the Downs. The whole of them on Thursday last either parted, or slipt their cables.—Two other ships in the Downs got athwart hawse of his Majesty's ship Venerable, of 74 guns, carried away her bowsprit, and received other injury. Considerable damage has been done to the shipping off Deal and Dover, and much apprehension is entertained for the safety of some other vessels.

We are sorry to find, by letters from Columbo, that our commerce in the Indian Seas suffered severely by the Piedmontaise, previously to her capture by the St. Fiorenzo The following are the ships stated to have been captured by her:—

Forth, Greenway, bound from Calcutta to Bussorah, insured for two lacks of rupees; Assistance, Chapman, from Bombay to Columbo; Sophia, Henderson, from ditto to ditto; Fayz Solymany, Arab, from Calcutta to Bombay; Candir Kouli Khan, from Bengal to Bombay; the Rozalio Maria, Portuguese, from Cochin to Colombo; Resource, Carolina, Highland Chief, Calcutta, Sarah, Mustapha, Louisa, and Udney; besides a rich ship, name not ascertained, from Bengal to Bombay, and a small vessel, which she burnt.

The cruizing station which the Piedmontaise occupied was favourable for intercepting the trade bound to the Malabar coast and the Gulphs; in fact, scarcely a vessel bound that way could escape her.

Lord Manners and the Liberty of the Press.—A motion was made in the Court of Chancery, Dublin, Dec. 8. for an attachment against an Attorney, for publishing in the Newspapers the proceedings of that Court, in reversing the Decree of another, as it cast reflections upon some of the parties and introduced matter which was hurtful to their feelings. His Lordship said, he was proud to find the proceedings of Courts published, and he wished to see a great deal more of them, as they answered most salutary purposes. It shewed the people how to guide themselves, when similar cases would occur; and, if judges acted wrong, the proceedings ought to be published. He, for his part, wished every decree he had, or would make was in every Newspaper in the kingdom; and that, if the Press was to be gagged, God knows where it would end.—Motion refused.

Bon Mot Extraordinary.—One of the most pointed and severe satires that perhaps ever was uttered, was made by Professor Porson, a short time before his death. Being in a mixed company, among which were many eminent literary characters, and particularly Mr. S. the poet, who has a very high opinion of his own talents, the conversation turned on some of his productions, when, as usual, he began to extol their merits. "I will tell you, Sir," said Mr. Porson, "what I think of your poetical works: they will be read, when Shakespeare's and Milton's are forgotten, (every eye was instantly fixed upon the Professor) but not till then.

Murder.—On Sunday evening, about eight o'clock, as Mr. Wm. White, a respectable farmer, of Hoo, near Upnor in Kent, was sitting in his parlour reading, a shot was fired through the window, which instantly killed him. The alarm being given, immediate search was made after the perpetrator, but without effect. A gun, recently discharged, was found in a ditch about 40 yards from the house, near the Medway; from which it is presumed that the villain escaped by water. The deceased was a widower, and bore an excellent character: he has left a family of eleven children to lament his loss. The most deliberate aim must have been taken by the perpetrator, as he had placed a hurdle before the window to rest the gun on. The elder branches of the family were sitting near the unfortunate man, and his eldest daughter had just risen to reach something from an adjoining cupboard when the shot was fired, which entered at the back part of his head, and came out under his right eye. The gun is an old musket-barrel fastened to the stock by a nail in the breech, hammered down double in the wood; the lock will not stand at whole cock, but was fastened back by a piece of twine, which is supposed to have been cut at the time of firing, as it appeared in that state when found.

Horrid Murder.—Wednesday the Parthian, Captain Rubbertson, at Plymouth, was ordered to Corunna with dispatches. Captain B. came on board with the dispatches, and while talking to the Purser on the quarter-deck, one of the Master's Mates came behind him and shot him with a pistol between the shoulders through the spinal marrow. Captain B. exclaimed, "Oh, Lord! I am killed," fell on the deck and expired instantly. The villain was instantly secured in irons by the ship's company, who were with difficulty restrained from tearing him to pieces, so much was Captain B. beloved by his ship's company. This morning the body of Capt. B. was placed in a shell and brought ashore to the Hospital, for the purpose of a Coroner's Inquest. Minute guns were fired from the Parthian while the boat was carrying the body ashore. She sailed directly for her station. Captain B. was about 22 years of age, a gentlemanly and good officer.

Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised a whole assize, or two pence in the peck loaf.

At a Provincial Assize not long since in Ireland, an Attorney was upon a capital charge of forgery. The trial was extremely long; when after much botheration from Council, and the most minute investigation of the Judge, it appeared, to the complete satisfaction of a very crowded Court, that the culprit had forged the Signature of a man who could neither read nor write!

A watchmaker at Vienna, named Digen, has constructed wings, by means of which he can raise and suspend himself in the air. He can move forward, but not with celerity; he is, however, of opinion, that he can so far improve his mechanism as to be able to fly at the rate of eight miles an hour.

THE COURT.

Wednesday the King arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor, where he held a private Levee, and the following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Rear-Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, on being appointed an Admiral of the White, and upon his return from the Baltic.

Major-General Spencer upon his return from Portugal.

Capt. Dundas of the Royal Navy, upon his being appointed a Commissioner at Bombay.

Capt. Inman, of the Royal Navy, upon his being appointed a Commissioner at Madras.

Colonel Drinkwater laid before his Majesty the Seventh Report of the Commissioners of the Military Inquiry.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, at which a Proclamation was agreed to be issued, for further proroguing Parliament from the 16th, to the 19th of January, then to meet for the dispatch of business.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held when the following Commanders took leave of the Court previous to departing for their respective destinations:—

Capt. A. Welbank, Cuffnells, for St. Helena, Bencoolen, and China. Capt. J. Loch, Scaleby Castle; Capt. G. Bonham, True Briton; and Capt. P. Wedderburn, Cumberland, for Bombay and China. Capt. J. N. Whyte, Lord Melville, for Madras and Bengal.

The under-mentioned Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, &c.

Captain M. Isacke, Metcalfe, and Captain J. A. Cumberlege, Surrey, for Madras and Bengal.

In consequence of the general tranquillity in India, and the few casualties in the civil service, the nominations of Cadets and Writers for that country in the ensuing season will be on a reduced scale.

The Court adjourned, at six o'clock.

Friday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the stations of the following ships were thus altered, viz.

Dover Castle, Captain ——, for Bombay direct, instead of Madras and Bengal, Devonshire, Captain J. Murray, Madras and Bengal, instead of the Dover Castle, Marquis Wellesley, Captain Le Blanc, Ceylon and Bengal, instead of Bombay, in the room of the Devonshire.

The Court voted the sum of 1,000*l.* towards the subscription for the relief of the Spanish Patriots.

The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

The Worcester and the extra ship Sir William Pulteney, Capt. Christopher, arrived off the Isle of Wight, the 11th instant.

The Worcester, with the Sir William Pulteney, Captain Christopher, and Union, Capt. Guillard, under convoy of his Majesty's ship St. Fiorenzo sailed from Bombay the 14th July last.

The Wexford, Capt. Barnard, sailed from Bombay for the Persian Gulph, the 24th April, and the Royal George, Capt. Gribble; Warley, Captain Montague; and the Company's new ship, Thomas Grenville, sailed from Bombay for China the 15th May, under convoy of his Majesty's Dedaigneuse.

The Elphinstone, Capt. Craig; Winchelsea, Capt. Moffatt; and Exeter, Capt. Nisbett, arrived at Bombay the 28th of May, all well, and were to sail for China the 23d of July.

The Worcester, on the 29th of July, fell in with the Dorsetshire, Capt. Brown, in lat. 0. 38 south long. 82. 47, East, having parted from the fleet bound to Madras off the Cape of Good Hope.

The Worcester arrived at the Cape the 19th of September, and found there the Europe, Capt. Gelston; Lord Castlereagh, Capt. Kyner; and Lord Keith, Capt. Campbell, which ship sailed for Ceylon the 29th the same month.

Georgiana packet, Capt. Leigh, arrived at Madras the 3d of March, and sailed from Bengal the 5th of the same month.

The David Scott, Captain Locke, and Alnwick Castle, Captain Prescott, arrived at Madras 25th June.

The Indus, Capt. Weltden, put into the Cape of Good Hope on the 3d August, to repair her damages sustained in a gale of wind, and was on the 18th of that month ready to pursue her voyage the first fair wind.

PASSENGERS PER WORCESTER.—Major F. Pearce, Capts Whitfield, Mr. Wynne, surgeon, Captain De Burgeon, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Burgess, Mr. Cassen.

PASSENGERS PER SIR WILLIAM PULTENEY.—Colonel Speers, Lady and two children, Capt. Watson and Lady, Capt. Bannerman and Lady, Mr. Malcolm, Lieut. O'Brien, Mr. Wipond, Mr. Bungan, Capt. Barns, Mr. Fancourt.

PASSENGERS PER WALPOLE.—Lieut.-Colonel and Mrs. Carnegie, Lieut.-Colonel and Mrs. Wynyard, Lieut.-Colonel Robert Turton, Lieut. Douglas, Ensign T. Kennaway, Mr. Charles Dolton.

LIST OF PASSENGERS WHO HAVE PROCEEDED FROM BOMBAY TO CHINA, AND EVENTUALLY TO EUROPE.

PASSENGERS PER ROYAL GEORGE.—Major Young, of the Infantry, and family.

PASSENGERS PER WARLEY.—Captain Eyles and family, Lieutenant Thomas Ince, of the Marines, Mr. William Stedman, of the Civil Service.

PASSENGERS PER COUNTRY SHIP CANTON.—Captain and Mrs. Maughan.

PASSENGER PER COUNTRY SHIP WINDHAM.—Lieutenant Pearch, of his Majesty's 65th Regiment.

PASSENGER PER COUNTRY SHIP LOWJEE FAMILY.—Lieutenant George A. Farquharson.

PASSENGERS PER THOMAS GRENVILLE.—Colonel Oakes and family, Dr. Scott and family, Lieut. Boye, Marine, Lieut. Edwards, of the Royal Navy, Dr. Baxer, of the 69th Regiment, Captain Andrew Scott, of the country service.

We learn from private letters received by the Walpole that the Georgiana packet had arrived at Bengal from Madras to the sailing of that ship from thence.

POPULAR PREACHERS.

No. XIX.

Praise from the rivel'd lips of toothless bald
Decrepitude, and in the looks of lean
And craving Poverty, and in the how Respectful of the snatched Artificer,
Is oft too welcome; and may much disturb
The bias of the purpose. How much more,
Poured forth by Beauty, splendid and polite,
In language soft as adoration breathes?
Ah, spare your Idol!—COWPER.

REV. WILLIAM BENGO COLLYER,

PECKHAM, SURRY.

CHURCHMEN seem not to have formed an adequate conception of the value of evangelical influence. Describing and depreciating the growing ascendancy of their antagonists, and too much affecting to despise the characters of their leaders, it is seldom that they properly consider the advantages which these possess, or the incitements by which they are reasonably, as well as powerfully, stimulated to exertion. Evangelism, let it be recollected, is now no ordinary vocation. To be an evangelical, or methodist, preacher was formerly, owing to various causes, something very different to what it has become in these days. Look to the history of the founders of evangelicism and methodism. Fatigues, privations, scoffings, insults and reproaches and peltings, occur in almost every stage of their career; every where are they reviled, resisted, and baffled. How different is the lot of their successors—how propitious their present prospects! Is there a veteran among them? he is caressed, and treated, and reverenced; communities submit to his opinion, families solicit his interposition, and individuals, though they do not presume upon his absolution, entreat the benefit of his godly intercession! Rises there up a promising champion of their common cause? he is directly distinguished as "the young minister of the present day," the wonder of elders and the admiration of juniors; followed, preac where he list, by promiscuous crowds of both sexes; esteemed by mankind, and beloved by womankind, while astonishment gapes at him, affection is absolutely doating upon him! This is no exaggerated description of the honours attending the profession of evangelical preaching. It is the broad way to popular preferment, and the narrow path to private gratification.

There remains, however, another point of view in which it may be serviceable to place our present incidental disquisition. If what we call evangelical preaching is becoming daily more alarming to our ecclesiastical establishment, it behoves us to enquire into the causes which assist its progress, and which may contribute to its permanency. We are too often deceived by mere epithets. Evangelical preachers, generally speaking, are no longer what once they were; they have divested themselves of those characteristics which once exposed them to the ridicule of the common people, and the contempt of the higher orders. It is this circumstance that now constitutes the danger of their opposition to our national church.—The improvement of this class of religious instructors having kept pace with the refinement of the age, they cease to be inconsequential; they have thereby acquired some stability, and are not to be estimated as contemptible competitors for popularity, or, perhaps, ascendancy. Their places of worship are seldom inferior to our church chapels, and sometimes surpass them, even in splendour; they always render the melody of devotion captivating; many of them, possessing talents, are making rapid advances in literature, and, at the same time, cultivating those accomplishments which must make their society acceptable. Since these sectarists are deriving so many advantageous lessons from their clerical superiors, perhaps those superiors would do well not entirely to disdain to investigate the pretensions of their opponents. Our enemies are sometimes our most beneficial monitors. It is really puerile to talk, as many people still talk, about the ignorance and impotence of the sectaries; who are, in fact, daily effacing the imputation of being ignorant, and who, it will hardly be denied, are far from being impotent. Consistency dictates what line of conduct is to be pursued. Is it not better to emulate the excellencies of an opponent than to appear to disclaim his merits, without pretending to dispute his success? I shall venture to deliver my sentiments more explicitly.

Evidently too much importance is by many Divines attached to acquisitions merely mental. Human learning is excellent, if cultivated with reference to religious knowledge—if, and I am speaking immediately of ecclesiastics, philosophy is engaged only as the hand-maid of divinity. Something more than mortal erudition, however, is justly expected from those who undertake to illustrate the system that "brought life and immortality to light!" Though the voice of prophecy has ceased to be heard among men, and the pages of inspiration are completed, the teacher of all truth still vouchsafes, by his spiritual illumination, to enlighten and direct the minds of those who devoutly implore his assistance and guidance. There is no mysticism in this pious dependence. It is the ground of earnest prayer, and the foundation of the hope of glory, so to confide, and, in this holy confidence, to be enabled to live. Here, notwithstanding, is the rock upon which too many teachers of our religion, anxious to avoid the imputation of steering towards fanaticism, continually split. While they denominate themselves, in the most solemn manner, "stewards of the mysteries" of faith, they nevertheless decline the illustration of those mysteries; as if they were fearful of involving themselves in difficulties, and of obscuring, instead of illuminating, the understandings of their hearers. Christianity, after all, is mysterious; but its "mysteries," though seen "through a glass darkly," are still seen and apprehended, as far as the nature of humanity will permit, by those who study them "after the "inner man." Why then do so many Stewards of these mysteries shrink from the duty of imparting the knowledge of them to those concerned in their divine stewardship? If they will leave this task to their rivals in religion, and if these men, however inadequately, endeavour to discharge it, they must expect that the result will be, in some way or other, unfavourable to themselves. Nor is it of much avail that these enemies of our establishment are represented as so many evangelical empirics. What appears undoubtedly culpable in them is the mystical language, the "words without meaning," by which they continually gloze things otherwise plain, and throw affected obscurity even around palpable brightness. Expose, then, this deception. Strip truth of its fabricated disguise, divest doctrines of their assumed difficulties, but do not refuse to recognize the truth, do not reject the doctrine. Regular practitioners should disclose the quackery of their antagonists without giving up the system, to which abuses have been only attached.

Having thus thrown out some incidental reflections on topics which have lately excited considerable interest in the religious world, I proceed to give my proposed account of the Gentleman whose name now stands at the head of this article. He is intimately connected with the subject just discussed. With no inconsiderable share of talent, nor without considerable defects, he alternately exemplifies the genius and the errors of the evangelical seminary.

WILLIAM BENGO COLLYER, who has appropriated for himself the title of "an Evangelical Preacher," is one of the most genteely distinguished ministers of the class of professing christians to which he belongs. He has been long the popular Pastor of a Meeting, at Peckham; and, owing to the continual interchange of ministerial services among evangelical teachers, he is also extensively known throughout the metropolis and its environs. Respecting the parentage of Mr. Collyer, I am uninformed; but for his education, I am told, he is indebted to the Hoxton Academy,—a species of College, supported by the donations and subscriptions of Evangelical Calvinists. This ministerial nursery is tolerably productive, if an estimate of its importance may be formed from the number of pastors which it yields for the edification of its pious patrons.

Of these Mr. Collyer is not the least conspicuous. His literary acomplishments, if not attainments, are sufficiently respectable; his person is inoffensively pleasing; his manner in the pulpit, is winningly graceful; his voice is plaintively pathetic; and his eloquence is, on the whole, rather interesting. He is, as the ladies would say, an amiable preacher. I fear, indeed, that he too much values the countenance of the fair-sex; and that, under this predilection, he may be as indifferent to the opinions of men. Let me therefore adjure the lovely admirers of this desirable "young minister," saying, in the language of the poet of the pulpit,

> "Ah, spare your idol! think him human still;
> "Charms he may have, but he has frailties too!
> "Dote not too much; nor spoil—what ye admire."

There is one perfection in Mr. Collyer, as a divine, for which he merits to be distinguished from the order of preachers to which he is attached, and which, at the same time might still be copied with advantage by many divines of our established church.—He really prays the Lord's Prayer! I am anxious to learn, however, by what authority he makes what to me appears an unwarrantable deviation—from the generally adopted words of that excellent form of devotional intercession? Correctly we pray, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that," &c. Now, Mr. Collyer says, "Forgive us our trespasses, and enable us to forgive those who trespass against us." Here, indeed, is a material variation from the evident design of the petition; which, placing our own [illegible] that we forgive the offences committed against ourselves, exhibits one of the [illegible] and enforces one of the sublimest [illegible] most holy faith!" Any unrighteous believer may venture to supplicate the forgiveness of his sins, and, without being "righteous overmuch," may pray to be also enabled to forgive the offences committed against himself by his fellow-creatures; but he must be righteous in deed, or else call down condemnation on his own head, who entreats the pardon of his transgressions only as he actually forgives the trespasses he endures from others. Let preachers beware how they presume to make innovations in the acknowledged rites of our religion. I tremble to think in what manner such conduct may eventually incur the dreadful denunciation with which Saint John concludes the BOOK OF REVELATION itself.—"If any man shall add unto these things GOD shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book (of this prophecy), GOD shall take away his part out of the book of life; and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book."

Other objections might be urged against the prayers of Mr. Collyer. He certainly has the privilege of praying for what he pleases, and therefore he must not be arraigned for imploring blessings on "village-preaching;" but his language is open to animadversion, and the construction of his sentences may be criticised. His vocabulary, then, is not very copious. He is capable, I am persuaded, of commanding better language; yet, compelled to confine himself within the range of the evangelical eloquence, he accustoms himself to what an illustrious writer calls a "gypsey-jargon," which is wholly unintelligible to the uninitiated, and is sometimes hardly understood by those to whose ears it is purposely addressed. He is doubtless right in his own eyes. So far from being affected by these strictures, perhaps he will say, nearly in the words of one of his "village-preaching" disciples,—"This, brethren, is the Devil's doing! He hates this preaching, because he knows as how its the only right sort. He hates me, because he knows I stoutly preaches it; and he hates you, because he sees you hears it." Mr. Collyer has chosen his part; and it is not to be supposed, that he will alter his practice.

This preacher, let me justly remark, excels in emphasis. He is, therefore, distinct and judicious in his readings. If he possessed equal voice, Mr. Collyer would, in this respect, be scarcely inferior to Mr. Worthington. His tones, however, are almost feminine; and his distinctness when preaching sometimes becomes, from this circumstance, painful to the hearer. His sermons abound in divisions and subdivisions, which, instead of preserving their connexion, generally produce perplexity. His theological ramblings occur incessantly. He does not keep to his subject; nor when he has wandered, is he dextrous in regaining himself. He is also too long in the pulpit. While the greatest art of a writer is to know how to blot, it is the greatest art of an orator to know when to conclude.

Mr. Collyer, as was before hinted, is absolutely persecuted by the attentions of the ladies! Not only do they throng to every place, and on every day, where and when he is to be heard, but, if there be any reality in common rumour, they pursue him even into the pulpit,—put billet-doux into his bible, and wait on the stairs, as he ascends the sacred rostrum, to "Pluck the good man's gown, and share his smile!"

I have observed something of this kind, while attending his preaching, in Broad Street; but still let me hope there is not truth in all the anecdotes told of our popular preacher and his fair followers. Surely it is not true, it cannot be true, that any "grave and learned clerk" would stoop, in the middle of his devout matters, to pick up the handkerchief dropped purposely by the fair one, who was languishly leaning upon the door of it, into his pulpit! If such things are, but they cannot be, what are our Hodsons, or Moores, when compared with the Collyers of this age?

Mr. Collyer writes, as well as preaches. He has published, by subscription, a volume of 'Lectures on Scripture Facts;' and he is the reported Author of 'An Appeal to the Legislature and the Public, in Answer to the Hints of a Barrister, on the Nature and Effects of Evangelical Preaching, by an Evangelical Preacher.' His first production is entitled to approbation; but his second has by no means augmented his previous reputation. I also learn, from the Evangelical Magazine, that he has now in the press a series of 'Lectures on the Prophecies.'

Pleasing in the pulpit, and passable from the press, though Mr. Collyer may always excite some degree of public interest, he must never aspire to command the admiration of the churches. He cannot look for durable distinction. They will not suffice for real celebrity; the side-glances of the preacher and the softer smiles of the assembled fair. Something more manly, something consistent, something Christian-like, must be exhibited. Tender appeals will not do; seraphic simperings, susceptible solicitations, will be found alike ineffectual to the purposes of eternal salvation! Let us have less of man, and more of his Maker; less of the creature, but more of his Creator; and more of the ministry, with less of the Minister.

It seems that the University of Edinburgh, according to one of the Morning Newspapers, has recently, in full Senatus Academicus, conferred upon the REV. W. B. COLLYER the degree of Doctor of Divinity, as a tribute of their approbation of his 'Lectures on Scripture Facts;' and that his Royal Highness the DUKE OF KENT condescended to convey the Diploma, from the Earl of Buchan, to DOCTOR COLLYER, and of uniting HIS OWN APPROBATION, and that of the noble Earl, with the distinction granted by the learned college!! Now, considering all circumstances, though there is little cause to felicitate any man on his acquiring a Scotch Diploma, Dr. Collyer may find some reason to congratulate himself as to the manner in which, and the august personage by whom, this distinction is stated to have been communicated. Let us hear no more of the irreligion of the higher orders of this country. Here is ONE OF THE PRINCES OF THE BLOOD-ROYAL, who though attached, by all possible ties, to the established church of these kingdoms, condescends, from his love of religion purely, "to become the medium of conveying" a divinity degree," uniting" with it "his own approbation," to one of the heads of that "VILLAGE-PREACHING" system, which is every where rapidly undermining the national hierarchy! Dr. Collyer ought to be proud enough of such infinite condescension.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

Monday night Venoni was represented with the new third act, which the author has COMPOSED, instead of the former, which was merely a translation from the French. So much candour in an author is not only uncommon, but highly honourable. A short sketch of the fable will prove, more than words, how highly the Drama has been improved by this alteration.

The unfortunate prisoner, Lodovico, who had died in his dungeon, in the former act, is found alive at the beginning of this; but exhausted by age and infirmity, he is unable to profit by the discovery which he has just made of a secret passage that communicates with the Convent of the Ursulines. Venoni is brought into this dungeon, and left, as the Prior supposes, quite alone, for Lodovico's prison was contiguous to this, but the Prior knew not that any communication existed between them. A dagger is placed by Venoni's side, and when he seizes it with the grasp of despair, to terminate his mortal sufferings, Lodovico snatches it from him, points to the secret passage, and directs the youth how to regain his liberty, by gaining the inside of the Ursuolines's convent. He arrives there at the moment when the Abbess, having drawn Josepha from her cell, attempts to force her to become the Prior's mistress. Hearing her voice, he rushes into her presence, and a very interesting scene ensues. The Abbess sends secretly for the Prior, who tears the lover's asunder at the moment they expected freedom and happiness, but the good father Michael enters with the Viceroy and the Marchioness, whom he had informed of Venoni's danger. The Prior is punished, innocence avenged, and love rewarded with felicity.

Though highly romantic, this last act teems with interest, The choir of Nuns, when Josepha remains in darkness and anxiety about her fate, produces a striking and pleasing effect. All the sentiments are good, the dialogue chaste, and the improvement in the piece was followed by an improvement in the manners of the audience, who at last bestowed upon this drama the applause to which it is so justly entitled.

HAY MARKET.

A new ballet entitled, "The Double Wedding" was last Friday night produced at the Theatre Royal Haymarket, and a sillier jumble of uninteresting action and dancing has never met our sight. The Scene is placed in the Highlands, and the story, if it can be called any, consists of the following particulars:—Two Soldiers obtain a promise of the hand of their Lassies, from their avaricious parents. The drum is heard on a sudden, and the Sons of Mars are called away on an expedition. Something like a Clown in a Pantomime, profits by their absence to obtain the old Miser's consent to wed his daughter. But whilst the marriage rites are preparing the two warriors return from an expedition abroad, which has not lasted quite five minutes, and the Lassie is restored to her former lover.

The most ridiculous part in this Ballet, was the introduction of "an infant prodigy," from Liverpool. We wish the fate of Miss Mudie had deterred the Managers of Covent-Garden, from exposing themselves to ridicule, by pretending to amuse a full grown public with infant's tricks. Had not the number of hisses counterbalanced the plaudits which the Liverpool prodigy received, we should soon probably have been entertained with the modulated shrieking of a new-born babe, under the name of the Musical Phenomenon; or reversing the case, with the feeble inarticulated notes of expiring fourscore, as a specimen of long-lived harmony.

We do not intend to speak against the child; as it is not only beautiful, but exerts itself more than its weakness ought to be allowed to do, and what is more surprising, hops and skips in time. It is against those who degrade the Stage, stage, that noble establishment formed for the correction and improvement of manners, that honourable pledge of civilization in every country, that field which ought to be opened to the exertions of genius alone, by changing it into an exhibition place for dancing infants—it is against those who have so little mercy on the feebleness of childhood, as to compel it to risk its health, if not its life, by labours which it must exhaust itself to perform, that our remarks are pointed. The reception which this ballet and the prodigy experienced, however, gives us hopes that it will soon give way to something more worthy of the managers and the public.

Miss Nora from the Opera-House, was introduced in this ballet. She is skilful in forming her steps, perhaps more so than any of the Misses Adams, but does not possess either their grace or agility.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, GUILDHALL, Dec. 16.

THORNTON v. SPLIDT.

This was an action on a policy of insurance on goods, provisions for the British army, to the ports of Elsinburg, Elsineur, or any other port in Zealand, which were fitted out whilst the City of Copenhagen and the Isle of Zealand were in our possession. The vessel was afterwards taken in the Cattegat, after the departure of the British forces; and it was contended, that as the parties knew by the public treaties that the British forces were to evacuate on a certain day, and the vessel could not arrive before that day, therefore the voyage was illegal.

His Lordship however held, that as there was a possibility of the time being prolonged, it could not be deemed an illegal voyage.—Verdict for Plaintiff.

COUSENS v. DAVIS.

The Plaintiff, as executor of a Mrs. Cousens, who had resided at Mortlake, was entitled to her house for his life. Upon her decease there was a sale, and there being several hampers of Madeira wine remaining, they were left in the cellar, and Davis, the tenant, undertook to take care of them. He had the cellar key sent to him in a parcel by the stage, and he made such good use of that and the cork-screw, that out of four 3-dozen hampers and three prickers there were only one hamper and a few bottles remaining.—The conversion being proved, the Plaintiff had a verdict for 55*l.*

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Dec. 16.

SPECIAL JURY.—MAWMAN v. GILLET.

The Plaintiff, a bookseller, sought to recover the value of a quantity of paper consumed when the premises of the Defendant, a printer, were destroyed by fire in Salisbury-square, Fleet-street, in 1805. The paper had been sent to the Defendant to print a work entitled "The Travels of Anacharsis," and the action was brought upon an understanding that Mr. Gillet undertook to insure Mr. Mawman's property, while he was employed upon the work.

It was contended, on the part of the Defendant, that it was not the custom of the trade to insure goods in trust, and that he had never undertaken to insure for the Plaintiff. Delay in not sending for the work, after part of it had been printed, was also imputed to the Plaintiff.

Sir James Mansfield left the Jury to decide the case according to their opinion of the contract between the parties, and the custom of the trade, as proved by the several witnesses. The Jury, after a short deliberation, found a verdict for the Plaintiff.—Damages 1047*l.* This case occupied near seven hours. It was the second trial, and much interest was excited.

BISHOP OF LONDON'S COURT, DOCTOR'S COMMONS, Dec. 16.

LORD BORINGDON v. LADY BORINGDON.

This was a proceeding or cause of Divorce brought by the Right Hon. John Lord Boringdon, against the Right Hon. Lady Augusta Boringdon, his wife, by reason of Adultery, alleged to have been committed with Sir Arthur Paget, Knight.

There being no defence set up in this case, the Learned Judge (Sir Wm. Scott) after hearing the evidence read, which went to prove the Criminal Connection between Lady Boringdon and Sir Arthur Paget; also the Verdict of Damages obtained against him in the Court of Common Law, was of opinion that the fact of Adultery was clearly established against Lady Boringdon, and accordingly pronounced the usual sentence of separation from Bed, Board, and mutual Cohabitation, which the husband prayed.

SERJEANT'S INN HALL, Dec. 16.

OPERA-HOUSE DEBTS.

The Solicitor-General, on behalf of Mr. Taylor, of the Opera House, moved, that an agreement entered into between the said William Taylor and Richard Hill, an Attorney, should be made a Rule of Court, and the proceedings in Chancery to set aside that agreement should be staid. This motion was resisted by Mr. Dallas at the suit of Mr. Hill, who insisted that the agreement had been obtained from the latter while under duress, and incapable of the free exercise of his will. The circumstances were as follow:—Mr. Hill had proceeded to outlaw Mr. Taylor, in defiance of an injunction directed by the Court of Exchequer to stay the outlawry; and for the contempt, an attachment was issued. Mr. Hill was arrested upon this process, and, in order to obtain his liberation, he agreed with Mr. Taylor's Solicitor to take 1,500*l.* for his demand upon Mr. Taylor, amounting to 5,000*l.* and the agreement in question was drawn up. After Mr. Hill's fears had subsided, or, to follow up the metaphor used in his affidavit, when the razor was taken from his throat, he began to think that he had done a silly act, and instituted a cause in Chancery to set the agreement aside, upon the ground that it was obtained from him while under duress, and that he consented to it as the means of extricating himself from the process moved against him. This was answered by saying that Mr. Hill was a very shrewd Attorney; that he had professed himself well satisfied with the compromise at the time of making the agreement, and turned to Tidd's practice, to prove there was no necessity for witnessing the act of an Attorney, as concerning himself, when under arrest.

Baron Wood said, the process of the Court had been converted into the means of advancing the private interests of a party, and not of forwarding the object for which that process was issued.

The Court, in the result, granted part of the motion, namely, that the agreement should be made a Rule of Court, but that the proceedings in Chancery to set it aside might go on. Of course, Mr. Taylor is not benefited by the application.

In the Sheriff's Court on Friday, a Jury was assembled to assess damages in a Crim. Con. Woods v. Matthews. The Defendant is a baker, in the Borough, the Plaintiff a shipwright, who, on coming home one night, was surprised at finding his house closely locked up and his family in bed; and with the assistance of the watchman he forced his way into the back window, and found his wife and the baker fast asleep in the same bed. The watchman sprung his rattle, which aroused the lovers, who, leaping from their bed, fled out of the room naked as they were. The neighbours assembled, and interposed between the enraged shipwright and the faithless pair, and the baker was suffered to return home to meet the friends of his enraged wife. A conversation took place between the friends of the contending parties, and a verdict of 30*l.* was taken, the Defendant agreeing to drop his action for a debt due to him of 200*l.*

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE, THURSDAY, DEC. 15.

A fellow named Evans, was charged by a girl named Anne Ralph, for an assault, with intent to commit a rape.

The Prisoner was a milkman, and the Prosecutrix had been his servant nearly five years. The poor girl, who appeared to possess a share of modesty and delicacy unhappily not very frequent in her rank and situation, could scarcely be induced to express the nature of the repeated insults and assaults she had sustained from the Prisoner, while in his service, but fortunately without success in his designs. She never had told her mistress what had happened from July last, when the first attempt was made, until she left her service, to be employed in the family of a Mr. Ledwick, which the Prisoner served with milk. Even there he continued to persecute her, and to attack her even in the street,—wherever he met her; and frequently ringing the street-door bell in a violent manner, in order to bring her to the door; and more than once chalking on the hall-door the words, "Here lives a w—, Anne Ralph."

The poor girl complained to her mistress, and told whom she suspected of this inscription: and the Prisoner, after having violently rung the bell one evening, was traced home to his own residence by one of the family, who remonstrated with him upon his conduct, which he did not deny. He still, however, persevered, and on Thursday evening last, renewed his attack upon the girl, who, by the advice of her mistress (who had even caused an Attorney to write to the Prisoner), had him taken into custody.

Mrs. Ledwick attended with the girl, and gave her testimony in support of the charge.

The Prisoner, Evans, acknowledged that the girl had been in his family five years, and said that he had been as fond of her as if she had been one of his own children; that last, however, his fondness became too great, and that certainly he had taken very indecent liberties with her, for which he was extremely sorry; and, if making an apology to her and her mistress would satisfy, he was ready to do it; but he hoped the business would be carried no farther, as he was a man with a large family, having a wife and six children.

The Lord Mayor told him, that his story, so far from palliating, highly aggravated the circumstances of his offence towards a poor unprotected girl, of whom it was his duty, as the father of a numerous family, to be the protector and guardian, instead of the insulter and violater. His Lordship therefore held him to bail, to take his trial for the assault; and, at the same time, bestowed a just and warm commendation on the becoming modesty, fortitude, and good conduct of the girl, and on the kind and humane support she received from her present mistress on this occasion.

GUILDHALL, DEC. 16.

Yesterday came on to be heard, the arguments on an information lodged by Mr. Hague, an Attorney, against Mr. G. Woodfall, Printer, under the Act of his present Majesty, "For the better prevention of treasonable, seditious, and immoral publications," which obliges printers, under a penalty of 20*l.* to register their printing-houses, to affix their names to all publications printed by them respectively, to retain one copy of each publication so printed, together with the manuscript, and to write thereon the name of the person by whom they may be employed, that the same may be produced in evidence before a Magistrate, in support of any information lodged in such case.

The information in this case was brought by Mr. Hague against Mr. Woodfall, not upon alleged grounds of any thing of a treasonable, seditious, or immoral tendency in the matter printed (which was a sort of enigmatical prospectus to a periodical pamphlet, proposed to be published, respecting the author of certain anonymous letters which have lately appeared in print, under the signature of "An Englishman," reflecting on the state of the British army), but merely under an allegation that Mr. Woodfall had printed the prospectus, and had not affixed his name thereto, as by law required.

After hearing Mr. Wigley, on the part of the Informer, and Mr. Gurney, on that of Mr. Woodfall, the Magistrate was pleased to quash the information for the present, not upon the merits of the case, which were not argued, but prima facie upon the informality in the pleadings as urged by Mr. Gurney.

After the defendant's counsel, Mr. Gurney, and Mr. Bolland, withdrew, Mr. Hague signified his determination to proceed with five other new informations against Mr. Woodfall; and Mr. Wigley, his Counsel, moved the Magistrate who now took the chair, Alderman Sir Matthew Bloxham, for a fresh summons to Mr. Woodfall upon another ground, namely, to call upon him to produce the printed copy he was bound to retain, together with the manuscript, and the name of the party who had employed him, under the penalty of 20*l.* upon default.

Mr. Hague said, he had to propose an alternative which would free Mr. Woodfall from all farther trouble or difficulty in the case, if he would now make affidavit that he was not employed directly or indirectly by the Duke of Sussex to print this paper, or that the Duke of Sussex had no knowledge of the matter, he would relinquish all farther proceedings against him.

Mr. Dillon, although he was not of Counsel for Mr. Woodfall, yet, as amicus curiæ, begged leave to observe, that although his Learned Friend, Mr. Wigley, professed not to call for such documents as those stated for his own information, yet it was obviously for the purpose of influencing the judgment of the Magistrate, and to call on Mr. Woodfall to produce evidence, for his own criminations. He could say, on the part of the illustrious Duke for whom he attended, that he could have no wish to interrupt the operation of the law, or to sanction any concealment that could have such a tendency.

Sir Matthew Bloxham, however, thought he could not decide upon the case, without the fullest evidence being before him, and therefore agreed to issue the summons for Mr. Woodfall, as proposed by Mr. Wigley.

The farther hearing was then postponed till Thursday next, notice of which was to be communicated to his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, in order that he may attend.

We would recommend to Carpenters, Builders, Printer's-Joiners, &c. a Business in the above branches, established upwards of fifteen years, in a central situation in the City, which is now to be disposed of, the present occupier going into another line. Immediate possession may be had. Particulars may be known of Mr. Roberts, Timber-merchant, Little Saffron hill, near Hatton-garden, Holborn.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DARING ROBBERIES.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Clewlow, of Norfolk-street, Secretary to Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, left London in a post-chaise for Portsmouth, when two large trunks were fastened on the perch of the chaise. The post-boy, previous to Mr. C's departure, informed him that the roads were much better by way of Putney to Kingston, than the Wandsworth Road, and consequently the driver was ordered to proceed that way. After having got a short distance from Hyde-park-corner gate, Mr. Clewlow thought he heard a noise, and on looking on the perch he missed his trunks, and immediately alighted, and made his way back towards Hyde-park-corner. He discovered one of the trunks containing private papers, &c. in the middle of the turnpike road, but the other trunk containing considerable valuables, was not found.—It is conjectured from certain circumstances that the robbery was a premeditated one, and the officers belonging to Marlborough-street Police-office, are endeavouring to trace the thieves.

Another robbery was committed on the property of Sir S. Hood, at about the same time as the former. The Admiral's servant had been sent to fetch a small package from Phillimore-place, Brompton, to his town-house in Wimpole-street, when the servant was met by a genteel dressed man, who rebuked him for being so long on his errand, as his mistress was waiting the arrival of the package, and that he was to return to Phillimore-place to fetch another package. The robber by this artifice got possession of the property, and the credulous servant returned to Phillimore-place as he was ordered. This package also contained valuables to a considerable amount, and on Sir Samuel Hood's Lady having been informed of the robbery, she gave information to the police, but the property has not been traced.

EXTREME CRUELTY.—A man of the name of Swiney, a shoemaker, in Monmouth-street, was charged with stabbing a patrole belonging to Hatton-Garden, in the execution of his duty. It appeared in evidence, that the prisoner had often been in confinement for barbarous treatment to his wife; and on Thursday night, although the wife was in the last month of her pregnancy, he beat her most unmercifully, broke her jaw-bone, and drew a knife on her, and swore he would murder her. The shrieks of the poor woman brought some people to her assistance, whilst the brutal husband was standing over her with the deadly weapon, and would probably have put his threat into execution. The patrole, and two watchmen, interfered, and took the prisoner into custody; but in doing so he stabbed the patrole twice in the stomach; but providentially the bluntness of the weapon prevented a mortal incision.—The prisoner was fully committed for trial, under the cutting and maiming act.

We find that the simple and unerring mode of using the new invented Magnetic Razor Tablet, enables persons intuitively, to use a hone with adroitness, who could not before use it with effect. The rapid sale of the Tablet most amply proves that when fully known, it will be universally adopted. Sold at the Inventor's Warehouses, No. 65, Cheapside, and 52 Park Street, Grosvenor Square, also by his appointment at Messrs. Clarke and Sons, 62, Cheapside. Price 7s. 6d.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FIFTY-ONE.

HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION TO THE LATE OVERTURES FROM FRANCE AND RUSSIA.

There are few persons, whatever their abhorrence of unlimited warfare, or their party-bias may be, who must not read, with satisfaction this interesting document. The principles it enounced, were so completely the reverse of that system of spoliation the enemy pursues; the language so dignified, that when contrasted with the prevarication, scurrility, hypocritical cant, and unblushing arrogance of the French Bulletins, that such as feel an interest in the honour of their country, must perceive with pleasure, that the convulsions of our time, which have sapped almost universally the morality of states and individuals; have not contaminated as yet our national probity. It has been remarked of an age, when moral profligacy attained the greatest height, and was most widely diffused, that public and private virtues likewise displayed their most astonishing effects. The examples were few, but so powerful, as to reconcile posterity with the most degraded and revolting period known in history. The age, which immediately followed the Christian æra, though cursed with the existence of such monsters as Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, and Domitian, and with a race of men perfectly suitable to such masters, vaunted, at the same time, examples of the sublimest virtues. In the universal wreck of national rights, and the alarming encrease of public depravity, which marked the end of the last and the beginning of this century, it furnishes us matter of no uncommon triumph, that the public and private virtues of this country have rather augmented than diminished, within that very interval. What encreases the pleasure of this reflection, is the necessity we are placed under of extending their influence, if we will surmount the difficulties of our situation. It is only the utmost range of the social duties which offers us security against the confusion and vices of the present time. To be safe, we are obliged to be virtuous.

Under this point of view, we are best enabled to appreciate the policy, as well as justice of his Majesty's Declaration; and we are happy that neither the menaces, nor the late illusory overtures of the enemy, have been able to make our government swerve from that rigid probity, it is our true interest to adhere to. Peace is a great and desirable object: but to attain its advantages, by violating the most sacred engagements, by sacrificing a people we have solemnly pledged ourselves to support, would induce every individual in Great Britain to sacrifice his last mite, sooner than consent to so disgraceful a compromise. Our adherence to honourable, in preference to selfish, policy, becomes imperiously urgent by the conviction we must now feel, that concession, though it might appear to appease for a year or two, the inveterate animosity of the enemy, would ultimately tend to expose us much weaker, and less prepared, to its most dire effects. In the intermediate time, those nations, which now have the appearance of independence and means of resistance, would fall a sacrifice to the tyrant; and, after he had divided the continent among the members of his family, and organised, for his own purpose, its immense resources, he would then throw off the troublesome mask of moderation, and employ the new accumulation of strength to effect our destruction. His Majesty's Ministers have not been insensible to this circumstance, and very justly observed, that "The continued appearance of a negociation, when peace was found to be utterly unattainable, could be advantageous only to the enemy.

"It might enable France to sow distrust and jealousy in the councils of those who are combined to resist her oppression: and, if, among the nations who groan under the tyranny of French alliance, or among those which maintain against France a doubtful and precarious independence, there should be any which even now are balancing between the certain ruin of a prolonged activity, and the contingent danger of an effort to save themselves from that ruin; to nations so situated, the delusive prospect of a peace between Great Britain and France could not fail to be peculiarly injurious. Their preparations might be relaxed by the vain hope of returning tranquillity; or their purpose shaken by the apprehension of being left to contend alone with the undivided strength of the enemy."

It is impossible to refuse our assent and unlimited approbation to this part of the Declaration; and it impresses so much conviction that it would be impertinent to comment on it. We only regret that Ministers who, on the first receipt of the dispatches from Erfurth, could not have been insensible to this, had been placed in the mortifying predicament, in consequence of our party feuds, as to permit the Cartel, which brought these illusory overtures, to touch on our shores. But we are sensible what obloquy and abuse such dignified policy would have exposed them to: however, the moment they received the tyrant's message to the Legislative Body, they were justified to break off every kind of intercourse. The moment Bonaparte made known his intention of prosecuting his nefarious aggression against the Spaniards, they were released from their embarrassing delicacy, and should immediately hasten to remove the anxiety of these powers, which are balancing between the certain ruin of a prolonged activity, and the contingent danger of an effort to save themselves from that ruin. They left Austria in the forward state of her military preparations, when her co-operation in the favour of the Patriots was so necessary, in the most dreadful uncertainty and anxiety relative to the line of policy our Government meant to pursue. In order to keep up this interval of anxious suspense, Bonaparte departed to put himself at the head of his armies, and consequently afforded a plausible excuse for deferring an answer to the proposal of our Cabinet. Whatever confidence Austria might be inclined to repose in the determination of this country, not to retract from her engagements, she could have come to no ultimate decision, as long as we carried on even the appearance of a negociation with France. Whatever the intentions of the Court of Vienna had been previous to the meeting at Erfurth, there is every reason to presume, that these overtures must have confirmed her in her system of neutrality, if that had been her intention; or deferred, for more than three months, her adopting a more vigorous system of policy, if she was willing to resist the encroachments of the tyrant.

The only justifiable excuse Ministers could have in deferring this Declaration, was their wish to reclaim Alexander, and to know his sentiments relative to Spain. Their repugnance to believe him so totally depraved, as not only to acquiese in, but to approve of, the usurpation of the Spanish monarchy, is a high panegyric of their feelings; though it furnishes no proof of their penetration. "It was "difficult for his Majesty to believe, that the Emperor of "Russia had devoted himself so blindly and fatally to the "violence and ambition of the power with which his Imperial Majesty had unfortunately become allied, as to be "prepared openly to abet the usurpation of the Spanish "monarchy; and to acknowledge and maintain the right "assumed by France to depose and imprison friendly sovereigns, and forcibly to transfer to herself the allegiance "of independent nations."

How could Ministers entertain a single doubt of the weakness and infatuation of that besotted prince, after he had been guilty of the unparalelled meanness to quit his capital, in order to compliment, or rather do homage to, the very ruffian who was guilty of such atrocious perfidy against the Royal Family of Spain. When all Europe expressed abhorrence, when even Frenchmen appeared astonished at the baseness of the action, this very Alexander made a journey of 1200 miles to embrace Bonaparte and assure him of his acquiescence. After such revolting indifference to his own dignity, to the feelings of his subjects, and to the outrage committed against another Sovereign, it would be more than silliness to expect any thing honourable or great from such an individual. We therefore read with no surprise, that part of the Declaration, which says;—"With astonishment, as well as with grief, his Majesty has received "from the Emperor of Russia a reply, similar in effect, although less indecorous in tone and manner. The "Emperor of Russia also stigmatises as Insurrection, the "glorious efforts of the Spanish people in behalf of their "legitimate Sovereign, and in defence of the independence "of their country: thus giving the sanction of his Imperial "Majesty's authority to an usurpation which has no parallel in the history of the world."

Notwithstanding the astonishment expressed at the meanness and folly of Alexander, we are convinced that Mr. Canning possesses too much penetration, too solid an understanding, to be surprised at any weakness in that infatuated prince; but he wished to expose to Europe, particularly to the Russians, and that with a tone of moderate but dignified reproof, the shameful and ruinous vassalage of the Russian Autocrat. There is not one of his subjects, who reads this Declaration, but must blush with shame and degradation, at the unexpected transmutation of a descendant of Czar Peter into a vassal of an obscure adventurer from the small town of Ajaccio. It is an extraordinary change; and the most unjustifiable and unnatural event in our revolutionary age. This prince, if he possesses less intellects, has more good fortune, than his predecessors, if he escape the effects of the indignation, which his present conduct must raise in the breasts of his subjects.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 7.—Both Houses made a quorum this forenoon, and having appointed a Committee to inform the President from each House, they adjourned after their Committees had returned with an answer, that he would send a written communication to-morrow (Tuesday.)

Nov. 8.—This day, as usual, at noon, the following Message, with the several documents accompanying it, was presented to both Houses:—

MESSAGE.

"TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

"It would have been a source, fellow-citizens, of much gratification, if our last communications from Europe had enabled me to inform you, that the belligerent nations, whose disregard of neutral right has been so destructive to our commerce, had become awakened to the duty and the policy of revoking their unrighteous edicts. That no means might be omitted to produce this salutary effect, I lost no time in availing myself of the Act authorising a suspension, in whole, or in part of the several Embargo Laws. Our Ministers at London and Paris were instructed to explain to the respective Governments there, our disposition to exercise the authority in such manner as would withdraw the pretext on which the aggressions were originally founded, and open the way for a renewal of that commercial intercourse, which it was alleged, on all sides, had been reluctantly obstructed. As each of these Governments had pledged its readiness to concur in renouncing a measure, which reached its adversary through the incontestible rights of neutrals only, and as the measure had been assumed by each as a retaliation for an asserted acquiescence in the aggressions of the other, it was reasonably expected that the occasion would have been seized by both, for evincing the sincerity of their professions, and for restoring to the United States its legitimate freedom. The instructions to our Ministers, with respect to the different Belligerents, were necessarily modified with a reference to their different circumstances, and to the condition annexed by law to the executive power of suspension, requiring a degree of security to our commerce, which would not result from a repeal of the decrees of France. Instead of a pledge, therefore, for a suspension of the embargo as to her, in case of such a repeal, it was presumed that a sufficient inducement might be found in other considerations, and particularly in the change produced by a compliance with our just demands, by one Belligerent, and a refusal by the other, in the relations between this other and the United States. To Great Britain, whose power on the ocean is so ascendant, it was deemed not inconsistent with that condition, to state, explicitly, that on her rescinding her Orders in relation to the commerce of the United States, their trade would be opened with her, and remain shut to her enemy, in case of his failure to rescind his decrees also. From France no answer has been received, nor any indication that the requisite change in her decrees is contemplated. The favourable reception of the propositions to Great Britain was the less to be doubted, as her Orders of Council had not only been referred for their vindication to an acquiescence on the part of the United States, no longer to be pretended; but as the arrangement proposed, whilst it resisted the illegal decrees of France, involved, moreover, substantially the precise advantages professedly aimed at by the British Orders. The arrangement has, nevertheless, been rejected.

"This candid and liberal experiment having thus failed, and no other event having occurred on which a suspension of the Embargo by the Executive was authorised, it necessarily remains in the extent originally given to it. We have the satisfaction, however, to reflect, that in return for the privations imposed by the measure, and which our fellow-citizens in general have borne with patriotism, it has had the important effects of saving our mariners, and our vast mercantile property, as well as of affording time for prosecuting the defensive and provisional measures called for by the occasion. It has demonstrated to foreign nations the moderation and firmness which govern our Councils, and to our citizens the necessity of uniting in support of the laws and the rights of their country; and has thus long frustrated those usurpations and spoliations which, if resisted, involved war; if submitted to, sacrificed a vital principle of our national independence.

"Under a continuance of the Belligerent measures, which, in defiance of laws which consecrate the rights of neutrals, over-spread the ocean with danger, it will rest with the wisdom of Congress to decide on the course best adapted to such a state of things; and bringing with them, as they do, from every part of the Union, the sentiments of our constituents, my confidence is strengthened that in forming this decision, they will, with an unerring regard to the essential rights and interests of the nation, weigh and compare the painful alternatives out of which a choice is to be made. Nor should I do justice to the virtues which on other occasions have marked the character of our fellow-citizens, if I did not cherish an equal confidence that the alternative chosen, whatever it may be, will be maintained with all the fortitude and patriotism which the crisis ought to inspire.

"The documents containing the correspondences on the subject of the foreign edicts against our commerce, with the instructions given to our Ministers at London and Paris, are now laid before you.

"The communication made to Congress at their last Session explained the posture in which the close of the discussions relating to the attack by a British ship of war on the frigate Chesapeake, left a subject on which the nation had manifested so honourable a sensibility. Every view of what had passed authorised a belief that immediate steps would be taken by the British Government for redressing a wrong, which, the more it was investigated, appeared the more clearly to require what had not been provided for in the special mission. It is found that no steps have been taken for the purpose. On the contrary, it will be seen in the documents laid before you, that the inadmissible preliminary which obstructs the adjustment is still adhered to; and, moreover, that it is now brought into connexion with the distinct and irrelative case of the Orders in Council. The instructions which had been given to our Ministers at London, with a view to facilitate, if necessary, the reparation claimed by the United States, are included in the documents communicated.

"Our relations with the other Powers of Europe have undergone no material changes since your last Session. The important negociations with Spain, which had been alternately suspended and resumed, necessarily experience a pause, under the extraordinary and interesting crisis which distinguishes her internal situation.

"With the Barbary Powers we continue in harmony, with the exception of an unjustifiable proceeding of the Dey of Algiers towards our Consul to that Regency. Its character and circumstances are now laid before you, and will enable you to decide how far it may, either now or hereafter, call for any measures not within the limits of the Executive Authority.

"With our Indian neighbours the public peace has been steadily maintained. Some instances of individual wrong have, as at other times, taken place, but in no wise implicating the will of the nation. Beyond the Mississippi, the Ioways, the Sacs, and the Alibamas, have delivered up, for trial and punishment, individuals from among themselves, accused of murdering Citizens of the United States, on this side the Mississippi; the Creeks are exerting themselves to arrest offenders of the same kind; and the Choctaws have manifested their readiness and desire for amicable and just arrangements, respecting depredations committed by disorderly persons of their tribe. And generally from a conviction that we consider them as a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the Indian tribes is gaining strength daily, is extending from the nearer to the more remote, and will amply requite us for the justice and friendship practised towards them; husbandry and houshold manufacture are advancing among them more rapidly with the southern than the northern tribes, from circumstances of soil and climate: and one of the two great divisions of the Cherokee nation have now under consideration, to solicit the Citizenship of the United States, and to be identified with us in laws and government, in such progressive manner as we shall think best.

"In consequence of the appropriations of the last Session of Congress for the security of our sea-port towns and harbours, such works of defence have been erected as seemed to be called for by the situation of the several places, their relative importance, and the scale of expence indicated by the amount of the appropriation. These works will chiefly be finished in the course of the present season, except at New York and New Orleans, where most was to be done; and although a great proportion of the last appropriation has been expended on the former place, yet some further views will be submitted to Congress for rendering its security entirely adequate against naval enterprize. A view of what has been done at several places, and of what is proposed to be done, shall be communicated as soon as the several reports are received.

"Of the gun-boats authorised by the Act of December last, it has been thought necessary to build only 100 in the present year; these, with those before possessed, are sufficient for the harbours and waters most exposed, and the residue will require little time for their construction, when it shall be deemed necessary.

"Under the Act of the last Session, for raising an additional military force, so many Officers were immediately appointed as were necessary for carrying on the business of recruiting; and in proportion as it advanced, others have been added. We have reason to believe, their success has been satisfactory, although such returns have not been received, as enable me to present you a statement of the numbers engaged.

"I have not thought it necessary, in the course of the last season, to call for any general detachments of Militia, or of Volunteers, under the laws passed for that purpose; for the ensuing season, however, they will be required to be in readiness, should their service be wanted. Some small and special detachments have been necessary to maintain the laws of embargo, on that portion of our Northern frontier which offered peculiar facilities for evasion; but these were replaced as soon as it could be done, by bodies of new recruits. By the aid of these, and of the armed vessels called in other quarters, the spirit of disobedience and abuse, which manifested itself early, and with sensible effect, while we were unprepared to meet it, has been considerably repressed.

"Considering the extraordinary character of the times in which we live, our attention should unremittingly be fixed on the safety of our country. For a people who are free, and who mean to remain so, a well organized and armed Militia is their best security. It is therefore incumbent on us at every meeting, to revise the condition of Militia, and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territories exposed to invasion. Some of the States have paid a laudable attention to this object, but every degree of neglect is to be found among others. Congress alone having the power to produce an uniform state of preparation in this great organ of defence, the interests which they so deeply feel in their own and their country's security, will present this as among the most important objects of their deliberation.

"Under the Acts of March 11, and April 23, respecting arms, the difficulty of procuring them from abroad, during the present situation and dispositions of Europe, induced us to direct our whole efforts to the means of internal supply; the public factories have, therefore, been enlarged, additional machineries erected, and, in proportion as artificers can be found or formed, their effect, already more than doubled, may be increased so as to keep pace with the yearly increase of the Militia. The annual sums appropriated by the latter Act, have been directed to the encouragement of private factories of arms; and contracts have been entered into with individual undertakers, to nearly the amount of the first year's appropriation.

"The suspension of our foreign commerce, produced by the injustice of the Belligerent Powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labour from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent. The commerce with the Indians too, within our own boundaries, is likely to receive abundant aliment from the same internal source, and will secure to them peace and the progress of civilization, undisturbed by practices hostile to both.

"The accounts of the receipts and expenditures during the year ending on the 30th day of September last, being not yet made, a correct statement will hereafter be transmitted from the Treasury. In the mean time, it is ascertained, that the receipts have amounted to near eighteen millions of dollars, which with the eight millions and a half in the Treasury at the beginning of the year, have enabled us, after meeting the current demands and interest incurred, to pay two millions three hundred thousand dollars of the principal of our funded debt, and left in the treasury on that day, near fourteen millions of dollars; of these, five millions three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, will be necessary to pay what will be due on the first day of January next, which will complete the reimbursement of the eight per cent. stock. These payments, with those made in the six years and a half preceding, will have extinguished thirty-three millions five hundred and eighty thousand dollars of the principal of the funded debt, being the whole which could be paid or purchased within the limits of the law and of our contracts; and the amount of principal thus discharged, will have liberated the revenue from about two millions of dollars of interest, and added that sum annually to the disposeable surplus. The probable accumulation of the surpluses of revenue, beyond what can be applied to the payment of the public debt, whenever the freedom and safety of our commerce shall be restored, merits the consideration of Congress. Shall it be unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the constitution as may be approved by the States: while uncertain of the course of things, the time may be advantageously employed in obtaining the powers necessary for a system of improvement, should that be thought best.

"Availing myself of this, the last occasion which will occur, of addressing the two Houses of Legislature at their meeting, I cannot omit the expression of my sincere gratitude, for the repeated proofs of confidence manifested to me by themselves and their predecessors, since my call to the administration, and the many indulgencies experienced at their hands; the same grateful acknowlegements are due to my fellow-citizens, generally, whose support has been my great encouragement under all embarrassments. In the transaction of their business, I cannot have escaped error—it is incident to our imperfect nature: but I may say, with truth, my errors have been of the understanding, not of intention; and that the advancement of their rights and interests has been the constant motive for every measure. On these considerations, I solicit their indulgence. Looking forward with anxiety to their future destinies, I trust, that in their steady character, unshaken by difficulties, in their love of liberty, obedience to law, and support of the public authorities, I see a sure guarantee of the permanence of our Republic; and, retiring from the charge of their affairs, I carry with me the consolation of a firm persuasion, that Heaven has in store for our beloved country, long ages to come of prosperity and happiness.

Nov. 8, 1804. Th. Jefferson.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Nov. 10.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. Chittenden immediately on the meeting of the House, moved the following Resolution:—

"Resolved, That the Act passed at the last Session of Congress, entitled 'An Act for laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbours of the United States, and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto,' ought to be immediately repealed."

On the question whether the House will agree to consider the Resolution, it was decided by Yeas and Nays—Yeas 83—Nays 9.

Mr. Chittenden moved that it should be the Order of the Day for to-morrow.

Mr. Smilie asked, whether it was meant to move the repeal of the whole embargo system and substitute nothing in its stead? If it be "I wish him to come forward and tell us so—tell us that he and his constituents are willing to pay tribute and submit—that they will surrender the independence of their country."

Mr. Dana reminded Gentlemen, that the navigation of the Northen frontier of the Union would be locked up. If the embargo was to be removed at all, it was of importance that it should be done directly—that it should be decided within a fortnight from this time—Need Gentlemen now to be told that in almost all the ports vessels were preparing for sea—that some had even bent their sails, many having taken cargoes on board. These now remained in a state of suspense, which always gave birth to speculations: which ought to be put a stop to? As to paying tribute and submit, if the Gentleman wanted to know the spirit of Vermont, let him refer to the history of the Revolutionary War, and see if for her numbers, any other State gave the enemy more bloody battles.

Mr. Elliott spoke against the embargo, and said the people of America did not believe that they were called upon to decide between the embargo and war.

Mr. Epps proposed the following Amendment to Mr. Chittenden's motion:

"Resolved, That from and after the day of next, all intercourse between the United States and France, its islands and dependencies, ought to cease and determine.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for arming and equipping for immediate service thousand militia in addition to the force already authorised by law."

The Speaker informed Mr. Epps that these could not be received while another question was pending, and Mr. Epps withdrew them for the present.

Mr. Chittenden's Resolution was then made the Order of the Day for Monday next (the 14th).

FROM THE GOTTENBURGH MAIL.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, DEC. 6.

My last report was dated on the 10th of November, and was dispatched from Brahestad by Captain Kuhefelt.

Your Majesty's army under my command has since retreated to Pajocki and Uppiri, where the Russians formed an attack on our rear, turned the left flank near Merrijarivi, advanced against Pelskeski, to take the army in the rear, and thus compelled the army to fall back on Pajocki, and took on the 17th a position near Sigkajoiki. Ravolax and Pawola were occupied by our troops; but, in consequence of the enemy's corps being reinforced to 20,000 men, furnished with 60 pieces of heavy ordnance, and your Majesty's army having been reduced to 7000 men, by losses in the field and sickness, it became impossible to maintain our position, and I thought it advisable to open again a negociation for an armistice, the result of which was the Convention which I hereby have the honour to lay at your Majesty's feet.

CONVENTION

BETWEEN THE ROYAL SWEDISH, IN NORTH FINLAND AND THE IMPERIAL RUSSIAN ARMY.

By virtue of the powers vested in us, We, the undersigned, have agreed and stipulated the following articles:

1. The Royal Swedish army is, immediately after the ratification of this Convention, to take up a position along the frontiers of the district of Uleaborg, from Kemi to Porkanara; Kemi, in consequence, remaining in the hands of the Russians.

2. The Swedish army is to evacuate the town of Uleaborg within ten days next ensuing the date of this Convention; the Russian troops are to take possession of the said town on the 30th of November. The other parts of the country which are to be given up to the Russians, shall be evacuated according to the agreement yet to be concluded between the contracting parties.

3. The rear of the Swedish army shall retreat by the route agreed upon, and whatever cannot be removed by the Swedish troops in their retreat, shall be considered as good and lawful prize.

4. The Swedish army binds itself neither to destroy, distribute among the inhabitants, nor sell the magazines which they shall be necessitated to surrender.

5. The Swedish troops are not to take from Uleaborg, or other places to be surrendered, any Civil Officers, nor any articles in goods belonging to the provinces.

6. The Swedish army is to send back all Clergymen, Civil Officers, and inhabitants of the places evacuated by their troops, provided it be done by the desire or with the consent of the said persons.

7. This Convention shall be ratified by the respective Generals in Chief of both armies, and the ratifications exchanged to-morrow night.

Baron Aldebowitz, Maj. Gen.
Count Kaminski, Lieut. Gen.
Ojocki, 7-8, Nov. 1808. Count Buxhowden.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES.

Art. I.—The Armistice concluded between the two armies is to continue one month, next ensuing the day on which the Swedish army crosses the frontiers of the district of Uleaborg, or until the 12th of January 1809: and notice of the cessation of the Armistice shall be given at least fifteen days before hostilities are recommenced.

Art. II.—During the Armistice the Imperial Russian troops are not to cross the river Kemi.

C. N. Klercker, General in Chief.

Head-Quarters, Linkago, Nov. 29, 1808.

General.—I have the honour to inform you that the Convention which was yesterday concluded,, has been ratified by his Excellency Gen. Count Buxhowyden, and I shall now transmit it to Count Pgtemkin in order that the exchange of the Ratification may be effected with regard to the Armistice in question. I have his Excellency's command to acquaint you, that although he must destroy the conclusion of a formal Armistice, yet he engages his word of honour that he will not recommence hostile operations against the Swedish army before the expiration of fourteen days after the Swedish army shall have taken up the position stipulated in the above Convention, in hopes that no operations will be commenced on your part within the said time.

I have the honour, &c.

STATE PAPERS.

GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA.

LETTER FROM MR. CANNING TO MR. PINKNEY.

Foreign Office, Sept, 23, 1808.

The Undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had the honour to receive the official letter addressed to him by Mr. Pinkney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, respecting the Orders in Council, issued by his Majesty on the 7th of January and 11th November 1807.—He has laid that letter before the King, and he is commanded to assure Mr. Pinkney that the answer to the proposal which Mr. Pinkney was instructed to bring forward, has been deferred only in the hope that the renewed application which was understood to be recently made by the Government of the United States to that of France, might, in the new state of things which has arisen in Europe, have met with such a reception in France as would have rendered the compliance of his Majesty with that proposal consistent as much with his Majesty's own dignity, and with the interests of his people, as it would have been with his Majesty's disposition towards the United States. Unhappily there is now no longer any reason to believe that such a hope is likely to be realised; and the undersigned is therefore commanded to communicate to Mr. Pinkney the decision which, under the circumstances as they stand, his Majesty feels himself compelled, however unwillingly, to adopt.

The mitigated measure of retaliation announced by his Majesty in the Order in Council of the 7th January, and the further extension of that measure (an extension in operation but not in principle) by the Orders in Council of November, are founded (as has been already repeatedly avowed by his Majesty) on the "unquestionable right of his Majesty to retort upon the enemy the evils of his own injustice;" and upon the consideration that if third parties incidentally suffered by these retaliatory measures, "they were to seek their redress from the Power by whose original aggression that retaliation was occasioned."

His Majesty sees nothing in the embargo laid on by the President of the United States of America, which varies this original and simple state of the question.

If considered as a measure of impartial hostility against both Belligerents, the embargo appears to his Majesty to have been manifestly unjust, as, according to every principle of justice, that redress ought to have been first sought from the party originating the wrong. And his Majesty cannot consent to buy off that hostility which America ought not to have extended to him, at the expence of a concession made not to America, but to France.

If, as it has more generally been represented by the Government of the United States, the embargo is only to be considered as an innocent municipal regulation which affects none but the United States themselves, and with which no foreign State has any concern; viewed in this light, his Majesty does not conceive that he has the right or the pretension to make any complaint of it, and he has made none. But in this light there appears not only no reciprocity, but no assignable relation between the retaliation by the United States of a measure of voluntary self-restriction, and the surrender by his Majesty of his right of retaliation against his enemies.

The Government of the United States is now to be informed that the Berlin Decree of November 21, 1806, was the practical commencement of an attempt not merely to check or impair the prosperity of Great Britain, but utterly to annihilate her political existence, through the ruin of her commercial prosperity; that in this attempt almost all the Powers of the European Continent have been compelled, more or less, to co-operate; and that the American embargo, though most assuredly not intended to that end (for America can have no real interest in the subversion of the British Power, and her Rulers are too enlightened to act from any impulse against the real interests of their country), but by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of "the Blockade of the European Continent," precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success.

To this universal combination his Majesty has opposed a temperate but a determined retaliation upon the enemy, trusting that a firm resistance would defeat this project, but knowing that the smallest concession would infallibly encourage a perseverance in it.

The struggle has been viewed by other Powers not without an apprehension that it might be fatal to this country. The British Government has not disguised from itself that the trial of such an experiment might be arduous and long, though it has never doubted of the final issue. But if that issue, such as the British Government confidently anticipated, has providentially arrived much sooner than could have been hoped; if "the blockade of the Continent," as it has been triumphantly styled by the enemy, is raised even before it had been well established; and if that system, of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, is broken up into fragments utterly harmless and contemptible: it is nevertheless important in the highest degree to the reputation of this country (a reputation which constitutes great part of her power), that this disappointment of the hopes of her enemies should not have been purchased by any concession; that not a doubt should remain to distant times of her determination, and of her ability to have continued her resistance; and that no step which could even mistakenly be construed into concession should be taken on her part, while the smallest link of the confederacy remains undissolved; or while it can be a question whether the plan devised for her destruction has or has not either completely failed, or been unequivocally abandoned.

These considerations compel his Majesty to adhere to the principles on which the Orders in Council of the 7th of January and the 11th of November are founded, so long as France adheres to that system by which his Majesty's retaliatory measures were occasioned and justified.

It is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the Orders in Council, as they are at present framed; alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals, with a more severe pressure upon the enemy.

But of alterations to be made with this view only, it would be uncandid to take any advantage in the present discussion: however, it might be hoped, that in their principal effect, they might prove beneficial to America, provided the operation of the embargo were not to prevent her from reaping that benefit.

It remains for the undersigned to take notice of the last paragraph of Mr. Pinkney's letter. There cannot exist on the part of Mr. Pinkney a stronger wish than there does on that of the undersigned, and of the British Government, for the adjustment of all the differences subsisting between the two countries.

His Majesty has no other disposition than to cultivate the most friendly intercourse with the United States.

The undersigned is persuaded, that Mr. Pinkney would be one of the last to imagine, what is often idly asserted, that the depression of any other country is necessary or serviceable to the prosperity of this. The prosperity of America is essentially the prosperity of Great Britain; and the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the whole world. When those adjustments shall take place, to which, though unfortunately not practicable at this moment, nor under the conditions prescribed by Mr. Pinkney, the undersigned, nevertheless, confidently look forward, it will perhaps be no insecure pledge for the continuance of the good understanding between these two countries, that they will have learnt duly to appreciate each other's friendship; and that it will not hereafter be imputed to Great Britain, either on the one hand that she envies American industry as prejudicial to British commerce, or on the other hand, that she is compelled to court an intercourse with America, as absolutely necessary to her own existence.

His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American people.

The undersigned is commanded, in conclusion, to observe, that nothing is said in Mr. Pinkney's letter, of any intention to repeal the Proclamation by which the ships of war of Great Britain are interdicted from all those rights of hospitality in the ports of the United States, which are freely allowed to the ships of his Majesty's enemies.

The continuance of an interdiction which, under such circumstances, amounts so nearly to direct hostility, after the willingness professed, and the attempt made by his Majesty, to remove the cause on which that measure had been originally founded, would afford but an inauspicious omen for the commencement of a system of mutual conciliation; and the omission of any notice of that measure in the proposal which Mr. Pinkney has been instructed to bring forward, would have been of itself a material defect in the overture of the President.

But the undersigned is commanded no further to dwell upon this subject than for the purpose of assuring Mr. Pinkney, that on this and every other point in discussion between the two Governments, his Majesty earnestly desires a restoration of a perfect good understanding, and that his Majesty would decline no measure for the attainment of that object, which should be compatible, with his honour and just rights, and with the interests of his people.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney will accept the assurances of his high consideration.

BRITISH DECLARATION.

"The Overtures made to his Majesty by the Governments of Russia and of France have not led to Negociation: and the intercourse to which those Overtures gave rise being terminated, his Majesty thinks it right thus promptly and publicly to make known its termination.

"The continued appearance of a Negociation, when Peace has been found to be utterly unattainable, could be advantageous only to the enemy.

"It might enable France to sow distrust and jealousy in the Councils of those who are combined to resist her oppression: and if, among the nations which groan under the tyranny of French alliance, or among those which maintain against France a doubtful and precarious independence, there should be any which even now are balancing between the certain ruin of a prolonged activity, and the contingent danger of an effort to save themselves from that ruin; to nations so situated the delusive prospect of a peace between Great Britain and France could not fail to be peculiarly injurious. Their preparations might be relaxed by the vain hope of returning tranquillity; or their purpose shaken by the apprehension of being left to contend alone.

"That such was in fact the main object of France in the proposals transmitted to his Majesty from Erfurth, his Majesty entertained a strong persuasion.

"But, at a moment when results so awful from their importance, and so tremendous from their uncertainty, might be depending upon the decision of peace or war, the King felt it due to himself to ascertain, beyond the possibility of doubt, the views and intentions of his enemies.

"It was difficult for his Majesty to believe, that the Emperor of Russia had devoted himself so blindly and fatally to the violence and ambition of the power, with which his Imperial Majesty had unfortunately become allied, as to be prepared openly to abet the usurpation of the Spanish Monarchy; and to acknowledge and maintain the right, assumed by France, to depose and imprison friendly Sovereigns, and forcibly to transfer to herself the allegiance of independent nations.

"When, therefore, it was proposed to his Majesty to enter into negociation for a general peace, in concert with his Majesty's allies, and to treat either on the basis of the uti possidetis (heretofore the subject of so much controversy), or on any other basis consistent with justice, honour, and equality, his Majesty determined to meet this seeming fairness and moderation, with fairness and moderation, on his Majesty's part real and sincere.

"The King professed his readiness to enter into such Negociation, in concurrence with his allies; and undertook forthwith to communicate to them the proposals which his Majesty had received. But as his Majesty was not connected with Spain by a formal treaty of alliance, his Majesty thought it necessary to declare, that the engagements which she had contracted, in the face of the world, with that nation, were considered by his Majesty as no less sacred, and no less binding upon his Majesty, than the most solemn treaties; and to express his Majesty's just confidence that the Government of Spain, acting in the name of his Catholic Majesty Ferdinand the Seventh, was understood to be a party to the Negociation.

"The reply returned by France to this proposition of his Majesty casts off at once the thin disguise which had been assumed for a momentary purpose; and displays, with less than ordinary reserve, the arrogance and injustice of that Government. The universal Spanish Nation is described by the degrading appellation of "the Spanish Insurgents;" and the demand for the admission of the Government of Spain, as a party to any Negociation, is rejected as inadmissible and insulting.

"With astonishment, as well as with grief, his Majesty has received from the Emperor of Russia a reply, similar in effect, although less indecorous in tone and manner. The Emperor of Russia also stigmatizes, as "Insurrection," the glorious efforts of the Spanish people, in behalf of their legitimate Sovereign, and in defence of the independence of their country; thus giving the sanction of his Imperial Majesty's authority to an usurpation which has no parallel in the history of the world.

"The King would readily have embraced an opportunity of negociation which might have afforded any hope or prospect of a peace compatible with justice and with honour. His Majesty deeply laments an issue, by which the sufferings of Europe are aggravated and prolonged. But neither the honour of his Majesty, nor the generosity of the British nation would admit of his Majesty's consenting to commence a negociation by the abandonment of a brave and loyal people, who are contending for the preservation of all that is dear to man; and whose exertions in a cause so unquestionably just, his Majesty has solemnly pledged himself to sustain.

"Westminster, Dec. 16, 1808."

PROVINCIALS.

EFFECTS OF THE WEATHER.

The fall of snow has been very great in various parts of the kingdom. It fell with such rapidity on the evening of Friday and the forenoon of Saturday se'nnight, on the North-East and East Coast of Yorkshire, as totally to suspend the progress of every kind of public carriage. The mail reached Market-Weighton both on the nights of Saturday and Sunday, from whence the bags were forwarded on horseback, and reached Hull safely, the first on Sunday at half past twelve, and the second on Tuesday, at half past ten. The guard, however, in returning, was from excessive fatigue so exhausted, as to be unable to proceed further than Bisaop-Burton.

The stage-coaches, says the Hull Paper of Tuesday, have been since Sunday morning suspended, until the roads are opened between Weighton and Beverley; but the whole of this day (Tuesday) has been a continued fall, which will of course render that event less probable.

The storm of wind and snow was very violent in the neighbourhood of Sheffield. The driver of the Manchester mail coach to Sheffield, was so frozen in coming over the Moors as to be unable to move from the box, when he arrived at Ringinlow-bar; he was taken into the house, and after some time recovered.

On Friday se'nnight, the following shocking circumstance occurred in Sandgate, in Newcastle. A young woman, sleeping with an infant child, awoke early in the morning, and missed the child out of the bed. On searching the room, she found that it had fallen from the bed into a tub of water, which had been left near it, and was drowned. The shrieks of the young woman, on discovering this melancholy event, alarmed the neighbours, who, instead of quieting her perturbed mind, began to charge her with carelessness, &c. This, added to the anticipated reflections of the mother (who was then at Shields), operated so powerfully on the young woman's feelings, that she rushed out of the house, and, in a fit of frenzy, precipitated herself into the river, where she was drowned before any assistance could be afforded.

On Tuesday last, a curious occurrence took place at Sunderland.—A beautiful large white fat ox, the property of Mr. George Longstaff of that place, instead of entering the house into which Mr. L's young men were endeavouring to drive him, ran up the stairs of an adjoining one, occupied by Mr. Mather, a respectable peruke-maker. The singularity of the transaction attracted a multitude of spectators, whilst, doubtless, it created in Mr. Mather the most agonising terrors: Here the ox continued about two hours; and it is said, on his first appearance, that Mr. Mather locked himself in a close-bed by way of security. At length he observed a guest through a chink, with its head and horns in his closet, but whether it was to eat up all Mr. M's victuals, or to prevent Mr. M. from shaving him, a difficult to determine. At length Mr. M. ventured to open a latch-pane in his large bow-window, (there being no sash) and to the great delight and consequent noise and vociferation of the crowd, put out his head. Mr. M. then withdrew abashed, and made good his retreat to the bed, where he continued in safety, until with great perseverance, contrivance, and art, Mr. Longstaff and his men safely extricated the noble animal.

A terrible fire broke out on Thursday sen'night, in a kitchen under the shop and parlour of Mr. George Carr, tallow-chandler, Hexham, which threatened destruction to a vast pile of buildings, and it was not known to the family above until they were almost suffocated. Mrs. Carr, Miss Robson, and three of the children, threw themselves from the window of the room above the parlour, and happily received little injury. Several fruitless attempts were made to rescue two remaining ones, by breaking in the windows in an upper story. The doors were unfortunately open, and the rooms were filled with such an intense smoke, that no person could enter to do any good until the fire, by the united exertions of a number of persons, was somewhat got under, when the poor little sufferers were relieved from their awful situation by Mr. James Meston, who handed them from a window of the third story; they were conveyed into the adjoining house, when medical aid was soon procured, and are now, to the great joy of their friends, in a fair way of recovery.

Mr. J. Wilson, who lately set off to Newmarket, in hopes of being backed for a pedestrian expedition, has at length succeeded. He is backed for a wager of a thousand guineas to walk a thousand miles in twenty successive days, each day's journey to be completed in fourteen hours. Water is to be his only beverage. He is to start on the 11th of April next, from Christchurch, London, to proceed twenty-five miles, and then return. Odds are against the performance, and it is justly stiled an Herculean task.

On the 9th ult. a very extraordinary accident occurred at Christielands, on the estate of Stapleton, near Annan.—The bucket and rope of a draw well having accidently fallen to the bottom, David Miller, a brother of the tenant, descended by a rope to the depth of 40 feet, when he recovered the bucket and was ascending, when unluckily his foot forced out one of the stones on the side of the well, near to the bottom; when in an instant the whole building rushed down, and completely closed upon him, and the well was filled up to within two feet of the top. His wife, mother, and brother were on the spot, and witnesses of this dreadful scene, and their agony was indescribable.—The alarm being given, a crowd of people from the surrounding neighbourhood assembled, who immediately went to work in removing the rubbish and stones from the well, to which they were the more encouraged, from hearing, at times, the sound of the unfortunate man's voice from below.—The accident happened about nine o'clock in the morning; and the people having wrought with the most indefatigable and unremitting exertion, till about eight at night, their efforts were crowned with success. They got all clear above him—and, astonishing to relate, without a broken bone, and so well, that he was able to walk into the house, and is now in a fair way of recovery. It appears the stones had formed a kind of arch over his head, which must have been the means of saving his life.

A fire broke out at ten o'clock on Sunday night, at the house of Mr. Hend, at Westdean, near Colebrook, which was attended with melancholy circumstances:—Mr. and Mrs. H. were on a visit about a mile from home when the fire broke out, and before they could arrive, the house was consumed, and a little boy, four years of age, was burnt to death. It was occasioned by the maid servant leaving a candle too near the bed-curtains when she had put the child to bed, who was afterwards burnt. The distress of the parents is beyond description.

Thursday se'nnight about eight o'clock, as Mr. Budgeon, of Dartford, was returning home from Rochester, in a single horse chaise, accompanied by his servant, he was stopped by two footpads between Gravel-hill and Foul-slough, near Greenhithe, One of the robbers seized the horse's head, the other, with a pistol in his hand, went to the chaise, and with some horrid oaths exclaimed, "your life or your money." Mr. Budgeon replied, he had no money for them, and none would he give. The demand for money was repeated with the threat to fire. Mr. B. not giving any money, the villain at the chaise struck several violent blows with a large stick, which Mr. B. warded off as well as he could with his umbrella. The man at the horse's head then cried out in a violent manner to shoot him; upon which, the villain at the chaise discharged the pistol at Mr. B. and two shots passed through his hat. The discharge of the pistol caused the horse to take fright, and run off furiously; but Mr. B. retaining command over the animal, he escaped without injury.

TUESDAY'S LONDON GAZETTE.

Admiralty Office, Dec. 17.

Copy of a letter from Lieut. Dawson, of his Majesty's ship St. Fiorenzo, at sea, 9th March.

Sir—It is with great regret I have to inform you of the death of Captain Hardinge, late of his Majesty's ship St. Fiorenzo; who fell gloriously in the early part of an action on the 8th inst. between his Majesty's ship St. Fiorenzo and the French national frigate La Piedmontaise.

The St. Fiorenzo sailed from Point de Galle on Friday the 4th inst. at half-past eleven, A. M. On the 6th, at seven A. M. passed three Indiamen, and, shortly after, saw a frigate bearing N. E. We immediately hauled our wind in chace, and made all sail, being at that time in latitude 7. 32. longitude 77. 58. We made the private signal, which was not answered; and at five shewed our colours, which the enemy took no notice of. At forty minutes past eleven, P. M. we ranged alonside of him on the larboard tack and received his broadside. After engaging till fifty minutes past eleven, P. M. within a cable's length, the enemy made sail a-head, out of the range of our shot; we ceased firing, and made all sail after him; continuing to come up with him till day-light, when finding he could not avoid an action, he wore, as did we also. At twenty-five minutes past six re-commenced the action, at the distance of half a mile, gradually closing with him to a quarter of a mile. The fire was constant and well-directed on both sides, though that of the enemy slackened towards the latter part of the action. At a quarter past eight, P. M. the enemy made all sail away; our main-topsail-yard being shot through, the main royal mast, and both main-topmast-stays, the mainspring-stay, and most of the standing and running rigging, and all our sails shot to pieces, and most of our cartridges fired away, (as our guns were directed at his hull he was not much disabled about his rigging, we ceased firing, and employed all hands in repairing the damages sustained, and fitting the ship again for action. From the great injury our masts, yards, and sails had received, I am sorry to observe that it was not in our power to chace or renew the action immediately; we, however, succeeded in keeping sight of him during the night; and at nine A. M. on the 8th, the ship being perfectly prepared for action, we bore down upon the enemy under all sail; he did not endeavour to avoid us till we hauled athwart his stern, for the purpose of gaining the weather gage, and bringing him to close fight, when he hauled up also, and made all sail; but perceiving that we came fast up with him, and that an action was inevitable, he tacked, and at three we passed each other on opposite tacks, and recommenced action within a quarter of a cable's length. With grief I have to observe, that our brave Captain was killed by a grape shot the second broadside. When the enemy was abaft our beam he wore, and, after an hour and twenty minutes close action, struck their colours, and waved their hats for a boat to be sent them. She proved to be La Piedmontaise, commanded by Mons. Epron, Capitaine du Vaisseau; she mounts fifty guns, long eighteen-pounders on her main deck, and thirty-six pounder carronades on her quarter deck. She had three hundred and sixty-six Frenchmen on board, and nearly two hundred Lascars, who worked their sails. She sailed from the Isle of France on the 30th of December. In the action she had forty-eight killed and one hundred and twelve wounded. The St. Fiorenzo has thirteen killed and twenty-five wounded; most of the latter are in a most promising way. A list of them I have the honour to inclose for your information. The enemy was cut to pieces in his masts, bowsprit, and rigging; and they all went by the board during the night.

It is now a pleasing part of my duty to recommend to your particular notice, the cool, steady, and gallant conduct of Lieutenants Edward Davies and Henry George Moysey; the latter, I am sorry to add, was severely wounded about ten minutes before the enemy struck. I also experienced very great assistance from Mr. Donovan, the Master, by the judicious and seaman-like manner in which he laid us close alongside the enemy. To Lieut. Samuel Ashmore, of the Royal Marines, I am much indebted, for the cool and determined courage evinced by him through the whole action. Indeed every Officer, petty officer, seaman, and marine in the ship, behaved in the most brave and gallant manner, and nobly maintained the pre-eminence of the British flag. In the first boat from the prize came Mr. W. F. Black, Assistant-Surgeon of his Majesty's 86th Regiment, captured by the Piedmontaise on his passage to Madras, who rendered the Surgeon great assistance.

I am also much indebted to the Officers of the army, and the Captains and Officers of the country ships, who were prisoners on board our ships, for the great assistance they afforded us with their boats in erecting jury masts, and working the ship into port, as from our weak state, and the great number of prisoners on board us, we could spare but few hands from our own ship to send on board the prize.

I have the honour to be, &c.

William Dawson.

To Sir Edward Pellew, Bart, Rear-Admiral of the Red, and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's ships and vessels in the East Indies.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND THE PUBLIC.

The PROPRIETORS of the NATIONAL REGISTER beg leave to inform their Subscribers and the Public that a COMPREHENSIVE INDEX, to complete the FIRST VOLUME OF THIS PAPER, is in preparation, and that it is their intention to issue it on Sunday the 15th of January;—on which day a PORTRAIT OF HIS MAJESTY, from a Painting by Sir WM. BEECHEY, will be distributed GRATIS. The Public may expect a Portrait worthy of their acceptance; and which, they trust, will supply the imperfections of the Print which was given soon after the commencement of the NATIONAL REGISTER.

Extraordinary and unprecedented applications having been made during the last month, for some of the former numbers of THE NATIONAL REGISTER; it is therefore necessary to apprise the Purchasers of this Paper, who may be desirous of completing their Setts, that immediate orders must be given, to prevent disappointment.

By some unaccountable accident HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION TO THE LATE OVERTURES FROM FRANCE AND RUSSIA was omitted in the NATIONAL REGISTER of Sunday last—We are extremely sorry for the omission; it will be found in this day's Paper.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

New York Papers to the 18th ult. were received yesterday. Their contents are extremely interesting. They contain the President's Message to Congress, and several documents, consisting of the correspondence on the subject of the British Orders in Council and the French Decrees. T judge from this Message, the American Executive seems determined to continue the restrictions of the Embargo Act; and as long as Mr. JEFFERSON retains his place, and his influence, we have no doubt he will make every exertion to keep it in force. He continues to adhere strongly to the principle, that it is much less prejudicial to the interests of the United States, than were they exposed to the vexatious effects of the French Decrees and our retaliating Orders. However, the great body of his fellow-citizens do not appear to feel the same conviction; and are disinclined to support Mr. JEFFERSON'S abstract notions of neutral rights. In fact, the injury inflicted on themselves by this restrictive measure has been so very considerable, and has had so little effect by way of retaliation, that it appears to us an excess of political infatuation, were it to be continued in force from the latter motive. It has hurt them, and them alone; and produced not one of the results it was expected to have, either on this country or on France, however fondly the President imagined it might compel us to rescind our Orders in Council. The inefficacy of the act in this respect, together with the material loss it has already inflicted on the citizens of the United States, have excited a marked repugnance to its continuance; and there is reason to suppose, that these united motives have induced the Legislature of that country to repeal it. They have already taken up the subject with the warmth and expedition which so important a measure calls for; and the 14th of November was fixed for its discussion in both Houses.

The correspondence between Mr. PINCKNEY and Mr. CANNING is the most important of the documents annexed to the Message. The reply of the latter to the proposal of the American Minister, is one of the finest specimens we ever read of diplomatic correspondence. It does not contain a single word to irritate the feelings of the Americans, or to widen the breach between the two countries; whilst it strongly insists on the right of our Government to retaliate on France for her prohibitory decrees. It is impossible to read this letter without feeling the highest respect for the talents, dignified moderation, and conciliatory spirit of the writer. It is dated September 23d, and if our Government, as has been asserted by the enemy, felt an inclination to thwart the progress of American prosperity, the auspicious appearance of Spanish affairs at that time gave our Government a favorable opportunity of letting the Americans feel that this country was not insensible to the manifest hostility of their Embargo Act.

Mr. CANNING does not throw out an insinuation of this kind; but admirably observes—"That if it be considered as "a measure of impartial hostility against both belligerents, "the Embargo appears to his MAJESTY to have been ma- "nifestly unjust; as, according to every principle of Justice, "that redress ought to have been first sought from the "party originating the wrong. And his MAJESTY cannot "consent to buy off that hostility, which America ought "not to have extended to him, at the expense of a conces- "sion made not to America but to France." Had our government first published its Orders in Council, previous to the French Decrees, the Americans had certainly a right to remonstrate with this country against so violent and unjustifiable a proceeding; but as they must be aware that the aggression originates in the enemy, and was intended, and proclaimed, as a vital blow to our commercial prosperity; it was both inconsistent and arrogant to use the language of remonstrance and menace, in consequence of measures, which the violence and injustice of the enemy compelled us to adopt. To the enemy they were submissive and crouching, and for the most wanton violation of the American flag, they had not courage to demand the slightest redress; whilst they held out to us, on account of the act of retaliation it was forced to adopt, the language of bullying and insult. We do not certainly forget the triumphant anticipation which was displayed by the Antifederalists that the Embargo Act would soon compel us to fall on our knees, in order to avert its pernicious effects. However, their triumph was short-lived, and their enmity had no other effect, than to convince us, that they were as willing, as they were impotent, to hurt us. After such demonstrations of a hostile spirit, we cannot but admire the enlightened moderation of our government, and its extreme forbearance at the inimical spirit of Mr. JEFFERSON and his partisans. We feel the highest satisfaction, that it has been noticed to the Americans, that this country can better do without an intercourse with them, than they can without us; and it is to be hoped they have by this time acquired sufficient prudence to be benefitted by the admonition. Mr. CANNING thus expresses himself:—"When "these adjustments shall take place, to which, though un- "fortunately not practicable at this moment, nor under the "conditions prescribed by Mr. PINCKNEY, the undersigned, "nevertheless, confidently looks forward, it will perhaps be "no insecure pledge for the continuance of the good un- "derstanding between the two countries, that they will "have learnt duly to appretiate each other's friendship, "and that it will not hereafter be imputed to Great Britain, "either on the one hand, that she envies American indus- "try, as prejudicial to British commerce, or, on the other "hand, that she is compelled to court an intercourse with "America, as absolutely necessary to her own existence."

We are still left in anxious suspense relative to the situation of the Spanish Patriots, or the further progress of the enemy. Under the pressure of this uncertainty, we have the satisfaction to announce that government has come at last to the patriotic resolution of sending out an additional force to the assistance of that brave people, worthy the resources and the reputation of this country. We sincerely rejoice that Ministers have so far complied with the sense of the public, as to make a great and adequate effort in support of a cause, which never becomes desperate, but from pusillanimity in our co-operation. The re-inforcements to be sent out are reported to be on a very extensive scale—amounting to about 30,000 men. This enlarged plan of operation will give effect to our assistance, and frustrate every attempt of the invaders to effect the subjugation of that country. Whatever has been vaunted of late years of the superiority of the French armies, and the tactical skill of their generals, we would not entertain the slightest uneasiness as to the result of this arduous contest, were this large British force, consisting of 80,000 men to unite in any part of the peninsula. If any credit can be attached to the prevalent reports of the day, this army, together with those of the Patriots, is to make a great stand in the South. Considering the native intrepidity, and the cool, steady discipline of our troops, together with the extreme irritation of the Spaniards against the invaders, very little apprehension ought to be entertained, that their united pressure will not bear down any resistance the enemy may be able to make. We have frequently insisted, and still repeat the observation that very little credit ought to be attached to the French statements of their own armies; and after the most minute attention to the operations of this campaign, we feel the strongest conviction, that their army in the Peninsula does not amount to 130,000 men. A retrospective view of the military occurrences since the arrival of BONAPARTE, gives a strong appearance of truth to this supposition. Whilst the army under BLAKE was pressed by the enemy, their force on the Ebro remained perfectly inactive; and no attempt was made to force the passes of the Somo Sierra, till part of the troops could be detached, which acted against CASTANOS: when we reflect on the extreme vigour and impetuosity with which the operations of BONAPARTE had been uniformly conducted, we are convinced that had his army been so considerable, as the Monitour represents it, the tyrant would not have remained, from the 11th to the 27th, stationary at Burgos; but would have immediately pushed forward to the capital, in order to crush at once the means of resistance the Supreme Junta was busied in organising. It is a subject of the highest gratification that government feels at last a similar conviction, and has come to the noble determination of opposing a force to the enemy capable, without even the assistance of the Spaniards, of expelling them from Spain. It is an excess of drivelling to maintain, that we have not the means of assembling an army of 120,000 men in that country; it is in our power to collect a much larger force, if we wished to try the utmost extent of our resources. If Ministers repose so much confidence in the patriotism of the public, and the bravery of our army, as to make this great effort, whilst they secure the political preponderance of great Britain, and the independence of Spain, they will establish a permanent memorial of their talents as Statesmen. We are sincerely happy to hear that SIR ARTHUR WELLESLEY is to have a distinguished command on the occasion; and General FERGUSON, and a number of other meritorious Officers, have received orders to proceed on a similar destination. The appointment of Sir ARTHUR WELLESLEY will meet with the approbation of every man, who recollects the brilliant result of the battle of Vimiera, and his prudence and delicacy during the sitting of the Court of Enquiry. A considerable portion of the public indignation, in consequence of the Convention, of Cintra, fell to his share; and he submitted with dignity to this unmerited censure, sooner than clear his character in the absence of the Officer who was the real cause of that unfortunate transaction. We bestowed on it our full measure of abhorrence, and having seen the sanction of Sir ARTHUR'S name to so repulsive an act we thought it our duty, as it unquestionably was, to give our unqualified disapprobation to every one concerned in framing it. We now feel a degree of pleasure, proportionate to the repugnance we felt in censuring him, in having it in our power to acquit him of any share in the odious measure. There is not a more promising officer in our service; and it must afford triumph, as well as joy, that the country, in this important crisis, can enjoy the full extent of his services and talents.

A Gottenburgh Mail, which arrived on Tuesday last, brought the intelligence of a Convention and Armistice having been concluded between the Swedes and Russians in Finland. The great accession of force which the enemy had received some time previous to the Armistice, rendered it indispensably necessary on the part of our allies. They had suffered besides so much from the scarcity of provisions, and the inclemency of the weather, that their effective force was reduced, through sickness and the above-mentioned causes, to about 7000 men. Under these disadvantages, however, distinguished the bravery of the Swedes may be, it was impossible for them to oppose an effectual resistance to the enemy. However the season was so far advanced, that had those causes not intervened, a cessation of hostilities must have taken place. From the excessive cold, which sets in about the beginning of November, in North Finland, no military operations can be carried on after that month; and this circumstance will account for the readiness of the enemy to accede to the Armistice. It was to continue for a month; and notice of the cessation is to be given fifteen days before hostilities are recommenced.

It is said that Sir Arthur Wellesley, goes out in command of all the reinforcements going to Spain. With him go—

Major-General	SPENCER,	Major-General	DYOTT,
	MURRAY,		THELWES,
	FERGUSON,	Brig-General	ELWES,
	PAYNE,		DORREIN,
	COTTON,		DUFF.

Sir John Moore has very urgently pressed Government to expedite the return of the General Officers attached to the army under his command now in this country; and several of them, among whom is Sir Arthur Wellesley, are making preparations to proceed to Spain immediately.

Speculation and fancy have been at work, and rumours of various descriptions have been circulated during the last few days.—A massacre of the French at Madrid, who were attacked in a moment of festivity, consequent of their gaining the Spanish capital, and a defeat of the French by the British army, were among the prevalent reports; but for which there can be no foundation, since no advices sufficiently recent have come to this country.

The Members of the Board of Inquiry, met on Friday at the house of Mr. Ryder, the Judge-Advocate-General, on the purpose of affixing their signatures to the report which was prepared for that purpose. When the report shall have received the signatures, it will be forwarded by the Judge-Advocate-General to his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, for the purpose of being laid before his Majesty; when, if his Majesty shall approve of the inferences drawn by the Board from the evidence, the report will be communicated to the parties and made public. The Commander-in-Chief had an interview with his Majesty yesterday at Windsor, on Military business. The papers containing the opinions of the Members of the Court of Enquiry, were laid before his Majesty, and the Sovereign's pleasure will be made known in a few days.

A plan for qualifying the Spaniards to rise en masse, is handing about in the political circles. The principle of close combat is chiefly urged, and it is proposed, that at a concerted time, the whole population shall assemble in three or four strong positions conveniently situated, and with the Spanish troops and the English Army converge to one grand attack on the enemy. The masse are only to be furnished with pikes, an easy mode of training is adapted, and as opportunities offer, they are to charge in columns upon the enemy, and overwhelm tactical skill by numbers and resolution.

The insolence and injustice of BONAPARTE we have always found to increase in proportion as the opposition to him became weaker. Twelve months ago, nay, even much later, he condescended to flatter the American Government, and to affect an extraordinary tenderness towards the commercial interest of that country. This hypocrisy is no longer necessary, and we accordingly discover that the shipping of the United States are seized with as little scruple by the French cruizers as if there was open war between that country and France. The following letters announce some recent captures. We shall be curious to learn in what light Mr. JEFFERSON and his adherents will view this intelligence:—

Copy of a letter from Capt. LEE, of the Mary, dated Boulogne Castle, Dec. 6:—

"I have the misfortune to acquaint you, that the brig Mary of Philadelphia, under my command, was captured on the 19th ult. by the French lugger privateer Grand Napoleon of this port, and carried in here.

"The Mary was captured between this port and the English shore. The cargo consisting of 142 tons of sweet oil, has been already discharged, and I, as well as my crew, are kept as yet in prison, though I have reason to suppose we shall be soon released. I have not been able to ascertain the motive of this Government for capturing American property, and detaining the subjects of the United States as prisoners, but time and patience will, no doubt, unfold their motives, and afford us redress.

"I am, Sir, your's, &c. "L. T. LEE."

Extract of a Letter from Captain Nicolas Owings, of the brig President, from the Canary Islands, dated St. Valery, Nov. 28, 1808:

"It is with the utmost regret I inform you of my being captured, on the 17th instant (November), close under the Isle of Wight, and sent into this place; and I have ever since been under guard at an inn, and am not allowed to go out of my room without some person to guard me: a thing that has never been known to be done in France before."

A Proclamation appeared in last night's Gazette, appointing a General Fast to be observed throughout England on Wednesday, the 8th of February; and another directing a General Fast to be observed on Thursday, the 9th of February, throughout Scotland.

BREAD.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised Half an Assize, or One Penny in the Peck Loaf, which commences to-day, when the Quartern Loaf of Wheaten is to be sold for One Shilling and Two Pence Three Farthings, and Household, One Shilling and a Penny Farthing.

Monday morning, pursuant to a signal from the Salvador del Mundo, 112 guns, Admiral Young, in Hamoaze, a Court Martial was held on board that ship, for the trial of Mr. Smith, late Master's Mate of the Parthian, 14, for the murder of Captain Bolderston, on board that ship last Tuesday, on her passage to Corunna, with dispatches. Rear-Admiral Sutton was the President; G. Eastland, Esq. Judge Advocate. The Court was uncommonly crouded on the occasion, and Smith appeared before it with uncommon hardihood. After the evidence for the prosecution was gone through, the prisoner was called on for his defence, but he said he supposed it was no use, and therefore should decline making any defence at all. The Court was then cleared; and, on its being resumed, the prisoner was informed, that he was found guilty of the foul murder of Capt. Bolderston, and that he was sentenced to be hanged at the yard-arm of such man of war as the Lords of the Admiralty should please to appoint. He was remanded into close custody, and retired sullenly to his birth, under the care of the Master at Arms and Provost Martial. An order for his immediate execution has been forwarded to Plymouth.

THE COURT.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his Majesty came to town from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace by the Dukes of York, Kent, Sussex, and Cambridge.

The following had the honour of being presented to his Majesty:—

Admiral Apodaca, upon his being appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the Supreme Junta of Spain, by Mr. Canning, and conducted by Sir Stephen Cotterel, the Master of the Ceremonies. His Excellency had an audience of his Majesty, delivered his credentials, and was most graciously received.—Captain Brace, Royal Navy, of the Virginia, upon his return from service.—Governor Cameron, upon his return from the Bahama Islands.—Mr. Howe, upon his being appointed Surgeon to the King.

His Majesty held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland and the Cabinet Ministers present.

Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, laid before his Majesty the proceedings of some Courts Martial.

The report of the Judge-Advocate laying before the King, yesterday, the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry of the Convention of Cintra, appears to be erroneous. Our Readers will recollect that in the appointment of the Court of Inquiry, it was directed that the report should be made through the medium of the Duke of York.

Yesterday being St. Thomas's Day, the same was observed at Court as a Collar Day, by all those who attended belonging to the Noble Orders wearing their collars.

That GLORIOUS FORM, that light unsufferable,
And that far-beaming blaze of Majesty,
Wherewith he wont, at Heaven's high council table,
To sit the midst of TRINAL UNITY
He laid aside: and, here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day;
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay!

MILTON.

REV. GEORGE MATHEW, M. A.

(CHRISTMAS DAY, 1808)

OF

GREENWICH, AND ST. JAMES'S.

"IT would now be extremely unadviseable," observes Blackstone "to make any alteration in the SERVICE OF THE CHURCH; unless by its own consent, or unless it could be shewn that some manifest impiety or shocking absurdity will follow from continuing the present forms." This position always struck me as equally entitled to consideration and confidence, and as capable of being essentially extended in its application. Let me be indulged in briefly stating my reasons for this persuasion.

It would seem ridiculous in me, as it would be superfluous in others, to write common-place commendations on the liturgy of our established church. A very different purpose now actuates my pen. I consider the 'Book of Common-Prayer' invaluable; not as containing the meer ritual part of the worship of the Church of England, but as an invariable standard of her Principles, as well as her practice. Men dispute, often causelessly enough, concerning the interpretation of particular sentences of Holy Writ, and by this means endeavour to stagger the faith of narrowed as weak minds; but it is not upon dubious constructions of contested passages of the Sacred Scriptures, not upon variations of critical exposition, that the Ecclesiastical Establishment of this Country depends for its spiritual stability. While our national Creeds continue to be received in the Church, and while what are known as the Thirty-nine Articles find their place in its Liturgy, our Religious Faith is unquestionably, and, may I add, irrevocably fixed! To "this law and to this testimony," then, let us confidently appeal, whenever we are called upon to ascertain the merits of those Preachers on whom they are peculiarly binding. It is this consideration that principally excites my esteem for the forms of devotional service appointed by authority among us. They contain, I think, the Bible Test, the acknowledged rules of arbitration, amidst schism or dissent, in all clerical controversies,—the Criterion of our common Christianity. We may now discern the full importance of the admonition, laid down by the illustrious author whose sentiments have introduced these reflections on the "SERVICE OF THE CHURCH."

Convinced myself of these things, and anxious to further their influence on the minds of those who honour this paper with their serious attention, it must not be objected to me if, in the prosecution of my leading design, I happen occasionally to expostulate with those whose sacred province it is to impart the "glad-tidings" of salvation to their fellow-creatures; and sometimes to remonstrate with such characters, when their instructions doctrinally and vitally degenerate from the fundamental axioms of divine truth, or the essential principles of divine faith. Lamentably should I fall short of the task I have undertaken, were the displeasure of any individual sufficient to stifle, even under any circumstances, the candid expression of those opinions which fidelity required me to state. However disputable may be my pretensions to ability——integrity is still within my reach.

GEORGE MATHEW, M. A. of whom it now remains to give such account as it is in my power to render, is of Trinity-College in the University of Cambridge. As the Chaplain to a High-Sheriff for Suffolk, he was formerly requested to print two Assize-Sermons. I have not seen either of the sermons, but am told that both of them "do him credit." Mr. Mathew has been for some time a morning preacher at Greenwich Church, and, in conjunction with Mr. Stevens, Evening Preacher at the Magdalen. He also new preaches occasionally at St. James's Church, in Piccadilly, during the absence of Dr. Andrewes. Here, indeed, is the place where his ministerial labours are likely to acquire him desirable distinction.

Perhaps this Gentleman will not allow my estimate of his powers, when I confess it would be hyperbolical to designate him as one of the most eminent preachers of his age. He is "sound," and his delivery, if it cannot be called highly animated, is appropriate and efficient; but there is in him nothing strikingly origiual,—nothing that separates character, that individualises excellence. He partakes too much of the caste of the priesthood.

Mr. Mathew, it occurs to me, has, however unintentionally, lately fallen into an imitation of Dr. Andrewes. Hence he has too much of the lecturer, but too little of the preacher; too much of the rostrum, but too little of the pulpit. Hence, also, he excels rather in the evidential illustration of our religion. His discourses are fully historical, but they are not sufficiently supplicatory.

Let me not be understood as wishing to pass condemnation on historical preaching altogether. It is often the safest mode of teaching, for young divines to adopt; and may sometimes, especially where there are numbers of young hearers, best answer the purposes of public instruction. Still it forms the food of "babes" only—it is not the manna of manly nutrition. An historical faith is not a believing faith.

"Our business," said Mr. Mathew, when last I heard him, "is not to entertain, but to instruct and save." Here we are devoutly agreed. "To entertain"——surely, no!

> "What! will he seek to dazzle me with tropes,
> "As with the diamond on his lilly hand;
> "And play his brilliant parts before my eyes,
> "When I am hungry for the bread of life!"

"But to instruct and save" is, in truth, the end of preaching; not forgetting, for one instant, that salvation must be the aim of all religious instruction! The matter is now brought within limits.——What is the mode of divine Instruction, best calculated to produce human Salvation?

I have just hinted one of the most momentous enquiries, as it affects the christian clergy, with which I am acquainted. Paley's works are not the principal source whence such characters should seem ambitious of collecting their testimonials.

Diffidence, I apprehend, is the great difficulty Mr. Mathew has to encounter. He fears to diverge into danger; he therefore keeps the beaten path, without considering whether it may be the best; and thus foregoes the advantages which he might possibly derive, from acting up to his own conceptions of the pulpit. Let him lay aside the primness of the priest, and divest himself of the servility of imitation. With more of Paul, and less of Paley, something really estimable may be yet expected from this accomplished and ingenious Divine.

One circumstance had nearly escaped my recollection. Whether it is the consequence of that self-diffidence which I before noticed in Mr. Mathew, or whether it originates in the uncomfortable sensation of not knowing how best to dispose of his person when he enters the pulpit, he has an awkward habit of busying himself by continually turning over the leaves of his sermon, seemingly employed in preparatively reviewing their contents. This anticipatory occupation is attended with some decided disadvantages. It prevents the preacher from assuming that erect posture, which is so truly becoming in him the moments previously to beginning his discourse; while it disappoints the eyes of his congregation, who naturally look up for him when he appears in his sacred station; and, therefore, it too much detaches him from them, at the interesting instant when their public acquaintance actually commences. This observation may to some persons appear trivial. Nothing is unworthy of being remarked, however, that in the least tends to improve and give effect to the eloquence of the pulpit. Had it been permitted us to contemplate a Peter on the day of Pentecost, a Stephen during his last address to the enraged Jews, and a Paul before Felix, or Agrippa, or Festus, we should have discovered, I doubt not, in each of these glorious champions of our religion, the happy and sublime union of Oratory and Christianity!

THE THEATRE.

HAY-MARKET.

On Friday night, a striking instance of temerity was exhibited on the boards of this Theatre; and the truth of this maxim, "Audaces fortuna juvat," was never better proved than on this occasion. A Mrs. Beaumont, from the Glasgow Theatre made her first appearance as Belvidera, in "Venice Preserved," a character which Mrs. Siddons has raised by the excellence of her performance, high above the abilities of any actress of the present, and perhaps of future times. The rumoured secession of the British Melpomena from the stage, has incited a number of candidates for the tragic crown to start forth from the obscurity, in which they had spent the greatest part of their existence, and court the public gaze. To this sudden impulse we owe the introduction of Mrs. Mudie at Drury-lane, and that of Mrs. Beaumont at the Haymarket. The latter, we must confess, possesses more claims to our indulgence, if not approbation, than the former. In features she is not very unlike Mrs. Mudie, and therefore little calculated to impress us with awe. Her name must be written on the same leaf in the catalogue of years. She cannot boast the same pleasing lisp, but her voice is fully as harmonious: she surpasses her, however, greatly in propriety of action, and seems to feel and understand her part, and expresses her feelings and conception of it, with a superior degree of exactness and discrimination. In the scene in which she gives an account of Renault's misbehaviour to her husband, she was really good; but her grief was now and then too much like ranting. Her madness at the close of the piece was more natural than her acting in the former scenes had led us to expect. In a word, the chief requisites in which Mrs. Beaumont stands in need, are youth, and a better voice; did she possess these, her judgment and feeling seem such as to insure her future excellence. As she now is, she may rank among the respectable and useful, but never among the great performers. She was received with applause, so enthusiastically bestowed, and now and then so ill-timed, that we almost suspect it chiefly proceeded from the blind partiality of friends. But the plaudits of the whole house, unmixed with a single hiss, hailed the moment of her death.

Mr. C. Kemble, in Jaffier, rose to the highest pitch of Siddonian excellence. He was truly great, not only when compared with the secondary actors with whom he is generally ranked, but when put in competition with the abilities of a John Kemble, an Elliston, and a Young. He was really the hero of the night, although acting by the side of the celebrated Cooke. His excellence did not consist of momentary bursts, it was equal throughout, without a single moment of ranting or weakness. Such a performance we did not expect from him, and a more perfect we do not recollect having ever witnessed.

The part of Pierre is not calculated to bring Mr. Cooke's powers into action. The dignity of heroic guilt, he sinks into low born villainy. We cannot conceive why Mr. Young was not entrusted with this character, which would have served to exalt his fame, whilst it now proves a stumbling block in the way of Mr. Cooke's dramatic reputation.

CHRISTMAS!

Oh, Winter! ruler of the inverted year;
I crown thee king of intimate delights,
Fire-side enjoyments, home-born happiness!—Cowper.

The national rejoicings of the Jews were celebrated at the expiration of every seven years, but the national festival of Christmas occurs once during every year. Judaism had septennially its Jubilee—Christianity has annually its Christmas. What millions of human-beings have been looking forward to the day on which this incubration of mine appears! Persons of all descriptions and conditions, men and women and children, each and all have, perhaps for months past, anticipated the customary rites of the season at which we are now arrived.

Christmas is, indeed, admirably calculated for the enjoyment of domestic comforts; for the indulgence of innocent gratifications, and the promotion of social happiness. It ought to be the signal for assembling together the scattered relationships of humanity, for the full play of family feelings and affections. With this season should commence the reign of serene hilarity, of good-humoured cheerfulness, of generous hospitality. Let the melody of the heart now enliven our land. Tap the hoarded barrel, open the treasured bottles; and, chief of all, still let in all its pristine grandeur, give stability to the table and abundance to the guests. Not that I would deny, to our little masters and mistresses—the good young ladies and gentlemen of this charming age—some taste of their favourite mince pies, or two or three glasses of their dear mammas' best homebrewed wine. And now—

"Now, stir the fire; and close the shutters fast;
"Let fall the curtains; wheel the sofa round!"

Now for the frolics of the little-ones, and the chit-chat of their elders.—How many Christmases they have seen! how many more they may see! What has transpired during the year that is fast expiring, and what the next year will probably produce; when

"We next enquire, but softly and by stealth,
"Like conservators of the public health,
"Of epidemic throats—if such there are,
"And coughs, and rheums, and phthisic, and catarrh,
"That theme exhausted, a wide chasm ensues,
"Filled up, at last, with interesting news;—
"Who danc'd with whom, and who are like to wed,
"And who is hanged, and who is brought to bed:
"But fear to call a more important cause,
"As if 'twere treason against English laws."

Well! time, notwithstanding, passes tolerably away. Night comes. Much has been said, much done. The feast is half eaten, the ale is half drank, and the bottles are all exhausted. We, therefore, begin to think of separating; and may now ask, not without confidence,

"Is Winter hideous in a garb like this?"

What becomes of those numberless ones, however, who possess not the "garb" by which Winter is prevented from seeming "hideous" to others?—Charity, of course, takes cognizance of those who cannot provide for themselves. Many a noble and affluent personage still extends something like munificent hospitality, during this season of joyous inclemency, towards the poor; since so true is it, as Pope said, that

"what his hard heart denies,
"His charitable vanity supplies!"

So much for Christmas; though, as to myself, I here frankly confess it might be as well if this day, and some few following days, were well over!

It has sometimes posed me, and perhaps many of my readers, to discover how it came to pass that the great epoch of religious rejoicing should also be chosen as the time for balancing and settling the most troublesome concerns of civilized intercourse. Thousands, I am confident, would exult infinitely more heartily, than at present, [illegible] possibly can do, were matters otherwise regulated in this respect. Is it not even irreligious, to convert the season for spiritual gratulation into an occasion for temporal lamentation? I humbly move, therefore, that the settling of account-books, together with all preparations for paying rents and discharging unpaid bills, be changed—from Christmas, to Lent. These necessitous times fully warrant, if any consideration can warrant, the innovation that I have now recommended.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Dec. 20.

SITTINGS AT GUILDHALL.

CRIM. CON.

PARR v. BENSON.

The Plaintiff and Defendant in this case are both Merchants resident at Liverpool, and the action was brought to recover a compensation in damages for criminal connection with the Plaintiff's wife. Mr. Parke, for the Plaintiff, stated the case as is below detailed in evidence, and accompanied the statement with the usual observations on the magnitude of the injury sustained by the Plaintiff. The Defendant he said was well able to pay any damages which the Jury might award, as he had come into the possession of a large fortune; and he trusted the Jury would think this was a case of exemplary damages, inasmuch as the consequences of the conduct of the Defendant had caused a derangement of mind in the Plaintiff. The parties lived upon terms of intimacy and friendship, and it was from the opportunity afforded by this intimacy, that the Defendant found means to seduce the wife of his friend. The Plaintiff was married in the year 1798, and resided at the village of Billingden, about a mile from Liverpool. He went into the town most days at ten in the morning, and did not return until four to dinner. In the interval between those hours it would be proved, that the Defendant was constant in his visits to Mrs. Parr. But these were not the only visits he paid, for the Plaintiff being a very jovial man, had the Defendant constantly dining with him. Another circumstance of aggravation in the conduct of the Defendant was, that he was himself a married man, and had children;-he trusted that the Jury would think these circumstances of aggravation merited a severer visitation than ordinarily was called for. With respect, however, to the mental derangement of the Plaintiff, he admitted that the malady might in part be occasioned by a fever which he brought on himself by over exertions at the Liverpool Election, where he actively and warmly supported General Tarleton's interest.

The marriage of the Plaintiff and his wife was proved in the year 1798.

Mr. Carey and Mr. Dixon proved that the Plaintiff and his wife lived on harmonious terms.

Mr. Wilkinson, clerk to the Plaintiff, and who had been a confidential servant of his father's, said they lived on good terms. On cross examination, he said that the defendant frequently dined at their house, and always handed Mrs. Parr out of the room. He also usually followed her a short time afterwards. He once heard the Plaintiff say, come back Ralph and divert your time, and leave Mary to herself. Several other witnesses were called, who spoke nearly to the same facts, and that the Defendant and Mrs. Parr were frequently together, but they did not see any thing improper pass between them.

Mr. D. Parr, brother to the Plaintiff, also spoke to the affectionate manner in which the Plaintiff and his wife lived. He stated, that after the discovery of Mrs. Parr's infidelity, his brother became melancholy, and at length so deranged that he was obliged to be committed to the care of Dr. Chute of Liverpool. On cross examination by Mr. Garrow, he said that his brother had been deranged before that time, and he attributed it to his over exertions at the Liverpool election.

Jane Hughes, servant to the Plaintiff, said, in the year 1805 Mr. Benson was frequent in his visits at their house; she observed great familiarities between him and her mistress. One day she was in the cellar, under the parlour where Mr. Benson and her mistress were sitting, she heard her mistress say, "Don't, Benson; adone Benson." This raised her curiosity, and she went into the room where they were sitting, on pretence of asking whether they would have muffins for tea. She saw them on the sopha together in the act complained of. Other persons were called who proved familiarities, and traced Mrs. Parr at last to the house of Mr. Benson, at Lutwich Hall, in Lancashire, where she openly cohabited with the Defendant after leaving her husband.

Mr. Garrow, for the Defendant, contended it was not a case for damages, inasmuch as the Plaintiff had brought his misfortune on himself by his own misconduct in neglecting his wife, and exposing her to improper libertics, which he suffered to be taken with her in his presence, without remonstrance, or apparently caring for them.

To prove this, a Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Catharine Jones, and Phillips, a waiter at the White Line, Shrewsbury, were called, who proved the following facts: That in August 1806, Mr. and Mrs. Parr, and Mr. Benson, were at the Shrewsbury Races together. They could not be accommodated with beds at the White Lion, and were obliged to get beds at an adjoining house. Mr. Parr did not sleep with his wife, but in the best bed below, and Mrs. Parr slept in a bed without curtains close adjoining to Mr. Benson's bed room; but at that time Parr had a shade over his eyes, and appeared rather unwell. The waiters at the Inn at first thought Mrs. Parr was Benson's wife, but when they discovered she was Parr's, they made it a joke, that Benson paid for all, and kept both husband and wife.

Several other witnesses were called, who proved, that familiarities had passed in the presence of the Plaintiff, such as correctly ought not to have been passed over by a husband without notice.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH detailed the evidence at length, and said it was a case for their serious consideration; he left it for them to determine, whether the Plaintiff had been consenting to his disgrace, or whether he had not been culpably negligent.

The Jury found for the Plaintiff damages 1,000*l*. The damages were laid at 100,000*l*.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

A letter from Dover, dated the 22d instant, states, "that on the evening of the 21st it came on to blow tremendously hard from the S. W. attended by a heavy fall of snow, and it being very dark, no object whatever was to be discerned. In this gale the brig Jane, of Carmarthen, Capt. T. Jenkins, from Limerick, with butter, feathers, and hemp, bound to London, struck upon a rock between the South Pier Head and Shakespear's Cliff. The situation of the crew was most horrible. Without knowing whether they were near an enemy's country or that of friends, with their limbs so benumbed, that all power of action was done away with, and expecting every moment that the ship would go to pieces, the sole hope of preserving their lives, made them cling to the masts, but to no purpose, for the ship dashed to atoms, and every soul, except the Captain, was drowned; he was almost miraculously saved by getting on the bowsprit, and believes he was thrown from thence to the beach, where he wandered about from eleven P. M. till day-light, when he climbed the cliff and reached the town. I am sorry I have to add to this misfortune the loss of the brig Eleanor, Capt. Henderson, of Sunderland, with iron, supposed from Cardiff to London, which sunk nearly close to where the Jane went to pieces, and every person on board perished. Several of the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers have been picked up, and should the weather continue fine, most probably the others will be found."

MARGATE, Dec. 20.—After a dreadful blowing night, Sunday morning discovered a very distressing scene. The Apelles brig, built by the apprentices at Chatham, went on shore near the Sea-bathing Infirmary on Thursday morning last, and must, of course, be materially injured by the gale of last night. The Walpole East Indiaman went on shore near Margate on the 18th inst. at ten A.M. and though the ship is totally lost, the whole of the officers, crew, and passengers, got safe on shore. Mr. Sutton, the Chief Officer, had his arm badly fractured by the wheel, on the ship's striking. The greater part of the cargo is expected to be saved. Three other Indiamen had this morning the union jack downwards flying as signals of distress; it is supposed the men on board will be got out at low water (about 7 o'clock P.M.) There is a vast deal of damage done in sight of this place to the shipping.

The Union East Indiamen, for whose safety serious apprehensions had been entertained, anchored at St. Helen's on Thursday afternoon. She had lost her cables and anchors, and was driven over to the French coast, during the tempestuous weather.

A large fleet of light vessels, bound to London, last week, three leagues from the Dodgeon Lights, fell in with a French lugger, which attempted to board one of them; but, at that instant, the ship wore round, and struck the lugger in the midship with her stern, which sent her instantly to the bottom, and the whole of her crew perished.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.

Thursday, the informations against Mr. Woodfall, printer, of Paternoster-row, came on to be heard, agreeably to adjournment, before Sir Matthew Bloxham. This information was to recover a penalty of 20*l.* for not printing his name and place of abode to a certain paper printed by him, or supposed to be printed in his printing-house. It was a large posting-bill, containing libellous matter. The Duke of Sussex attended, to give evidence as to his knowledge of this bill and of Mr. Woodfall. He declared that he never saw Mr. Woodfall till that day; that he knew nothing of the bill produced, nor the hand-writing of the cover; this bill having been sent under a cover directed to a Mrs. Heig. The only proof to substantiate this information was the evidence of the Compositors and Pressmen in the employ of Mr. Woodfall, who could not swear that the bill produced was the same printed in their printing-office; when, after much altercation between the Counsel on both sides, the Magistrate decided, that the first information was not proved, and dismissed it. It being then past four o'clock, the Informer desired permission of the Alderman to postpone the hearing of the other informations, as some of his witnesses were absent. The farther hearing was, by mutual consent, postponed to the 19th of Jan.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPES.—A melancholy event occurred on Thursday at Pimlico, accompanied with very extraordinary circumstances. Mr. Man, a hair-dresser, who resided in Ranelagh-street, had, in consequence of a domestic misfortune, suffered mental derangement; but being, by medical aid, recovered, he some time since resumed his occupation. Thursday morning he attended, as usual, to dress and shave several gentlemen in his neighbourhood, by whom he was much esteemed. He had, in all, dressed and shaved nine of his customers, the last of whom was Mr. Palmer, of Drury-lane Theatre. Immediately upon his leaving Mr. Palmer, he returned home, without attending to any of his other employers, and cut his throat with one of his razors. The wound was so deep and extensive, that he died in a few moments. The gentlemen with whom he had been, al observed something very singular in his conduct, and there is not doubt that, during the whole of the morning, he was labouring under the terrible malady which induced him to put a period to his existence. Each of the nine has reason, therefore, to be thankful that the fatal razor was not applied to his neck before the unfortunate maniac raised it against his own.

An inquisition was taken on Wednesday, before A. Gell, Esq coroner for Westminster, at the house of Mordecai Levi, a Jew Cloathes-man, in Brydges-street, Covent-garden, on the body of Mrs. Popham, who died by poison on Saturday evening. It appeared by the testimony of Mr. Popham, husband of the deceased, who is a gentleman of fortune, that Mrs. Popham and himself were in the habit of taking laudanum; and that on Saturday evening Mrs. P. sent her servant to procure two ounces —she drank about an ounce and a half of the liquid, and died in agony in four hours afterwards. Messrs. Stanton and Cavell, Surgeons, were called in, and every means were used, but in vain.—Verdict, Accidental death.

As Mr. Monroe, the Portuguese Interpreter, was coming down the side of a ship, near the Custom-House Quay, at Plymouth, he slipped his foot, fell into the water, and was drowned.

MARRIED.

Last Sunday, the 18th instant, at Christ Church, Liverpool, Mr. Saroni, the celebrated Rope-Dancer, to Miss Cabanel, Daughter of Mr. Cabanel, Vauxhall, London.

DIED.

On the 19th inst. at his house in Sloane-street, Patrick Home, Esq. of Wedderburne, in the county of Berwick, many years Representative in Parliament for that county.

Wednesday night, at the age of 81 years, Hugo Meynell, Esq. so well known on the turf and in all the fashionable circles, for half a century past. He had been repeatedly attacked by paralytic strokes. He has left a large property behind him.
